This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

+ Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.

+ Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.

+ Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.

+ Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. You can search through the full text of this book on the web at `http://books.google.com/`

THE

WEEKLY REPORTER,

1895-96

(FORTY-FOURTH YEAR),

CONTAINING

CASES DECIDED IN THE SUPREME COURT OF JUDICATURE

WITH

APPEALS TO THE HOUSE OF LORDS AND THE PRIVY COUNCIL,

FROM THE 24TH OF OCTOBER, 1895, TO THE 12TH OF AUGUST, 1896.

TOGETHER ALSO WITH SOME CASES DECIDED PREVIOUSLY TO THAT PERIOD.

TO WHICH ARE ADDED

A DIGESTED INDEX

AND

A TABLE OF THE NAMES OF ALL CASES

REPORTED DURING THAT PERIOD,

WITH

REFERENCES TO CONTEMPORANEOUS REPORTS AND PUBLICATIONS.

VOL. XLIV.

EDITED BY
MARTIN JOSEPH BLAKE,
OF LINCOLN'S INN, BARRISTER-AT-LAW.

LONDON: 27, CHANCERY LANE, W.C.

1896.

ALEXANDER & SHEPHEARD,
Printers,
IONSDALE BUILDINGS, CHANCERY LANE.

94306

PREFACE.

In the forty-fourth volume of the WEEKLY REPORTER the characteristics of the publication will be found unaltered. Every endeavour has been made to render the reports succinct and accurate, and they have been published as soon as possible after the decisions have been pronounced. It is believed that the cases in this volume may be cited with the confidence which the Profession has always placed in the WEEKLY REPORTER.

The Annual Digest this year contains, in the same form as last year, a summary of all the cases published from the 24th of October, 1895, to the end of August, 1896, in the WEEKLY REPORTER, and in the Law Reports, the Law Journal Reports, and the Law Times Reports, besides some of those given in the Irish Law Reports. In the body of the Digest, figures following the name of a case denote the page in the WEEKLY REPORTER at which it will be found. Where the name of a case has no figures attached, the case is not reported in this volume of the WEEKLY REPORTER; but the references to the case in other series of Reports will be found in the Tabular Index to the Names of Cases.

LIBRARY
LELAND STANFORD JUNIOR UNIVERSITY

JUDGES AND LAW OFFICERS

FROM THE 24TH OF OCTOBER, 1895, TO THE 12TH OF AUGUST, 1896.

LORD HALSBURY, LORD CHANCELLOR.

LORD WATSON,
LORD MACNAGHTEN,
LORD MORRIS,
LORD DAVEY,
} LORDS OF APPEAL IN ORDINARY.

JUDICIAL COMMITTEE OF THE PRIVY COUNCIL.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR.
THE LORDS OF APPEAL IN ORDINARY.
LORD HERSCHELL,
LORD HOBHOUSE,
LORD SHAND,
SIR RICHARD COUCH,
} ADDITIONAL JUDGES ORDINARILY ATTENDING.

SUPREME COURT OF JUDICATURE—COURT OF APPEAL.

LORD ESHER, MASTER OF THE ROLLS,
SIR NATHANIEL LINDLEY,
SIR HENRY CHARLES LOPES,
SIR EDWARD EBENEZER KAY,
SIR ARCHIBALD LEVIN SMITH,
SIR JOHN RIGBY,
} LORDS JUSTICES OF APPEAL.

HIGH COURT OF JUSTICE—CHANCERY DIVISION.

SIR JOSEPH WILLIAM CHITTY.
SIR FORD NORTH.
SIR JAMES STIRLING.
SIR ARTHUR KEKEWICH.
SIR ROBERT ROMER.
SIR ROLAND VAUGHAN WILLIAMS.

QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION.

LORD RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN, CHIEF JUSTICE.
SIR CHARLES EDWARD POLLOCK.
SIR HENRY HAWKINS.
SIR JAMES CHARLES MATHEW.
SIR LEWIS WILLIAM CAVE.
SIR JOHN CHARLES DAY.
SIR ALFRED WILLS.
SIR WILLIAM GRANTHAM.
SIR ARTHUR CHARLES.
SIR ROLAND VAUGHAN WILLIAMS.
SIR JOHN COMPTON LAWRANCE.
SIR ROBERT SAMUEL WRIGHT.
SIR RICHARD HENN COLLINS.
SIR GAINSFORD BRUCE.
SIR WILLIAM RANN KENNEDY.

PROBATE, DIVORCE, AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION.

SIR FRANCIS HENRY JEUNE, PRESIDENT.
SIR JOHN GORELL BARNES.

SIR RICHARD EVERARD WEBSTER, ATTORNEY-GENERAL.

SIR ROBERT BANNATYNE FINLAY, SOLICITOR-GENERAL.

EDITOR AND REPORTERS.

1895—96.

EDITOR.

MARTIN JOSEPH BLAKE,

BARRISTER-AT-LAW.

REPORTERS.

HOUSE OF LORDS		CHARLES HARDMAN GRAFTON, Barrister-at-Law.
PRIVY COUNCIL		CHARLES HARDMAN GRAFTON, Barrister-at-Law.
COURT OF APPEAL (No. I.)		WILLIAM FREDERICK BARRY, FREDERICK GEORGE RÜCKER, FRANCIS OCTAVIUS ROBINSON, and EDWARD G. STILLWELL, Barristers-at-Law.
COURT OF APPEAL (No. II.)		WILLIAM SHALLCROSS GODDARD, ROBERT CUNNINGHAM MACKENZIE, ARNOLD GLOVER, WILLIAM SCOTT THOMPSON, FRANCIS ARTHUR MORTON, and JAMES IRVINE STIRLING, Barristers-at-Law.
CHANCERY DIVISION.	Mr. Justice Chitty	JOHN FELIX WALEY, RALEGH B. PHILLPOTTS, and GILBERT ROWLAND ALSTON, Barristers-at-Law.
	Mr. Justice North	G. BALDWIN HAMILTON and RICHARD SILLEM, Barristers-at-Law.
	Mr. Justice Stirling	WILLIAM SCOTT THOMPSON, JAMES IRVINE STIRLING, and FRANCIS ARTHUR MORTON, Barristers-at-Law.
	Mr. Justice Kekewich	FRANCIS THEODORE DUKA and CHARLES CARRINGTON HENSLEY, Barristers-at-Law.
	Mr. Justice Romer	JAMES WILLIAM GREIG and J. ARTHUR PRICE, Barristers-at-Law.
	Mr. Justice Vaughan Williams	VILLIERS DE SAUSSURE FOWKE, Barrister-at-Law.
QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION		Sir SHERSTON BAKER, Bart., and THOMAS REGINALD COLQUHOUN DILL, Barristers-at-Law. WILLIAM ERSKINE REID and CECIL G. WILBRAHAM, Barristers-at-Law. FRANCIS OCTAVIUS ROBINSON and EDWARD G. STILLWELL, Barristers-at-Law.
" (CASES IN BANKRUPTCY)		PAUL M. FRANCKE, Barrister-at-Law.
PROB., DIV., and ADM. DIVISION		(Prob. & Div.)—JOHN GERARD LAING, Barrister-at-Law. (Adm.) .....CHARLES FUHR. JEMMETT, Barrister-at-Law.
CROWN CASES RESERVED		THOMAS REGINALD COLQUHOUN DILL, Barrister-at-Law.

A. P

A TABLE

OF

THE NAMES OF CASES

REPORTED AND DIGESTED IN THIS VOLUME,

WITH REFERENCES TO THE CONTEMPORANEOUS REPORTS.

VOL. XLIV.

NOTE.—In the following Table the cases are arranged in the Alphabetical order of the PLAINTIFFS' names; but for convenience of reference, with respect to cases having double titles—e.g., In re Smith, Brown v. Jones—this Table gives the names of such cases under both titles.

Name of Case.	Court.	Page in W. R. 1895-96.	Column in Digest.	References to Contemporaneous Reports.
Aaron's Reefs v Twiss	H.L.	—	30	[1896] A. C. 273; 65 L. J. P. C. 54
Adcock v Evans. In re Allen	CH. D. CHI. J.	644	4	[1896] 2 Ch. 345
Agnew v Belfast Banking Co.	C.A. (I.)	—	58	[1896] 2 Ir. Rep. 204
Ainsworth v Wilding	CH.D. ROM.J.	540	127	[1896] 1 Ch. 673; 65 L. J. Ch. 432; 74 L. T. 193
"Albis," The	P.D. & A.D.	—	151	73 L. T. 664
Alcoy Railway Co. v Greenhill	C.A.	117	129	[1896] 1 Ch. 19; 65 L. J. Ch. 99; 73 L. T. 452
—— (No. 2)	CH.D. STI. J.	—	125	74 L. T. 345
Allcard v Walker. In re Lucas	CH. D. STI. J.	661	102	[1896] 2 Ch. 369; 65 L. J. Ch. 660; 74 L. T. 487
Allen, In re. Adcock v Evans	CH. D. CHI. J.	644	4	[1896] 2 Ch. 345
Allen v London County Council	C.A.	—	109	43 W. R. 674; [1895] 2 Q. B. 587
Alty v Ferrell	Q.B.D.	—	92	[1896] 1 Q. B. 636; 65 L. J. M. C. 115; 74 L. T. 492
Ambition Investment Society, In re	CH.D. WIL.J.	141	—	[1896] 1 Ch. 89; 65 L. J. Ch. 113; 73 L. T. 508
Andrews v Mockford	C.A.	—	30	[1896] 1 Q. B. 372; 65 L. J. Q. B. 302; 73 L. T. 726
—— (No. 2)	C.A.	—	124	65 L. J. Q. B. 302; 73 L. T. 730
Angerstein v Angerstein	CH.D. KEK.J.	152	68	[1895] 2 Ch. 883; 65 L. J. Ch. 57; 73 L. T. 500
Anglo-Austrian Printing Co., In re. Brabourne v Same	CH. D. WIL.J.	186	—	[1895] 2 Ch. 891; 65 L. J. Ch. 38; 73 L. T. 442
Arkwright v Arkwright	P.D. & A.D.	—	57	73 L. T. 287
Armstrong, In re	CH.D. STI. J.	281	155	[1896] 1 Ch. 536; 65 L. J Ch. 258; 74 L. T. 134
—— v Wilkin. In re Weeding	CH. D. NOR.J.	556	176	[1896] 2 Ch. 364; 74 L. T. 651
Arnold v Burt. Jeffery, In re	CH.D. NOR. J.	61	69	[1895] 2 Ch. 577; 73 L. T. 332
—— v Smith. In re Smith	CH.D. NOR. J.	280	180	[1896] 1 Ch. 171; 65 L. J. Ch. 269; 74 L. T. 14
Arton, Ex parte (No. 1)	Q.B.D.	238	65	[1896] 1 Q. B. 108; 65 L. J. M. C. 23; 73 L. T. 687
—— (No. 2)	Q.B.D.	351	64	[1896] 1 Q B. 509; 65 L. J. M. C. 50; 74 L. T. 249
Asfar v Blundell	C.A.	130	152	[1896] 1 Q. B. 123; 65 L. J. Q. B. 138; 73 L. T. 648
Assets Realization Co. v Trustees Insurance Corporation	CH. D. ROM. J.	126	164	65 L. J. Ch. 74
Athy Guardians v Murphy	V.C. (I.)	—	42	[1896] 1 Ir. Rep. 65
Atkinson v Carlisle (Mayor)	Q.B.D.	—	46	[1896] 1 Q. B. 393; 65 L. J. Q. B. 331
Attorney-General v Anderson. In re Wood	CH.D. ROM. J.	685	83
—— v Christ's Hospital	CH.D. CHI. J.	379	26	[1896] 1 Ch. 879; 65 L. J. Ch. 646; 74 L. T. 96
—— v Ellis	Q.B.D.	13	70	[1895] 2 Q. B. 466; 73 L. T. 350
—— v Jacobs-Smith	C.A.	—	70	43 W. R. 657; [1895] 2 Q. B. 341
—— v London Parochial Charities.	CH. D. STI. J.	395	23	[1896] 1 Ch. 541; 65 L. J. Ch. 242; 74 L. T. 184
—— v Mander	Q.B.D.	413	78	65 L. J. Q. B. 246; 74 L. T. 103
—— v Sudeley (Lord)	C.A.	340	76	[1896] 1 Q. B. 354; 65 L. J. Q. B. 281; 74 L. T. 91
—— v Wendt	Q.B.D.	—	69	43 W. R. 701 65 L. J. Q. B. 54; 73 L. T. 255

[Name of Case.	Court.	Page in W. R. 1895-96.	Column in Digest.	References to Contemporaneous Reports.
Badische Anilin, &c., Fabrik v Johnson	C.A.	308	132	[1896] 1 Ch. 25; 65 L. J. Ch. 174; 73 L. T. 523
Baerlein v Chartered Mercantile Bank	C.A.	—	123	43 W. R. 692; [1895] 2 Ch. 488; 65 L. J. Ch. 54
Baker v Stone. In re Stone	C.A.	235	173
Ballantyne v Mackinnon	Q.B.D.	—	81	65 L. J. Q. B. 395
Ballard v Halliwell	Q.B.D.	—	45	65 L. J. Q. B. 332
"Bangor Castle," The	P.D. & A.D.	—	153	74 L. T. 768
Banks and James' Trade-Mark, In re. Shakespeare case	CH.D. CHI. J.	32	160
Banque d'Hochelaga v Jodoin	P.C.	—	24	[1895] A. C. 612
Barber v Barber	P.D. & A.D.	—	56	[1896] P. 73; 65 L. J. P. D. & A. 58
Barnes, Ex parte	H.L. (E.)	433	39	[1896] A. C. 146; 65 L. J. Ch. 394; 74 L. T. 153
Barr, In re. Ex parte Wolfe	Q.B.D. BKCY.	586	16	[1896] 1 Q. B. 616; 65 L. J. Q. B. 504; 74 L. T. 555
Barraclough v Brown	C.A.	—	153	65 L. J. Q. B. 333; 74 L. T. 86
Barry v Peruvian Corporation	C.A.	487	123	[1896] 1 Q. B. 208; 65 L. J. Q. B. 191; 73 L. T. 678
Bartlett v Marshall	CH.D. ROM.J.	251	114
Bassano v Bradley	Q.B.D.	576	47	[1896] 1 Q. B. 645; 65 L. J. Q. B. 479; 74 L. T. 553
Bassett, In re. Ex parte Lewis	Q.B.D. BKCY.	240	15	[1896] 1 Q. B. 219; 65 L. J. Q. B. 144; 73 L. T. 736
Bates v Donaldson	C.A.	659	86	[1896] 2 Q. B. 241; 74 L. T. 751
——— v Kesterton	CH.D. CHI. J.	150	102	[1896] 1 Ch. 159; 65 L. J. Ch. 108; 73 L. T. 656
Battersea (Lord) v City of London Sewers Commissioners	CH.D. NOR. J.	124	91	[1895] 2 Ch. 708; 65 L. J. Ch. 81
Battison v Hobson. In re Hobson	CH.D. STI. J.	615	111	[1896] 2 Ch. 403; 65 L. J. Ch. 695; 74 L. T. 689
Baylis, In re	CH.D. CHI. J.	404	—	65 L. J. Ch. 418; 74 L. T. 337
———	C.A.	533	155	[1896] 2 Ch. 107; 65 L. J. Ch. 612; 74 L. T. 506
Baynes v Lloyd	C.A.	328	87	[1895] 2 Q. B. 610; 73 L. T. 250
Bean v Fowler	C.A.	—	124	73 L. T. 371
Beeman, In re. Fowler v James	CH.D. NOR. J.	247	1	[1896] 1 Ch. 48; 65 L. J. Ch. 190; 73 L. T. 555
Bell, In re. Jeffery v Sayles	C.A.	99	166	[1896] 1 Ch. 1; 65 L. J. Ch. 188; 73 L. T. 391
Bennett, In re. Jones v Bennett	C.A.	419	179	[1896] 1 Ch. 778; 65 L. J. Ch. 422; 74 L. T. 157
Berry, In re. Duffield v Williams	CH.D. STI. J.	346	128	[1896] 1 Ch. 939; 65 L. J. Ch. 245; 74 L. T. 306
Betjemann v Betjemann	C.A.	182	115	[1895] 2 Ch. 474
Biggerstaffe v Rowatt's Wharf	C.A.	536	31	[1896] 2 Ch. 93; 65 L. J. Ch. 536; 74 L. T. 473
Birch, In re. Ex parte Caucasian Trading Co.	C.A.	439	11	[1896] 1 Q. B. 368; 65 L. J. Q. B. 346; 74 L. T. 47
Birchall v Bullough	Q.B.D.	300	78	[1896] 1 Q. B. 325; 65 L. J. Q. B. 252; 74 L. T. 27
Bircham, In re	C.A.	—	156	43 W. R. 673; [1895] 2 Ch. 786
Bischop v Toler	Q.B.D.	189	7	65 L. J. M. C. 1, 4; 73 L. T. 402, 403
Bishop v Smyrna and Cassaba Railway Co. (No. 2)	CH.D. KEK. J.	—	28	[1895] 2 Ch. 596; 73 L. T. 337
Blake v O'Reilly	M.R. (I.)	—	179	[1895] 1 Ir. Rep. 479
Bloomenthal, Ex parte. In re Monnier (Veuve et Fils)	C.A.	577	—	74 L. T. 670
Board of Trade, Ex parte. In re Cornish	C.A.	161	18	[1896] 1 Q. B. 99; 65 L. J. Q. B. 106; 73 L. T. 602
———. In re Mardon	Q.B.D. BKCY.	111	18	[1896] 1 Q. B. 140; 65 L. J. Q. B. 111; 73 L. T. 489
Bolton v Aldin	Q.B.D.	—	45	65 L. J. Q. B. 120
Borrow v Howland	Q.B.D.	—	106	74 L. T. 787
Botton v City and Suburban Building Society	CH.D. STI. J.	12	23
Bovill v Endle	CH.D. KEK. J.	523	110	[1896] 1 Ch. 648; 65 L. J. Ch. 542
Bovril Trade-Mark, In re	C.A.	—	160	65 L. J. Ch. 715
Bower v Hett	C.A.	4	15	[1895] 2 Q. B. 337
Bowes, In re. Strathmore v Vane	CH.D. NOR. J.	441	177	[1896] 1 Ch. 507; 65 L. J. Ch. 298; 74 L. T. 16
Brabant v King	P.C.	157	113	[1895] A. C. 632
Brabourne v Anglo-Austrian Printing Co.	CH.D. WIL. J.	186	37	[1895] 2 Ch. 891; 65 L. J. Ch. 38; 73 L. T. 442
Bradford v Eastbourne (Mayor)	Q.B.D.	—	93	[1896] 2 Q. B. 205; 74 L. T. 762
Bradford (Mayor of) v Pickles	H.L. (E.)	190	172	[1895] A. C. 587; 73 L. T. 353
Brandreth v Colvin. In re Pitcairn	CH.D. NOR. J.	200	176	[1896] 2 Ch. 199; 65 L. J. Ch. 120; 73 L. T. 430
Bray v Ford	H.L. (E.)	—	131	[1896] A. C. 44; 65 L. J. Q. B 213; 73 L. T. 609
Brereton v Dav	M.R. (I.)	—	3	[1895] 1 Ir. Rep. 518
British Insulated Wire Co. v Prescot Council	Q.B.D.	224	95	[1895] 2 Q. B. 463; 65 L. J. Q. B. 190; 73 L. T. 383
British Wagon Co. v Gray	C.A.	113	132	[1896] 1 Q. B. 35; 65 L. J. Q. B. 75; 73 L. T. 498
Brook v Manchester, Sheffield, &c., Railway Co.	CH.D. CHI. J.	—	88	43 W. R. 698; [1895] 2 Ch. 571
Brooke v Inland Revenue Commissioners	Q.B.D.	670	77
Broom v Phillips	CH.D. KEK. J.	—	169	74 L. T. 459
Brougham v Brougham	P.D. & A.D.	—	56	[1895] P. 288
Brown, In re	LUN.	17	99	[1895] 2 Ch. 666; 73 L. T. 375

Name of Case.	Court.	Page in W. R. 1895–96.	Column in Digest.	References to Contemporaneous Reports.
Brown, Shipley, & Co. v Inland Revenue Commissioners	C.A.	—	78	[1895] 2 Q. B. 598; 73 L. T. 377
Brown v Stedman	CH.D. CHI. J.	458	113
Bryant, In the Goods of	P.D. & A.D.	—	134	[1896] P. 159
Buchanan v London and Provincial Marine Insurance Co.	Q.B.D.	—	81	65 L. J. Q. B. 92
Buckler v Wilson	Q.B.D.	220	7	[1896] 1 Q. B. 83; 65 L. J. M. C. 18; 73 L. T. 580
Building Estates Brickfield Co., In re. Parbury's case	CH.D. WIL. J.	107	40	[1896] 1 Ch. 100; 65 L. J. Ch. 104; 73 L. T. 506
Bulkeley v Stephens	CH.D. STI. J.	490	9	[1896] 2 Ch. 241; 65 L. J. Ch. 597; 74 L. T. 409
Buller v Giberne	CH.D. STI. J.	—	174	74 L. T. 406
Burgess v Morton	H.L. (E.)	—	130	[1896] A. C. 136; 65 L. J. Q. B. 321; 73 L. T. 713
Burnett v Berry	Q.B.D.	512	45	[1896] 1 Q. B. 641; 65 L. J. M. C. 118; 74 L. T. 494
Burnham, Ex parte. Reg. v Stewart	Q.B.D.	368	—	[1896] 1 Q. B. 300; 74 L. T. 54
Burrows, In re. Cleghorn v Burrows.	CH.D. CHI. J.	—	175	43 W. R. 683; [1895] 2 Ch. 497; 65 L. J. Ch. 52
Buralem (Mayor) v Staffordshire County Council	C.A.	356	93	[1896] 1 Q. B. 24; 65 L. J. Q. B. 1; 73 L. T. 651
Byles v Cox	P.D. & A.D.	—	136	74 L. T. 222
Cadogan Estate, In re	C.A.	—	85	73 L. T. 387
Caffin v Aldridge	C.A.	129	149	[1895] 2 Q. B. 648; 65 L. J. Q. B. 85; 73 L. T. 426
Cain v Moon	Q.B.D.	—	58	74 L. T. 728
Callander Hydropathic Co. v Marshall	H.L. (E.)	—	144	[1896] A. C. 223
Carew v Carew	CH.D. STI. J.	296	—	[1896] 1 Ch. 527; 65 L. J. Ch. 233; 74 L. T. 304
———	C.A.	700	177	[1896] 2 Ch. 311; 65 L. J. Ch. 686; 74 L. T. 501
Carey, In re. Ex parte Jeffries	C.A.	59	14	[1895] 2 Q. B. 624
Carter v Carter	CH.D. STI. J.	73	100	[1896] 1 Ch. 62; 65 L. J. Ch. 86; 73 L. T. 437
———	P.D. & A.D.	400	53	[1896] P. 35; 65 L. J. P. D. & A. 48
——— v Rigby	C.A.	566	47	[1896] 2 Q. B. 113; 65 L. J. Q. B. 537; 74 L. T 744
Cartwright v Del Balzo. In re Orford (Countess)	CH.D. NOR. J.	383	70	[1896] 1 Ch. 257; 65 L. J. Ch. 253; 73 L. T. 681
Caucasian Trading Corporation, Ex parte. In re Birch	C.A.	439	11	[1896] 1 Q. B. 368; 65 L. J. Q. B. 346; 74 L. T. 47
Chaddock v British South African Co.	C.A.	658	125	[1896] 2 Q. B. 153; 74 L. T. 755
Chadwick v Manning	P.C.	—	63	[1896] A. C. 231; 65 L. J. P. C. 42
Chamber Colliery Co. v Rochdale Canal Co.	H.L. (E.)	—	24	[1895] A. C. 564; 73 L. T. 258
Chapman, In re. Cocks v Chapman.	CH.D. KEK. J.	311	164	[1896] 1 Ch. 323; 65 L. J. Ch. 170; 73 L. T. 658
Charlesworth, Ex parte. Murgatroyd v Old Silkstone Coal Co.	CH.D. CHI. J.	198	—	65 L. J. Ch. 111
Charriere, In re. Duret v Charriere	CH.D. NOR. J.	539	83	[1896] 1 Ch. 912; 65 L. J. Ch. 460; 74 L. T. 650
Charterhouse School v Gayler	Q.B.D.	410	74	[1896] 1 Q. B. 437; 65 L. J. Q. B. 233; 74 L. T. 171
Chillingworth v Chambers	CH.D. NOR. J.	32	—
———	C.A.	388	164	[1896] 1 Ch. 685; 65 L. J. Ch. 343; 74 L. T. 35
Chippendale v Holt	Q.B.D.	128	81	65 L. J. Q. B. 104; 73 L. T. 472
Chitty v Maitland. In re Maitland	CH.D. NOR. J.	—	176	74 L. T. 274
Cholditch v Jones	CH.D. NOR. J.	124	156	[1896] 1 Ch. 42; 65 L. J. Ch. 83; 73 L. T. 528
Christ Church, Greenwich (Vicar of), In re. Ex parte London County Council	CH.D. NOR. J.	520	27	[1896] 1 Ch. 520; 65 L. J. Ch. 331; 74 L. T. 18
Clarke v Clarke	P.D. & A.D.	—	55	65 L. J. P. D. & A. 12
Clarke's Design, In re	C.A.	—	118	[1896] 2 Ch. 38; 65 L. J. Ch. 629; 74 L. T. 631
Clegg, Parkinson, & Co. v Earby Gas Co.	Q.B.D.	606	68	[1896] 1 Q. B. 592; 65 L. J. Q. B. 339
Cleghorn v Burrows. In re Burrows	CH.D. CHI. J.	—	175	43 W. R. 683; [1895] 2 Ch. 497; 65 L. J. Ch. 52
Cleveland's Estate, In re. Hay v Wolmer	CH.D. KEK. J.	—	178	[1895] 2 Ch. 542; 65 L. J. Ch. 29; 73 L. T. 313
Clifford v Inland Revenue Commissioners	Q.B.D.	—	76	[1896] 2 Q. B. 187; 74 L. T. 699
Clifton College v Thompson	Q.B.D.	410	74	[1896] 1 Q. B. 432; 65 L. J. Q. B. 231; 74 L. T. 168
Clutterbuck v Taylor	C.A.	531	61	[1896] 1 Q. B. 395; 65 L. J. Q. B. 314; 74 L. T. 177
Clutton v Attenborough	C.A.	114	19	[1895] 2 Q. B. 707; 65 L. J. Q. B. 122
Clydesdale Bank v Paton	H.L. (E.)	—	41	74 L. T. 738
Coalport China Co., In re. Ex parte Middleton & Bell	C.A.	38	36
Cochrane v Exchange Telegraph Co.	CH.D. CHI. J.	—	159	65 L. J. Ch. 334
——— v Macnish	P.C.	—	84	[1896] A. C. 225; 65 L. J. P. C. 20; 74 L. T. 109
Cocks v Chapman. In re Chapman	CH.D. KEK. J.	311	164	[1896] 1 Ch. 323; 65 L. J. Ch. 170; 73 L. T. 658
Coleridge's (Lord) Settlement, Re	CH.D. CHI. J.	59	146	[1895] 2 Ch. 704
Collinson v Jeffery	CH.D. KEK. J	311	130	[1896] 1 Ch. 644; 65 L. J. Ch. 375; 74 L. T. 78
Colman v Roberts	Q.B.D.	445	104	[1896] 1 Q. B. 457; 65 L. J. M. C. 63; 74 L. T. 198
Colonial Securities Trust Co. v Massey	C.A.	212	121	[1896] 1 Q. B. 38; 65 L. J. Q. B. 100; 73 L. T. 497
Common Petroleum Engine Co., In re. Elmer and MacArthur's cases	CH.D. ROM. J.	361	34	[1895] 2 Ch. 759; 65 L. J. Ch. 76; 73 L. T. 338

Name of Case.	Court.	Page in W. R. 1895-96.	Column in Digest.	References to Contemporaneous Reports.
Conolly, In the Goods of	P.D. & A.D.	—	134	74 L. T. 461
Constantine v Warden	C.A.	162	5	73 L. T. 450
Cook v Culverhouse. In re Culverhouse	CH.D. KEK. J.	—	64	[1896] 2 Ch. 251; 65 L. J. Ch. 484; 74 L. T. 347
—— v Hainsworth	Q.B.D.	541	92	[1896] 2 Q. B. 85
—— v White	Q.B.D.	409	6	[1896] 1 Q. B. 284; 65 L. J. M. C. 46; 74 L. T. 53
Cook's Mortgage, In re. Lawrence v Tyndall	CH.D. NOR. J.	646	160	[1896] 1 Ch. 923; 65 L. J. Ch. 654; 74 L. T. 652
Cooper v Pearse	Q.B.D.	494	86	[1896] 1 Q. B. 562; 65 L. J. M. C. 95; 74 L. T. 495
"Copernicus," The	P.D. & A.D.	—	—	[1896] P. 154; 65 L. J. P. D. & A. 61; 74 L. T. 431
——	C.A.	—	80	74 L. T. 757
Copland, In re. Mitchell v Bain	CH.D. NOR. J.	94	—
Cornish, In re. Ex parte Board of Trade	C.A.	161	—	[1896] 1 Q. B. 99; 65 L. J. Q. B. 106; 73 L. T. 602
Cotton v Vogan	C.A.	55	—	[1895] 2 Q. B. 652; 65 L. J. Q. B. 40; 73 L. T. 553
——	H.L. (E.)	—	68	65 L. J. Q. B. 486; 74 L. T. 598
Craig v Craig	P.D. & A.D.	—	56	[1896] P. 171
Creagh v Creagh	P.D. & A.D.	—	56	74 L. T. 430
Cremer v Lowles (Haggerston Election Petition)	C.A.	629	61	[1896] 1 Q. B. 504; 65 L. J. Q. B. 289; 74 L. T. 42
Crichton v Crichton	CH.D. NOR. J.	203	—	[1895] 2 Ch. 853; 65 L. J. Ch. 13; 73 L. T. 556
——	C.A.	—	167	[1896] 1 Ch. 870; 65 L. J. Ch. 491; 74 L. T. 357
Crofton, Ex parte. In re Nash & Sons	Q.B.D. BKCY.	112	15	[1896] 1 Q. B. 13; 65 L. J. Q. B. 65; 73 L. T. 477
Crompton v Burton	CH.D. NOR. J.	60	129	[1895] 2 Ch. 711
Crosland v Wrigley	C.A.	—	80	73 L. T. 327
Cross v London Anti-Vivisection Society. In re Foveaux Estate	CH.D. CHI. J.	—	25	43 W. R. 661; [1895] 2 Ch. 501
Cubison v Mayo	C.A.	473	46	[1896] 1 Q. B. 246; 65 L. J. Q. B. 267; 74 L. T. 65
Culling v Culling	P.D. & A.D.	—	100	[1896] P. 116; 65 L. J. P. D. & A. 59; 74 L. T. 252
Culverhouse, In re. Cook v Culverhouse	CH.D. KEK. J.	—	64	[1896] 2 Ch. 251; 65 L. J. Ch. 484; 74 L. T. 347
Dalmeyer, In re	C.A.	375	172	[1896] 1 Ch. 372; 65 L. J. Ch. 201; 73 L. T. 671
Darbyshire v Leigh	C.A.	452	129	[1896] 1 Q. B. 554; 65 L. J. Q. B. 360; 74 L. T. 241
Darling, In re. Farquhar v Darling	CH.D. STI. J.	75	26	[1896] 1 Ch. 50; 65 L. J. Ch. 62; 73 L. T. 382
Davis v Taff Vale Railway Co.	H.L. (E.)	172	138	[1895] A. C. 542
De Burgh's Estate, In re	CH.D. (I.)	—	63	[1896] 1 Ir. Rep. 274
De Hoghton v De Hoghton (No 1)	CH.D. STI. J.	—	—	43 W. R. 630; [1895] 2 Ch. 517
——	C.A.	550	75	[1896] 1 Ch. 855; 65 L. J. Ch. 528; 74 L. T. 297
—— (No. 2)	CH.D. STI. J.	635	121	[1896] 2 Ch. 385; 65 L. J. Ch. 667; 74 L. T. 613
Denney v Bennett	Q.B.D.	333	47
Dennis, In re. Ex parte Dennis	Q.B.D. BKCY.	170	18	[1895] 2 Q. B. 630; 65 L. J. Q. B. 48; 73 L. T. 413
Dennison v Jeffs	CH.D. NOR. J.	476	22	[1896] 1 Ch. 611; 65 L. J. Ch. 435; 74 L. T. 270
Derby County Council v Matlock Bath District Council	H.L. (E.)	—	95	[1896] A. C. 315; 65 L. J. Q. B. 419; 74 L. T. 595
Derbyshire County Council v Derby (Mayor and Corporation)	Q.B.D.	543	—	[1896] 2 Q. B. 53; 65 L. J. Q. B. 488
——	C.A.	—	125	74 L. T. 747
Derbyshire Silkstone Coal Co. v Midland Railway Co.	Q.B.D.	—	141	[1896] 1 Q. B. 260; 65 L. J. Q. B. 274
D'Errico v Samuel	C.A.	356	47	[1896] 1 Q. B. 163; 65 L. J. Q. B. 197; 73 L. T. 680
Deutsche Bank v Beriro	C.A.	—	20	73 L. T. 669
Dewhurst's Trade-Mark, In re	C.A.	672	161	[1896] 2 Ch. 137; 65 L. J. Ch. 618; 74 L. T. 388
Dibbins v Dibbins	CH.D. CHI. J.	595	42	[1896] 2 Ch. 348; 65 L. J. Ch. 724
Dickins v Gill	Q.B.D.	686	119
Dobell v Rossmore Steamship Co.	C.A.	37	148	[1895] 2 Q. B. 408
Dodsworth, In the Goods of	P.D. & A.D.	—	138	73 L. T. 315
Dorrell v Dorrell. In re Russell	C.A.	100	177	[1895] 2 Ch. 698
Douglas v Douglas	P.D. & A.D.	—	57	74 L. T. 384
Drax v Ffooks	Q.B.D.	78	—	[1896] 1 Q. B. 1; 65 L. J. Q. B. 77; 73 L. T. 407
——	C.A.	393	62	[1896] 1 Q. B. 238; 65 L. J. Q. B. 270; 74 L. T. 43
Drury v Army and Navy Co-operative Society	Q.B.D.	560	106	65 L. J. M. C. 169; 74 L. T. 621
Dubowski v Goldstein	C.A.	436	141	[1896] 1 Q. B. 478; 65 L. J. Q. B. 397; 74 L. T. 180
Dudgeon, In re. Truman v Pope	CH.D. STI. J.	—	25	74 L. T. 613
Duffield v Williams. In re Berry	CH.D. STI. J.	346	158	[1896] 1 Ch. 939; 65 L. J. Ch. 245; 74 L. T. 306

Name of Case.	Court	Page in W. R. 1895–96.	Column in Digest	References to Contemporaneous Reports.
Dunhill v North-Eastern Railway Co.	C.A.	231	88	[1896] 1 Ch. 121; 65 L. J. Ch. 178; 73 L. T. 644
Dunn v Reg.	C.A.	243	50	[1896] 1 Q. B. 116; 65 L. J. Q. B. 279; 73 L. T. 695
Duret v Charriere. In re Charriere	CH.D. NOR J.	539	83	[1896] 1 Ch. 912; 65 L. J. Ch. 460; 74 L. T. 650
Durnford, In re. Ex parte Durnford	Q.B.D. BKCY.	272	15	73 L. T. 583
Dyson and Fowke's Contract, In re	CH.D. KEK. J.	—	171	74 L. T. 759
Earnshaw v Earnshaw	P.D. & A.D.	—	53	[1896] P. 160; 74 L. T. 560
East Stonehouse Local Board v Victoria Brewery Co.	CH.D. NOR. J.	—	124	43 W. R. 585; [1895] 2 Ch. 514
Ebbetts v Conquest	C.A.	56	88
Edwards v Jenkins	CH.D. KEK. J.	407	66	[1896] 1 Ch. 308; 65 L. J. Ch. 222; 73 L. T. 574
Edwards v Walters	C.A.	547	20	[1896] 2 Ch. 157; 65 L. J. Ch. 557; 74 L. T. 396
Ellesmere Brewery Co. v Cooper	Q.B.D.	254	133	[1896] 1 Q. B. 75; 65 L. J. Q. B. 173; 73 L. T. 567
Elliot, In re. Kelly v Elliot	CH.D. CHI. J.	632	172	[1896] 2 Ch. 353
Elsner and MacArthur's Case. In re Common Petroleum Engine Co.	CH.D. ROM. J.	361	34	[1895] 2 Ch. 759; 65 L. J. Ch. 76; 73 L. T. 338
"Emerald," The	C.A.	—	151	[1896] P. 192; 65 L. J. P. D. & A. 69; 74 L. T. 645
Emsley v North-Eastern Railway Co.	C.A.	—	140	[1896] 1 Ch. 418; 65 L. J. Ch. 385; 74 L. T. 113
England, In re. Steward v England	C.A.	119	91	[1895] 2 Ch. 820; 65 L. J. Ch. 21; 73 L. T. 237
Escritt v Todmorden Co-operative Society	Q.B.D.	544	69	[1896] 1 Q. B. 461; 65 L. J. Q. B. 358; 74 L. T. 350
Exchange Telegraph Co. v Gregory	C.A.	—	44	[1896] 1 Q. B. 147; 65 L. J. Q. B. 262; 74 L. T. 83
Eyre v Wynn-Mackenzie	C.A.	273	122	[1896] 1 Ch. 135; 65 L. J. Ch. 194; 73 L. T. 571
Faber v Montagu. In re Montagu	CH.D. KEK. J.	583	165	[1896] 1 Ch. 549; 65 L. J. Ch. 372; 74 L. T. 346
Farnham, In re (No. 1)	LUN.	—	98	[1895] 2 Ch. 799; 73 L. T. 231
—— (No 2)	LUN.	465	98	[1896] 1 Ch. 836; 65 L. J. Ch. 456; 74 L. T. 214
—— v Milward	CH.D. STI. J.	135	98	[1895] 2 Ch. 730; 73 L. T. 434
Farquhar v Darling. In re Darling	CH.D. STI. J.	75	26	[1896] 1 Ch. 50; 65 L. J. Ch. 62; 73 L. T. 382
Finch v Oake	C.A.	—	171	[1896] 1 Ch. 351; 65 L. J. Ch. 324; 73 L. T. 716
Follows, In re. Ex parte Follows	Q.B.D. BKCY.	—	12	[1895] 2 Q. B. 521; 65 L. J. Q. B. 15
Fooks v Horner. In re Horner	CH.D. CHI. J.	556	83	[1896] 2 Ch 188; 65 L. J. Ch. 694; 74 L. T. 686
Ford v Stier	P.D. & A.D.	—	54	[1896] P. 1; 73 L. T. 632
Ford's Hotel Co. v Bartlett	H.L. (E.)	241	10	[1896] A. C. 1; 65 L. J. Q. B. 166; 73 L. T. 665
Fortune v Hanson	Q.B.D.	431	—	[1896] 1 Q. B. 202; 65 L. J. M. C. 71; 74 L. T. 145
Foveaux, In re. Cross v London Anti-Vivisection Society	CH.D. CHI. J.	—	25	43 W. R. 661; [1895] 2 Ch. 501
Fowler v James. In re Beeman	CH.D. NOR. J.	247	1	[1896] 1 Ch. 48; 65 L. J. Ch. 190; 73 L. T. 555
Francis v Boulton	Q.B.D.	222	81	65 L. J. Q. B. 153; 73 L. T. 578
Freme, In re. Freme v Hall	C.A.	164	178	[1895] 2 Ch. 778; 73 L. T. 366
Frewen v Law Life Assurance Co.	CH.D. NOR. J.	682	179
Frith v Frith	P.D. & A.D.	—	55	[1896] P. 74; 65 L. J. P. D. & A. 53
—— v Wilson. In re Wroe	CH.D. NOR. J.	—	176	74 L. T. 302
Fulham (Vestry) v Solomon	Q.B.D.	—	97	[1896] 1 Q. B. 198; 65 L. J. M. C. 33
Fuller v Blackpool Winter Gardens Co.	C.A.	—	44	[1895] 2 Q. B. 429; 73 L. T. 242
Furness Finance Co., Ex parte. In re Seaman	Q.B.D. BKCY.	496	17	[1896] 1 Q. B. 412; 65 L. J. Q. B. 348; 74 L. T. 151
Gallard, In re. Ex parte Gallard	C.A.	121	15	[1896] 1 Q. B. 68; 65 L. J. Q. B. 199; 73 L. T. 457
Galwey, In re	Q.B.D.	313	65	[1896] 1 Q. B. 230; 65 L. J. M. C. 38; 73 L. T. 757
Gardner v Hart	Q.B.D.	527	58
Gas Float "Whitton," The	C.A.	263	4	[1896] P. 42; 65 L. J. P. D. & A. 17; 73 L. T. 698
Gaskell v Gosling	C.A.	—	132	[1896] 1 Q. B. 669; 65 L. J. Q. B. 435; 74 L. T. 674
"Germanic," The	C.A.	394	5	[1896] P. 84; 65 L. J. P. D. & A. 53; 73 L. T. 730
Giles, In re. Jones v Pennefather	CH.D KEK. J	283	64	[1896] 1 Ch. 956; 65 L. J. Ch. 419; 74 L. T. 21
Gillespie & Co. v Cheney	Q.B.D.	—	144	[1896] 2 Q. B. 59
"Glenochil," The	P.D. & A.D.	—	148	[1896] P. 10; 65 L. J. P. D. & A. 1; 73 L. T. 416
Godfrey v George	C.A.	245	126	[1896] 1 Q. B. 48; 65 L. J. Q. B. 249; 73 L. T. 599
Godley's Estate, In re	CH.D. (I.)	—	105	[1896] 1 Ir. Rep. 45
Goodall v Goodall	CH.D. NOR J.	70	76	65 L. J. Ch. 65; 73 L. T. 379
Gooderou h, In re. Marland v Williams	CH.D. KEK. J.	44	83	[1895] 2 Ch. 537; 65 L. J. Ch. 71
Government Stock Investment Co. v Manila Railway Co.	C. A.	166	30	[1895] 2 Ch. 551

Name of Case.	Court.	Page in W. R. 1895-96.	Column in Digest.	References to Contemporaneous Reports.
Graham v Drummond	CH.D. ROM.J.	596	63	[1896] 1 Ch. 968; 65 L. J. Ch. 472; 74 L. T. 417
—— v O'Connor	CH.D. KEK. J.	—	43	73 L. T. 712
Grainger v Gough	H.L. (E.)	561	73	[1896] A. C. 325; 65 L. J. Q. B. 410; 74 L. T. 435
Grassmoor Co. v Midland Railway Co.	Q.B.D.	—	141	[1896] 1 Q. B. 260; 65 L. J. Q. B. 274
Gray v Gray	CH.D NOR. J.	406	71	[1896] 1 Ch. 620; 65 L. J. Ch. 462; 74 L. T. 275
Graydon, In re. Ex parte Official Receiver.	Q B.D. BKCY.	495	12	[1896] 1 Q. B. 417; 65 L. J. Q. B. 328; 74 L. T. 175
Great Northern Railway Co. v Coal Co-operative Society	CH.D. WIL. J.	252	21	[1896] 1 Ch. 187; 65 L. J. Ch. 214; 73 L. T. 443
Greatorex v Shackle	Q B.D.	47	46
Gribble v Webber. In re Webber	CH.D. NOR. J.	489	70	[1896] 1 Ch. 914; 65 L. J. Ch. 544; 74 L. T. 244
Griffin's Divorce Bill, In re	H.L. (E.)	—	55	[1896] A. C. 133
Griffith v Thompson. In re Thompson	CH.D. CHI. J.	582	172
Haggerston Election Petition, In re. Cremer v Lowles	C.A.	629	—	[1896] 1 Q. B. 504; 65 L. J. Q. B. 289; 74 L. T. 42
Haigh and London and North-Western Railway Co.'s Arbitration, In re	Q.B.D.	618	10	[1896] 1 Q. B. 649; 65 L. J. Q. B. 511; 74 L. T. 655
Halligan v Halligan	C.A. (I.)	—	52	[1896] 1 Ir. Rep. 245
Hancock, In re. Malcolm v Burford-Hancock	CH.D. KEK. J.	426	—	65 L. J. Ch. 276; 74 L. T. 217
——	C.A.	545	120	[1896] 2 Ch. 173; 65 L. J. Ch. 690; 74 L. T. 658
Hanks v Bridgman	Q.B.D.	285	162	[1896] 1 Q. B. 253; 65 L. J. M. C. 41; 74 L. T. 26
Hannan's Empress Gold Mining Co., In re	CH.D. STI. J.	—	133	74 L. T. 550
Harbin v Masterman	C.A.	421	172	[1896] 1 Ch. 351; 65 L. J. Ch. 195; 73 L. T. 591
Hardaker v Idle District Council	C.A.	323	113	[1896] 1 Q. B. 335; 65 L. J. Q. B. 363; 74 L. T. 69
Hardy, In re. Hardy v Farmer	CH.D. CHI. J.	503	14	[1896] 1 Ch. 904; 65 L. J. Ch. 461; 74 L. T. 403
Harkness and Allsop's Contract, In re	CH D. NOR. J.	683	170	[1896] 2 Ch. 358; 65 L. J. Ch. 726; 74 L. T. 652
Harling v Harling	P.D. & A.D.	—	54	74 L. T. 559.
Harper & Co. v Wright	C.A.	274	117	[1896] 1 Ch. 142; 65 L. J. Ch. 161; 73 L. T. 486
Harris, In re	Q.B.D. BKCY.	—	13	74 L. T. 221
Hart v Beard	Q.B.D.	154	62	[1896] 1 Q. B. 54; 65 L. J. Q. B. 157; 73 L. T. 535
—— v Stone. In re Hubbuck	C.A.	289	180	[1896] 1 Ch. 754; 65 L. J. Ch. 271; 73 L. T. 738
Harvey, In re. Harvey v Hobday	C.A.	242	112	[1896] 1 Ch. 137; 65 L. J. Ch. 370; 73 L. T. 613
Hassell v Stanley	CH.D. CHI. J.	405	130	[1896] 1 Ch. 607; 65 L. J. Ch. 494; 74 L. T. 375
Hay v Trinity House Corporation	Q.B.D.	188	153	65 L. J. Q. B. 90; 73 L. T. 471
—— v Wolmer. In re Cleveland's Estate	CH.D. KEK. J.	—	178	[1895] 2 Ch. 542; 65 L. J. Ch. 29; 73 L. T. 313
Heard v Heard	P.D. & A.D.	—	53	[1896] P. 188
Hellard, In re	CH.D. NOR. J.	475	156	[1896] 2 Ch. 229; 65 L. J. Ch. 550; 74 L. T. 457
Hemp, Yarn, and Cordage Co., In re	CH.D. WIL. J.	397	—	65 L. J. Ch. 322; 74 L. T. 136
——	C.A.	630	37	[1896] 2 Ch. 121; 65 L. J. Ch. 591; 74 L. T. 627
Henderson v Shankland	C.A.	401	152	[1896] 1 Q. B. 525; 65 L. J. Q. B. 340; 74 L. T. 238
"Hereward," The	P.D. & A.D.	288	6
Hewitt v Taylor	Q.B.D.	431	8	[1896] 1 Q. B. 287; 65 L. J. M. C. 68; 74 L. T. 51
Hickman v Berens	C.A.	—	41	[1895] 2 Ch. 638; 73 L. T. 323
Hiddle v National Fire and Marine Insurance Co. of New Zealand	P.C.	—	131	[1896] A. C. 372; 65 L. J. P. C. 24; 74 L. T. 204
Hides v Littlejohn	Q.B.D.	—	96	74 L. T. 24
Hill, In re. Hill v Pilcher	CH.D. KEK. J.	573	146	[1896] 1 Ch. 962; 65 L. J. Ch. 511; 74 L. T. 460
—— v Scott	C.A.	—	25	[1895] 2 Q. B. 713; 65 L. J. Q. B. 87; 73 L. T 458
Hill (Trustee of) v Rowlands	Q.B.D. BKCY.	—	12	[1896] 2 Q. B. 124; 65 L. J. Q. B. 542; 74 L. T. 556
Hill's Waterfall Estate and Gold Mining Co., In re	CH.D. STI. J.	—	40	[1896] 1 Ch. 947; 65 L. J. Ch. 476; 74 L. T. 341
Hinchliffe, In re	C.A.	—	100	73 L. T. 522
Hindley's Case. In re Hemp, Yarn, and Cordage Co.	C.A.	630	37	[1896] 2 Ch. 121; 65 L. J. Ch. 591; 74 L. T. 627
Hindson v Ashby	CH.D. ROM.J.	184	142	[1896] 1 Ch. 78; 65 L. J. Ch. 91; 73 L. T. 468
——	C.A.	—	—	[1896] 2 Ch. 1; 65 L. J. Ch. 515; 74 L. T. 327
Hirsche, Ex parte. In re South African Trust Co.	C.A.	—	50	74 L. T. 769
Hobson, In re. Battison v Hobson	CH.D. STI. J.	615	111	[1896] 2 Ch. 403; 65 L. J. Ch. 695; 74 L. T. 689
Hockin, In the Goods of	P.D. & A.D.	—	135	73 L. T. 316
Hockley v Ansah	Q.B.D.	666	122
Hodder v Williams	C.A.	98	147	[1895] 2 Q. B. 663; 65 L. J. Q. B. 70; 73 L. T. 394
Hoddinott v Home and Colonial Stores	Q.B.D.	285	75	[1896] 1 Q. B. 169; 65 L. J. Q. B. 291; 74 L. T. 79
Hodson v Heuland	CH.D. KEK. J.	684	158	[1896] 2 Ch. 428
Holt v Saunders. Trilby case	CH.D. NOR. J.	269	—	65 L. J. Ch. 142; 73 L. T. 572

Name of Case.	Court.	Page in W. R. 1895-96.	Column in Digest.	References to Contemporaneous Reports.
Holt v Saunders Trilby case	C.A.	369	160	[1896] 1 Ch. 711; 65 L. J. Ch. 410; 74 L. T. 225
Honywood, In the Goods of	P.D. & A.D.	256	135	[1895] P. 341; 65 L. J. P. D. & A. 14
Hood Barrs v Heriot (No. 1)	H.L. (E.)	481	101	[1896] A. C. 174; 65 L. J. Q. B. 352; 74 L. T. 353
—— (No 2)	C.A.	487	155	[1896] 1 Q. B. 610; 65 L. J. Q. B. 403; 74 L. T. 372
Hood's Trusts, In re	CH.D. NOR. J	382	3	[1896] 1 Ch. 270; 65 L. J. Ch. 372; 74 L. T. 77
Horner, In re. Fooks v Horner	CH.D. CHI. J.	556	83	[1896] 2 Ch. 188; 65 L. J. Ch. 694; 74 L. T. 686
Hornsey District Council v Smith	CH.D. KEK.J.	559	96	[1896] 2 Ch. 254; 65 L. J. Ch. 579; 74 L. T. 415
Horrocks v Stubbs	C.A.	—	116	74 L. T. 58
How v Winterton (Earl)	CH.D. KEK. J.	—	163	65 L. J. Ch. 415; 74 L. T. 277
Howard v Fanshawe	CH.D. STI. J.	—	87	43 W. R. 645; [1895] 2 Ch. 581
—— v Rowatt's Wharf	C.A.	536	—	[1896] 2 Ch. 93; 65 L. J. Ch. 536; 74 L. T. 473
Howarth v Sutcliffe	C.A.	33	46	[1895] 2 Q. B. 358; 73 L. T. 277
Hubbuck, In re. Hart v Stone	C.A.	289	180	[1896] 1 Ch. 754; 65 L. J. Ch. 271; 73 L. T. 738
Huber, In the Goods of	P.D. & A.D.	—	135	[1896] P. 209
Hudson v Cripps	CH.D. NOR. J.	200	88	[1896] 1 Ch. 265; 65 L. J. Ch. 328; 73 L. T. 741
Hull Rope Co. v Adams	Q.B.D.	108	142	65 L. J. Q. B. 114; 73 L. T. 446
Hunt v Worsfield	CH.D. NOR.J.	461	127	[1896] 2 Ch. 224; 65 L. J. Ch. 548; 74 L. T. 456
Hunter District Board v Newcastle Coal Co.	P.C.	—	114	[1896] A. C. 1; 65 L. J. P. C. 1; 73 L. T. 541
Huntington v Inland Revenue Commissioners	Q.B.D.	300	77	[1896] 1 Q. B. 422; 65 L. J. Q. B. 297; 74 L. T. 28
Imperial Japanese Government v Peninsular and Oriental Steam Navigation Co.	P.C.	—	84	[1895] A. C. 644
Isaacs v Chinery	Q.B D.	—	98	74 L. T. 320
Jackson v Parrott. In re Wise	CH.D. NOR. J.	310	165	[1896] 1 Ch. 281; 65 L. J. Ch. 281; 73 L. T. 743
Jackson v Rainford Coal Co.	CH. D. CHI. J.	554	28	[1896] 2 Ch. 340
James v Buena Ventura Nitrate Grounds Syndicate	C.A.	372	35	[1896] 1 Ch. 456; 65 L. J. Ch. 284; 74 L. T. 1
Jeffery, In re. Arnold v Burt	CH.D. NOR.J.	61	69	[1895] 2 Ch. 577; 73 L. T. 332
—— v Sayles. In re Bell	C.A.	99	166	[1896] 1 Ch. 1; 65 L. J. Ch. 188; 73 L. T. 391
Jeffries, Ex parte. In re Carey	C.A.	59	14	[1895] 2 Q. B. 624
Jenkins v Hope	CH.D. NOR.J.	358	117	[1896] 1 Ch. 278; 65 L. J. Ch. 249; 73 L. T. 705
Jessop v Smith	M.R. (I.)	—	159	[1895] 1 Ir. Rep. 508
Johnstone v Haviland	H.L. (E.)	—	144	[1896] A. C. 95
Jones, In re	CH.D. STI. J.	10	154	[1895] 2 Ch 719
——	C.A.	146	154	[1896] 1 Ch. 222; 65 L.J. Ch. 191; 73 L. T. 543
—— v Bennett. In re Bennett	C.A.	419	179	[1896] 1 Ch. 778; 65 L. J. Ch. 422; 74 L. T. 157
—— v Jones	P.D. & A.D.	—	55	[1896] P. 165
—— v Palmer. In re Nottage	C.A.	22	175	[1895] 2 Ch. 649, 657; 73 L. T. 269
—— v Pennefather. In re Giles	CH.D. KEK. J.	283	64	[1896] 1 Ch. 956; 65 L. J. Ch. 419; 74 L. T. 21
—— v Withers	C.A.	—	91	74 L. T. 572
Kavanagh v Working Man's Benefit Building Society	C.A. (I.)	—	112	[1896] 1 Ir. Rep. 56
Kelly v Elliot. In re Elliot	CH.D. CHI. J.	632	172	[1896] 2 Ch. 353
Kemp v Lester	C.A.	453	132	[1896] 2 Q. B. 162; 65 L. J. Q. B. 532; 74 L. T. 268
—— v Rozey. In re Sharland	CH.D. NOR. J.	—	110 175	[1896] 1 Ch. 517; 65 L. J. Ch. 280; 74 L. T. 20
—— (No. 2)	C.A.	—	173	74 L. T. 664
Kennedy v De Trafford	C.A.	454	110	[1896] 1 Ch. 762; 65 L. J. Ch. 465; 74 L. T. 599
Kershaw v Taylor	C.A.	28	107	[1895] 2 Q. B. 471; 73 L. T. 274
Killick v Graham	Q B.D.	669	71	[1896] 2 Q. B. 196
King v Victoria Insurance Co.	P.C.	592	79	[1896] A. C. 250; 65 L. J. P. C. 38; 74 L. T. 206
Kingston Cotton Mill Co., In re	C.A.	210	36	[1896] 1 Ch. 6; 65 L. J. Ch. 145; 73 L. T. 482
—— (No. 2)	CH.D. WIL. J.	363	—	[1896] 1 Ch. 331; 65 L. J. Ch. 290; 73 L. T. 745
——	C.A.	—	37	[1896] 2 Ch. 279; 65 L. J. Ch. 673; 74 L. T. 568
Kirby v Harrogate School Board	C.A.	—	144	[1896] 1 Ch. 437; 65 L. J. Ch. 376; 74 L. T. 6
—— v North British and Mercantile Insurance Co.	C.A.	529	127	[1896] 2 Q. B. 99; 65 L. J. Q. B. 527; 74 L. T. 723
Kirke v North. In re Wright	CH.D. KEK.J.	125	129	[1895] 2 Ch. 747; 65 L. J. Ch. 37; 73 L. T. 396
Kirkwood v Smith	Q.B.D.	480	20	[1896] 1 Q. B. 582; 65 L. J. Q. B. 408; 74 L. T. 423
Kissam v Link	C.A.	452	11	[1896] 1 Q. B. 574; 65 L. J. Q. B. 433; 74 L. T. 368
Knight v Simmonds	C.A.	580	168	[1896] 2 Ch. 294; 65 L. J. Ch. 583; 74 L. T. 563
Knox's Trusts, In re	C.A.	—	167	[1895] 2 Ch. 483
Konig & Ebhardt's Application, In re	CH.D. STI. J.	—	161	[1896] 2 Ch. 236; 65 L. J. Ch. 404
Kyffin v East London Waterworks Co.	Q B.D.	446	172	[1896] 1 Q. B. 446; 65 L. J. M. C. 60; 74 L. T. 141
Lampet v Kennedy. In re Tilt	CH.D. CHI. J.	—	146	74 L. T. 163
Lamson Store Service Co., In re. In re National Reversionary Co.	CH.D. STI. J.	42	29	[1895] 2 Ch. 726; 73 L. T. 311
Lancaster v Lancaster	P.D. & A.D.	—	—	[1896] P. 75; 74 L. T. 31

Name of Case.	Court.	Page in W. R. 1895–96.	Column in Digest.	References to Contemporaneous Reports.
Lancaster v Lancaster	C.A.	440	55	[1896] P. 118; 65 L. J. P. D. & A. 34; 74 L. T. 64
Land Securities Co., In re (No. 1)	C.A.	514	39	[1896] 2 Ch. 320; 65 L. J. Ch. 587; 74 L. T. 400
——— (No. 2)	C.A.	611	38
Lane v Lane	P.D. & A.D.	—	54	[1896] P. 133; 65 L. J. P. D. & A. 63; 74 L. T. 551
Langham, In re. Otway v Langham	CH.D. STI. J.	—	99	74 L. T. 611
Lavy v London County Council	C.A.	—	105	43 W. R. 677; [1895] 2 Q. B. 577
Lawes Chemical Manure Co. v Ingham	CH.D. STI. J.	—	122	74 L. T. 21
Lawledge v Tyndall. In re Cook's Mortgage	CH.D. NOR. J.	646	160	[1896] 1 Ch. 923; 65 L. J. Ch. 654; 74 L. T. 652
Lawson's Trusts, In re	CH.D. NOR. J.	280	3	[1896] 1 Ch. 175; 65 L. J. Ch. 95; 73 L. T. 571
Le Brasseur, In re. Ex parte Terrell.	CH.D. KEK. J.	—	155	74 L. T. 526
———	C.A.	—	—	74 L. T. 717
Lee v Flack	P.D. & A.D.	—	59	[1896] P. 138
Lee's Settlement Trusts, In re	CH.D. CHI. J.	680	167
Leigh, Ex parte. In re Stogdon	C.A.	—	14	[1895] 2 Q. B. 534; 65 L. J. Q. B. 47; 73 L. T. 279
Le Neve Foster v Fyfe	Q.B.D.	524	109	[1896] 2 Q. B. 104; 74 L. T. 784
Leonard, Ex parte. In re Leonard	C.A.	438	18	[1896] 1 Q. B. 473; 65 L. J. Q. B. 393; 74 L. T. 183
Lewis, Ex parte. In re Bassett	Q.B.D. BKCY.	240	15	[1896] 1 Q. B. 219; 65 L. J. Q. B. 144; 73 L. T. 736
Liddell v Liddell	H.L. (E.)	—	177	74 L. T. 105
——— v Lofthouse	Q.B.D.	349	67	[1896] 1 Q. B. 295; 65 L. J. M. C. 64; 74 L. T. 139
Liles v Terry	C.A.	116	157	[1895] 2 Q. B. 679; 65 L. J. Q. B. 34; 73 L. T. 428
Linden (Baron), In the Goods of	P.D. & A.D.	448	137	[1896] P. 148; 65 L. J. P. D. & A. 87
Linfoot v Pocket	C.A.	66	20	[1895] 2 Ch. 835
Lintern v Burchell	Q.B.D.	669	71	[1896] 2 Q. B. 196
Liquidation Estates Purchase Co. v Willoughby	C.A.	612	112	[1896] 1 Ch. 726; 65 L. J. Ch. 486; 74 L. T. 229
Little v Stephenson	H.L. (E.)	—	149	[1896] A. C. 108; 74 L. T. 529
Lloyds Bank v Bullock	CH.D. CHI. J.	633	111	[1896] 2 Ch. 192; 65 L. J. Ch. 680; 74 L. T. 687
Lloyd and North London Railway Co., In re	CH.D. STI. J.	522	139	[1896] 2 Ch. 397; 65 L. J. Ch. 626; 74 L. T. 548
Lloyd v Newell	CH.D. KEK. J.	43	170	[1895] 2 Ch. 744
Lock v Queensland Investment Co.	C.A.	257	35	[1896] 1 Ch. 397; 65 L. J. Ch. 301; 73 L. T. 720
London Clearing Bankers v Inland Revenue Commissioners	C.A.	516	77	[1896] 1 Q. B. 542; 65 L. J. Q. B. 372; 74 L. T. 209
London County Council, Ex parte. In re Christ Church, Greenwich (Vicar)	CH.D. NOR. J.	520	27	[1896] 1 Ch. 520
——— v Grove	Q.B.D.	599	72
——— v Lambeth Churchwardens	Q.B.D.	—	119	[1895] 2 Q. B. 511; 73 L. T. 408
———	C.A.	621	—	[1896] 2 Q. B. 25; 65 L. J. M. C. 148; 74 L. T. 605
——— v Pryor	Q.B.D.	—	105	[1896] 1 Q. B. 330
———	C.A.	—	—	[1896] 1 Q. B. 465; 65 L. J. M. C. 89; 74 L. T. 234
London and County United Building Society v Angell	Q.B.D.	—	109	65 L. J. Q. B. 194
London and General Bank, In re	C.A.	80	36	[1895] 2 Ch. 673; 73 L. T. 304
London and New York Investment Corporation, In re	CH.D. STI. J.	137	29	[1895] 2 Ch. 860; 73 L. T. 280
London and River Plate Bank v Bank of Liverpool	Q.B.D.	—	20	[1896] 1 Q. B. 7; 65 L. J. Q. B. 80; 73 L. T. 473
"Lord Bangor," The	P.D. & A.D.	—	152	[1896] P. 28; 65 L. J. P. D. & A. 6; 73 L. T. 414
Lord and Fullerton's Contract, In re	C.A.	195	165	[1896] 1 Ch. 228; 65 L. J. Ch. 184; 73 L. T. 689
Lough Neagh Ship Co., In re	M.R. (I.)	—	28	[1895] 1 Ir. Rep. 533
———. Ex parte Thompson	M.R. (I.)	—	33	[1896] 1 Ir. Rep. 29
Louis v Smellie	C.A.	—	103	73 L. T. 226
Louth District Council v West	Q.B.D.	—	94	65 L. J. Q. B. 535
Lowe v Volp	Q.B.D.	442	162	[1896] 1 Q. B. 256; 65 L. J. M. C. 43; 74 L. T. 143
Lucas, Re. Allcard v Walker	CH.D. STI. J.	661	—	[1896] 2 Ch. 369; 65 L. J. Ch. 660; 74 L. T. 487
Lynde v Anglo-Italian Hemp Spinning Co.	CH.D. ROM. J.	359	33	[1896] 1 Ch. 178; 65 L. J. Ch. 96; 73 L. T. 502
Lyons v Wilkins	C.A.	—	162	[1896] 1 Ch. 811; 65 L. J. Ch. 601; 74 L. T. 358
Macduff, In re. Macduff v Macduff	CH.D. STI. J.	344	—	65 L. J. Ch. 365; 74 L. T. 187
———	C.A.	—	26	65 L. J. Ch. 700; 74 L. T. 706
MacIver v Burns	C.A.	40	132	[1895] 2 Ch. 630
Mackeown v Boudard Peveril Gear Co.	CH.D. ROM. J.	664	34	65 L. J. Ch. 446; 74 L. T. 310
Maitland, In re. Chitty v Maitland	CH.D. NOR. J.	—	176	74 L. T. 275
Malcolm v Bickford-Hancock. In re Hancock	CH.D. KEK. J.	426	—	65 L. J. Ch. 276; 74 L. T. 217
———	C.A.	545	120	[1896] 2 Ch. 173; 65 L. J. Ch. 690; 74 L. T. 658
Manchester Trust v Furness & Co.	C.A.	178	148	[1895] 2 Q. B. 539

Name of Case.	Court.	Page in W. R. 1895–96.	Column in Digest.	References to Contemporaneous Reports.
Mansion House Association of Railway Traffic v London and North-Western Railway Co.	Q.B.D.	—	141	[1896] 1 Q. B. 273; 65 L. J. Q. B. 209; 74 L. T 463
"Maori King," The v Hughes	C.A.	2	147	[1895] 2 Q. B. 550; 65 L. J. Q. B. 168
Mapperley Colliery Co. v Midland Railway Co.	Q.B.D.	—	141	65 L. J. Q. B. 272
Mara v Browne	C.A.	330	164	[1896] 1 Ch. 199; 65 L. J. Ch. 225; 73 L. T. 638
Mardon, In re. Ex parte Board of Trade.	Q.B.D. BKCY.	111	18	[1896] 1 Q. B. 140; 65 L. J. Q. B. 111; 73 L. T. 480
"Maréchal Suchet," The	P.D. & A.D.	—	5	74 L. T. 789
Margetts, In re	CH.D. KEK.J.	462	156	[1896] 2 Ch. 263; 65 L. J. Ch. 479; 74 L. T. 309
Marland v Williams. In re Goodenough	CH.D. KEK. J.	44	83	[1895] 2 Ch. 537; 65 L. J. Ch. 71
Marsden v Moser	H.L. (E.)	—	117	73 L. T. 667
Marsh v Joseph	CH. D. KEK.J.	462	157	74 L. T. 412
Marshall v Orpen	P C.	—	25	[1895] A. C. 606
Marshland Smeeth District Commissioners v Marshland District Council	Q.B.D.	—	94	65 L. J. Q. B. 185; 73 L. T. 563
Mastell and Goldfinch's Contract, In re	CH. D. STI. J	—	169	43 W. R. 620; [1895] 2 Ch. 525
Mason's Orphanage and London and North-Western Railway Co., In re	CH. D. STI. J.	61	—	[1896] 1 Ch. 54; 73 L. T. 465
———	C.A.	339	26	[1896] 1 Ch. 506; 65 L. J. Ch. 439; 74 L. T. 161
Mayville (La Compagnie de) v Whitley	C.A.	568	32	[1896] 1 Ch. 788; 74 L. T. 441
McAuliffe, In the Goods of	P.D. & A.D.	304	134	[1895] P. 290
McCord v Cammell	H.L. (E.)	—	104	[1896] A. C. 57; 65 L. J. Q. B. 202; 73 L. T. 634
McDonnell v Broderick	C.A. (I.)	—	91	[1896] 2 Ir. Rep 136
McHenry v McHenry	C.A. (I.)	—	123	[1896] 1 Ir. Rep. 60
McMahon v Gaussen	V.C. (I.)	—	120	[1896] 1 Ir. Rep. 143
McSwaine v Lascelles	P.C.	—	138	[1895] A. C. 618
Melville v Mirror of Life Co.	CH. D. KEK.J	—	45	[1895] 2 Ch. 531; 65 L. J. Ch. 41; 73 L. T. 334
Metropolitan Coal Consumers' Association v Scrimgeour	C.A.	35	40	[1895] 2 Q. B. 604; 65 L. J. Q. B. 22
Metropolitan District Railway v Fulham Vestry	C.A.	53	108	[1895] 2 Q. B. 443; 65 L. J. Q. B. 29; 73 L. T. 330
Meux v City of London Electric Lighting Co.	C.A.	198	140
——— v Great Eastern Railway Co.	C.A.	—	140	43 W. R. 680; [1895] 2 Q. B. 387; 73 L. T. 247
Middlesex County Council v St. George's Union Assessment Committee	Q.B.D.	666	119	[1896] 2 Q. B. 143; 65 L. J. M. C. 141
Middleton and Bell, Ex parte. In re Coalport China Co.	C A.	38	36
Middleton v Bradley	CH.D. STI. J.	—	116	43 W. R. 684; [1895] 2 Ch. 716
Mid-Kent Fruit Factory, In re	CH.D. WIL. J.	284	39	[1896] 1 Ch. 567; 65 L. J. Ch. 250; 74 L. T. 23
Midland Railway Co. v Gribble	C.A.	133	140	[1895] 2 Ch. 827; 73 L. T. 270
Miller v Collins	C.A.	466	101	[1896] 1 Ch. 573; 65 L. J. Ch. 353; 74 L. T. 122
Mills' Trust, In re	C.A.	21	13	[1895] 2 Ch. 564; 73 L. T. 229
Minchin v Gabbett	M.R. (I.)	—	176	[1896] 1 Ir. Rep. 1
Mitchell v Bain. In re Copland	CH.D. NOR. J.	94	—
——— v Reg.	C.A.	—	50	[1896] 1 Q. B. 121n
Monnier (Veuve et Fils), In re. Ex parte Bloomenthal	C.A.	577	33	74 L. T. 670
Monsen v Macfarlane	C.A.	—	149	[1895] 2 Q. B. 562; 65 L. J. Q. B. 57; 73 L. T. 548
Montagu, In re. Faber v Montagu	CH D. KEK.J.	583	165	[1896] 1 Ch. 549; 65 L. J. Ch. 372; 74 L. T. 346
Montgomery v Foy	C.A.	—	5	43 W. R. 691; 65 L. J. Q. B. 18
Moore v Pearce's Dining Rooms	Q.B.D.	94	6	[1895] 2 Q. B. 657; 65 L. J. M. C. 7; 73 L. T. 400
——— v Smith	C.A. (I.)	—	1	[1895] 1 Ir. Rep. 512
Moran v Place	C.A.	593	102	[1896] P. 214; 65 L. J. P. D. & A. 83; 74 L. T. 661
Morgan, In re. Ex parte Turner	Q. B. D. BKCY.	96	18	73 L. T. 448
——— v Richardson. In re Richardson	CH. D. NOR. J.	279	64	[1896] 1 Ch. 512; 65 L. J. Ch. 512; 74 L. T. 12
Morley, In re. Morley v Haig	CH. D. KEK.J.	140	180	[1895] 2 Ch. 738
——— v Leacroft	P.D. & A.D.	—	60	[1896] P. 92
Morris v Official Assignee of Cooke	P.C.	65	21	[1895] A. C. 625
Mortgage Insurance Corporation v Pound	H.L. (E.)	—	83	65 L. J. Q. B. 129
Moses v Parker. Ex parte Moses	P.C.	—	159	[1896] A. C. 245; 65 L. J. P. C. 18; 74 L. T. 112
Mount Cashell v More Smyth	H.L. (E.)	—	11	[1896] A. C. 158; 65 L. J. Ch. 12; 74 L. T. 321
Mowbray v Merryweather	C.A.	49	51	[1895] 2 Q. B. 640; 65 L. J. Q. B. 50; 73 L. T. 459
Munkittrick v Perryman	Q B.D.	—	32	74 L. T. 149
Murgatroyd v Old Silkstone Coal Co. Ex parte Charlesworth	CH.D. CHI. J.	198	86	65 L. J. Ch. 111
Murray, In the Goods of	P.D. & A.D.	414	135	[1896] P. 65; 65 L. J. P. D. & A. 49
Nash & Sons, In re. Ex parte Crofton	Q.B.D. BKCY.	112	15	[1896] 1 Q. B. 13; 65 L. J. Q. B. 65; 73 L. T. 477
National Provincial Bank of England, Ex parte. In re Sass	Q.B.D. BKCY.	588	17	[1896] 2 Q. B. 12; 65 L. J. Q. B. 481; 74 L. T. 383
National Reversionary Co., In re. In re Lawson Street Service Co.	CH.D. STI.J.	42	29	[1895] 2 Ch. 726; 73 L. T. 311

Name of Case.	Court.	Page in W. R. 1894–95.	Column in Digest.	References to Contemporaneous Reports.
Newcomb v Newcomb	P.D. & A.D.	—	137	73 L. T. 317
Newman v Lamport	Q.B.D.	—	150	[1896] 1 Q. B. 20; 65 L. J. Q. B. 102; 73 L. T. 473
New South Wales (Attorney-General) v Rennie	P.C.	—	114	[1896] A. C. 376; 65 L. J. P. C. 52; 74 L. T. 532
Newton, In re	C.A.	470	69	[1896] 1 Ch. 740; 65 L. J. Ch. 641; 73 L. T. 692
—— v Newton	P.D & A.D.	—	52	[1896] P. 36; 65 L. J. P. D. & A. 16
Newton Heath (Rector), Ex parte	CH. D. NOR. J.	645	89
New Union Mill Co. v Great Western Railway Co.	Q.B.D.	—	140	65 L. J. Q. B. 493; 74 L. T. 791
Nicol v Hennessey	Q.B.D.	584	43
Noel v Redruth Foundry Co.	Q.B.D.	407	103	[1896] 1 Q. B. 453; 65 L. J. Q. B. 330; 74 L. T. 196
Norton v Dashwood	CH. D. CHI. J.	680	63
Norwich Fire Insurance Co. v Magee.	Q.B.D.	384	73	73 L. T. 733
Nottage, In re. Jones v Palmer	C.A.	22	175	[1895] 2 Ch. 649, 657; 73 L. T. 269
Nourse v Liverpool Sailing-ship Owners' Protection Association	C.A.	500	81	[1896] 2 Q. B. 16; 65 L. J. Q. B. 507; 74 L. T. 543
Oakey, In the Goods of	P.D. & A.D.	432	134	[1896] P. 7; 65 L. J. P. D. & A. 38
Odhams v Brunning	C.A.	—	129	74 L. T. 370
Official Receiver, Ex parte. In re Graydon	Q.B.D. BKCY.	495	12	[1896] 1 Q. B. 417; 65 L. J. Q. B. 328; 74 L. T. 175
——. In re Smith and Hartogs	Q.B.D. BKCY.	79	16
Ogilvie v West Australian Mortgage and Agency Association	P.C.	—	10	[1896] A. C. 257; 65 L. J. P. C. 46; 74 L. T. 201
Ogston v Stewart	H.L. (E.)	—	66	[1896] A. C. 187
Oldroyd v Oldroyd	P.D. & A.D.	—	53	[1896] P. 175
O'Neil v Armstrong	C.A.	—	104	[1895] 2 Q. B. 418; 65 L. J. Q. B. 7
Ontario (Attorney-General) v Dominion Attorney-General	P.C.	—	24	[1896] A. C. 348; 65 L. J. P. C. 26; 74 L. T. 533
Orford (Countess), In re. Cartwright v Del Balzo	CH. D. NOR. J.	383	70	[1896] 1 Ch. 257; 65 L. J. Ch. 253; 73 L. T. 681
Osborne v Chocqueel	Q.B.D.	575	57	[1896] 2 Q. B. 109; 65 L. J. Q. B. 534; 74 L. T. 786
Otway v Langham	CH. D. STI. J.	—	99	74 L. T. 611
Overton v Burn	C.A.	—	126	74 L. T. 776
Page v Ratliffe	CH. D. STI. J.	—	115	74 L. T. 343
Pain v Bowden	Q.B.D.	—	46	65 L. J. Q. B. 530
Palmer v Bramley	C.A.	—	86	[1895] 2 Q. B. 405; 65 L. J. Q. B. 42; 73 L. T. 329
—— v Day	Q.B.D.	14	18	[1895] 2 Q. B. 618
Panther Lead Co., In re.	CH. D. ROM. J.	573	38	[1896] 1 Ch. 978; 65 L. J. Ch. 499
Parbury's case. Building Estates Brickfields Co., In re	CH. D. WIL. J.	107	40	[1896] 1 Ch. 100; 65 L. J. Ch. 104; 73 L. T. 506
"Paris," The	P.D. & A.D.	—	158	[1896] P. 77; 65 L. J. P. D. & A. 42; 73 L. T. 736
Parry v Parry	P.D. & A.D.	—	52	[1896] P. 37; 65 L. J. P. D. & A. 35; 73 L. T. 759
Paterson v Gas Light and Coke Co.	C.A.	—	68	65 L. J. Ch. 709; 74 L. T. 640
Payne v Stamford. In re Stamford (Earl of)	CH. D. STI. J.	249	—	[1896] 1 Ch. 288; 65 L. J. Ch. 134; 73 L. T. 559
—— v Wilson	C.A.	—	143	43 W. R. 657; [1895] 2 Q. B. 537; 65 L. J. Ch. 150
Peace v Brookes	Q.B.D.	—	22	[1895] 2 Q. B. 451; 72 L. T. 798
Pearce v Bunting. Reg. v Wedd	Q.B.D.	—	142	65 L. J. M. C. 131
Pearson v Belgian Mills Co.	Q.B.D.	334	65	[1896] 1 Q. B. 244; 65 L. J. M. C. 48; 74 L. T. 101
Peebles v Oswaldtwistle Urban District Council	C.A.	513	128	[1896] 2 Q. B. 159; 65 L. J. Q. B. 499; 74 L. T. 721
Pegge v Neath Tramways Co.	CH. D. NOR. J.	72	163	[1895] 2 Ch. 508
——.	C.A.	—	—	[1896] 1 Ch. 684; 65 L. J. Ch. 536
Pembroke (Earl) v Warren	C.A. (I.)	—	87	[1896] 1 Ir. Rep. 104
Peninsular and Oriental Steam Navigation Co. v Tsune Kijima	P.C.	—	128	[1895] A. C. 661
Pertwee v Townsend	Q.B.D.	—	58	[1896] 2 Q. B. 129
Petersen v Freebody	C.A.	5	150	65 L. J. Q. B. 12
Phillips v Evans	Q.B.D.	429	71	[1896] 1 Q. B. 305; 65 L. J. M. C. 101; 74 L. T. 314
——, In re. Ex parte Treboeth Brick Co.	Q.B.D. BKCY.	—	14	[1896] 2 Q. B. 122
Piercy, In re. Whitwham v Piercy	CH. D. NOR. J.	—	26	65 L. J. Ch. 364; 73 L. T. 732
Pilling v Joint-Stock Institute	C.A.	—	124	73 L. T. 570
Pitcairn, In re. Brandreth v Colvin	CH. D. NOR. J.	200	176	[1896] 2 Ch. 199; 65 L. J. Ch. 120; 73 L. T. 430
Pledge v White	H.L. (E.)	389	110	[1896] A. C. 187; 65 L. J. Ch. 449; 74 L. T. 323
Pletts v Beattie	Q.B.D.	—	90	[1896] 1 Q. B. 519; 65 L. J. M. C. 86; 74 L. T. 148

Name of Case.	Court.	Page in W. R. 1895-96.	Column in Digest.	References to Contemporaneous Reports.
Platts v Campbell	Q.B.D.	—	90	73 L. T. 344
Pocock's Contract, In re	CH.D. STI. J.	247	146	[1896] 1 Ch. 302; 65 L. J. Ch. 211; 73 L. T. 706
Police Commissioners v Cartman	Q.B.D.	637	90	[1896] 1 Q. B. 655; 65 L. J. M. C. 113; 74 L. T. 726
Pollard's Settlement, In re	CH.D. CHI. J.	474	101	[1896] 1 Ch. 901; 65 L. J. Ch. 496; 74 L. T. 374
"Pomeranian," The	P.D. & A.D.	—	81	[1895] P. 349; 65 L. J. P. D. & A. 39
"Pongola," The	P.D. & A.D.	—	4	73 L. T. 512
Ponsonby, In the Goods of	P.D. & A.D.	240	134	[1895] P. 287
Poppleton and Jones' Contract, In re	CH.D. NOR. J.	—	168	74 L. T. 582
Porter v Walsh	C.A. (I.)	—	58	[1896] 1 Ir. Rep. 148
Portland Urban District Council and Tilley's Arbitration, In re	Q.B.D	—	122	[1896] 2 Q. B. 98; 65 L. J. Q. B. 527; 74 L. T. 703
Powell v Birmingham Vinegar Brewery Co.	C.A.	688	161	[1896] 2 Ch. 54; 65 L. J. Ch. 563; 74 L. T. 509
Powell & Sons, In re	CH.D. ROM. J.	618	38	[1896] 1 Ch. 681; 65 L. J. Ch. 454; 74 L. T. 220
Preservation Syndicate, In re	CH.D. WIL. J.	—	40	[1895] 2 Ch. 768; 73 L. T. 341
Price v South Metropolitan Gas Co.	Q.B.D.	—	112	65 L. J. Q. B. 126
Pugh v London, Brighton, and South Coast Railway Co.	C.A.	627	79	[1896] 2 Q. B. 248; 65 L. J. Q. B. 521; 74 L. T. 724
Purrett, In re. Ex parte Purrett	Q.B.D. BKCY.	171	17
Ray, In re	LUN.	353	99	[1896] 1 Ch. 468; 65 L. J. Ch. 316; 73 L. T. 723
Reddaway v Banham	H L. (E.)	638	161	[1896] A. C. 199; 65 L. J. Q. B. 381; 74 L. T. 289
"Red Sea," The	C.A.	306	80	[1896] P. 20; 65 L. J. P. D. & A. 9; 73 L. T. 462
Rees v De Bernardby	CH.D. ROM.J.	—	43	[1896] 2 Ch. 437; 65 L. J. Ch. 656; 74 L. T. 585
Reg. v Anglesea Justices	Q.B.D.	—	89	65 L. J. M. C. 12
—— v Antrim Justices	Q.B.D. (I.)	—	84	[1895] 2 Ir. Rep. 603
—— v Armstrong	Q.B.D.	—	89	65 L. J. M. C. 35
—— v Bexley Heath Railway Co.	C.A.	501	139	[1896] 2 Q. B. 74; 65 L. J. Q. B. 469; 74 L. T. 540
—— v Bradford Justices	Q.B.D.	—	89	74 L. T. 287
—— v Erdheim	C.C.R.	607	48	74 L. T. 734
—— v Evans	Q.B.D.	271	19	[1896] 1 Q. B. 228; 65 L. J. M. C. 29
—— v Farnborough	C.C.R.	48	49	[1895] 2 Q. B. 484; 73 L. T. 351
—— v Gaunt	C.C.R.	—	48	73 L. T. 585
—— v Hehir	C.C.R. (I.)	—	49	[1895] 2 Ir. Rep. 709
—— v Hopkins	C.C.R.	585	48	[1896] 1 Q. B. 652; 65 L. J. M. C. 125
—— v Incorporated Law Society	Q.B.D.	—	154	43 W. R. 687; [1895] 2 Q. B. 456
—— (No. 2)	C.A.	307	158	[1896] 1 Q. B. 327; 65 L. J. Q. B. 326; 74 L. T. 67
—— v Jennings. Ex parte Symons	Q.B.D.	128	85	[1896] 1 Q. B. 64; 65 L. J. M. C. 26; 73 L. T. 412
—— v Jones	C.C.R.	110	48	[1896] 1 Q. B. 4; 65 L. J. M. C. 28; 73 L. T. 584
—— v Kent Justices	Q.B.D.	603	85	[1896] 2 Q. B. 1; 65 L. J. M. C. 138; 74 L. T. 618
—— v Lewis and Moss	Q.B.D.	—	171	[1896] 1 Q. B. 665; 65 L. J. M. C. 126; 74 L. T. 551
—— v Lillyman	C.C.R.	654	49	[1896] 2 Q. B. 167; 74 L. T. 730
—— v London Justices	C.A.	485	119	[1896] 1 Q. B. 659; 65 L. J. M. C. 120; 74 L. T. 523
—— v London and North-Western Railway Co.	Q.B.D.	—	120	65 L. J. Q. B. 516; 74 L. T. 624
—— v Payne	Q.B.D.	605	41	[1896] 1 Q. B. 577; 65 L. J. Q. B. 426; 74 L. T. 351
—— v Plymouth (Mayor)	Q B.D.	620	65	[1896] 1 Q. B. 158; 65 L. J. Q. B. 258
—— v Riley	C.C.R.	318	49	[1896] 1 Q. B. 309; 65 L. J. M. C. 74; 74 L. T. 254
—— v St. George's, Hanover-square, Vestry	Q.B.D.	16	108
—— v St. Matthew's, Bethnal Green, Vestry	Q.B.D.	559	107	[1896] 2 Q. B. 95; 65 L. J. M. C. 129; 74 L. T. 701
——	C.A.	697	—
—— v Slade	Q.B.D.	—	85	73 L. T. 348
—— (No. 2)	Q B D.	—	114	65 L. J. M. C. 108; 74 L. T. 656
—— v Smith (Horace)	Q.B.D.	492	84	[1896] 1 Q. B. 596; 65 L. J. M. C. 104; 74 L. T. 348
—— v Soden	C.A.	499	61	[1896] 1 Q. B 634; 65 L. J. Q. B. 501; 74 L. T. 520
—— v Stewart. Ex parte Burnham	Q.B.D.	368	84	[1896] 1 Q. B. 300; 65 L. J. M. C. 83; 74 L. T. 54
—— v Titterton	Q.B.D.	—	7	73 L. T. 345

Name of Case.	Court.	Page in W. R. 1895-96.	Column in Digest.	References to Contemporaneous Reports.
Reg. v Tynemouth Rural District Council	Q.B.D.	646	95	[1896] 2 Q. B. 219
—— v Waudby	C.C.R.	64	49	[1895] 2 Q. B. 482; 73 L. T. 352
—— v Webb	Q.B.D.	527	19	[1896] 1 Q. B. 487; 65 L. J. M. C. 98; 74 L. T. 428
—— v Wedd. Pearce v Bunting	Q.B.D.	—	142	65 L. J. M. C. 131
—— v Yorkshire West Riding County Council	Q.B.D.	650	160	65 L. J. M. C. 136
Reid, In the Goods of	P.D. & A.D.	—	137	[1896] P. 129; 65 L. J. P. D. & A. 60; 74 L. T. 462
Reynolds v Attorney-General of Nova Scotia	P.C.	—	23	[1996] A. C. 240; 65 L. J. Ch. 16; 74 L. T. 108
—— v Presteign District Council	Q.B.D.	479	94	[1896] 1 Q. B. 604; 65 L. J. Q. B. 400; 74 L. T. 422
—— v Tomlinson	Q.B.D.	—	150	[1896] 1 Q. B. 586; 65 L. J. Q. B. 496; 74 L. T. 591
Rhymney Iron Co v Fowler	Q.B.D.	651	72	[1896] 2 Q. B. 79; 65 L. J. Q. B. 524
Richards v Kidderminster (Overseers)	CH.D. NOR. J	505	30	[1896] 2 Ch. 212; 65 L. J. Ch. 502; 74 L. T. 483
Richardson, In re. Morgan v Richardson	CH.D. NOR.J.	279	64	[1896] 1 Ch. 512; 65 L. J. Ch. 512; 74 L. T. 12
—— v Richardson	C.A.	102	55	[1895] P. 346
Richmond Hill Steamship Co. v Trinity House Corporation	Q.B.D.	—	150	[1896] 1 Q. B. 493; 65 L. J. Q. B. 405; 74 L. T. 380
——	C.A.	—	—	[1896] 2 Q. B. 134
Rickett & Co. v Midland Railway Co.	C.C.R.	—	141	[1896] 1 Q. B. 260; 65 L. J. Q. B. 274
Riley, In the Goods of	P.D. & A.D.	—	136	[1896] P. 9; 65 L. J. P. D. & A. 41
Robb v Green	C.A.	25	103
Robertson, In the Goods of	P.D. & A.D.	—	136	[1896] P. 8; 65 L. J. P. D. & A. 15
Robins v Gray	C.A.	1	79	[1895] 2 Q. B. 501; 65 L. J. Q. B. 44; 73 L. T. 252
Robinson v Harkin	CH D. STI. J.	702	164	[1896] 2 Ch. 415; 74 L. T. 777
Roche v Meyler	Q.B.D. (I.)	—	128	[1896] 2 Ir. Rep. 35
Rochfort v Seaton	V.C. (I.)	—	163	[1896] 1 Ir. Rep. 18
Rochefoucauld v Boustead	CH.D. KEK.J.	—	126	74 L. T. 783
Roddick v Indemnity Marine Insurance Co.	C.A.	27	82
Rogers v Le Cocq	P.D. & A.D.	—	—	65 L. J. P. D. & A. 68
Rooke v Dawson	CH.D. ROM. J.	77	144	65 L. J. Ch. 31; 73 L. T. 399
Roth, In re. Goldberger v Roth	CH.D. NOR.J.	—	166	74 L. T. 50
—— v Taysen	Q.B.D.	—	50	73 L. T. 628
Ruck v Ruck	P.D. & A.D.	—	55	[1896] P. 152; 65 L. J. P. D. & A. 87
Rudd v James	C.A.	—	66	74 L. T. 714
Russell, In re. Dorrell v Dorrell	C.A.	100	177	[1895] 2 Ch. 698
—— v Russell	C.A.	213	52	[1895] P. 315; 73 L. T. 295
—— (No. 2)	C.A.	—	124	73 L. T. 569
Rutter v Everett	CH.D. STI. J.	104	16	[1895] 2 Ch. 872
Sadler v Great Western Railway Co.	C.A.	50	—	[1895] 2 Q. B. 688; 65 L. J. Q. B. 26 73 L. T. 385
——	H.L. (E.)	—	128	65 L. J. Q. B. 462; 74 L. T. 561
St. Gabriel's, Fenchurch-street v City of London Real Property Co.	P.D. & A.D.	—	59	[1896] P. 95
St. Leonard's, Shoreditch, Vestry v Phelan	Q.B.D.	427	106	[1896] 1 Q. B. 533; 65 L. J. M. C. 111; 74 L. T. 285
Salt, In re	LUN.	146	99	[1896] 1 Ch. 117; 65 L. J. Ch. 152; 73 L. T. 599
Sampson v Sampson	CH.D. STI. J.	557	174	[1896] 1 Ch. 630; 65 L. J. Ch. 406; 74 L. T. 246
Sander's Settlement, In re	CH D. NOR.J.	309	—	65 L. J. Ch. 261; 74 L. T. 15
——	C.A.	385	156	[1896] 1 Ch. 480; 65 L. J. Ch. 426; 74 L. T. 261
Sanford v Beal	Q.B.D.	—	61	65 L. J. Q. B. 73; 73 L. T. 406
Sanguinetti v Stuckey's Bank	CH.D. CHI. J.	309	111	[1896] 1 Ch. 502; 65 L. J. Ch. 340; 74 L. T. 269
San Paulo Railway Co. v Carter	H L. (E.)	336	73	[1896] A. C. 31; 65 L. J. Q. B. 161; 73 L. T. 538
Sarson v Roberts	C.A.	—	86	43 W. R. 690; [1895] 2 Q. B. 395; 65 L. J. Q. B. 37
Sass, In re. Ex parte National Provincial Bank of England	Q.B.D. BKCY.	598	17	[1896] 2 Q. B. 12; 65 L. J. Q. B. 481; 74 L. T. 383
Saul, In the Goods of	P.D. & A.D.	—	136	[1896] P. 151
Saunders, In re. Ex parte Saunders	C.A.	30	16	[1895] 2 Q. B. 424
Savoy (Overseers) v Art Union of London	H.L. (E.)	—	119	[1896] A. C. 296; 65 L. J. M. C. 161; 74 L. T. 497
Sawyer's Trusts, In re	M.R. (I.)	—	101	[1896] 1 Ir. Rep. 40
Scott, In the Goods of	P.D. & A.D.	—	134	[1895] P. 342; 65 L. J. P. D. & A. 15; 73 L. T. 317
——, In re. Ex parte Scott	Q.B.D. BKCY.	587	12	[1896] 1 Q. B. 619; 65 L. J. Q. B. 465; 74 L. T. 555
—— v Alvarez Contract (No. 2)	C.A.	—	169	43 W. R. 694; [1895] 2 Ch. 603
Seaman, In re. Ex parte Furness Finance Co.	Q.B.D. BKCY.	496	17	[1896] 1 Q. B. 412 65 L. J. Q. B. 348 74 L. T. 151
Searanck, In re. Simonds v Huntington	CH.D. NOR.J.	—	146	74 L. T. 339
Seaward v Dennington	C.A.	696	124

Name of Case.	Court.	Page in W. R. 1895–96.	Column in Digest.	References to Contemporaneous Reports.
Seligman v Prince	C.A.	6	27	[1895] 2 Ch. 617
Severn and Wye Railway Co., In re	CH.D. ROM.J.	347	34	[1896] 1 Ch. 559; 65 L. J. Ch. 400; 74 L. T. 219
Shakespeare case. Banks and James' Trade-Mark	CH.D. CHI. J.	32	—
Sharland, In re. Kemp v Rosey	CH.D. NOR J.	—	110 175	[1896] 1 Ch. 517; 65 L. J. Ch. 280; 74 L. T. 20
——— (No. 2)	C.A.	—	173	74 L. T. 664
Shears v Goddard	C.A.	402	17	[1896] 1 Q. B. 406; 65 L. J. Q. B. 344; 74 L. T. 128
Shelfer v City of London Electric Lighting Co.	C.A.	198	127
Shoe Manufacturing Co. v Cutlan	C.A.	92	129	[1896] 1 Ch. 108; 65 L. J. Ch. 44; 73 L. T. 419
——— (No. 2)	CH.D. ROM.J.	—	117	[1896] 1 Ch. 667; 65 L. J. Ch. 314; 74 L. T. 166
Shrewsbury (Earl) v Wirrall Railways Committee	C.A.	19	138	[1895] 2 Ch. 812; 73 L. T. 234
Sievier v Spearman	C.A.	—	126	74 L. T. 182
Simonds v Huntington. In re Searanck	CH.D. NOR. J.	—	146	74 L. T. 339
Simpson, In re	V.C. (I.)	—	2	[1895] 1 Ir. Rep. 530
——— v Godmanchester (Mayor of)	C.A.	149	58	[1896] 1 Ch. 214; 65 L. J. Ch. 154; 73 L. T. 423
Smallwood v Sheppards	Q.B.D.	44	66	[1895] 2 Q. B. 627
Smelting Co. of Australia v Inland Revenue Commissioners	Q.B.D.	—	77	[1896] 2 Q. B. 179; 65 L. J. Q. B. 513; 74 L. T. 694
Smith, In re. Arnold v Smith	CH.D. NOR. J.	280	180	[1896] 1 Ch. 171; 65 L. J. Ch. 269; 74 L. T. 14
———. Smith v Thompson	CH.D. KEK. J	270	165	[1896] 1 Ch. 71; 65 L. J. Ch. 159; 73 L. T. 604
Smith and Hartoga, In re. Ex parte Official Receiver	Q.B.D. BKCY.	79	16
Smith v Bedouin Navigation Co.	H.L. (E.)	—	147	[1896] A. C. 70; 65 L. J. P. C. 8
——— v Gill	Q.B.D.	574	46	[1896] 2 Q. B. 166
——— v Hammond	Q.B.D.	478	131	[1896] 1 Q. B. 571; 65 L. J. Q. B. 477; 74 L. T. 590
——— v Somes. In re Somes	CH.D. CHI. J.	236	121	[1896] 1 Ch. 250; 74 L. T. 49
——— v South-Eastern Railway Co.	C.A.	291	113	[1896] 1 Q. B. 178; 65 L. J. Q. B. 219; 73 L. T. 614
——— v Stuart. In re Stuart	CH.D. STI. J.	—	122	74 L. T. 646
——— v Thompson. In re Smith	CH.D. KEK.J.	270	—	[1896] 1 Ch. 71; 65 L. J. Ch. 159; 73 L. T. 604
Sodeau v Shorey	C.A.	—	147	74 L. T. 240
"Solway Prince," The	P.D. & A.D.	—	153	[1896] P. 120; 65 L. J. P. D. & A. 45; 74 L. T. 32
Somers-Cocks, In re. Wegg-Prosser v Wegg-Prosser	CH.D. KEK. J.	106	175	65 L. J. Ch. 49
Somes, In re. Smith v Somes	CH.D. CHI. J.	236	121	[1896] 1 Ch. 250; 65 L. J. Ch. 262; 74 L. T. 49
———. Stuart v Somes	C.A.	—	3	73 L. T. 359
South African Trust Co., In re. Ex parte Hirsche	C.A.	—	50	74 L. T. 769
Southern Counties Deposit Bank v Rider	C.A.	—	32	73 L. T. 374
South Staffordshire Tramways Co. v Ebbsmith	C.A.	97	11	[1895] 2 Q. B. 669; 65 L. J. Q. B. 96; 73 L. T. 454
South Staffordshire Waterworks Co. v Sharman	Q.B.D.	653	51	[1896] 2 Q. B. 44; 65 L. J. Q. B. 460; 74 L. T. 761
Southwell v Royal Holloway College Governors	Q.B.D.	315	74	[1895] 2 Q. B. 487
Soutter v Roderick	Q.B.D.	205	61	[1896] 1 Q. B. 91; 65 L. J. Q. B. 145; 73 L. T. 576
Sowerby District Council and Mytholmroyd Council's Arbitration, In re	Q.B.D.	—	91	74 L. T. 313
Spiers & Pond v Bennett	Q.B.D.	510	8	[1896] 2 Q. B. 65; 65 L. J. M. C. 144; 74 L. T. 697
Stamford (Earl of), In re. Payne v Stamford	CH.D. STI. J.	249	166	[1896] 1 Ch. 283; 65 L. J. Ch. 134; 73 L. T. 559
Standard Gold Mining Co., In re	CH.D. WIL. J.	63	39	[1895] 2 Ch. 545; 73 L. T. 285
Staples v Eastman Photographic Materials Co.	C.A.	—	34	[1896] 2 Ch. 303; 65 L. J. Ch. 682; 74 L. T. 47
Stern v Reg.	Q.B.D.	302	75	[1896] 1 Q. B. 211; 65 L. J. Q. B. 240; 73 L. T. 752
Stewart v England. In re England	C.A.	119	91	[1895] 2 Ch. 820; 65 L. J. Ch. 21; 73 L. T. 237
Stewart v Somes. In re Somes	C.A.	—	3	73 L. T. 359
Stoddart v Sagar	Q.B.D.	287	97	[1895] 2 Q. B. 474
Stogdon, In re. Ex parte Leigh	C.A.	—	13	[1895] 2 Q. B. 534; 65 L. J. Q. B. 47; 73 L. T. 279
Stokell v Heywood	CH.D. KEK. J.	—	79	65 L. J. Ch. 721; 74 L. T. 781
Stone, In re. Baker v Stone	C.A.	235	173
Strachan v Universal Stock Exchange (No. 1)	C.A.	90	67	43 W. R. 611; [1895] 2 Q. B. 329; 73 L. T. 492
———	H.L. (E.)	497	—	[1896] A. C. 166
——— (No. 2)	C.A.	90	—	[1895] 2 Q. B. 697; 65 L. J. Q. B. 178
Strafford (Earl) and Maple's Contract, In re	C.A.	259	170	[1896] 1 Ch. 235; 65 L. J. Ch. 124; 73 L. T. 586
Strathmore v Vane. In re Bowes	CH.D. NOR. J.	441	177	[1896] 1 Ch. 507; 65 L. J. Ch. 298; 74 L. T. 16
Strickland v Hayes	Q.B.D.	398	93	[1896] 1 Q. B. 290; 65 L. J. M. C. 55; 74 L. T. 137

Name of Case.	Court.	Page in W. R. 1895–96.	Column in Digest.	References to Contemporaneous Reports.
Stuart, In re. Smith v Stuart	CH. D. STI. J	—	122	74 L. T. 546
Stuart and Seadon's Contract, In re	C.A.	610	168	[1896] 2 Ch. 328; 65 L. J. Ch. 576; 74 L. T. 450
Swoffer v Swoffer	P.D. & A D.	—	122	[1896] P. 131; 65 L. J. P. D. & A. 82
Swyny v North-Eastern Railway Co.	C.A.	—	130	74 L. T. 88
Symes v Symes	CH.D. NOR. J.	521	121	[1896] 1 Ch. 272; 65 L. J. Ch. 265; 73 L. T. 684
Symons, Ex parte. Reg. v Jennings	Q B.D.	128	65	[1896] 1 Q. B. 64; 73 L. T. 412
Taltal Chile Nitrate Co., In re	C.A.	—	42	73 L. T. 422
Tanner v Oldman	Q.B.D.	63	105	[1896] 1 Q. B. 60; 65 L. J. M. C. 10; 73 L. T. 404
Teece, In the Goods of	P.D. & A.D.	400	135	[1896] P. 6; 65 L. J. P. D. & A. 41; 73 L. T. 631
Terrell, Ex parte. In re Le Brasseur	CH.D. KEK.J.	—	155	74 L. T. 526
———	C.A.	—	—	74 L. T. 717
Thomas v Lulham	C.A.	—	86	43 W. R. 689; [1895] 2 Q B. 400
Thompson and McWilliams' Contract, In re	C.A. (I.)	—	169	[1896] 1 Ir. Rep. 357
Thompson, In re. Griffith v Thompson	CH.D. CHI. J.	582	172
——— v Hawes	C.A.	—	95	73 L. T. 369
——— v Veale	C.A.	—	143	74 L. T. 131
Thomson v Thomson	C.A.	—	57	65 L. J. P. D. & A. 80
——— v Trustees Insurance Corporation	CH.D. KEK.J.	237	29	65 L. J. Ch. 66
Thorne v Heard	H.L. (E.)	155	163	73 L. T. 291
Thwaites v Coulthwaite	CH.D. CHI. J.	295	67	[1896] 1 Ch. 496; 65 L. J. Ch. 238; 74 L. T. 164
Tibbatts v Boulter	CH.D ROM.J	—	170	73 L. T. 534
Tilt, In re. Lampet v Kennedy	CH.D. CHI. J.	—	—	74 L. T. 163
Tomlinson v Broadsmith	C.A.	471	116	[1896] 1 Q. B. 386; 65 L. J. Q. B. 308; 74 L. T. 265
Toronto (Corporation of) v Virgo	P.C.	—	24	[1896] A. C. 88; 65 L. J. P. C. 4; 73 L. T. 449
Tottenham v Tottenham	CH. D. NOR. J.	539	126	[1896] 1 Ch. 628; 65 L. J. Ch. 549; 74 L. T. 376
Tottenham Urban District Council v Williamson	C.A.	676	95
Tree v Bowkett	CH.D. KEK.J.	—	44	74 L. T. 77
Truman v Pope. In re Dudgeon	CH.D. STI. J.	—	25	74 L. T. 613
Trustees Insurance Corporation v Alcoy Co	C.A.	117	—	[1896] 1 Ch. 19
Tucker's Settled Estates, In re	C.A.	—	145	43 W. R. 581; [1895] 2 Ch. 468
Trego v Hunt	H.L. (E.)	225	116	[1896] A. C. 7; 65 L. J. Ch. 1; 73 L. T. 514
Trevor v Hutchins	C.A.	417	4	[1896] 1 Ch. 844; 74 L. T. 470
Trilby Case. Holt v Saunders	CH.D. NOR. J.	269	—
———	C.A.	369	—	[1896] 1 Ch. 711; 65 L. J. Ch. 410; 74 L. T. 225
Tunbridge Wells (Mayor) v Baird	H.L. (E.)	—	96	65 L. J. Q. B. 451; 74 L. T. 385
Turner, Ex parte. In re Morgan	Q.B.D. BKCY.	96	18	73 L. T. 448
——— v Watson. In re Watson	CH.D. NOR. J.	571	64	[1896] 1 Ch. 925; 65 L. J. Ch. 553; 74 L. T. 453
Tyne Mutual Steamship Association v Brown	Q.B.D.	—	31	74 L. T. 283
Tyser v Shipowners' Syndicate	Q.B.D.	207	82	[1896] Q. B. 135; 65 L. J. Q. B. 238; 73 L. T. 605
United Kingdom Steamship Assurance Association v Houston	Q.B.D.	—	10	[1896] 1 Q. B. 567; 65 L. J. Q. B. 484
Universal Stock Exchange v Strachan	H.L. (E.)	497	67	[1896] A. C. 166; 65 L. J. Q. B. 429; 74 L. T. 468
Vawdrey v Simpson	CH.D. CHI. J	123	115	[1896] 1 Ch. 166; 65 L. J. Ch. 369
Vine v Raleigh	CH.D. CHI. J.	169	145	[1896] 1 Ch. 37; 65 L. J. Ch. 103; 73 L. T. 655
Von Joel v Hornsey	C.A.	—	126	[1895] 2 Ch. 774; 65 L. J. Ch. 102; 73 L. T. 372
V. V. Bread Co. v Stubbs	Q.B.D.	—	22	74 L. T. 704
Wakelin v London and South-Western Railway Co.	C.A.	—	139	[1896] 1 Q. B. 189n; 73 L. T. 615
Walker v Stretton	Q.B.D.	525	92
Ward, In re	C.A.	484	157	[1896] 2 Ch. 31; 65 L. J. Ch. 595; 74 L. T. 567
Wassell v Leggatt. In re Wassell	CH.D. ROM.J.	298	102	[1896] 1 Ch. 554; 65 L. J. Ch. 240; 74 L. T. 99
Watkins, In re	LUN.	609	100	[1896] 2 Ch. 336; 65 L. J. Ch. 636; 74 L. T. 504
——— v Watkins	C.A.	677	54	[1896] P. 222; 65 L. J. P. D. & A. 75; 74 L. T. 636
Watson, In re. Turner v Watson	CH.D. NOR.J.	571	64	[1896] 1 Ch. 925; 65 L. J. Ch. 553; 74 L. T. 453
——— v Royal Insurance Co.	C.A.	89	72	[1896] 1 Q. B. 41; 65 L. J. Q. B. 132; 73 L. T. 524
——— v White	Q.B.D.	525	47	[1896] 2 Q. B. 9; 65 L. J. Q. B. 492; 74 L. T. 702
Waynes Merthyr Co. v Radford	CH.D. CHI. J.	103	127	[1896] 1 Ch. 29; 65 L. J. Ch. 140; 73 L. T. 624
Webber, In re. Gribble v Webber	CH.D. NOR. J.	489	70	[1896] 1 Ch. 914; 65 L. J. Ch. 544; 74 L. T. 244
Weeding, In re. Armstrong v Wilkin	CH.D. NOR. J	556	176	[1896] 2 Ch. 364; 74 L. T. 651
Wegg-Prosser v Wegg-Prosser. In re Somers Cocks	CH.D. KEK.J.	106	175	65 L. J. Ch. 49
"Westburn," The	P.D. & A.D.	—	153	74 L. T. 200
Western v Bailey	Q.B.D.	—	44	[1896] 2 Q. B. 234
West Sussex County Council, In re	Q B.D.	—	61	65 L. J. Q. B. 184; 73 L. T. 566

Name of Case.	Court.	Page in W. R. 1895-96.	Column in Digest.	References to Contemporaneous Reports.
Wheeler and De Rochow's Trusts, In re	CH.D. KEK.J.	270	166	[1896] 1 Ch. 315; 65 L. J. Ch. 219; 73 L. T. 661
White, In the Goods of	PROB. (I.)	—	136	[1896] 1 Ir. Rep. 269
White and Smith's Contract, In re	CH.D. STI. J.	424	170	[1896] 1 Ch. 637; 65 L. J. Ch. 481; 74 L. T. 377
White v Fulham Vestry	Q.B.D.	—	108	74 L. T. 425
Whiteley v Edwards	C.A.	530	101	[1896] 2 Q. B. 48; 65 L. J. Q. B. 457; 74 L. T. 720
Whittaker v Scarborough Post Newspaper Co.	C.A.	657	125	[1896] 2 Q. B. 148; 74 L. T. 753
Whitwham v Piercy. In re Piercy	CH.D. NOR. J.	—	26	65 L. J. Ch. 364; 73 L. T. 732
—— v Westminster Brymbo Coal Co.	CH.D. CHI. J.	459	—	[1896] 1 Ch. 894; 65 L. J. Ch. 598; 74 L. T. 405
——	C.A.	698	51
Wilkins v Wilkins	C.A.	305	131	[1896] P. 108; 65 L. J. P. D. & A. 55; 74 L. T. 62
Willesden Local Board v Wright	C.A.	676	92
Williams v Quebrada Railway Co.	CH.D. KEK. J.	76	126	[1895] 2 Ch. 751; 65 L. J. Ch. 68; 73 L. T. 397
—— v Williams	P.D. & A.D.	—	55	[1896] P. 153
Willson v Love	C.A.	450	88	[1896] 1 Q. B. 626; 65 L. J. Q. B. 474; 74 L. T. 580
Wilmot v Alton	Q.B.D.	—	13	[1896] 2 Q. B. 254
"Winstanley," The	P.D. & A.D.	—	151	74 L. T. 432
Wise, In re. Jackson v Parrott	CH.D. NOR. J.	310	165	[1896] 1 Ch. 281; 65 L. J. Ch. 281; 73 L. T. 743
Wolfe, Ex parte. In re Barr	Q.B.D. BKCY.	586	16	[1896] 1 Q. B. 616; 65 L. J. Q. B. 504; 74 L. T. 555
Wood, In re. Attorney-General v Anderson	CH.D. ROM. J.	685	83
—— v London County Council	Q.B.D.	144	108	73 L. T. 313
Woodhead v Woodhead	P.D. & A.D.	—	53	[1895] P. 343
Woodside v Globe Marine Insurance Co.	Q.B.D.	187	82	[1896] 1 Q. B. 105; 65 L. J. Q. B. 117; 73 L. T. 626
Woolwich Local Board v Gardner	Q.B.D.	46	118	[1895] 2 Q. B. 497
Wright, In re. Kirke v North	CH.D. KEK. J.	125	129	[1895] 2 Ch. 747; 65 L. J. Ch. 37; 73 L. T. 396
Wroe, In re. Frith v Wilson	CH.D. NOR.J.	—	176	74 L. T. 302
Yates v Higgins	Q.B.D.	333	48	[1896] 1 Q. B. 166; 65 L. J. M. C. 31
Young v South African, &c., Exploration Syndicate	CH.D. KEK.J.	509	32	[1896] 2 Ch. 268; 65 L. J. Ch. 638; 74 L. T. 527

THE 391

WEEKLY REPORTER,

1895-96.

Court of Appeal.

From Q. B. Div. (Lord Esher, M.R., and Kay and A. L. Smith, L.JJ.) Aug. 1, 2.

ROBINS & Co. v. GRAY. (a.)

Innkeeper — Lien — Commercial traveller — Goods the property of a third person.

A commercial traveller, whilst staying at an inn for the purpose of carrying on his business, had sent to him by his employers certain goods for sale, which goods the innkeeper, at the time they were received, knew did not belong to the traveller, but to his employers. On the traveller failing to pay for his board and lodging, the innkeeper detained certain of the said goods, claiming a lien on them.

Held, that the innkeeper had a good lien upon the goods in respect of the debt incurred by the traveller.

This was an appeal by the plaintiffs in an action tried before Wills, J., without a jury, May 16, 1895: [1895] 2 Q. B. 78, 43 W. R. Dig. 82.

The plaintiffs, who dealt in sewing machines and other articles, had in their employment one Edward Green as a commercial traveller, and it was part of his duty to canvass for orders and sell goods upon commission.

In April, 1894, Green, for the purposes of carrying out his duties as commercial traveller, went to the defendant's hotel and remained there until the end of July. During his stay there, the plaintiffs from time to time sent down to him certain sewing machines and other goods for the purpose of his selling them. At the end of July Green was indebted to the defendant for board and lodging to the amount of £4 0s. 8d., and this sum he neglected to pay. Thereupon the defendant detained certain of the goods which had been sent by the plaintiffs to Green, claiming a lien upon them in respect of the debt incurred by the latter. It appeared at the trial that before the goods were received into the defendant's hotel, and before the said debt had been incurred, the defendant had been expressly informed by the plaintiffs that the goods were the plaintiffs' property and not the property of Green.

The plaintiffs brought an action in detinue.

Wills, J., gave judgment for the defendant, holding that he had a lien upon the goods in respect of the debt.

From this decision the plaintiffs now appealed.

Arthur Powell, for the appellants.—The defendant had received the goods into his inn, knowing that they were not the goods of the guest but of a third person. He, therefore, has no lien upon them: Turrell v. Crawley, 18 L. J. Q. B. 155. [Lord ESHER, M.R. —There is not one single word in the judgment of Wills, J., about such knowledge of the innkeeper.] He has a lien when he is bound to take the goods in, but not otherwise. Here he was not bound to take these goods in: Broadwood v. Granara, 3 W. R. 25, 10 Exch. 417. [KAY, L.J.—An innkeeper is bound to receive the goods, to a reasonable amount, of commercial travellers who put up at his inn.] If the innkeeper knows the goods are not the property of the traveller he has no lien because he knows the traveller could not pledge them: Threfall v. Borwick, 20 W. R. 1032, L. R. 7 Q. B. 711, and 23 W. R. 312, L. R. 10 Q. B. 210; Gordon v. Silber, 39 W. R. 111, 25 Q. B. D. 491; Robinson v. Waller, 1 Rolle, 449, 3 Bulst. 269.

Hume Williams and Shaw, for the respondent, were not called upon.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—From the first I have not had a shadow of doubt about this case. An innkeeper has his duties and his rights, which are dependent upon the custom of the realm. If a traveller comes to an inn with luggage, the innkeeper is bound to take him in and his luggage also. He cannot discriminate between the two and say, "I will take you but not your luggage." There is no foundation for the proposition that he can refuse to take in the luggage. And further, I will say, the innkeeper has no right to inquire whether the goods are the property of the traveller or not. If a person were to bring goods that are so bulky that there is no room for them in the inn, or if he were to bring something dangerous, such for instance as a tiger or dynamite, the innkeeper need not take in the guest or his goods, but the custom of the realm is that except in unreasonable cases he is bound to take in the guests and their luggage. The guest may be travelling with somebody else's luggage, and say so, yet, the innkeeper must take them in. Now what is the innkeeper's liability when once he has taken in the goods? He is bound to keep them safe, and is liable for their loss, unless lost through the fault of the guest. That is a very great liability, but on the other hand, in respect of this obligation and liability, the innkeeper has a lien for his charges on the goods of the guest for taking care of them, and by virtue of the law of the realm he has such lien not only as against the guest, but also against the true owner of the goods brought to the inn by the guest. This has been the custom of the realm for hundreds of years, and there is no authority to show that the innkeeper has not got such lien. The case of Broadwood v. Granara has been cited, but that case does not say that the innkeeper has not such a lien. It is not an authority which helps the appellant at all, because there the decision was not upon the law of innkeeper and guest, but upon the particular facts of the case, and to those facts the law of innkeeper and guest does not apply. The piano in that case was not sent in as part of the goods of the guest.

(a.) Reported by T. MATHEW, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

In this case the innkeeper was bound to take in the goods of the guest, and he accordingly has his lien on them in respect of the charges incurred by the guest, therefore this appeal must be dismissed.

KAY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. It is said that the innkeeper was told that the goods did not belong to the guest, but that is immaterial. The traveller was already staying in the inn when these further sewing machines were sent to him, and the innkeeper took them in as part of the original luggage the guest had brought with him. Long and elaborate arguments have been addressed us, but not one single authority has been cited, nor as far as I know can be cited, in support of the appellants' contention.

The innkeeper is not bound to inquire who is the true owner of the goods brought to his inn, but he is bound to take them in. In Broadwood v. Granara the guest hired a piano from a tradesman, and the innkeeper took it in knowing it was only for the temporary use of the guest, and it was held that the innkeeper had no lien on it. Baron Parke says, "The principle on which an innkeeper's lien depends is, that he is bound to receive travellers and the goods which they bring with them to the inn." There may, it is true, be circumstances when goods are sent to the guest only for a special and temporary purpose, for instance, jewels sent on approval, and then the innkeeper would not receive them as the goods of the guest, and he would have no lien on them. But in the present case the innkeeper did receive the goods as the goods of the guest and as the sort of goods the guest was accustomed to take about with him. Innkeepers have always relied on the supposition that they have a lien in these cases, and I think they have such lien. I agree with the Master of the Rolls that the appeal must be dismissed.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The obligation of the innkeeper is such that he is bound to take in the commercial traveller, he is bound to take his goods in, and he is bound to take care of them. That obligation is imposed upon him by the custom of the realm, and in return he has given him a lien on such goods in respect of his charges against the traveller.

I entirely agree with the law as laid down by Lord Justice Lopes in Gordon v. Silber, 39 W. R. 111. But it is said here that that law does not apply if the innkeeper knows that the goods are not the goods of the guest. No authority, however, has been cited to show that that is so. As regards the question raised by counsel that there can be no lien where the guest is not in a position to pledge the goods, that has nothing to do with this case. This case is entirely regulated by the custom of the realm. I think this appeal must, therefore, be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitor for the plaintiffs, W. Wilkins.

Solicitors for the defendant, Colyer, Bristow, & Russell, for F. Hall, Folkestone.

From Q. B. Div. (Lord Esher, M.R., and Kay and A. L. Smith, L.JJ.) July 26.

OWNERS OF CARGO LATELY ON BOARD THE SS. "MAORI KING" v. HUGHES. (a.)

Ship — Bill of lading — Cargo of frozen meat — Refrigerating machinery—Implied warranty of fitness at time of shipment.

In a bill of lading stated to be for the carriage of a cargo of frozen meat there is an implied warranty that the ship is, at the time of shipment, fit to carry such a cargo. Exceptions in the bill of lading freeing the shipowner from liability for damage from a failure of machinery do not apply to the condition of the machinery at the commencement of the voyage, but only to contingencies which may occur during the progress of the voyage.

Appeal of the defendants from the judgment of Mathew, J., on a preliminary question of law arising in the pleadings.

The action was brought to recover damages for breach of contract and breach of duty in and about the carriage of goods by sea. The defendants were the owners of the steamship Maori King. In November, 1894, the plaintiffs shipped some frozen meat on The Maori King at Melbourne to be carried to England. The vessel proceeded from Melbourne to other ports taking in a further cargo of frozen meat, and on the arrival of the vessel at Sydney, it was discovered that the refrigerating machinery in the vessel had broken down, and it became necessary to remove the cargo from the vessel. As there was not sufficient cold storage for the whole cargo, a portion of it, including the plaintiffs' meat, had to be sold at once owing to its liability to speedy decomposition.

The plaintiffs alleged that it was an implied term in the undertaking contained in the bill of lading under which the plaintiffs' meat was shipped that the ship and the refrigerating machinery therein were at the time of shipment fit to carry the frozen meat to Europe; that the ship and the machinery were not in fact so fit, and that owing to the improper construction of the machine it failed to keep the meat frozen, and that the meat was sold at a loss to the plaintiffs.

The defendants by their defence (inter alia) denied that there was any such implied term in the bill of lading as alleged.

The defendants further said that at the commencement of the voyage the steamer was fitted with refrigerating machinery of a proper construction and before the voyage commenced the defendants used all due diligence with reference to the care and condition of the machinery, and that by the express terms of the bill of lading they were not accountable for damage or loss occasioned by the failure or breakdown thereof or for accidents to or defects in the machinery.

The terms of the bill of lading so far as material were as follows:—"Refrigerator Bill. Shipped in apparent good order and condition . . . on board the steamship Maori King . . . for London . . . the following goods—viz., 4,553 carcases of hard frozen mutton . . . to be delivered (subject to the exceptions and conditions hereinafter mentioned) in the like good order and condition. . . . Steamer shall not be accountable for the condition of the goods shipped under this bill of lading, nor for any loss or damage thereto arising from failure or breakdown of machinery, insulation or other appliances, nor for detention nor for the consequences of any act, neglect, default or error of judgment of the master, officers, engineers, crew, or other persons in the service of the owners, nor for any other cause whatsoever, and steamer shall be at liberty to jettison the whole or any part thereof if considered necessary on account of decomposition . . . loss or damage resulting from any of the following causes or perils are excepted . . . accidents to or defects in hull, tackle, boilers or machinery, or their appurtenances."

(a.) Reported by F. O. ROBINSON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The action was placed in the commercial list and the following preliminary question of law was ordered to be decided: "Whether it was an implied term of the bill of lading that The Maori King and the refrigerating machinery therein was at the time of the shipment fit to carry the frozen meat to Europe."

Mathew, J., decided the point in favour of the plaintiffs.

The defendants appealed.

Moulton, Q.C., Joseph Walton, Q.C. (with them James Fox), for the defendant.—There was no such implied warranty in the bill of lading as is suggested, The only implied warranty is as to seaworthiness, and that does not cover this case, but only relates to fitness for transit. This ship would have been equally seaworthy whether the refrigerating machinery was in good condition or not. The only duty upon the shipowners was to take reasonable care that the machinery was fit for the work. Their obligation is analogous to that of a warehouseman. Secondly, the defendants are protected from liability by the exceptions in the bill of lading which are not confined to events which happen after the commencement of the voyage.

Bigham, Q.C., and Scrutton, for the plaintiffs.—It is an implied term in every bill of lading that not only is the ship seaworthy in the sense that it will float, but also that it is fit to carry the particular cargo referred to in the bill of lading: Tattersall v. National Steamship Co., 32 W. R. 566, 12 Q. B. D. 297. This case does not come within the exception which cannot have been intended to cover the case of insufficient or improper machinery at the commencement of the voyage.

Fox replied.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—The question in this case is whether under the circumstances which existed at the time the contract was made, there is contained in the bill of lading a warranty that the refrigerating machinery was at the time of shipment fit to carry frozen meat to Europe. That obligation in the shipowner if it existed must be inferred from the terms of the bill of lading and must have been intended by both parties to form part of the contract. Now the bill of lading is headed by the words "Refrigerator bill." These words must have some meaning, and their necessary meaning is that there was on board such machinery as is required for the purpose of keeping frozen meat, for the bill of lading states in express terms that 5,000 frozen carcases are delivered on board. Both parties must, therefore, have contemplated that the refrigerating machinery was at the time of shipment in a fit condition, for the shipper knows that if that is not the case the meat will spoil and the shipowner knows that the shipper will not ship frozen meat and pay an increased freight for it unless there is on board the requisite machinery, and if the refrigerating machinery is not in proper working order it is just as useless as if there were none at all. Therefore, that implied obligation on the shipowner must be read into the bill of lading, but the obligation can only be implied as to the state of things at the commencement of the voyage, and it does not refer to anything which might happen after the start. If the exceptions on the bills of lading are inconsistent with this obligation, it cannot be implied for the exceptions are express terms. But in this case the exceptions as in the ordinary bills of lading are exceptions only as to matters which may happen during the voyage; they are exceptions to the liability of the shipowner to deliver the cargo in the same condition at the end of the voyage as at the commencement.

I am, therefore, of opinion that the decision of Mathew, J., was right, and this appeal must be dismissed.

In cases such as this, where a preliminary question of law is ordered to be tried before the questions of fact in the action, if an appeal is brought upon the preliminary question of law, that is an interlocutory appeal, and the remaining questions in the action will not be tried until the preliminary question has been finally decided in this court or in the House of Lords, as the case may be.

KAY, L.J.—In this case we have to deal with a bill of lading of frozen meat. The bill of lading is headed "Refrigerator bill," and the cargo is stated to be hard frozen mutton, and the bill of lading says in express terms that, subject to the exceptions, the mutton is to be delivered in as good order and condition as it was received on board. Then follow various conditions which, however, do not relate to the state of the goods at the time of shipment, but only during the voyage.

A question of an implied warranty has arisen, and it has been treated as a warranty of seaworthiness. Strictly speaking it is a warranty as to the shipowner's duty with regard to the carrying of the goods, but the authorities do appear to have treated that duty as coming within the meaning of the term "seaworthy." In Steel v. State Line Steamship Co., 3 App. Cas. 72, at p. 76, 26 W. R. Dig. 216, Lord Cairns, after reading the affirmative part of a bill of lading, which was in the same terms as the one in this case, says, "What is the meaning of the contract created by these words, supposing they stood alone? I think there cannot be any reasonable doubt entertained that this is a contract which not merely engages the shipowner to deliver the goods in the condition mentioned, but that it also contains in it a representation and an engagement—a contract—by the shipowner that the ship in which the wheat is placed is, at the time of its departure, reasonably fit for accomplishing the service which the shipowner engages to perform. Reasonably fit to accomplish that service, the ship cannot be unless it is seaworthy." Then on p. 77 he points out that, if there is that obligation on the shipowner "it must be from this, and only from this, that in a contract of this kind there is implied an engagement that the ship shall be reasonably fit for performing the service which she undertook." Then in the same case Lord Blackburn, at p. 86, says: "I take it to be quite clear that where there is a contract to carry goods in a ship, whether that contract is in the shape of a bill of lading, or any other form, there is a duty on the part of the person who furnishes or supplies that ship or that ship's room, unless something be stipulated which should prevent it, that the ship shall be fit for its purpose. That is generally expressed by saying that the ship shall be seaworthy." Now in this case it has been argued that there is no contract that the ship shall be fit for the purpose for which it is intended, but that the contract is that the shipowner will take all reasonable steps to make it so. Lord Blackburn lays it down that the obligation is not to do everything that is reasonable, but is to have the ship absolutely fit for the intended purpose. In this case the bill of lading is called a refrigerator bill, and it is for the carriage of frozen meat to be delivered in the same good order and condition as when received on board. There is a clear implication from that that the shipowner represented that the ship was in good order to carry out that voyage, and if the refrigerating machinery was not at the time the voyage began in a condition to perform the service contemplated by the bill of lading, there would be a breach of the implied warranty.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—I am of opinion that the decision of Mathew, J., on this preliminary point of law was right. The question is whether there was in this bill of lading an implied warranty that the ship, or the part of the ship where the meat was, was at the time of sailing fit for the purpose for which both parties were contracting, that is, the carriage of frozen meat from Australia to England. I think there was such an implied warranty. I think that I stated the law correctly in Tattersall v. National Steamship Co., for what I there said is no more than was said by Lord Cairns and Lord Blackburn in Steel v. State Line Steamship Co. KAY, L.J., has read their observations and therefore I will not again refer to them. With regard to the exceptions in the bill of lading, I do not think they show that there can be no implied warranty. The exceptions only apply to contingencies which may happen after the vessel has sailed.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the plaintiffs, Waltons, Johnson, Bubb, & Whatton.

Solicitors for the defendants, Parker, Garrett, & Parker.

From Q. B. D.
(Lord Esher, M.R., and Kay and A. L. Smith, L.JJ.)

July 23.

BOWER & CO. v. HETT. (a.)

Bankruptcy—Execution—Money paid "under an execution"—"To avoid sale"—Payment to sheriff before seizure—Bankruptcy of debtor—Right of execution creditor—Bankruptcy Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 71), s. 11, sub-section 2.

Where the amount of a judgment debt is paid to the sheriff, before the judgment debtor's goods have been seized in execution, in order to prevent a seizure, the money is not paid "under an execution in order to avoid sale" within the meaning of section 11, sub-section 2, of the Bankruptcy Act, 1890, and, therefore, the sheriff, upon a bankruptcy petition being presented against the debtor within fourteen days, is not justified in paying the money to the official receiver, but must pay it over to the execution creditor.

Appeal from the judgment of the Queen's Bench Division (reported 43 W. R. 557; [1895] 2 Q. B. 51), reversing the decision of the judge of the Hull County Court in an action against the high bailiff of the Brigg County Court to recover £23 15s. 8d.

The plaintiffs had recovered judgment in the Brigg County Court against one Denton for £23 15s. 8d., and on the 29th of September, 1894, a warrant of execution was delivered to the defendant to levy the amount of the judgment.

On the 1st of October the defendant went to Denton's premises, and seized the goods, but an arrangement was come to between the defendant and Denton, whereby it was agreed that the defendant should not remain in possession, but that he should be at liberty to re-take possession whenever he chose to do so. The defendant then went out of possession, and Denton continued to carry on his business there until the 2nd of October, when he absconded.

On the 3rd of October Denton's manager locked up the premises and handed the key to the defendant, and on the same day Denton's father went to the defendant and promised to pay the amount of the judgment if the key was given up to him. The defendant accordingly gave up the key to the father, and on the 4th of October, the father paid the defendant the amount of the judgment.

On the 15th of October a bankruptcy petition was presented against Denton, of which notice was given to the defendant on the 16th of October, and he was adjudicated bankrupt.

On the 12th of November the defendant paid to the official receiver the money received from Denton's father. The plaintiffs thereupon brought this action to recover the above amount as money had and received to their use.

The county court judge gave judgment for the defendant.

The Divisional Court entered judgment for the plaintiffs.

By section 11, sub-section 2, of the Bankruptcy Act, 1890, "where, under an execution in respect of a judgment for a sum exceeding £20, the goods of a debtor are sold or money is paid to avoid sale," the sheriff shall deduct his charges and retain the balance for fourteen days, and if, within that time, notice is served on him of a bankruptcy petition against or by the debtor, and a receiving order is made, the sheriff shall pay the balance to the official receiver.

C. Dodd, Q.C., for the defendant.

Montague Lush and Sidney Clarke, for the plaintiffs, were not called upon.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—In my opinion this appeal must be dismissed. The facts as found by the county court and as appearing on the evidence were that the defendant seized under the warrant of execution on the 1st of October, but went out of possession under an agreement between him and the judgment debtor that he might retake possession whenever he chose, that is, that he might reseize the goods. The defendant under that agreement might have retaken possession under the warrant. But he never retook possession. What happened was that the debtor's manager locked up the premises and brought him the key, but the defendant did not go in again and seize the goods, and, therefore, he was not in possession of them and not in a position to sell them. The debtor's father then came to the defendant and offered to pay him the amount of the judgment debt if he would hand over the key, that is to say, if he would not retake possession and seize the goods. The defendant accordingly handed the key to the father, who on the 4th of October paid him the money. That money was paid to the defendant for the purpose of the latter handing it over to the execution creditors, and the defendant received and held the money on those terms, as money received by him on behalf of the execution creditors. Then came the bankruptcy petition against the judgment debtor on the 15th of October. It is obvious that the defendant cannot escape from his obligation to pay over the money to the execution creditors unless section 11, sub-section 2, of the Bankruptcy Act, 1890, applies. In my opinion this money was not paid "under an execution." There was no execution in when the money was paid. Even assuming, however, that the money was paid under an execution, it was not paid "to avoid sale." It was paid to avoid a seizure, which is a different matter. I agree, therefore, with the Divisional Court that the case does not come within section 11, sub-section 2. The money was paid to the defendant for the execution creditors, and the defendant was bound to pay it to them, and section 11, sub-section 2, afforded no excuse for paying it to the official receiver. The appeal must, therefore, by dismissed.

(a.) Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

KAY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. By section 11, sub-section 2, the money must be paid under an execution and in order to avoid a sale. This money was not paid under an execution, because there was no execution in existence at the time when the money was paid. The high bailiff had gone out of possession, and he had the key of the premises and an agreement with the debtor that he might re-take possession whenever he chose. I fail to see how, by taking the key, the high bailiff was in possession. There being then no execution in existence, the payment could not have been made to avoid a sale. Those words apply where the sheriff is in possession, and is proceeding to sell. The high bailiff here was not in possession, and was not proceeding to sell. Therefore the case does not come within the section. I desire to reserve my opinion upon the question whether if the money is paid under an execution and to avoid a sale the money must be the debtor's money. The section does not say whose money it must be, and I express no opinion upon that point.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The two conditions to be complied with to make the section applicable are that the goods must be sold or money paid to avoid a sale, and that this must be done under an execution. In my opinion on the 4th of October, when this money was paid, the goods were not in fact taken in execution, nor was the money paid to avoid a sale. The defendant, therefore, cannot bring the case within section 11, sub-section 2, of the Bankruptcy Act, 1890.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the plaintiffs, Oldhan, Clabburn, & Co., for C. E. Gresham, Hull.

Solicitors for the defendant, Collyer, Bristow & Co., for Laverack & Son, Hull.

From Q. B. Div.
(Lord Esher, M.R., and Kay, and A. L. Smith, L.JJ.) June 15.

PETERSEN v. FREEBODY & Co. (a.)

Ship—Charter-party—Demurrage—Discharge of cargo—Joint operation—Duty of shipowner—Duty of consignee—Cargo of timber spars—Custom of timber trade.

The operation of discharging the cargo of a ship is a joint operation in which it is the duty of both the shipowner and the consignee to take part. This applies as well to a cargo of timber as to other kinds of cargo. Where a charter-party provides that the ship shall discharge a cargo of timber spars overside into lighters, the shipowner is not bound to do more than place the spars over the side of the ship in such a position that they may be within reach of the lighter; it is then the duty of the consignee to receive the spars and place them in the lighter.

(a.) Reported by F. G. RUCKER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Appeal from the judgment of Kennedy, J., at the trial of the action without a jury.

The action was brought by a shipowner under a charter-party for demurrage in respect of delay at the port of discharge. The charter-party provided that the ship should load a cargo of timber in Norway and carry the same to London, and contained the following clauses:—"The discharging to take place in eight days. . . . The cargo to be brought to and taken from alongside the ship at merchants' risk and expense. The ship to deliver the cargo with such dispatch that unnecessary delay can be avoided. The ship to discharge overside in the river or dock, into lighters or otherwise, if required by consignees. The usual custom of the wood trade of each port to be observed by each party in cases where not specially expressed." The cargo was consigned to the defendants under a bill of lading subject to the conditions of the charty-party.

The ship arrived in the Surrey Commercial Docks on the 18th of May, 1894, and was ready to commence the discharge of her cargo on the afternoon of the 24th of May. Some of the timber was discharged into the water direct, in accordance with what was stated to be the custom of the trade. Spars under a certain thickness were discharged into lighters. The defendants sent a lighter alongside the ship, and the spars were passed through one of the ship's portholes on to a stage at the side of the ship, and thence to the lighter. The defendants at first sent only one man in charge of the lighter which was at work, but they subsequently sent two men. These men received the spars in the lighter and stowed them in the bottom. The captain, finding that the work was proceding slowly, complained that the defendants did not send a sufficient number to complete the discharge within the eight days, and subsequently he sent two of his crew to help in the lighter, besides one man who was working on the stage. The lay days ended on the 2nd of June, but the discharge was not completed till the afternoon of the 11th of June.

At the trial of the action the learned judge gave judgment for the plaintiff for nine days' demurrage.

The defendants appealed.

Joseph Walton, Q.C., and Scrutton, for the defendants.—According to the custom of the timber trade, the shipowner is entitled to discharge spars of a certain thickness direct into the water; but with regard to spars of a lesser thickness it is his duty to get them out of the ship and to place them on the quay or in barges, as the case may be. Here the charter-party expressly provides that the ship is to discharge overside into lighters. It is not sufficient for the ship's crew to place the spars over the side and let the lighterman draw them down into the lighter. The shipowner is bound to put the spars out of the ship and into the barge. Therefore in this case the delay was owing to the default of the shipowner, and he is not entitled to demurrage.

Robson, Q.C., and Carver, for the plaintiff.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—This is an action by a shipowner against charterers for demurrage. The delay of which the plaintiff complains took place in the operation of discharging a cargo of timber. The charter-party allowed eight days for the discharging of the cargo, but it took a longer time, and the question arises, Whose fault was that? If it was the fault of the ship, the owner cannot call upon the charterers to pay demurrage; but if it was not the fault of the ship, the charterers are bound to pay demurrage. The charter-party provided that the ship was "to discharge overside in the river or dock.

into lighters or otherwise if required by the consignees." The charter-party also spoke of the ship delivering the cargo, so that the same operation was spoken of indifferently as discharging the cargo and delivering the cargo, and that operation was to take place in eight days. The operation of discharging or delivering a cargo is an operation to be performed by the shipowner and the consignee. Whichever word is used, the same operation is referred to. One party gives delivery, and the other party takes delivery, and they do that at the same time and by one operation. The performance of this joint operation is a matter of common occurrence—viz., whenever a cargo has to be discharged. Sometimes the delivery is into barges or lighters, sometimes it is into another ship, sometimes it is on to a quay. But in any case both parties must be present to take part in performing the one operation. The shipowner has to deliver, and, of course, he has to deliver from the ship, and, therefore, he has to act on the ship. The consignee has to take delivery, and, therefore, he must be alongside the ship, on the thing or place—that is to say, on the barge, or lighter, or ship, or quay—on which delivery has to be taken. If the shipowner simply puts the goods on the rail of the ship, that is not delivery. If the consignee simply takes his place alongside and does nothing more, that is not taking delivery. The shipowner must get the goods over the rail of the ship, and put them into such a position that the consignee can begin to take delivery. The consignee cannot act while the goods are out of his reach, but, when they come within his reach, he is bound to begin his part of the joint operation. If the goods are in slings, the ship works a derrick, and lowers them gradually over the side; and as a mattter of business those on board must help those who are taking delivery by guiding the things as they come down. But as soon as they are within the reach of the consignee, he must join in the operation.

The operation in this case was to get spars of timber out of the ship, and to get them into barges. And, unless spars of timber are to be treated differently from bales of goods, the operation must be a joint operation. The shipowner had to put the spars out of the ship. While they were on the stage, which belonged to the ship, the delivery was not complete; but when they were tipped over so as to come within reach of the consignee, the shipowner had done his part, and it was the duty of the consignee to assist in the joint operation by taking delivery as quickly as possible. It was his duty to have a sufficient number of men to receive the spars and stow them in the barges within the time allowed. Here the men whom he supplied were not able to take delivery quickly enough. Thereupon the captain did that which he was not bound to do—he put two of his own men into the barge to help in doing that part of the work which ought to have been done by the consignee. It is now argued that it was his duty to put these men on the barge, and the suggestion is that it was not merely a case of helping the consignee, but that the captain was bound to perform the whole operation of getting the spars out of the ship and putting them into the barges. In my opinion there is no ground for that contention. The delay occurred because the defendants did not supply enough men for the work, and, the ship not being in the wrong, the plaintiffs are entitled to demurrage.

The appeal must therefore be dismissed.

KAY and A. L. SMITH, L.JJ., concurred.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the plaintiff, Stokes, Saunders, & Stokes.

Solicitors for the defendants, Trinder & Capron.

From Chan. Div. (Lindley, Lopes, and Rigby, L.JJ.) June 12, 13, 26.

SELIGMAN v. PRINCE & Co. (LIMITED). (a.)

Company—Borrowing powers—Issue of debentures in satisfaction of debt—Fraudulent preference—Companies Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 89), s. 164.

P., carrying on business as P. & Co., borrowed £150 from S. for the purposes of his business without security. S., not having been repaid, brought an action against P., and was in a position to sign judgment for the full amount. P. about this time formed a company to take over his business. The memorandum of association contained a clause authorizing the company to borrow or raise money by the issue of debentures and otherwise. The company was bound to indemnify P. against his debts and liabilities, as shown in the balance-sheet.

S. accepted, in discharge of his debt and interest, 7 per cent. first mortgage debentures of the company to the nominal value of £175. Proceedings were shortly afterwards taken to wind up the company, and S. commenced an action on behalf of himself and all other debenture-holders to enforce his security.

Held, that the directors were authorised and empowered to issue such debentures in satisfaction of the debt of P., and their validity was not affected because no money was actually raised or borrowed upon them. P. not being a bankrupt, the Bankruptcy Act and the doctrine of fraudulent preference cannot be applied in favour of his unpreferred creditors as such.

In re Inns of Court Hotel Co., L. R. 6 Eq. 82, 16 W. R. Ch. Dig. 65; and Howard v. Patent Ivory Manufacturing Co., 36 W. R. 801, 38 Ch. D. 156, approved.

Appeal from a decision of Vaughan Williams, J., who dismissed with costs an ordinary debenture-holder's action.

The defences raised by the pleadings were substantially as follows: (1) That no consideration was given for the debentures, and that the directors of the company had no power to issue them; (2) that, if they had such power, it was improperly and irregularly exercised, and that the debentures were invalid on that ground; (3) that the company was being wound up and was insolvent, and that the issue of the debentures was a fraudulent preference. The learned judge held that there was no fraudulent preference, but he refused relief to the plaintiff on the other grounds relied upon by the company.

In 1892 one Llewellyn Prince commenced carrying on business as a tailor in the West-end of London. In August of the same year he borrowed £600 from the plaintiff's brother, Oscar Seligman, upon terms contained in a deed dated the 24th of August, 1892. By this deed Prince mortgaged his business premises and book debts and goodwill to Oscar Seligman as a security for £600, and covenanted to pay that sum within three months after notice in writing requiring payment thereof; but payment was not to be required for eighteen months, and Prince was not to be entitled to pay off the loan for twenty years. Prince then covenanted to carry on the business, to keep and furnish proper accounts, and to pay Oscar Seligman three-sevenths of the net profits in lieu of interest. In July, 1893, Prince applied to the plaintiff for a loan of £150, and the plaintiff lent him that sum without security, but upon a verbal understanding that the loan should be repaid as soon as sufficient money could be got by Prince from his customers. On the 26th of September, 1893, the plaintiff issued a writ to obtain repayment of his loan, and he was in a position to sign judgment against Prince for the amount.

(a.) Reported by W. SHALLCROSS GODDARD, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

At about this time Prince determined to form a company to take over his business. A balance-sheet showing the state of the business on the 30th of September, 1893, was prepared. According to this balance-sheet there was an excess of assets over liabilities, but only £150 was allowed for bad debts off the sum of £2,339 due from customers, and which was the main asset of the business. The evidence showed that the bad debts ought to have been put down at a much larger figure. On the 17th of November, 1893, an agreement was signed between Llewellyn Prince and Oscar Seligman for the formation of a company to take over the business. Prince was to form the company. Oscar Seligman was to release his security. Prince was to accept and give him a bill at three months for £1,100, and at the maturity of the bill Oscar Seligman was to accept first mortgage debentures of the company for £925, bearing interest at 7 per cent., in satisfaction of the bill. These debenture were to be part of an aggregate of like debentures for £1,300. It was part of this agreement that Prince should be the managing director of the company, and should vote for the issue of these debentures to Oscar Seligman, and he was to have power to nominate a director so long as his debentures were unpaid, and there were to be only two directors of the company. The plaintiff was not a party to this agreement, but he knew that an attempt was to be made to form a company, and that he was willing to take its debentures in satisfaction of Prince's debt to him.

On the 1st of November, 1893, the company was registered. The memorandum of association contained (inter alia) the following clauses, defining the objects for which the company was incorporated:—(A.) "To purchase or otherwise acquire as a going concern the business of a tailor and outfitter now carried on by Llewellyn Prince, under the name and style of Prince & Co., in London, and all or any of the assets or liabilities of the said Llewellyn Prince in relation to the said business, and with a view thereto to enter into and carry into effect, with or without modification, the agreement, a draft of which has been initialled by two of the subscribers hereto for identification." (I.) "To sell, exchange, mortgage (with or without a power of sale), assign, lease, sub-let, and generally otherwise deal with the whole or any part of the business, estates, property, or undertaking of the company as a going concern or otherwise, to any person or persons, association or associations, or otherwise, for such consideration as the company may think fit, and either for cash or for shares, debentures, or securities of any other company having objects including the objects of this company, and to hold and distribute among the members in specie the whole or part of the consideration for such sale." (K.) "To borrow or raise money on any terms or conditions, by the issue of, or upon, bonds, debentures, debenture stock, perpetual or otherwise, certificates, bills of exchange, promissory notes, or other obligations or securities of the company, or by mortgage, charge, hypothecation, or pledge of all or any of the company's property (both present and future), including its uncalled capital, or in such other manner as the company may think fit."

The articles of association of the company provided that:—"The regulations contained in Table A of the first schedule to the Companies Act, 1862, shall apply to this company, and, subject as hereby modified, such regulations shall be the regulations of the company." Table A contains the following clauses:—(52) "The number of the directors, and the names of the first directors, shall be determined by the subscribers of the memorandum of association." (53) "Until directors are appointed the subscribers of the memorandum of association shall be deemed to be directors." (55) "The business of the company shall be managed by the directors, who may pay all expenses incurred in getting up and registering the company, and may exercise all such powers of the company as are not by the foregoing Act, or by these articles, required to be exercised by the company in general meeting, subject nevertheless to any regulations of these articles, to the provisions of the foregoing Act, and to such regulations, being not inconsistent with the aforesaid regulations or provisions, as may be prescribed by the company in general meeting; but no regulation made by the company in general meeting shall invalidate any prior act of the directors which would have been valid if such regulation had not been made." The special articles contained (inter alia) the following clauses:—(3) "The directors shall forthwith enter into, on behalf of the company, an agreement with Llewellyn Prince, in the terms of the draft which, for the purpose of identification, has been initialed by two of the subscribers to the memorandum of association, and the board shall carry the same into effect, subject to any modification thereof which the board may approve." (7) "The qualification of a director shall be the holding in his own right of 100 shares, and this qualification shall apply as well to first directors as to all future directors; but the first directors shall be allowed a period of three months in which to obtain their qualification shares." (8) "The first directors shall continue in office till the first ordinary general meeting of the company in the year 1894, and one of the first directors shall be Llewellyn Prince, who shall be managing director." (10) "No director shall vote on any question in which he has a personal interest apart from the members at large." (13) "One director shall be a quorum for a board meeting. The seal of the company shall be affixed in the presence of and countersigned by one director and the secretary." (16) "The directors shall have power to borrow or raise money by the issue of debentures or otherwise, as they shall think proper, and on the issue of any new shares the same shall, in the first instance, be offered to the members of the company for the time being, in proportion to their respective holdings."

The memorandum was signed by seven persons for one share each. Llewellyn Prince and a brother of his (J. R. Prince) were two of the subscribers. The other persons were clerks or servants in the business. On the same day a three months' bill for £1,100 was given by Prince to Oscar Seligman. This would fall due on the 21st of February, 1894. On the 28th of November, 1893, a meeting of two directors—viz., the two Princes, the secretary, and the solicitors of the company—was held, and it was resolved that the seal of the company should be affixed to the contract referred to in the memorandum of association. On the same day the agreement was sealed accordingly. The agreement was between Llewellyn Prince and the company, and by it the company agreed to buy his business, and business premises and assets, for £3,600, to be paid by 720 fully paid-up shares of £5 each. Prince was to be managing director. The company was to indemnify him from his debts and liabilities shown in the balance-sheet. No mention was made in this agreement of either of the Seligmans, nor was there any mention of debentures. This agreement was duly filed at the proper office, and on the 4th of December, 1893, another meeting was held of the two Princes as directors, the secretary and the solicitor of the company. Oscar Seligman and one Warner were also present. Warner was then a solicitor's clerk and acted for Oscar Seligman, and also, according to the evidence, for the plaintiff. At this meeting it was resolved that the 720 shares mentioned in the agreement for sale should be allotted as fully paid-up (in accordance with Llewellyn Prince's request), thus —500 to Llewellyn Prince, 120 to Oscar Seligman, and 100 to J. R. Prince. It was stated at that meeting that L. Seligman was in a position to sign judgment for a debt of £150 taken over by the company, but that he had offered to accept in discharge of that debt and interest seven per cent. first mortgage debentures of the company (provided that the issue did not exceed £1,300) to the nominal value of £175. It was also stated that Llewellyn Prince had borrowed for the purpose of the business, since the 30th of September, 1893, £125 from Warner on condition that Warner would accept debentures similar to those issued to L. Seligman for £200. It was also stated that the company had the option to repay cash or issue the debentures. It was resolved to elect to issue debentures. It was further resolved that a debenture issue of £1,300 in 52 debentures of £25 each be created in accordance with the powers contained in the memorandum and articles of association, carrying 7 per cent. interest. It was also resolved to issue six debentures to L. Seligman, and eight to Warner. There was no allusion in these minutes to the payment of Oscar Seligman. Pursuant to the above resolution debentures for £175 were issued to the plaintiff, and those were the debentures in respect of which he sued. They were in the ordinary form, but made payable if an order was made or resolution passed to wind up the company. On the 4th of January, 1894, the bill for £1,100 held by Oscar Seligman still not having become due, debentures for £925 were issued to him, and the bill was given up. Shortly after this proceedings were taken to wind up the company.

On the 31st of January, 1894, a petition was present by the company.

On the 1st of February, 1894, the plaintiff commenced his action, on behalf of himself and the other debenture-holders. On the 5th a receiver and manager was appointed in that action. On the 6th the company resolved to wind up voluntarily. On the 14th an order was made for the winding up by the court.

The action commenced by the plaintiff was proceeded with in the usual way, and ultimately was dismissed with costs.

Grosvenor Woods, Q.C., and Whinney, for the appellant.—The directors had power to issue debentures for the purpose of raising and borrowing money, and, though no money was actually borrowed on these debentures, they were issued in satisfaction of an existing debt, and are, therefore, valid: In re Inns of Court Hotel Co., L. R. 6 Eq. 82, 16 W. R. Ch. Dig. 65; Howard v. Patent Ivory Manufacturing Co., 36 W. R. 801, 38 Ch. D. 156. The debentures were not issued irregularly, and the directors had full power to issue them at a discount: Anglo-Danubian Steam Navigation and Colliery Co., 23 W. R. 783, L. R. 20 Eq. 339; Davies v. R. Bolton & Co., 43 W. R. 171, [1894] 3 Ch. 678. We submit that the issue was a proper exercise of the Parliamentary powers. Further, there could have been no fraudulent preference, because at the date of the issue the plaintiff was the only creditor of the company.

Farwell, Q.C., and Ribton, for the respondents, referred to In re George Newman & Co., 43 W. R. 483, [1895] 1 Ch. 674, and In re Pyle Works, 39 W. R. 235, [1891] 1 Ch. 173.

Cur. adv. vult.

26th June.—LINDLEY, L.J., stated the facts as above set out, and continued:—Such being the facts, it is necessary to consider the legal position of the plaintiff. He is the holder of debentures issued by the directors of the company under the seal of the company, and which have become payable by the company according to their terms. Unless, therefore, they can be successfully impeached, the plaintiff is entitled to judgment. It is said, first of all, that the directors had no power to issue debentures, except for the purpose of raising and borrowing money (see Article 16), and that the debentures issued to the plaintiff were not issued for any such purpose. Literally this is true; but to hold the debentures invalid on this ground would be to sacrifice substance to form. It is true that the plaintiff was not a creditor of the company, but he was a creditor of Prince's, and the company was to indemnify Prince against his debt to the plaintiff. If the company had borrowed money from the plaintiff or any one else, and with the money so raised had paid off the debt owing to the plaintiff by Prince, the debentures would have been perfectly valid, and would have been within the very terms of Article 16. What was done was in substance, though not in form, the same thing; and the decisions of Giffard, V.C., in In re The Inns of Court Hotel Co. and of Kay, L.J., in Howard v. Patent Ivory Manufacturing Co. support this view of the case and show that these debentures are not invalid on the ground that no money was actually borrowed or raised upon them. But, even if this point were more open to doubt than it is, all doubt is removed by clause (i) of the company's memorandum and Article 55 of Table A to the Companies Act, 1862. Although clause (i) is not one of those matters required by statute to be in the memorandum of association, and such a clause derives no greater efficacy by being put into the memorandum rather than into the articles of association, still, it is as valid as if it were one of such articles, and it cannot be said that the issue of debentures to the plaintiff was without consideration. If the plaintiff had refused to accept debentures Prince would have required the company to pay the plaintiff in cash, and the consideration moving from the plaintiff to the company was relief from this necessity.

Next, it is contended that these debentures were issued by Prince improperly, and acting as an individual in his own interest, and not bonâ fide in the interest of the company, and that the plaintiff knew this to be the case. It is, however, impossible to ignore the existence of the company as a corporate body distinct from Prince, and impossible to ignore the company's memorandum and articles of association. According to them the issue of debentures was left to the directors, and by article 13 one was a quorum, and one could authorize the company's seal to be affixed. Further, the company was formed for the express purpose of taking over Prince's business on the terms of paying his business debts. It is plain that these debentures were issued in order to carry out this object, and in order to bind the company on the one hand and to relieve it from pressure on the other; and, although no doubt Prince was acting in his own interest in this matter, his interest and the interest of the company as a body corporate and existing for the purposes mentioned in the memorandum were not conflicting interests, but were similar in all respects. Nor does the fact that the draft of the resolutions of the 4th of December, 1893, was prepared by Warner in the interests of the two Seligmans in any way prove the contrary. By adopting the resolutions he had prepared, Prince and his brother were not betraying the company or abusing the powers conferred upon them. They were exercising those powers for the purposes for which they were created. I cannot, therefore, come to the conclusion that the debentures issued to the plaintiff are invalid as against the company upon the ground that the power to issue them was not so exercised as to bind the company.

With respect to fraudulent preference, the view taken by the learned judge was quite correct. Prince is not a bankrupt, and the Bankruptcy Act and the doctrine of fraudulent preference cannot be applied in favour of his unpreferred creditors as such. The company having been ordered to be wound up so soon after the debentures were issued is, by section 164 of the Companies Act, 1862, to be treated as a bankrupt person, but when these debentures were issued to the plaintiff the company's only creditor was Prince, and if a man has only one creditor and pays him that payment cannot be set aside as a fraudulent preference simply because other debts are afterwards contracted. Besides which no fraud on creditors was really contemplated by any one, and the pressure put by Prince on the company to give debentures to the plaintiff would be enough to enable the plaintiff to have them treated as valid, even if the company had had other creditors than Prince when the debentures were issued. For the reasons above stated I have come to the conclusion that the appeal must be allowed and the judgment be reversed, and the usual judgment in a debenture-holder's action be substituted for it, and the plaintiff is entitled to the costs of the appeal. This decision in no way conflicts with the decisions of this court in In re George Newman & Co., or in Broderip v. Salomon & Co., 43 W. R. 612. The company is recognized as a corporate body distinct from Prince, and there are no proceedings against Prince as there were against Salomon entitling the company to set aside the agreement for the sale of the business to acquire which the company was formed, or to be indemnified by the vendor against the debts with which he endeavoured to saddle the company. No such fraud as was proved in Salomon's case is proved in this case, and on the materials before us the plaintiff is entitled to the usual judgment in a debenture-holder's action, with costs of the appeal.

LOPES, L.J.—It is said the debentures are invalid on two grounds. First, on the ground that the directors had no power to issue them; and secondly, on the ground that if they had, they improperly exercised that power.

There was another question raised to the effect that the debentures were a fraudulent preference. The last question was decided by the learned judge in favour of the defendant, and I agree with the decision; the two former in favour of the plaintiff, and I am unable to agree with the view he has taken.

The facts have been very fully stated. I will very shortly state my reason for differing from the learned judge. The plaintiff is holder of these debentures which are unimpeachable so far as their form is concerned. But it is said they are not issued to any creditor of the company, they are issued to the plaintiff, who is not a creditor of the company, but a creditor of Prince, and are issued not for the purposes of the company but to discharge a private liability of Prince. But is this really the case when the whole transaction is carefully looked at? The company had indemnified Prince against his liabilities, and one of those liabilities was his debt to the plaintiff. Suppose the company had issued the debentures in question to Prince, as they might have done, as part of the consideration for the purchase of his business, and Prince had taken them to his bankers and raised the amount of the debt upon them and then handed it over to the plaintiff; no question could then have been raised as to the validity of the transaction. Having regard to the fact that the company had indemnified Prince, was not what was done practically the same thing, but done in a less circuitous mode?

I am of opinion that the directors had power to issue these debentures to the plaintiff, and that they were not issued without consideration. But it is said that the directors improperly exercised this power, that they did not issue the debentures quâ directors but in their individual capacity. How can this be successfully urged? Every formality was complied with. Every requirement in the memorandum and articles of association was observed. The debentures were issued in the interest of the company quite as much as in the interest of Prince. They relieved the company from pressure from Prince who was entitled to be indemnified against his liability to the plaintiff, and they released Prince from pressure from the plaintiff, who was entitled to proceed upon his judgment.

The debentures were issued to carry out the object for which the company was formed—viz., the acquisition of Prince's business; and I am unable to say that the directors improperly exercised their powers in issuing them to the plaintiff. This case is entirely different from Salomon's case. The learned judge did not consider that there was anything dishonest or fraudulent or against the policy of the Joint Stock Companies Acts in the formation of the company, as there was in the last-named case.

The appeal must be allowed.

RIGBY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. In the consideration of this case the learned judge has found, and we are unable to differ from him on that point, that in the formation of the company there was no fraud intended; and he seems, amongst other things, to have drawn the conclusion that I should have drawn myself: that it was intended on the part of all the persons concerned in forming the company that the business should be carried on.

Now, with reference to the debentures allotted on the 4th of December to the plaintiff in the debenture action, I have come to the conclusion that there was no bargain, properly so called, between him and Prince which would bind him to accept the debentures or bind Prince to give them. No doubt through Warner he had been brought to say that he would accept debentures, but that was only an offer. He might have withdrawn that offer. So that there was no bargain antecedent to the formation of the company about these particular debentures. Under these circumstances I cannot but think that under the combined operation of the memorandum and articles of association as quoted by Lindley, L.J., there was power to do what the directors did on the 4th of December.

Then it is said that they did not exercise their power for the benefit of the company, but for the individual benefit of Llewellyn Prince himself. If that were so, I do not see there is anything to invalidate the other properly appointed directors, but I may say that I do not see anything to invalidate Llewellyn Prince's action. If he had a personal interest, apart from the members at large, it might be so: but I do not see that he had that personal interest. He had a personal interest along with the others, because it is perfectly plain that the company, as a company, could not have gone on at all if it had not been for the arrangement made about these debentures, or some other arrangement of a similar character.

I think that disposes of the ground upon which the learned judge found these debentures invalid, and on the question of fraudulent preference I agree with what has been already said and with what the learned judge himself said. There is no preferring of these creditors of the company to other creditors of the company. Seligman was no doubt a creditor of Prince's, but he was not a creditor of the company and he was not, in that capacity, preferred to any other creditors of the company, if indeed there were other creditors of the company, which must have been to a very small amount, the company having been formed on the 18th, the agreement sealed on the 28th of November, and this resolution of the 4th of December passed so short a time afterwards. At that time I do not think that any person contemplated the winding up of the company. It was only that it was found impracticable to raise further cash, and that at once would show that the company was not in a position to pay off Seligman and the other Seligman or Warner otherwise than in some such way as they did.

I agree that the appeal ought to be allowed, and that the order of Lindley, L.J., is right in this case.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitors for the appellant, Warner & Seligman.

Solicitors for the company, Thomson, Brooks, & Danby.

High Court of Justice.

Chan. Div. }
Stirling, J. } April 23, 24; July 27.

In re J. H. JONES. (a)

Solicitor—Agreement with client as to costs—Payment—Work done before magistrates and quarter sessions in respect of a criminal charge—Jurisdiction to set aside—Solicitors and Attorneys Act, 1870 (33 & 34 Vict. c. 28), ss. 4, 8, 10.

A person, the subject of a charge of a criminal nature pending before a stipendiary magistrate, retained a solicitor to defend him, and paid him £25 down, and signed a document by which he agreed to pay for costs a lump sum of £75 in addition to the £25 already paid. He subsequently was committed for trial at quarter sessions, and was there acquitted.

Held, that although the above-mentioned document was not signed by the solicitor, yet that it was an agreement within the meaning of the Attorneys and Solicitors Act, 1870.

Held, further, that the High Court has jurisdiction to set aside such an agreement, and to order delivery of a bill of costs, and taxation.

This was a summons by a client against his solicitor asking for the delivery and taxation of a bill of costs.

The facts are stated in the judgment of Stirling, J.

Ashton Cross, for the applicant.

Dunham, for the respondent, took the preliminary objection that there had been an agreement between the solicitor and client as to these costs, and that this court had no jurisdiction to set that agreement aside and order delivery or taxation of a bill in respect of work done at quarter sessions.

(a.) Reported by WM. SCOTT THOMPSON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Ashton Cross.—Under the statute, 2 Geo. 2, c. 23, the Court of King's Bench had power to tax such bills: Clarke v. Donovan, 1 Esp. 137; Ex parte Williams, Sylvester v. Webster, 9 Bing. 388. The jurisdiction has now been transferred to the High Court: In re Howell Thomas, 41 W. R. 524, [1893] 1 Q. B. 670. Was the business done in a "court." Can any distinction be drawn between contentious business and criminal business. In re Andrews, 2 W. R. 46, 17 Beav. 510, shows that a revising barristers' court is a court for this purpose: Rees v. Williams, 23 W. R. 550, L. R. 10 Exch. 200; Midland Railway Co. v. Guardians of Edmonton, 43 W. R. 309, [1895] 1 Q. B. 357. Further, the Act of 1881, having by section 2 given power to make a general order, "in respect of other business not being business in an action or transacted in any court or in the chambers of any judge or master, and not being otherwise contentious business," and as no such order has been made the old practice continues. As the agreement here is not signed by both parties it is not within the Act of 1870: In re Lewis, Ex parte Munro, 24 W. R. 1017, 1 Q. B. D. 724; In re Russell, Son, & Scott, 33 W. R. 815, 30 Ch. D. 114; In re West, King, & Adams, 40 W. R. 644, [1892] 2 Q. B. 102; In re Frape, 41 W. R. 417; [1893] 2 Ch. 284. The case of In re Thompson, 42 W. R. 462, [1894] 1 Q. B. 462, is inconsistent with every reported case. There is nothing in the Act of 1870 to exclude the inherent jurisdiction of the court to tax a solicitor's bill: Storer v. Johnson, 38 W. R. 756, 15 App. Cas. 203. The preliminary objection goes merely to taxation: Duffett v. McEvoy, 10 App. Cas. 300, 33 W. R. Dig. 238.

Dunham.—The Act of 1843 is altogether superseded by the Act of 1881. Here the business was done in part before the magistrates' court and in part before quarter sessions, and therefore its jurisdiction is altogether excluded by section 15, and if the court resorts to its inherent jurisdiction the effect will be to violate the spirit of that section.

July 27.— STIRLING, J.—Certain preliminary objections were raised, with which I have now to deal. It appears that the applicant was in October, 1893, along with certain other persons brought before the stipendiary magistrate at Cardiff on the criminal charge of being concerned in the theft of certain timber. He was committed for trial to quarter sessions, which was held on the 11th of November, and retained the solicitor to defend him. On the 19th of October he paid the solicitor £25 on account of costs, and on the 21st he signed a document stipulating that the costs would be a lump sum of £75 in addition to that already paid. He was tried and acquitted and subsequently paid the £75, and now, being discontented, he has taken out this summons.

The first preliminary objection was that the document which he signed not being signed by the solicitor was not an agreement within the Attorney and Solicitors Act, 1870, that it related to business done, and could not, having regard to section 8 of that Act, be set aside. Section 4 of the Act is as follows:—

"An attorney or solicitor may make an agreement in writing with his client respecting the amount and manner of payment for the whole or any part of any past or future services, fees, charges, or disbursements in respect of business done or to be done by such attorney or solicitor, whether as an attorney or solicitor or as an advocate or conveyancer, either by a gross sum or by commission or percentage, or by a salary or otherwise, and either at the same or at a greater or at a less rate as or than the rate at which he would otherwise be entitled to be remunerated, subject to the provisions and conditions in this part of this Act contained."

The meaning of this agreement in writing has been considered by the court, and there is some doubt as to what the true meaning is. It is not, however, necessary for me to go through the whole of the decisions, because it seems to me that I am bound by a decision of the Divisional Court: In re R. G. Thompson, Ex parte Baylis, where all the previous cases are considered. There the document was signed by the client only. In his judgment Baron Pollock says: "It is said on the authority of the decision in In re Lewis, Ex parte Munro, that the document signed by this gentleman's client is not an agreement in writing within section 4 of the Attorneys and Solicitors Act, 1870, because it is not signed also by him. In that case the agreement was signed by the solicitor only, and the reason given for requiring the client to sign also is that 'otherwise it would always be possible for a solicitor to place a document signed by himself only and containing terms favourable to him before a client, and then to contend that the client was bound by it.' This observation has plainly no bearing on the present case. It is said that the dictum has been assented to in subsequent decisions, but I do not find this to be the case. It has been quoted, not unnaturally, in judgments in which the effect of the language of the statute has not been carefully considered, but in Bewley v. Atkinson, 28 W. R. 638, 13 Ch. D. 283, Thesiger, L.J., points out that the expressions used are wider than was necessary for the decision, and it is not supported by In re Raven, Ex parte Pitt, 30 W. R. 134, 45 L. T. N. S. 742, in which Fry, J., merely held that a letter written by a client to a solicitor did not show 'accession in writing.' I think that the document satisfies the statute, and that the client is not now entitled to have the agreement examined by the officer of the court." Charles, J., gives judgment to the same effect. I consider I am bound by that to hold the document to be an agreement within the Act.

Then the next question is whether the court has jurisdiction to set aside this agreement. Now that is a question entirely novel, and though this Act was passed twenty-five years ago and has been the subject of discussion in many cases, and, as I am informed, by the masters of the Crown office, agreements relating to costs in criminal actions are repeatedly before the courts, such as was the case of In re Lewis, Ex parte Munro, referred to in the above judgment, this point has never arisen. The material parts of the Act to be considered are sections 4, 8, 10, and 15. I have already read the first part of the 4th section, but the proviso is very important. It is as follows:—"Provided always that when any such agreement shall be made in respect of business done or to be done in any action at law or suit in equity the amount payable under the agreement shall not be received by the attorney or solicitor until the agreement has been examined and allowed by a taxing officer of a court having power to enforce the agreement, and if it shall appear to such taxing officer that the agreement is not fair and reasonable he may require the opinion of a court or a judge to be taken thereon by motion or petition, and such court or judge shall have power either to reduce the amount payable under the agreement or to order the agreement to be cancelled, and the costs, fees, charges, and disbursements, in respect of the business done to be taxed in the same manner as if no such agreement had been made."

Sections 8, 10, 15 are as follows:—

8. "No action or suit shall be brought or instituted upon any such agreement, but every question respecting the validity or effect of any such agreement may be enforced or set aside without suit or action on motion or petition of any person or the representative of any person a party to such agreement, or being or alleged to be liable to pay or being or claiming to be entitled to be paid the costs, fees, charges, or disbursements in respect of which the agreement is made by the court in which the business, or any part thereof, was done, or a judge thereof, or if the business was not done in any court, then where the amount payable under the agreement exceeds £50, by any superior court of law or equity or a judge thereof, and where such amount does not exceed £50, by the judge of county court which would have jurisdiction in an action upon the agreement."

10. "Where the amount agreed for under any such agreement has been paid by or on behalf of the client or by any person chargeable with or entitled to pay the same, any court or judge having jurisdiction to examine and enforce such an agreement may upon application by the person who has paid such amount within twelve months after the payment thereof, if it appears to such court or judge that the special circumstances of the case require the agreement to be reopened, reopen the same, and order the costs, fees, charges, and disbursements to be taxed, and the whole or any portion of the amount received by the attorney or solicitor to be repaid by him on such terms and conditions as to the court or judge may seem just."

15. "Except as in this part of this Act provided the bill of an attorney or solicitor for the amount due under an agreement made in pursuance of the provisions of this Act shall not be subject to any taxation nor to the provisions of the Act of the 6 & 7 Vict. c. 73, and the Acts amending the same respectively, the signing and delivery of the bill of an attorney or solicitor."

The contention is that the court having jurisdiction to examine the force of the agreement within section 8 is either the court of the magistrate or quarter sessions, and consequently that under section 10 one or other of these courts is the proper tribunal, and that the jurisdiction of this court is excluded by section 15. The words of the other part of section 4 are very wide and seem to include all questions of taxation, and it has been already held in In re Lewis, Ex parte Munro that a bill of costs before magistrates is subject to taxation, I think, therefore, it is within the Act. Section 8 says that it may be set aside by the court in which the business . . . was done or a judge thereof. Now it is contended that the word court in this section includes the court of quarter sessions and of a police magistrate. If the word includes quarter sessions who are the judges of that court? It seems that by the use of the word judge the application must be made not only to every justice sitting on the trial of any particular case, but also to every justice capable of sitting. So that the application might be made by petition to any such justice. I cannot think that such a result was intended. It seems to me that the courts spoken of in the Act are courts presided over by judges, and I do not think that justices of the peace in quarter sessions can be designated in the ordinary sense judges. At all events I think that what in this Act is referred to as a court is one of the same type as those in which actions at law or suits in equity may be brought. Where the words "court or a judge" first occur in the proviso to section 4, the section is there dealing with the business on petition or motion in those matters, and the courts and judges there spoken of are those who have power to deal with them. It appears to me that a like meaning must attach throughout the Act to the words "court or judge," and that courts of quarter sessions, therefore, were not in contemplation, and are not such a court.

Being of this opinion, it seems to me that the same conclusion must be arrived at as regards the magistrates. The power to appoint stipendiary borough magistrates is conferred by 26 & 27 Vict. c. 97, and it is evident from the preamble and clause 5 of that Act that when appointed they simply perform the duties of justices to the peace. I come, therefore, to the conclusion that the objections must be removed, and the summons restored to the paper.

Solicitors, Vallance & Vallance; Riddell, Vaisey, & Smith, agents for J. H. Jones, Cardiff.

Chan. Div. }
Stirling, J. } April 26; May 17.

BOTTON v. CITY AND SUBURBAN PERMANENT BUILDING SOCIETY. (a)

Building society—Withdrawing member—Repayment of advances — Priorities — Instrument of dissolution — Building Societies Act, 1874, ss. 18, 32.

The priorities, under the rules of a building society, of the withdrawing members over those who have given no notice of withdrawal cannot be varied by an instrument of dissolution executed under the Building Societies Act, 1874, unless such variation has been previously sanctioned by a special meeting of the society summoned and held in accordance with the rules of the society and the terms of section 18 of the Act.

This was a motion by the plaintiff, a member of the above society, the object whereof was to have it determined whether the right as to priory of repayment given to withdrawing members under the rules of the society were liable to be overridden by the provisions of an instrument of dissolution executed under section 32 of the Building Societies Act of 1874.

The plaintiff also sought an injunction to restrain the defendants from paying away the moneys of the society except to the plaintiff and to such withdrawing members of the society as still remained unpaid in accordance with their priority, and from in any manner dealing with the moneys of the society contrary to rule 5 of the society's rules, which was as follows:—

"Upon giving one month's notice in writing of his intention so to do, any member may withdraw his investments at any monthly meeting of the society the amount to be repaid out of the moneys received from members in repayment of advances on the night for withdrawal, but should the repayments not be sufficient, the balance shall be paid from the same fund on the next or following monthly night. If several members shall give notice to withdraw within any one month they shall be paid pro rata."

The directors, however, were to have power upon a resolution of the board to use the monthly subscriptions to assist in repaying withdrawals. The other rules of the society relevant to the present case were to the effect that the society was to be dissolved, if its funds should not be sufficient to meet the claims made upon them, or if any other cause rendered dissolution absolutely necessary, and that the rules of the society should only be altered, rescinded, or repealed by a general meeting properly convened, and no such alterations or repeals should be properly made except with the concurrence of three-fourths of the members then present.

The society was established in 1865 under the statute 6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 32, and in 1887 was incorporated under the Building Societies Act, 1874. The plaintiff was the owner of five fully paid-up shares of £50 each in the society, and on the 20th of January, 1891, he gave notice of withdrawal of his investments under rule 5 aforesaid. This notice of withdrawal became effective one month after the date thereof, that is to say, on the 20th of February, 1891, but the plaintiff had never been able to recover the sums of money due to him in respect of his said five shares. An application had been made by the plaintiff to the court to enforce his rights, and the Court of Appeal had decided that, under the said notice of withdrawal and according to the interpretation which the court put upon the society's rules, the plaintiff was entitled to be repaid his investments out of all moneys received from members in repayment of advances on and subsequent to the 20th of February, 1891, subject to the claims of all members who had given notices which became effective before that date, and pari passu with members who had given notices which became effective on that date, and in priority to members who had given notices which became effective subsequently.

Immediately after this decision of the Court of Appeal, by an instrument of dissolution executed on the 13th of February, 1895, under section 32 of the Building Societies Act, 1874, it was decided to wind up the society, and it was provided (inter alia) by the said instrument that, after payment of the claims of the depositors and other creditors, the funds and property of the society should, subject to the prior payment of costs and expenses, be divided among the members in proportion to the amounts standing to their credit in the books, and further, that the word "member" should include all members, whether they had or had not given notice of withdrawal, and that those members who had given such notice of withdrawal were not to take priority over those who had not, but all were to rank pari passu.

As soon as the plaintiff became aware of the execution of the instrument of dissolution aforesaid, and learnt its provisions, he gave notice of this motion.

The real question for the decision of the court was whether the plaintiff's rights under the rules in respect of his notice of withdrawal, as declared by the Court of Appeal, were extinguished by the said instrument of dissolution.

Hastings, Q.C., and C. E. Bovill, for the motion.—The rights of members of the society under the rules cannot be altered by an instrument of dissolution. The case of Kemp v. Wright, [1894] 2 Ch. 462, 43 W. R. 213, cannot be relied on, having regard to the remarks of Herschell, L.C., in the appeal on the same case. The fact that the appeal was on another point does not affect the cogency of the remarks.

Buckley, Q.C., and Montagu Lush, for the respondents.—The decision in the Court of Appeal in Kemp v. Wright does not apply here, but the decision of the judge in the court below is exactly in point.

Hastings, Q.C., replied.

STIRLING, J., stated the facts as above set out, and continued:—From the balance-sheet of the society published in the years 1891 and 1892 it appears that there are, or at any rate ought to be, funds in the coffers of the society applicable to the satisfaction of the plaintiff's claim, and if the society had been ordered to be wound up the plaintiff's right to have those funds so applied would not have been affected by any such order: Walton v. Edge, 33 W. R. 417, 10 App. Cas. 33; In re Alliance Society, 28 Ch. D. 559, 33 W. R. Dig. 48.

(a.) Reported by ARTHUR MORTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

It was contended, however, by the defendants at the hearing of the motion that the plaintiff's rights were put an end to by the instrument of dissolution, and in support of that view they relied on the case of Kemp v. Wright.

The judgment of the learned judge in the court below in that case seems to me to be based on these two propositions: (1) that what was done in Kemp v. Wright could have been validly done by an alteration in the rules; and (2) that, that being so, it could be done with equal efficacy by an instrument of dissolution under section 32 of the Building Societies Act of 1874. In principle these propositions cover the present case; but it is said that the second one is inconsistent with what was laid down by the Lord Chancellor on appeal in the same case (43 W. R. 213, [1895] 1 Ch. 121).

Now I have carefully considered the Lord Chancellor's judgment, and I am of opinion that it expresses a different view of the effect of an instrument of dissolution from that taken by Kekewich, J., in the court below. Consequently, the second proposition cannot be relied on.

By section 18 of the Act of 1874, which is the statutory enactment as to the alteration of rules, it is provided that an alteration is to be made only with the sanction of a meeting of which notice must be given in the manner provided by the rules. Now no such meeting has been held in this case. It is further to be noticed that an instrument of dissolution might be duly executed in accordance with section 32 without any meeting being called at all. Now the courts have always attached importance to the due observance of rules relating to general meetings, at which any shareholder affected may, if he be so inclined, express his views, and if there is one case more than another in which such rules ought to be rigidly followed it seems to me to be where vested rights of a shareholder or class of shareholders are sought to be taken away by the alteration of an existing rule. In such a case I think alterations in rules can only be held binding where they are made modâ et formâ as prescribed by the Legislature.

If the defendants are right, then in a case where a small number of members have given notice of withdrawals, and these have exhausted the funds of the society, it would be possible for the remaining members, without even hearing their fellow shareholders, to deprive them of the advantage they have gained, and of the fruits of their diligence.

I cannot think that that was intended, and I am of opinion that the plaintiff is entitled to the injunction for which he asks.

Solicitors, Skipper & Tucker; Piesse & Son.

Q. B. Div.
(Lord Russell of Killowen, C.J., and Charles, J.) May 21; July 31.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. ELLIS (a).

Inland revenue — Account stamp duty — Voluntary transfer — Customs and Inland Revenue Acts, 1881 (44 & 45 Vict. c. 12), s. 38, sub-section 1, 2 (b); 1889 (52 & 53 Vict. c. 7), s. 11.

The Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1881, s. 38, sub-section 2 (b), enacts that account stamp duty shall be paid upon any property "voluntarily" transferred by the deceased into the joint names of himself and another person so that the beneficial interest in such property accrues by survivorship to such other person.

Held, the word "voluntarily" is used in this sub-section in its ordinary meaning of "without compulsion" or "without obligation," and does not mean "without consideration."

Information against the executors of Arthur Ellis, deceased, to recover account stamp duty in respect of certain railway stock standing at the time of his death in the joint names of the deceased and his wife.

The facts and the sections of the statutes are fully set out in the judgment of the court.

Sir R. T. Reid, A.G., and Vaughan Hawkins (with them Sir F. Lockwood, S.G.), appeared for the Crown.

Farwell, Q.C., and Lawrence Jenkins, for the executors.

Cur. adv. vult.

July 31.—The judgment of the Court (Lord RUSSELL of Killowen, C.J., and CHARLES, J.) was read by Lord RUSSELL, of Killowen, C.J.—This was an information against the executors of Arthur Ellis to recover account stamp duty in respect of certain railway stocks standing at the time of his death in the joint names of his wife and himself. No part of these stocks had been bought solely with money belonging to Arthur Ellis; all of them had, in fact, been bought with moneys contributed in equal shares by him and his wife out of her separate estate. These investments were made from time to time in pursuance of a verbal arrangement that they should, on the decease of such one of the parties as should first die, belong to the survivor absolutely. Arthur Ellis died on the 11th of February, 1891. By his will he devised and bequeathed his residuary estate for the benefit of his wife during widowhood and afterwards for his children. The will then declared that his wife and himself had from time to time invested moneys partly belonging to him and partly to her in various railway stocks and shares, which were registered in their joint names "such investments having been made on the express agreement that the survivor of them should be entitled by right of survivorship to the stocks and shares so bought," and proceeded to direct that the income of the residuary estate should be enjoyed by her on condition of her transferring all such stocks and shares to his executors and trustees to be by them held on the same trusts as the rest of his residuary estate. In fulfilment of this condition the various stocks and shares were duly transferred into the names of the defendants, the executors and trustees of Arthur Ellis. It was now sought to charge account stamp duty on so much of the stocks and shares as had been bought by Arthur Ellis out of his own moneys. The defendants refused to pay the duty claimed, on the ground that the investment of the moneys by Arthur Ellis was made in pursuance of a contract for value, and not "voluntarily" within the meaning of the Customs and Inland Revenue Acts, 1881 and 1889, and this was the question to be determined.

By the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1881, s. 38, sub-section 1, it is enacted as follows:—"Stamp duties at the like rates as are by this Act charged on affidavits and inventories shall be charged and paid on accounts delivered of the personal or movable property to be included therein according to the value thereof." Sub-section 2, "The personal or movable property to be included in an account shall be" [amongst other property] "of the following description":—(b) "Any property which a person dying on or after the 1st of June, 1881, having been absolutely entitled thereto, has voluntarily caused or may voluntarily cause to be transferred to or vested in himself and any other person jointly, whether by disposition or otherwise, so that the beneficial interest therein or in some part thereof passes or accrues by survivorship on his death to such other person." By the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1889, s. 11, it is enacted that the description of property marked (b) in the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1881, s. 38, "shall be construed as if the expression 'to be transferred to or vested in himself and any other person' included also any purchase or investment effected by the person who was absolutely entitled to the property, either by himself alone or in concert or by arrangement with any other person." It was contended on behalf of the Crown that the act of Arthur Ellis was "voluntarily" done, inasmuch as it had not been done in pursuance of any obligation previously incurred, either by common law, statute, or contract. Had Arthur Ellis acted alone, it was pointed out, there could not have been any doubt that the transfer would have been voluntarily effected, and it was urged that, even under the words of the earlier statute, the circumstance that the wife brought in equivalent sums could make no difference. She, too, was not acting under any precedent obligation.

(a.) Reported by F. O. ROBINSON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Further, it was said that the amending statute made the matter perfectly clear. Arthur Ellis had done the very thing contemplated; he had effected a purchase "in concert or by arrangement with" his wife of securities the beneficial interest in which accrued by survivorship to her on his death; and that it by no means followed that, because there might have been consideration between the parties, the acts could not properly be considered to have been "voluntarily" done within the meaning of the Act: see Crossman v. The Queen, 35 W. R. 303, 18 Q. B. D. 256. The respondent, on the other hand, contended that "voluntarily" meant "gratuitously," or "without consideration," and that here the transfer was not gratuitous, but for valuable consideration. The funds were contributed in consideration of mutual promises. The husband and wife had contracted with each other for value, and, except in so far as every contract is in one sense voluntary, as being the result of an exercise of the will, the act of neither was "voluntarily" done: see In re New University Club, 35 W. R. 774, 18 Q. B. D. 720. We are, however, of opinion that in the section under consideration the word "voluntarily" is not used in the sense of "without consideration," but in its ordinary sense of "freely," "without compulsion," and "not under any obligation": see Churchwardens of Birmingham v. Shaw, 10 Q. B. 868; Art Union v. Savoy, 42 W. R. 690, [1894] 2 Q. B. 609. We think that this is not only the true construction, but that it is that best calculated to carry out the object of the Act, which was to fix with liability to duty all dispositions "which, while preserving to a man the enjoyment of personal property to the day of his death, make the same property pass on his death to some one else, and so become substitutes for wills": Attorney-General v. Gosling, 40 W. R. 366, [1892] 1 Q. B. 545. It is, moreover, a construction which makes it possible to put a reasonable interpretation on the amending Act, section 11 relating to property marked (b), whereas if "voluntarily" means "without consideration" it is difficult to give effect to the words in the last-mentioned section, "in concert or by arrangement with"—words which would appear to point to the existence of some contractual obligation. Our judgment must therefore be for the Crown.

Judgment for the Crown.

Solicitors for the Crown, The Solicitor for Inland Revenue.

Solicitors for the defendants, Walker, Son, & Field, for Field, Son, & Hannay, Liverpool.

Q. B. Div.
(Lord Russell of Killowen, C.J., and Charles, J.) — May 17, 18, 20; July 31.

PALMER v. DAY & SONS. (a.)

Bankruptcy—Sale of goods of bankrupt by auctioneer—Auctioneer's lien—"Giving of credit"—"Mutual dealings"—Section 38 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52).

One L. instructed a firm of auctioneers to sell certain property, and a sum of money became due to them in respect of their charges in connection with such sale. Subsequently L. delivered to them certain goods as bailees with authority to sell them. L. became bankrupt, without having revoked the authority.

Held, that the credit given by the auctioneers to L. in respect of their charges, and the credit given by L. to the auctioneers in respect of the goods to be sold and the money to be realized by such sale, was a giving of credit to the auctioneers, and constituted "mutual dealings" between them and L. within the meaning of section 38 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883.

The facts of the case as set out in the judgment are as follows.

The plaintiff in this case, as trustee of one D. W. Langton, a bankrupt, sought to recover a sum of £31 10s. 9d. from the defendants, a firm of auctioneers, under the following circumstances.

On the 29th of September, 1894, Langton gave instructions to the defendants to sell the furniture of his freehold house, and he also gave him instructions to sell the house itself.

The furniture sale took place on the 15th and 19th of October.

The house was put up for sale on the 8th of November, but no sale was effected.

The furniture sale account showed a balance due to the auctioneers of £7 4s. 9d. Their charges, in respect of the abortive sale of the house amounted to £24 6s., these two sums amounting to the sum now in question—viz., £31 10s. 9d.

Between the date of the furniture sale and the unsuccessful attempt to sell the house, some pictures, which had been at the house of Langton and had been bought in at the furniture sale, were sent by him to the defendants' premises for the purpose of their being sold by the defendant. It was thought that there was a better chance of selling them, if sent there, than if left at Langton's house, but although they were thus sent, there was no absolute right in the auctioneers to sell them without the approval of Langton as to price.

On the 15th of November a receiving order was made against Langton.

The plaintiff was appointed trustee on the 1st of January, 1895, and on the 2nd of January Langton was adjudicated bankrupt.

On the 30th of January the trustee wrote to the defendants requesting them to remove some furniture, which had been bought in at the sale to their premises and dispose of it, together with the pictures already at their office. The trustee added that any rights the defendants might have by way of lien upon the goods or proceeds of sale should not be prejudiced. The defendants, accordingly, sold and claimed to deduct from the proceeds the two sums due to them in respect of the furniture sale and of the attempted sale of the house. The trustee disputed their right to do so, and brought this action in the county court at Maidstone to recover the amount sought to be deducted—viz., the sum of £31 10s. 9d., that amount being made up of the £7 4s. 9d. due on the furniture sale, and the £24 6s. due on the abortive house sale. The learned judge gave judgment for the defendants, on the ground that there was one entire and indivisible contract between Langton and the defendants for the sale of the furniture and the house, and that they were, therefore, entitled by virtue of their auctioneers' lien to retain their charges in respect of both sales. He negatived a contention by the defendants that they were under any circumstances, whether the contract was one entire contract or not, entitled to a set-off in bankruptcy by virtue of section 38 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52). The plaintiff appealed from this decision.

(a.) Reported by T. MATHEW, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

E. Bray, for the appellant.—This is not a "mutual credit" within the meaning of section 38 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883. The trustee was entitled to have these pictures returned to him, and could maintain an action in detinue to recover them, therefore the "account" mentioned in section 38 could not be taken.

Counsel cited Eberles Hotels Co. v. Jonas, 35 W. R. 469, 18 Q. B. D. 459.

Hohler, for the respondent.—The debt due by the bankrupt to the defendant is a credit from the defendant to the bankrupt on the one hand, and the delivery of pictures by the bankrupt, with instructions to sell, is on the other hand a credit given by the bankrupt to the defendant. Section 38, therefore, applies, as there was a mutual credit within that section: Rose v. Hart, 8 Taunt. 499; Peat v. Jones, 30 W. R. 433, 8 Q. B. D. 147; Smith v. Hodson, 4 T. R. 211; Booth v. Hutchinson, 21 W. R. 116, L. R. 15 Eq. 30, Sm. L. C. 9th ed., vol. 2, p. 344. At the date of the receiving order the authority given to the defendants to keep the pictures for the purpose of sale became irrevocable as against the rights of the defendants under section 38: Naoroji v. Chartered Bank of India, 16 W. R. 791, L. R. 3 C. P. 444; Astley v. Gurney, 18 W. R. 44, L. R. 4 C. P. 714.

Bray, in reply.

Cur. adv. vult.

July 31.—Lord RUSSELL, C.J., read the judgment of the court. After stating the facts as set out above, the learned judge proceeded as follows:—We are unable to concur in the view of the learned judge of the county court that there was one entire and indivisible contract between Langton and the defendants in reference to both sales. We think, on the whole, that the evidence does not warrant that conclusion. The case appears to us the ordinary one of auctioneers being instructed to sell, first, the furniture, and, secondly, the house. The mere fact that the instructions were given at or about the same time does not, in our opinion, justify the inference that the two sales took place under a single and indivisible contract. The circumstances of the two sales were different; they took place at different times and under different conditions. It therefore becomes necessary to consider whether his judgment can be supported on the other ground (that of mutual dealings) relied upon. Section 38 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, so far as is material, is as follows:—

"Where there have been mutual credits, mutual debts, or other mutual dealings between a debtor against whom a receiving order shall be made and any other person proving, or claiming to prove, a debt under such receiving order, an account shall be taken of what is due from the one party to the other in respect of such mutual dealings, and the sum due from the one party shall be set off against the sum due from the other party, and the balance of the account, and no more, shall be claimed or paid on either side respectively."

This is a re-enactment in substance of section 39 of the Act of 1869, where for the first time the words "mutual dealings" were added to the words "mutual credits" and "mutual debts," which are alone used in the earlier statutes regulating the right of set-off in bankruptcy. The additional words undoubtedly have extended the right conferred by the earlier statutes. Under their provisions it had been considered from the year 1818, when Rose v. Hart, 8 Taunt. 499, was decided, that although "mutual credits" is a wider term than "mutual debts," the credits must be such as either must terminate in debts, or have a natural tendency to terminate in debts, and must not be such as terminate in claims differing in nature from debts: see Smith's Leading Cases, 9th ed., vol. 2, p. 336. The section in its present shape, however, has been held applicable to all demands provable in bankruptcy, and so to include claims as well in respect of debts as of damages liquidated or unliquidated, provided they arise out of contract. Thus, in Booth v. Hutchinson, damages for breach of covenant unascertained at the date of a deed of arrangement incorporating the enactments of the Bankruptcy Act, 1869, were allowed to be set off against a claim for accruing rent. And in Peat v. Jones the Court of Appeal followed Booth v. Hutchinson in holding the mutual credit clause in the Act of 1869 applicable to a claim for unliquidated damages, and held that such a claim might be set off in an action brought by a trustee without recourse to the Court of Bankruptcy. The same rule is applicable not only to actual breaches of contract, but also to breaches of obligations arising out of contract. It was accordingly held that in Jack v. Kipping, 30 W. R. 441, 9 Q. B. D. 113, that a claim for fraudulent misrepresentation on the sale of a chattel by a bankrupt could be set off against a claim by the trustee for the price.

But whilst the right of set-off has been thus widely extended, it is still subject to the limitation that the "dealings" must be such that in the result the account contemplated in the section can be taken in the way therein described. In other words, the "dealings" must be such as will end on each side in a money claim. Otherwise the claims are incommensurable. It was upon this ground that the Court of Appeal in Eberles Hotel Co. v. Jonas, held that the defendant could not set off a debt due from the plaintiff company to him under section 38, the claim of the plaintiffs against him being for the return of chattels in specie in an action of detinue.

There could not be an "account" as between goods and money, and no balance could be struck.

It was contended by the plaintiff in the present case that the authority last referred to was in point. At the date of the receiving order (which, it was admitted, was the date at which the rights of the parties must be determined) the bankrupt, it was said, had a right to maintain an action of detinue for the return of the pictures in specie, and nothing else. Such a claim (it was argued) did not arise from a

"dealing" within the true meaning of that term as used in section 38. It was the result of an interference with a right of property, and would not end in a money claim, and the case relied upon is, no doubt, an authority for that proposition. The defendants, on the other hand, contended that at the date of the receiving order no action for the return of the goods could have been maintained unless Langton had taken some step to alter the terms upon which the pictures had been deposited with them. Their position, they said, was that of bailees of the pictures with an authority to sell them so that there was a "mutual credit" or "mutual dealing" then existing between the bankrupt and themselves—a credit on the one hand by them to him in respect of the sums due to them on the furniture sale account and in respect of their charges for the attempted sale of the house, and a credit on the other hand by the bankrupt to them in respect of the pictures and the moneys to be realized by the sale. We think that the latter is the true view of the relations between the parties. No action could, in our opinion, have been maintained by Langton when the receiving order was made. He had done nothing to revoke the authority conferred upon the defendants to keep the pictures on their premises for the purpose of sale, and the circumstance that he retained a control over the price does not seem to us to make any difference. The defendants were the depositaries of the pictures with an authority to sell them at approved prices, and as auctioneers they would certainly be entitled to receive for the vendor from the purchaser the amount realized. This authority could have been revoked, but until revoked the deposit, with such an authority to sell and receive the proceeds, constituted, in our opinion, a giving of "credit" to the defendants (see Naoroji v. Chartered Bank of India, approved in Astley v. Gurney). There was a debt on one side and a delivery of property with directions to turn it into money on the other.

Upon the ground, therefore, that section 38 of the Bankruptcy Act of 1883 applies to this case, while we cannot agree with the reasons given in the court below for the judgment, we think that this appeal must be dismissed with costs on the grounds we have stated.

Appeal dismissed; leave to appeal refused.

Solicitors for the appellant, Sole, Turner, & Knight, for W. C. Cripps & Sons.

Solicitor for the respondent, Walter Day, Maidstone.

Q. B. Div.
(Wright and Kennedy, JJ.) } June 17, 18; July 4.

REG. v. VESTRY OF ST. GEORGE, HANOVER SQUARE. (a)

Metropolis Management — Sewers — London County Council—Power of county council to order vestries to construct sewers—Metropolis Local Management Act, 1855 (18 & 19 Vict. c. 170), s. 138.

The London County Council have no power, under section 138 of the Metropolis Local Management Act, 1855, to order the vestry of a parish in the metropolis, in which parish certain houses are situate which discharge their sewage directly into the River Thames, to construct a new sewer for the purpose of receiving the drainage of such houses and preventing its discharge into the river.

(a.) Reported by T. MATHEW, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

In this case a rule nisi for a mandamus had been obtained at the instance of the London County Council directed to the Vestry of St. George, Hanover-square, in the county of London, calling upon them to show cause why they should not comply with an order made on the 4th of December, 1894, by the London County Council, directing them to construct a sewer therein described, or to execute sufficient works to secure the communication with the main sewers of the metropolis of the sewer or drain receiving the sewerage from certain premises in the said order mentioned.

The question that was raised before the court was whether the London County Council, as the successors of the Metropolitan Board of Works, had power to order the vestry to construct the sewer.

It appeared that the attention of the county council was called by the Thames Conservators to the fact that the drainage of certain houses, numbered 102, 103, and 104, Grosvenor-road, Pimlico, was discharged into the River Thames. The county council thereupon communicated with the Vestry of St. George, Hanover-square, the local authority, in order that that body should cause the sewage to be diverted into a local sewer, but the vestry refused to execute the work.

The county council thereupon made an order upon the vestry to construct a sewer to receive the drainage of the said houses.

This order the vestry refused to carry out, contending that the London County Council had no jurisdiction to order them to do so.

On the above facts a rule nisi was obtained.

Channell, Q.C., and Macmorran, showed cause on behalf of the vestry.

Bosanquet, Q.C., and English Harrison, appeared on behalf of the county council, in support of the rule.

Cur. adv. vult.

July 4.—WRIGHT, J.—In this case the question we have to decide is whether the London County Council, as representing the old Metropolitan Board of Works, has power to order the vestry to construct a new sewer for the purpose of taking the sewage of certain houses situate on the edge of the Thames Embankment into one of the low level sewers at some distance inland.

By section 69 of the Metropolis Local Management Act, 1855 (18 & 19 Vict. c. 120), the duty is placed upon the vestries of constructing sewers for the purpose of carrying local sewerage. As tending to show that the system intended was one which left the initiative to the vestry, and only gave the control to the Metropolitan Board of Works, it is material to observe that the vestry had not the power to construct any local sewers without the previous consent and approval of the Metropolitan Board of Works.

By section 135 of the same Act it was enacted that the Metropolitan Board of Works should have the power, but not that it should be their absolute duty, to construct such main sewers and works "as they may think necessary for preventing all or any part of the sewage within the metropolis from flowing or passing into the River Thames, in or near the metropolis, and shall also make all such sewers or other works and such diversions or alterations of any existing sewers or works as they may from time to time think necessary for the effectual sewerage and drainage of the metropolis."

By the Act of 1858 (21 & 22 Vict. c. 104) there was imposed upon the Metropolitan Board of Works the duty of constructing a system of sewerage so that the sewage should not pass into the Thames, and then, later, by the Act of 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 102), several amendments in the law were made.

By section 138 of the Act of 1855, which is the section on which the question before us turns, it is enacted that the Metropolitan Board of Works shall "make such general or special order as to them may seem proper for the guidance, direction, and control of the vestries of parishes and district boards in the levels, construction, alteration, and maintenance and cleansing of sewers in their respective parishes or districts, and for securing the proper connection and inter-communication of the sewers of the several parishes and districts and their communications with the main sewers vested in the said metropolitan board, and generally for the guidance, direction, and control of vestries and district boards in the exercise of their powers and duties in relation to sewerage; and all such orders shall be binding upon such vestries and boards."

Does that section authorize the county council, which now represents the Metropolitan Board of Works, to make the order in question?

It appears to me that it does not empower them to take the initiative by ordering specific new works of sewerage. It was only intended for the purposes of control over the construction and arrangement of sewers. If the vestry make a sewer it must be made with the approval of the county council. If the existing or future sewers are at such levels or constructed in such a manner as to prevent their properly communicating with the main sewerage, the county council may order them to be altered so as to communicate properly with the main system, but there is nothing in the section which authorizes the county council to take away from the vestry the initiative as to making new sewers, or which enables the county council to usurp the discretion of the vestry as to what new sewers shall be made.

Section 45 of the Act of 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 102) provides that the vestry must submit plans of the new sewers to the Metropolitan Board of Works and further that "no such sewer or works shall be proceeded with without the approval in writing or contrary to the direction of the said board." It appears to me that these enactments are merely regulative enactments and do not authorize the county council to command the vestry to exercise their powers. The case of St. Luke's, Chelsea, 10 W. R. 293, 31 L. J. Q. B. 50, throws some light upon the matter. There a private person obtained a mandamus to the vestry to construct sewers in a part of their district and upon demurrer it was held that the mandamus ought not to go. It was not however claimed or contended in that case that the Metropolitan Board of Works had the jurisdiction which is now claimed for the county council. The court, as a matter of fact, held that it is the approval of the board that the Act contemplates, and I think the tenor of that judgment supports the view we take in this case.

KENNEDY, J.—I am of the same opinion. It is conceded that the object of the order was for the purpose of preventing the outfall of certain sewage within the metropolis. On looking at the various statutes it appears to me that that is not an order which can be made upon the vestry by the county council.

By section 69 of the Act of 1855 the duty is imposed upon the vestry of every parish mentioned in the schedule, to do such works as may be necessary for effectually draining their parish or district. It appears to me that the general central authority are given the control, direction and supervision of such drainage works, but not the power sought to be enforced here by the order to make certain specific sewers. If the central authority had the power to order the various vestries to construct such works, then the powers given by section 135 to the central authority would be needless. The true construction of the sections taken together appears to me to be that a power of supervision and control is given to the county council as the central authority, but not a power which authorizes them to order a district to carry out such a work as is sought to be enforced here. If the Metropolitan Board of Works or their successors think it is necessary to construct works for preventing the outfall of sewage within the metropolis into the Thames they have power to construct the works themselves, but they are not authorized to order the vestry to do so. Section 83 of 25 & 26 Vict. c. 102, which gives the Metropolitan Board of Works power to make bye-laws for the guidance of the vestry, ought not to be construed as giving the board of works authority to make such an order as is made here—namely, not for the purpose of maintaining the main and general sewerage of the metropolis, but for the purpose of keeping the river within the metropolis clear as specified in section 135 of the Act of 1855. The question we have to decide is whether there is a power given to the county council to make an order for the performance by another body of a duty which is charged upon itself in respect of the construction of a sewer. I think the county council has no such power, and that they have no authority to make the order they have sought to enforce here.

Rule discharged, with costs.

Solicitors for the vestry, Caprons, Dalton, Hitchins, & Brabant.

Solicitor for the London County Council, W. A. Blaxland.

Lunacy.

(Lindley, Lopes, and Rigby, L.JJ.) Aug. 5, 9, 1895.

In re G. E. BROWN. (a.)

Lunacy—Lunatic domiciled in Victoria—Transfer of stock standing in the name of the lunatic—Discretion of the court—Lunacy Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 5), s. 134.

A., a person domiciled in Victoria, had been there found a lunatic, and B., the Master in Lunacy of the Supreme Court of Victoria, had been appointed, under the Lunacy Act of Victoria, 1890, to manage A.'s estate B. applied to the English court to have a transfer to him of the capital and dividends of stock standing in the lunatic's name in England.

Held, that, under section 134 of the Lunacy Act, 1890, the court had a discretion as to making the order, but that, under the circumstances, it was right that both capital and income should be transferred to B.

This was a petition by T. P. Webb, master in equity and master in lunacy of the Colony of Victoria, by H. L. Taylor, his attorney in this country, asking that some fit person should transfer to him or his attorney certain securities belonging to the above-mentioned Gertrude Emily Brown. The stock in question consisted of £752 9s. 2d. Midland Railway Stock, £104 London and North-Western Railway Stock, and £260 Consols.

By an order of the Supreme Court of Victoria made in lunacy in the matter of the said G. E. Brown, a lunatic patient, and in the matter of the

(a.) Reported by WM. SCOTT THOMPSON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Lunacy Act, 1890 (of Victoria), on the 6th of September, 1894, it was ordered that the master in lunacy should examine the said G. E. Brown and take evidence as to whether she was a lunatic and report thereon to the court. The master accordingly made his report, and thereby found that she was of unsound mind and incapable of managing herself or her affairs, and by an order of the said court made on the 27th of September, 1894, that report was confirmed.

By another order of the same date the court appointed the present petitioner, T. P. Webb, guardian of the person and estate of the said G. E. Brown, and receiver of her estate, and by the same order the care and management of her estate was remitted to him. Mr. Webb duly appointed the said H. L. Taylor his attorney to receive the lunatic's property in the United Kingdom.

Minutes of an order to be made on the present petition had been drawn up and approved by the master in lunacy in this country, which provided for the transfer of the stock and the payment of the dividends to the said H. L. Taylor, but the judge at chambers refused to make such an order and adjourned the matter to be heard in court.

The Lunacy Act of 1890 of the Colony of Victoria provides (section 124) that the court and the master might make orders after the return of the inquisition for the custody of the person and management of the estate of the lunatic; (131) the master in lunacy was empowered and required to undertake the management of the estates of all lunatics in Victoria and to take possession and care of, recover, collect, and preserve and administer their property; (182) the master was to have power with respect to the estates of patients to receive and recover moneys due, demise lands, sell, or convert into money any real or personal property, and surrender any lands, receive all rents, income, and profits of real or personal property, settle or compromise demands, &c. (190), he was to be at liberty to apply money in paying the debts of and maintaining the lunatic and his family and payment of costs of management, to invest the patient's money in Government stock in the name of the treasurer, and the treasurer, at the request of the master, might buy, sell, or transfer such stock; (229) where any stock should be standing in the name of or should be vested in a lunatic beneficially entitled thereto the court might order some fit person to transfer the stock and to receive and pay the dividends as the court might order.

Strickland, for the petitioner. — The point is whether the property has been vested in the person appointed according to the law of Victoria for the management thereof. The Colonial Act does not expressly use the word "vest." [LINDLEY, L.J.—Is not the effect of the Act this, that until a committee is appointed the master is a receiver?] The Act contains no provision for the appointment of a committee. The duties of the master are such that he must have the property vested in himself. The capital is required for maintenance. [LINDLEY, L.J.—The lunatic having been so found there is no difficulty as to income. We will consider the effect of the Colonial Act as regards the capital.]

Aug. 9, 1895.—The judgment of THE COURT was read by

LINDLEY, L.J.—The question to be decided in this case is whether this court sitting in lunacy has jurisdiction under section 134 of the Lunacy Act, 1890, to order certain stocks and shares standing in the name of the lunatic to be transferred into the name of the Master of Lunacy in the colony of Victoria in the common form to be applied by him in the usual way. [His lordship read section 134 of the Lunacy Act, 1890.] The lunatic in this case is residing out of the jurisdiction in Victoria and has been declared a lunatic, and the Master in Lunacy there has been appointed to manage her personal estate. So far there is no difficulty; but such personal estate has not vested in the colonial master in the sense in which it was vested in the lunatic, nor does the master occupy the same position as the personal representative of the lunatic at her death. Section 133 speaks of vesting according to the law of the place where the lunatic lives, and if it only applies where the personal property is "vested" in a person in the strict legal sense attached to it by the courts of law in England, it would not only be inapplicable to this case, but also to the Act of Victoria, for it very rarely happens that property is "vested" by foreign or colonial Acts in that sense.

What is usually done by such Acts is very much like what we do. We appoint a committee with power, if necessary, to sue for any property of the lunatic; but we do not vest the lunatic's property in that person in the strict legal sense of vesting. Unless, therefore, vesting in section 134 is to be construed in its wide sense and not in its strictly legal sense the section would become practically useless. It is obviously the intention of the section to hand over to committees the personal property of the person declared lunatic, and it ought to be so construed as to be made effectual. If now we turn to the previous decisions we shall see that orders have been made for the transfer of stocks of persons resident out of the jurisdiction, although the property did not vest in the persons appointed in the strict sense. Following the chronological order in which they were decided, we have In re Stark, 2 Mac. & G. 174 (a Scotch case); In re Elias, 3 Mac. & G. 234 (a Dutch case); In re Garnier, 20 W. R. 288, L. R. 13 Eq. 532 (a French case); In re Mitchell, 17 Ch. D. 515 29 W. R. Dig. 127 (a Scotch case); and Scott v. Bentley, 3 W. R. 280, 1 K. & J. 281 (also a Scotch case).

In these cases the rights of persons appointed have been carefully considered and fully argued. In In re Stark and in In re Garnier, the court held that it had a discretion in case of its not being satisfied with the proposed application of the property, and ordered the dividends only to be paid to the curator. In In re Elias and In re Mitchell the capital was ordered to be transferred to the curator without security being required. In Scott v. Bentley the stock was in court, so that the case did not turn on the Lunacy Acts. In In re Barlow's Will, 35 W. R. 737, 36 Ch. D. 287, a master had been appointed by the Supreme Court of New South Wales, and he applied for the transfer of the stock to him, consisting of £2,250, which had been paid into court by the trustee of the will under the Trustee Relief Act. The beneficiary had not been judicially declared a lunatic, and the court held that the colonial master had no absolute right to have the whole sum transferred, but that there was ground for making such an order as to part of the capital. The lunatic in that case had not been adjudicated a lunatic, and the court felt considerable difficulty in making any order. Obviously, if the lunatic had been so declared and the master appointed as committee, there would have been no difficulty as to the transfer. That, case, however, did not turn on the Lunacy Acts of this country. Here, although the stocks are not vested in the strict legal sense, the Colonial Act clearly gives the master all the powers necessary to dispose of the stock and shares, and as we are satisfied that the money is wanted for maintenance and so forth, the proper order by the master will be made.

Whether, in the circumstances, the colonial master is absolutely entitled to the transfer need not now be decided, as section 134 of the Act of 1890 seems to give us a discretion. But in order to render the order right in the form of it, we propose to say that the stock and shares are vested in the master within the meaning of section 134. The sections of the Colonial Act are, in our opinion, ample for the purpose.

Solicitors, Roy & Cartwright.

Court of Appeal.

From Chan. Div. (Lindley, Lopes, and Rigby, L.JJ.) July 30, 1895.

EARL OF SHREWSBURY v. WIRRALL RAILWAYS COMMITTEE. (a.)

Railway company—Arbitration—Umpire's fees paid by landowner — Action to recover — Taxation — Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845 (8 & 9 Vict. c. 18), ss. 34, 35.

A landowner who himself takes up the award of the umpire in an arbitration and pays the umpire's fees cannot recover them from the railway company, though such fees may be costs which, under the statute, are payable by the promoters of the undertaking.

Where such fees have been paid by the landowner and the amount has been disallowed on taxation by the taxing-master, the decision of the taxing-master cannot be reviewed in an action against the railway company.

Appeal from Romer, J.

The plaintiff was a landowner, to whom notice had been given by the defendant railway company that they required some of his land.

The plaintiff claimed £21,700, and the railway company offered £9,500. The plaintiff having given notice to have the amount fixed by arbitration, the amount was fixed by the umpire at £11,865.

The plaintiff took up the umpire's award, and himself paid the umpire's fees, amounting to £410 4s. 6d.

The bill for the costs of and incidental to the arbitration was taxed by one of the taxing-masters, who struck out this item of £410 4s. 6d. as not being costs properly incurred by the plaintiff.

The defendants refused to pay these fees, and the plaintiff brought the present action to recover them.

Romer, J., dismissed the action. The plaintiff appealed.

Section 34 of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, is as follows: "All the costs of any such arbitration, and incident thereto, to be settled by the arbitrators, shall be borne by the promoters of the undertaking, unless the arbitrators shall award the same or a less sum than shall have been offered by the promoters of the undertaking, in which case each party shall bear his own costs incident to the arbitration, and the costs of the arbitration shall be borne by the parties in equal proportions."

Section 35 provides that "the arbitrators shall deliver their award in writing to the promoters of the undertaking, and the said promoters shall retain the same, and shall forthwith, on demand, at their own expense, furnish a copy thereof to the other party to the arbitration, and shall at all times, on demand, produce the said award, and allow the same to be inspected and examined by such party or any person appointed by him for that purpose."

Witt, Q.C., and T. L. Wilkinson, for the appellant. —Section 35 is ancillary to section 34, not restrictive of it. No doubt the company in this case might have been compelled to pay the fees, but it was not obligatory upon the plaintiff to compel them. Section 34 gives us a statutory right to these costs, and it is immaterial who first pays them. So far as the taxing-master affected to deal with the liability of the company he exceeded his jurisdiction.

They referred to Metropolitan District Railway Co. v. Sharpe, 28 W. R. 617, 5 App. Cas. 425; In re Walker and Brown, 30 W. R. 703, 9 Q. B. D. 434; Broadhurst v. Darlington, 2 Dowl. 38; In re Autothreptic Steam Boiler Co. (Limited) and Townsend, Hook, & Co., 21 Q. B. D. 182, 36 W. R. Dig. 55; In re Holliday and Mayor, &c., of Wakefield, 20 Q. B. D. 699, 36 W. R. Dig. 8; In re Sheffield Waterworks Act, 1864, 14 W. R. 143, L. R. 1 Ex. 54; In re Owen and London and North-Western Railway Co., 16 W. R. 125, L. R. 3 Q. B. 54; In re Sandback Charity Trustees and North Staffordshire Railway Co., 26 W. R. 229, 3 Q. B. D. 1.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and Macnaghten, for the respondents.—This is an attempt to obtain review of the taxation. The point was put by Cotton L.J., in In re Sandback Charity Trustees and North Staffordshire Railway Co.

Witt, Q.C., replied.

LINDLEY, L.J.—This is a curious action and one which, looking at it from a merely moral point of view, apart from legal principles, one would like to have decided in the plaintiff's favour, but I do not see my way to do so. The defendants took some land belonging to the plaintiff under the Lands Clauses Act. There was an arbitration, a reference to an umpire, and the umpire made an award, giving the plaintiff, it is true, less than he asked for, but a great deal more, or substantially more, than the defendants had offered him for the land which they wanted. Under those circumstances it became the duty of the defendants, under the statute, to pay the costs of and incidental to the arbitration, and that, I take it, included the expenses of the award—the umpire's fees. There is a method (I will read the section presently), pointed out by the statute which, if pursued, would have enabled the plaintiff to compel the defendants to take up that award, pay all those costs and give him a copy of it. That was the plaintiff's right before he paid a farthing. He was under no obligation himself to pay a farthing. He had a right under the statute to compel the defendants to pay the whole amount. But he did not pursue his rights. He did not follow the provisions of the statute at all. He had no right himself to go and get that award; but notwithstanding that, he goes to the arbitrator and says: "If you (the arbitrator) will give me that award, I will pay you £400." Now he wants to make the defendants repay that £400. How is he to do it? I confess, looking at it from that point of view, it appears to me that there is no obligation on the part of the defendants to reimburse him that money. It was paid for a convenience to himself and a convenience which he had no right to obtain, but which he did obtain under the arrangement to which I have alluded.

Now, if we look at the sections of the Lands Clauses Act, we shall see exactly how the matter stands. Section 34 says that all the costs of the arbitration—the words are—"any such arbitration," but I need not comment upon the words "any such," it includes this—"all the costs of the arbitration and incident thereto"—and I think Mr. Witt has given us authority for saying that that covers the umpire's costs and his fees, to be settled by the arbitrators—shall be borne by the promoters of the undertaking. Therefore, we have got this, that under section 34, in the events which have happened, it was the duty of the defendants to pay all the costs of the arbitration and incident thereto. Now section 35 says this. [His lordship read the section, and continued:—] What is the effect of those two sections? The effect of those two sections is, to my mind, tolerably plain. The obligation imposed upon the defendants to pay the costs is not limited or qualified or taken away by section 35, but the combined effect of those two sections appears to be this, that the costs which the defendants are to pay under section 34 are to be regarded as their own costs which they must pay in order to perform the obligations imposed upon them by section 35. That will become important when we deal with the taxing-master, but I am looking now at what I consider to be the broader point, whether there is any obligation on the part of the defendants to pay the plaintiffs; and under the circumstances and for the reasons which I have given, I can find none. But then it is put in this way. These are the plaintiff's costs, and, inasmuch as they are the plaintiff's costs and the defendants are bound to pay them and the plaintiff has had to pay them, the defendants are bound to reimburse the plaintiff his costs. Now if we look at it in that way these costs have been laid before the taxing-master, who was the proper officer, to tax and reduce them if necessary, and he, in the exercise of his jurisdiction, has struck them out. Whether there is or is not any method of compelling him to review that taxation I do not know. It is unnecessary for us to consider. He certainly is not the ordinary taxing-master. That is settled by the decision we have been referred to, the Sandback Charity case; and that there is no method of compelling him to review his taxation similar to that which obtains in ordinary taxation is also obvious from the decision in Sharpe v. The Metropolitan District Railway Co. The point decided in that case was of a different character. The point decided there was that a person could bring an action under this statute for his costs without going to the taxing-master at all; but the decision in that case shows that the taxing-master is not to be treated as a ordinary taxing-master in an action, but as having a jurisdiction imposed or conferred upon him by the statute and which he, being treated as an inferior court, can be compelled to perform either by mandamus or certiorari, when those are the proper remedies. If you look at it as a taxation of costs, then it does appear to me that the taxing-master's decision, in this proceeding at all events, is incapable of review and is against the plaintiff; but I prefer to put my judgment upon the broader base, that although the plaintiff might have compelled the defendants to pay all the money in the discharge of their duty which they have not done, he has disentitled himself from saying that they are under any obligation to him to repay a sum of money which he choose to pay to get a document which he had no right to get. That is the broad point.

(a.) Reported by ARNOLD GLOVER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

LOPES, L.J.—I feel very sorry for the plaintiff in this case, and, speaking for myself, if I could have possibly seen my way to help him I would have been very glad to avail myself of it; but I fear I can see none. The real truth of the case is that the plaintiff went the wrong way to work. He had the whole matter in his own hands if he had been careful to follow the statute. He ought to have gone under section 35.

I mean by that he ought to have held his hand, and left it to the company to take up this award. If they had not taken it up in a reasonable time he might have gone for a writ of mandamus to compel them to take it up; they would then have taken it up and would have paid these fees, and there would have been no difficulty whatever with regard to this matter. But most unfortunately he has not followed the statute. He went to the umpire, and he obtained his award and paid some £400. This was a voluntary payment. According to the statute he ought not to have paid it.

The question now is can he recover? I think he cannot. The effect of sections 34 and 35 appears to me to be this, that they make the costs of the arbitration the costs of the company. But in this case we have the plaintiff paying costs which, in point of fact, are the costs of the company, voluntarily paying costs of the company, and then seeking to recover them back. I do not see how he can do that. It seems to me very much the same as the case which was put by my brother Rigby during the argument, I mean as if the plaintiff had voluntarily paid the costs of some of the valuers during the arbitration and then had sought to recover them back from the defendants. I think on that ground alone this action fails.

But it appears to me there is another ground on which it also fails. It seems to me that really, when this matter came before the master, it was a question of costs, and the attempt which is now being made is an attempt to review his taxation. I know it is an action, but practically it is an attempt to review the taxation of the master. The master, as far as I understand the evidence, heard and considered this question of the attendance on the umpire and the umpire's fees, and when he had heard and considered it he decided that he ought not to allow those matters, and he disallowed them. If that is so this case comes distinctly within the authority of the two cases which have been cited to us: In re Owen and London and North-Western Railway Co. and In re Sandback Charity Trustees and The North Staffordshire Railway Co. I understand those cases to come to this, that if the master allows costs to one of the parties where the statute does not give them, or disallows them where the statute gives them, the court has no power to interfere with a master's taxation on motion to review, because the master is not acting in the matter ex officio, as the officer of the court, but as a person named by the Act. It seems to me that the position of the master is very much the same as that of an arbitrator. He has complete power and control over the matters with which he has to deal. Even if the arbitrator decides on a matter of law wrongly, the award cannot be set aside; neither do I think here that anything which the master has done, even if he has done it wrongly, can be set aside. On both grounds, therefore, I think this action fails.

RIGBY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I cannot help regretting it, because I see that by a mere mistake the plaintiff has paid a sum of money which he cannot recover. It could not be argued that this money was paid at the request of the defendants and was recoverable on that score, and consequently the appellant frankly admitted that that could not be so. Then it was said that it was a statutory debt. Let us examine that. What by the statute is given as a debt from the railway company to the plaintiff? Clearly nothing more than his costs of the arbitration, and he chooses voluntarily to pay a part of these costs, there being no obligation whatever to pay any part of them.

The plaintiff, probably misled by the arbitrator sending to him to announce that the award was ready for him to take up, chose to take it up. He did wrongly. He had no right to do so. I do not mean to say that it was a wrong that would do any great harm to anyone, but he had no right to get the award or to obtain possession of the document at all, and the sum paid by him was money paid in order that he might have what the statute did not intend him to have.

Then, in regard to the taxation part of the question. If these are costs, on the assumption that they were costs of the plaintiff, the master is the proper person to deal with them. No review of that taxation can take place. The only remedy, if remedy there be, is either by a mandamus against him to consider that particular question and to tax a particular sum, or by certiorari. I do not say that such a remedy exists; but at any rate there is no remedy by review, and no right of action directly against the company; and it appears to me, therefore, that the learned judge's decision is quite right and ought to be supported, and the appeal dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors, Hadden-Woodward, Macleod, & Blyth; Cunliffes & Davenport, for J. B. Pollitt, Manchester.

From Chan. Div. (Lindley, Lopes, and Rigby, L.JJ.) July 13, 1895.

In re MILLS' TRUSTS. (a.)

Bankruptcy—Assignment—Equitable chose in action—Assignment to trustees — Notice of assignment not given—Disclaimer by trustees—Bankruptcy of assignor —"Possession, order, or disposition of bankrupt"— "Consent of true owner" — Infant beneficiaries— Incapacity to consent—Bankruptcy Act, 1849 (12 & 13 Vict. c. 106), ss. 125, 141—Bankruptcy Act, 1883, s. 44, sub-section 3.

The owner of a reversionary interest under a will settled his interest upon his wife and children in the year 1861, and became bankrupt in the year 1865. The trustees of the settlement had no knowledge of its existence till after the settlor's bankruptcy, when they at once "rejected the trusts." Subsequently the reversionary interest fell into possession, when the trustees of the will, who, prior to the bankruptcy, had no notice of the settlement, paid the fund into court under the Trustee Relief Act. Some years afterwards the assignee in bankruptcy claimed the fund.

Held, that the assignee in bankruptcy had no title to the fund.

By Kekewich, J., on the ground that the trustees of the will had notice of the settlement before they paid the money into court and before they knew that the assignee in bankruptcy claimed the fund.

By the Court of Appeal, because the fund was not, at the date of the bankruptcy, in the "possession, order, or disposition" of the bankrupt settlor "with the consent of the true owner" within the meaning of the Bankruptcy Acts, the "true owners" being the beneficiaries, some of whom were infants, and, therefore, incapable of consenting.

This was an appeal from a decision of Kekewich, J., dismissing the petition of the assignee in bankruptcy of the estate and effects of John Mills Wills, who was adjudicated a bankrupt on the 3rd of July, 1865, for the payment out of a sum of money paid into court by the trustee of the will of John Mills, under the Trustee Relief Act, in May, 1868.

The facts of the case are as follows: John Mills Wills was the nephew of John Mills, who, by his will dated the 16th of January, 1836, after directing payment of his debts and funeral expenses, gave the residue of his goods, chattels, and effects to John Isaac Hensley and Charles Hensley upon trusts (inter alia) after the death of the survivor of his three sisters, Nancy Mills, Lydia Sarah Hensley, and Sarah Wills (the mother of John Mills Wills), to divide the same equally between all the children of his said three sisters.

John Mills, the testator, died on the 8th of September, 1837, and letters of administration with the will annexed were, on the 31st of October, 1837, granted to John Isaac Hensley and Charles Hensley.

John Isaac Hensley died on the 28th of July, 1855, and Sarah Wills, the last survivor of the three sisters, died on the 7th of November, 1866; on which event John Mills Wills became, under the trusts of the will, entitled in possession to one-eighth of the residue of the estate of John Mills.

Some years previously—viz., in the month of February, 1861, John Mills Wills, partly in consideration of his wife having handed him a sum of £600 which she had received under the trusts of her father's will, made a settlement, whereby he assigned his interest under the will of John Mills, as also a contingent interest to which he was entitled under the will of his grandfather, to Thomas Leeman Hensley and John Bickford upon the trusts therein declared in favour of his wife and children. This deed of settlement was not executed by the trustees, who appear to have had no knowledge of its existence until after the bankruptcy of John Mills Wills, and they then "rejected the trusts"; both the trustees had since died.

John Mills Wills was adjudicated bankrupt on the 3rd of July, 1865, and Henry Martin Wills was appointed creditors' assignee and Edward Watkin Edwards official assignee under his bankruptcy.

In the month of May, 1868, Charles Hensley, the surviving trustee of the will of John Mills, after giving Henry Martin Wills and Edward Watkin Edwards notice of his intention so to do, paid the share of the bankrupt in the residuary estate of John Mills into court, under the Trustee Relief Act.

In the affidavit of Charles Hensley, made at the time he paid the fund into court, reference was made to the settlement of February, 1861.

No steps were taken to get the fund out of court until a petition was presented to Kekewich, J., by Peter Paget, who had been appointed on the 6th of December, 1894, sole assignee of the estate and effects in bankruptcy of John Mills Wills. The learned judge required the beneficiaries under the settlement of February, 1861, to be represented at the hearing of the petition. The petitioner relied mainly on a decision of Wood, V.C., in Hensley v. Wills, 16 L. T. 582, 15 W. R. Ch. Dig. 147, to the effect that the contingent interest of John Mills Wills under the trusts of his grandfather's will, comprised in the settlement of February, 1861, belonged to the assignees under his bankruptcy and not to the beneficiaries under the settlement, and claimed that the interest of John Mills Wills under the trusts of the will of John Mills also belonged to the assignees under his bankruptcy, that interest having at the date of the bankruptcy been in the possession, order, or disposition of the bankrupt "by the consent and permission of the true owner thereof" within the meaning of the Bankruptcy Act, 1849, section 125, and that the fund in court should, therefore, be paid out to him for distribution amongst the creditors. At the date of the bankruptcy of John Mills Wills, some of the beneficiaries were infants and one was a married woman.

(a.) Reported by W. SHALLCROSS GODDARD, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Kekewich, J., was of opinion that neither the settlor nor (under the circumstances) the trustees appointed by him, were the true owners within the meaning of the Bankruptcy Act, and did not think it necessary to determine whether or not the beneficiaries (the wife and children of the settlor) were the "true owners," as from the evidence he came to the conclusion that the trustees of the will of John Mills knew of the existence of the settlement before they paid the money into court, and before they knew that the assignee in bankruptcy claimed any interest in it. He, therefore, held (following the Stuart v. Cockerell, L. R. 8 Eq. 607, 18 W. R. Ch. Dig. 84) that the beneficiaries under the settlement were entitled to the fund as against the assignee in bankruptcy, and dismissed the petition.

The assignee in bankruptcy appealed.

Muir Mackenzie and W. Higgins, for the appellant.

Herbert Reed, Q.C., Dibdin, and Errington, for the respondents.

Method, for other parties.

LINDLEY, L.J., after stating the facts and reading section 125 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1849, continued: It is not disputed that the interest under the trusts of the will of John Mills came within the term "goods and chattels" as used in that section. What we have to decide is whether the fund was in the bankrupt's "possession, order, or disposition," "by the consent and permission of the true owner thereof." If the persons appointed by the settlor as trustees of the settlement of February, 1861, were the "true owners" within the meaning of the section, they clearly never consented to the fund remaining in the "possession, order, or disposition" of the bankrupt settlor, since they had no knowledge of their having been so appointed trustees until after the settlor became bankrupt. If, as I think, the correct view is that the trustees were not the "true owners," but that the beneficiaries were then inasmuch as one was a married woman and some of them were infants they were incapable of consenting, and it is impossible for the assignee in bankruptcy to successfully contend that the fund remained in the bankrupt's possession with the consent of the beneficiaries. It appears to me that on these grounds without going into the one upon which Kekewich, J., based his decision, this appeal must be dismissed.

LOPES, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. So far as we can gather from the evidence the trustees named in the settlement knew nothing about it until after the settlor's bankruptcy, when they at once disclaimed. It is, therefore, clear that they could not be said to be the "true owners." Who were the "true owners"? They were the cestuis que trust. And as some of them were infants, they could not consent to the fund remaining in the "order and disposition" of the settlor. It seems to me, therefore, that section 125 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1849, does not apply.

RIGBY, L.J., concurred.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitor for the appellant, R. Ballard.

Solicitors for the respondents, Pitman & Sons, for Jones, Macintosh, & Dixon, Cardiff.

Solicitor for other parties, The Official Solicitor.

From Chan. Div. (Lindley, Lopes, and Rigby, L.JJ.) July 12, 1895.

In re NOTTAGE.
JONES v. PALMER. (a.)

Will—Construction—Legacy—General or specific—Uncertainty—Charitable legacy—Gift for the encouragement of yacht racing—Validity of.

A testator who had, at the date of his will and at his death, debentures and shares in company A., and debentures and no shares in company B., gave a legacy of "£500 debenture stock or shares" of the A. company and legacies of "350 ordinary shares," 250 "fully-paid shares," and 50 "shares" in the same company. He also gave to his trustees £5,000 "debenture stock or shares" of the A. company, 350 "ordinary shares" in the same company, and £1,500 "debenture stock or shares" of the B. company upon trust to continue the same in their present state of investment, or to sell the same, and to hold the same upon the trusts therein mentioned.

Held (reversing the decision of Kekewich, J.), that the gifts included the debentures in both companies, and upon the whole will that the legacies of debentures and shares were specific and not general legacies.

The testator gave a legacy of £2,000 to the Yacht Racing Association of Great Britain upon trust for the purpose of providing out of the annual income thereof a cup, to be given each year, for the encouragement of yacht racing; and the testator declared that if the Yacht Racing Association should cease to exist, the trust fund should be made over to the Thames Yacht Club, to be held by them on similar trusts.

Held (affirming the decision of Kekewich, J.), that the gift was not a charitable legacy and was void for perpetuity.

Charles George Nottage, the testator, by his will dated the 27th of October, 1894, after appointing the plaintiffs executors and trustees thereof and making certain specific bequests, gave the following legacies: "I give to each of my said nephews, Cecil Ernest Palmer and Arthur Nottage Palmer, £500 debenture stock or shares of the London Stereoscopic and Photographic Co. (Limited)." The testator then gave legacies of "350 ordinary shares," "250 fully paid shares," and "50 shares," in the said company; and, after making sundry "pecuniary" bequests, gave the following trust legacy: "I give to my trustees before-named £5,000 Debenture Stock or shares of the London Stereoscopic and Photographic Co. (Limited), 350 ordinary shares in the same company, £1,500 Debenture Stock or shares of the Barton Estate Co. (Limited), whose offices are at No. 4, Tokenhouse-buildings, in the City of London, and 35 shares in the Delaware and Hudson Canal and Railway Co., upon trust to continue the same in their present state of investment or to sell same," such legacy to be held by the trustees upon the trusts therein mentioned.

The will also contained a legacy in the following terms: "I bequeath to the Yacht-Racing Association of Great Britain, out of such part of my estate as may be legally bequeathed for such a purpose, the sum of £2,000 [the same to be invested as therein mentioned]. And I direct that the trustees so to be appointed as aforesaid shall, out of the annual income of the trust funds, purchase annually a cup to be called 'The Nottage Cup,' which is to be given to the most successful yacht of the season of over nineteen rating, or what may in future be held to be the equivalent of that rating, and the council of the said association shall decide annually which yacht has, in their opinion, the best claim to the cup; and, in the event of their being any difference of opinion, the vote of the majority of the said council is to decide the question; or the said council may, if they think fit, order the said cup to be specially raced for; my object in giving this cup is to encourage the sport of yacht-racing. And I declare that, in the event of the Yacht-Racing Association being dissolved or ceasing to exist, the trustees of the said fund shall pay and make over the same to three trustees to be appointed by the council or committee of the Royal Thames Yacht Club, by whom the said fund shall be held upon similar trusts to those hereinbefore declared with regard to the purchase of a cup to be called 'The Nottage Cup.'"

(a.) Reported by ARNOLD GLOVER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The testator then gave various other "sums" of money, and the residuary gift was as follows:—"I give, devise, and bequeath all my real and personal estate, property, and effects whatsoever and wheresoever, . . . not otherwise disposed of unto my trustees, their heirs, executors, and upon trust that my trustees shall . . . sell, call in, and convert into money the same, . . . and pay or provide for the payment of the pecuniary legacies and sums hereinbefore bequeathed," and then upon the trusts therein mentioned, and the testator declared that his trustees might postpone the sale and conversion of his debentures or shares in the London Stereoscopic and Photographic Co. for as long as they should think fit.

At the date of the will and of his death the testator had 130 £50 debentures, and 3,710 £5 fully paid-up shares in the London Stereoscopic and Photographic Co., and no other interest in the company. There were two classes of debentures in the company—viz., those held by the testator and certain "mortgage debentures" which had priority over them, but there was no "debenture stock," and there were no "debenture shares."

In the Barton Estate Co. he had debentures but no shares.

On the 28th of March, 1895, the executors and trustees of the will took out an originating summons for the purpose of deciding certain questions that had arisen under the will.

Upon this summons Kekewich, J., held (1) that the legacies of shares given by the will were general legacies, but that the legatees of "debenture stock or shares" took nothing under the bequests to them; (2) that the trust legacy bequeathed by the will to the executors was a general legacy as regards the shares comprised therein, but void as regards the £5,000 debenture stock or shares of the London Stereoscopic Photographic Co., and the £1,500 debenture stock or shares of the Barton Estate Co.; and (3) that the legacy of £2,000 given by the will to the Yacht Racing Association of Great Britain was an invalid bequest.

From this decision Cecil Ernest Palmer, one of the legatees of shares and "debenture stock or shares," Edith Marian Bigwood (by an order of Kekewich, J., appointed to represent the trust legatees), and the Yacht Racing Association of Great Britain appealed.

Crackanthorpe, Q.C., and W. A. Peck, for C. E. Palmer.

Crackanthorpe, Q.C., and W. Freeman, for E. M. Bigwood. — The debentures in both gifts are sufficiently described, and both legacies are specific. In the case of the trust legacy that is clear from the direction to continue in the same state of investment, and in the other case, there are various indications that the gift was intended to be specific.

They referred to Ashton v. Ashton, 3 P. Wms. 384; Sleech v. Thorrington, 2 Ves. Sen. 560; and Door v. Geary, 1 Ves. Sen. 255.

Lopes, L.J., referred to Trinder v. Trinder, 14 W. R. 557, L. R. 1 Eq. 695.

Pattullo, for residuary legatees.—The legacies are general and, as to the debentures, void for uncertainty.

He referred to In re Gray, Dresser v. Gray, 35 W. R. 795, 36 Ch. D. 205, and In re Lane, Luard v. Lane, 28 W. R. 764, 14 Ch. D. 856.

Fawcus, for the executors and trustees.

LINDLEY, L.J.—With regard to these first two appeals, I do not think we shall gain anything further by looking through the will again. I cannot agree with the conclusion arrived at by Kekewich, J., when he goes the length of saying that these two appellants take nothing. I cannot get that out of the will.

This testator seems to have had a good many shares, and, amongst other things, he had an interest in debentures and shares in the Stereoscopic Co.—I call it for shortness—and in the Barton Estate Co. [His lordship stated the facts as to the testator's shares and debentures, and continued:—]

Now let us see what he does about the Stereoscopic Co. He gives to each of his two nephews naming them, Cecil Palmer and Arnold Palmer—I will read it as it runs, and without any stops, because I do not know where to put the stops—"£500 debenture stock or shares of the 'Stereoscopic Co.'" Then he goes on and says, "I give to each of my cousins," naming them, "350 ordinary shares" in the same company. Then he gives to somebody else "250 fully paid shares" in the same company, and he gives to somebody else fifty "shares," without calling them anything, in the same company. Now if one only for a moment bears in mind what there was, and what he had to give, it appears to me that he had, in a very inaccurate way, contrasted the debentures on the one side, which he calls "debenture stock or shares"—not knowing what to call them—with "shares" on the other, which he calls sometimes "ordinary," sometimes "fully paid shares" and sometimes "shares" without any adjective at all. I cannot help thinking that his scheme is that he gives to these two persons what he calls "debenture stock or shares," not knowing what to call it, but meaning something different from "fully paid shares" or "ordinary shares" or "fifty shares."

Now bearing in mind that he had only 130 debentures of £50 each in the Stereoscopic Co., and he had those—I cannot come to the conclusion that Kekewich, J., is right in saying that there is such a defect of description as to destroy the whole legacy which was clearly intended. There is something answering the legacy, although the description of that something is not very happy or accurate.

Now as regards the Barton Estate Co., which is the second appeal, the case is still plainer. This is the language of the will with regard to that. [His lordship read the gift, and continued:—] Now, as regards the Barton Estate Co., he had, as he calls it, "£1,500 debenture stock or shares of the Barton Estate Co. (Limited)." He had nothing there except debentures, and that shows, to my mind, almost conclusively, that he did not know how to describe these debentures. But having got debentures, he leaves what he has got under the description (not very accurate, I admit) of "debenture stock or shares."

Now the remarks I have made about the Stereoscopic Company also apply to this bequest. He contrasts there what he calls "debenture stock or shares," with "ordinary shares," and that, I think, fortifies the conclusion at which I have arrived, namely, that he did know that he had different sorts of things—that he had debentures (not knowing whether to call them stocks or shares), and ordinary shares; and when he uses the expression "debenture stock or shares," what he means is, debentures as distinguished from the other shares which he describes sometimes as "fully paid up," and sometimes as "ordinary," and sometimes without any adjective at all. As to the Barton Estate Co. there is no difficulty in it, because he only had debentures. So far, therefore, I think, there is no real difficulty.

The next point, however, arises whether these gifts are specific, or whether they are what are called "general legacies." As to that, with respect to the £5,000 debentures, as I will call them, putting my own construction on this clause—as to the gift of £5,000 debentures and 350 ordinary shares in the Stereoscopic Co., and that of the £1,500 debentures in the Barton Estate Co., there can be no reasonable doubt, because he goes on, as to them, to say that the trustees are to hold these "upon trust to continue the same in their present state of investment." That points, without any ambiguity or any doubt, to the things which he then had in some state of investment. That makes that bequest perfectly specific, and free from any difficulty at all.

As regards his bequest of the £500 in the London Stereoscopic Co., there is more difficulty because there is nothing in the immediate connection of that clause to show that he is dealing with the particular debentures which he had. But bearing in mind what he was doing, bearing in mind that he had debentures, that he is apparently dealing with them, giving them to his relatives and indicating, in one place clearly, that he intends them to be specific, bearing that in mind and then turning to that indication, (I admit somewhat slight) in the gift in the residuary clause to which Mr. Crackanthorpe called our attention, I think we should not be going too far or stretching the doctrines of the court in holding the first bequest to be specific too. When he says, "I give to each of my nephews £500 debentures," I do not think that that is a pecuniary bequest, but something more than that. It is not a sum of money at all. It is not a pecuniary bequest, I think in the view of this testator, because further on he gives a string of what he calls "pecuniary legacies," which are mere sums of money. There is some difficulty about whether it is not a gift of a "sum of money," but I do not think it is. When you come to look at it, it is not a gift of money to be laid out or to be applied in buying debentures—it is a gift of these debentures which the context shows he himself has. If that be right, then the clause about residue does help, because the clause as to residue is this. [His lordship read the clause and continued:] Now, the "pecuniary legacies and sums hereinbefore bequeathed," do not, I think, apply to the bequest of these debentures. I do not think they do. But coupling that with the clause which comes afterwards, which is perhaps not alike, but a little looking in the same direction, namely, that the trustees "may postpone the sale and conversion of my debentures," I think we may say and ought to say, upon the true construction of this will, and taking into account the whole of these clauses, that what he really meant was to give the £500 debentures, part of that which he then held in the company. I think that is right and, therefore, the appeal must be allowed.

LOPES, L.J.—I have great difficulty in understanding how Kekewich, J., arrived at the conclusion which he seems to have arrived at—namely, that these two legatees took nothing. Reading the will carefully, it appears to me that the testator was very mixed in his mind as to the proper designation which he ought to apply to the interest in these companies, which he then possessed. It appears to me that he did not know what to call them, whether to call them "debenture stock" or "debenture shares," or how to designate them. First, with regard to the Stereoscopic Co. he had in that company debentures and ordinary shares, and I do not doubt for a moment, having regard to the words he used (though, no doubt, he was mixed in his mind as to how to designate them), he meant debentures.

With regard to the Barton Estate Co. the language is more clear. In that company he only had debentures, and the difficulty there is not so serious to get over the words. I think there he did mean the debentures that he had in that company.

Then the question arises as to whether these two legacies are to be regarded as specific or general. It seems to me with regard to the Barton Estate, as has been said by Lindley, L.J., that there is very little doubt indeed that the legacy to the legatee of the debentures in that company is a specific gift.

With regard to the Stereoscopic Co., the difficulty is greater; but, having regard to the different parts of the will to which our attention has been called, I am inclined to think that the testator intended that gift to be specific, I mean by that, that he intended it to be a gift of a particular thing which he then possessed, as distinguished from something which was to be provided out of his general estate by his trustees after his death.

I am of opinion, therefore, that this appeal should be allowed.

RIGBY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. In construing a will we are bound to look to every part of it, and to gather what light we can from one part in attempting to construe another.

Now, here we have a testator who is possessed of debentures in the Stereoscopic Co. He is possessed also of ordinary shares in the Stereoscopic Co., and he is possessed also of debentures in the Barton Estate Co. He appears to be dealing with something that he possesses in each of these cases, because he aims (according to my construction of the particular bequests) at describing something or other and he does not quite know what the description ought to be. He calls it "debenture stock or shares." I read that as meaning "What I possess in the nature of debentures, whether properly called stock or properly called shares, or whatever the description may be." I think he is trying to dispose of something that he has got, and I think that is made a little stronger by referring to the other bequests. Well, already we have got a little way. He is treating it as a specific gift. If we are satisfied that he is trying to describe something that he had, and to dispose of that, we have got a long way; but when we find that in the will he deals with a precisely similar sort of property, and he gives to trustees that property upon trust, to continue the same in their present state of investment, or to sell the same—one is not stronger than the other, I agree—and then afterwards he says, "and to stand possessed of the said stocks and shares, and the proceeds of the sale thereof," we have three several expressions which can only be explained, with reference to that bequest, on the supposition that he was making a specific gift. The trustees were to hold the actual subject of the gift upon trust. Then we find that he gives what he calls, correctly, "pecuniary legacies"; and we find also that he gives in terms "sums of money." As to the sum of £2,000, he does not include that. I mean that the charitable legacies are not included in "pecuniary legacies," though, of course, they are pecuniary legacies, and if we hold that "debenture stock or shares" were general legacies, perhaps in legal intendment they would come under the meaning of "pecuniary legacies." But that is not a proper way of construing a man's will—first of all to find a legal definition which he has never heard of, and then to put that in the will as if it were part of the will—though he never meant it. We have to deal with the language, and what he calls "pecuniary legacies" are those he designated by that name: and not being quite sure whether the others that he gives in money would be pecuniary legacies in the same sense, he calls them "sums of money."

Then we come to the residue, and we find that the only legacies he wishes to provide for are pecuniary legacies or "sums" and there are words to answer very precisely those descriptions.

Then we come to the investment clauses. I think he shows there an intention to give the trustees special power to retain in their present state of investment, his debentures. Taking it altogether, I think it would be fantastic to suppose that when he had provided in this way, he meant not that the legatees were to have something out of what he had got, but that they were to have something purchased for them, or that that was his idea at all. The thing is totally different when you have a testator saying, for instance, "I give £1,000 Consols." That is such a common case of investment that you cannot derive any conclusion, one way or the other, as to whether he meant Consols which he might happen to have or Consols to be purchased. But when a man has several kinds of investments and he deals with them all, and with some of them in such a manner as to make it absolutely plain that he intended that they should be specific gifts; and with regard to all, there are expressions in the will more suited to the language used on the hypothesis that the gifts in question are specific gifts, I think we may fairly assume that they were specific gifts, and declare accordingly.

Appeal allowed.

The appeal of the Yacht Racing Association of Great Britain was then heard.

Warrington, Q.C., and Kenyon Parker, for the appellants.—This gift is a trust for a purpose beneficial to a community: Commissioners, &c., of Income Tax v. Pemsel, [1891] A. C. 531 (see p. 583), 40 W. R. Dig. 217.

They also referred to In re Lord Stratheden and Campbell, [1894] 3 Ch. 265; In re Stephens, Giles v. Stephens, 36 SOLICITORS' JOURNAL, 713, W. N. 1892, p. 140; Beaumont v. Oliveira, 17 W. R. 269, L. R. 4 Ch. App. 309. [RIGBY, L.J., referred to Thompson v. Shakespear, 8 W. R. 265, 1 De G. F. & J. 399.]

Patullo, for the residuary legatees, was not called on.

LINDLEY, L.J.—We are all quite aware of the extreme difficulty of drawing a line between gifts which are charitable, in the sense in which lawyers use that term, and gifts which are not, but this is really a new experiment. The testator here tells us exactly what he has in his mind. This is an institution of members for mere sport, it is a mere game, the testator treats it so, and he tells us so himself. At the end of the bequest he says, "My object in giving this cup is to encourage the sport of yacht racing." Taking the wide view, in my opinion, I should say that every healthy sport is good for the nation. I do not draw much distinction between cricket, football, fencing, yachting or anything else. If that were a lawyer's idea of a charity, this would not have been the first time we should have heard of it, and I cannot find any case which tends that way, that is to say, any case which would authorize us in saying that a mere legacy to promote a game or a sport is a charitable legacy within the extended doctrine of the Court of Chancery. I quite agree that I find it very difficult to draw the line, and I do not attempt to draw the line. It is a case in which it is exceedingly difficult to do it. The cases in the books show that sometimes there is a case a little on one side and sometimes one a little on the other of the line: but I take the broad ground that I am not aware of any case which warrants the inference that a legacy for mere sport is a charity. I think that is enough to decide this case.

LOPES, L.J.—It is indeed most difficult to draw a line in this matter, but probably the safest way to deal with this case will be to say what does not come within the definition of a charitable gift. I am clearly of opinion that a gift, the object of which is a mere sport or game, which is primarily calculated to promote the amusement of individuals as distinguished from the community at large, cannot, upon the authorities, be said to be a charitable gift. If we were to hold this a charitable gift, we should indeed open a very wide door, because there would be very great difficulty in saying that a gift for the purpose of promoting bicycling, cricket, football, lawn tennis, or any other game, would not come within the same category, because all those sports are calculated to promote the health, physique, and good constitution of the community at large. But they are not of that kind which can be said to be charitable gifts.

RIGBY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion; I dare say it is impossible, and certainly it would not be advisable, to define in general words what is a charitable bequest. One must always go back to the analogy of the statute, and that is the only test which has ever really been applied. If this could succeed—if the gift of a fund to found a prize for yacht racing could succeed—it must be on the ground that it is for a general public purpose. I know no other head under which it could come. I think the very terms of the will explain that itself. The Yacht Racing Association which is spoken of is an association of yacht owners; and the prizes are to be won by the owners of the yachts. I think, however much we might favour the support of yachting, we cannot go to the extent of saying that it is a general public purpose. There are a great many things which are highly laudable, and in many ways very useful, which are yet not charities within the meaning of the statute, and in my opinion this is one of those things.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors, Barraclough; G. H. Barber & Son; Lake & Lake; Neish, Howell, & Macfarlane.

From Q. B. Div.
(Lord Esher, M.R., and Kay, and A. L. Smith, L.JJ.) July 10, 1895

ROBB v. GREEN. (a.)

Master and servant—Confidential employment—Implied contract—Copying list of master's customers—Breach of confidence and trust—Injunction.

The defendant, who was employed by the plaintiff as manager in his business, made a list of the names of the plaintiff's customers from his order-book without the plaintiff's knowledge or authority, with the intention of using it in a rival business after he left the plaintiff's employment, and he did in fact so use it. The plaintiff having claimed damages and an injunction to restrain the defendant from using the list,

(a.) Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Held, that there was an implied term in the contract of service that the servant should act honestly and faithfully towards his master, and that the defendant had committed a breach of that contract, and that damages and an injunction ought to be granted.

Lamb v. Evans, 41 W. R. 405, [1893] 1 Ch. 218, followed.

Appeal from the judgment of Hawkins, J., in favour of the plaintiff, at the trial of the action without a jury, reported [1895] 2 Q. B. 1.

The plaintiff claimed an injunction and damages against the defendant, who had been in his service as manager, and who subsequently carried on a similar business, for having, during his service, improperly copied a list of the names of customers from the plaintiff's order book, and used it afterwards in his business for the purpose of soliciting their custom.

The facts as found by the learned judge were as follows:—The plaintiff, who occupied a game farm, was a dealer in live game and eggs, the chief part of his business consisting in procuring the eggs, and in the hatching, rearing, and sale of game birds. He also kept a large stock of laying pheasants, and sold pheasant's eggs, as well as live pheasants for shooting and for stock purposes. His customers were numerous, and their names and addresses were collected in his order-book. In 1890 the plaintiff required a manager, and in July he had an interview with the defendant upon the subject, when he stated that he relied on the defendant to treat everything in connection with the farm in strict confidence. On the 6th of August the plaintiff, by letter, engaged the defendant as his manager, and in September the defendant entered the plaintiff's service. On the 22nd of November, 1893, the defendant gave the plaintiff notice to terminate the service at the end of the year, and that notice was duly accepted. In March, 1894, it came to the knowledge of the plaintiff that the defendant was carrying on a similar business at the Game Farm, Henley, and was sending out circulars, soliciting orders, to a great number of the plaintiff's customers, whose names and addresses the defendant had, while in the plaintiff's service, copied from the plaintiff's order-book clandestinely, without the plaintiff's knowledge or authority, and for the purpose of using it to solicit the customers to give their custom to him. The plaintiff thereupon issued the writ in this action.

HAWKINS, J., gave judgment for the plaintiff for £150 damages, and granted an injunction restraining the defendant from making use of the information so obtained by him; and directed the list of the names and addresses of the plaintiff's customers copied from the plaintiff's order-book to be delivered up to be destroyed. The defendant appealed.

J. W. McCarthy, for the defendant.

R. M. Bray (Murphy, Q.C., with him), for the plaintiff.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—In this case the defendant, while in the plaintiff's service, surreptitiously made a copy of the names of the plaintiff's customers from the plaintiff's order book, not for the advantage of his employer, but for the sole purpose of using the list so made, after he left the plaintiff's service, so as to get orders from those customers in a rival business. Was that or was that not what any person of ordinary honesty would say was a dishonest act towards his employer? Was it not a dereliction of the duty to act in good faith which he owed to his employer? In my opinion the learned judge rightly found that it was a breach of that trust and confidence which his service imposed upon him. It is impossible to say that the defendant had a right to make a copy of the plaintiff's order book for the purpose of using it afterwards against his master's interests, and it is equally impossible to say that it was not a breach of trust. Was it also a breach of the contract of service? That contract was reduced into writing. But that does not prevent a stipulation, not inconsistent with the written contract, from being implied.

It seems to me that a stipulation on the part of a servant in a confidential relation to act in good faith towards his master must be implied in every contract of service, because it must obviously have been the intention of both parties, acting honestly, when making the contract, that such a stipulation should be implied. In Lamb v. Evans, 41 W. R. 405, [1893] 1 Ch. 218, Bowen, L.J., said: "The common law, it is true, treats the matter from the point of view of an implied contract, and assumes that there is a promise to do that which is part of the bargain, or which can be fairly implied as part of the good faith which is necessary to make the bargain effectual. What is an implied contract or an implied promise in law? It is that promise which the law implies and authorizes us to infer in order to give the transaction that effect which the parties must have intended it to have and without which it would be futile." The transaction here is one of confidential trust, and if there is not to be implied the stipulation of a faithful performance of duty, the contract would be futile. Under these circumstances the learned judge was right in making the implication which he did, and in giving damages for the breach of contract.

There was also, as I have said, a breach of confidence and trust, and, therefore, an injunction is a proper remedy, inasmuch as the defendant, if not stopped, will go on repeating what he has done. Whether the injunction is too wide in its terms I do not stop to enquire. That may arise if it becomes necessary to enforce it.

KAY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The order appealed from awards the plaintiff £150 damages, orders the list of customers' names to be delivered up to be destroyed, and grants an injunction restraining the defendant from making use of the information obtained by him. First, as regards the injunction. The learned judge has found that the defendant, while in the plaintiff's employment, surreptitiously copied from his master's order-book a list of his master's customers with the object and intention of using the list after he left his master's employment in a rival business which he was going to set up. He held that that was a breach of his duty towards his master, and granted the relief I have stated. In a matter of this kind one likes to refer to the old authorities to see upon what ground the court grants relief by way of injunction. In Yovatt v. Winyard, 1 Jac. & W. 394, Lord Eldon granted an injunction to restrain the defendant, who had been an assistant of the plaintiff, from communicating certain recipes for medicines which the defendant, while in the plaintiff's service, had surreptitiously copied from the plaintiff's books, upon the ground that it was a breach of trust and confidence. In Morison v. Moat, 9 Hare, 241, Turner, V.C., stated the ground upon which the court exercised its jurisdiction. He said: "The plaintiff's case was rested in argument upon the ground that the defendant had obtained this secret by breach of faith or of contract on the part of the plaintiff.

. . . The true question is, whether under the circumstances of this case the court ought to interfere by injunction upon the ground of breach of faith or of contract. That the court has exercised jurisdiction in cases of this nature, does not, I think, admit of any question. Different grounds have indeed been assigned for the exercise of that jurisdiction. In some cases it has been referred to property, in others to contract, and in others again it has been treated as founded upon trust and confidence." And later on he cites Lord Cottenham in Prince Albert v. Strange, 1 Mac. & G. 25, as saying that "this case by no means depends solely upon the question of property, for a breach of trust, confidence, or contract would of itself entitle the plaintiff to an injunction." In the later case of Lamb v. Evans, Bowen, L.J., puts it at law, upon the ground of a term implied in the written contract, and not inconsistent with it, arising from the confidential relation of the parties. It is clear to me that an injunction can be granted. It is sufficient to say that when a servant surreptitiously compiles a list for his own use as here, he is guilty of a breach of confidence and trust, whether it is implied in the contract or not; and an injunction is the proper remedy. As regards the form of the injunction, whether the plaintiff will be able to make out that there has been a use of the information so obtained, in breach of the injunction, is still open if the plaintiff applies to enforce the injunction. Next, as to the delivery up of the list, it is clear that, as it was made in breach of trust and confidence, the order is right. Then, as regards the damages, if what the defendant has done is a breach of an implied contract, the damages were rightly given. Bowen, L.J., in Lamb v. Evans treats it as such, and I entirely agree with him. The appeal must, therefore, be dismissed.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. In my opinion there is implied in a contract of service, a stipulation that the servant will act in good faith towards his master. That was the proposition laid down in Lamb v. Evans, and also in Louis v. Smellie, 11 Times L. R. 515. It is obvious that the defendant has acted here in the worst possible faith towards his master.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the plaintiff, Roopers & Whately

Solicitors for the defendant, Church, Rendall, Todd, & Co.

From Q. B. Div.
(Lord Esher, M.R., and Kay and A. L. Smith, L.JJ.) June 28, 1895.

RODDICK v. INDEMNITY MUTUAL MARINE INSURANCE CO. (LIMITED). (a.)

Insurance, Marine—Time policy—Hull and machinery —"Warranted uninsured"—"Honour" policy—"Disbursements"—Breach of warranty.

The plaintiff effected a time policy of insurance with the defendants on the hull and machinery of a steamship of the value of £10,000, and by the policy warranted that £5,000 was uninsured. The total amount insured on the hull and machinery was £5,000, but the plaintiff effected "honour" policies (i.e., policies void under 19 Geo. 2, c. 27) on "disbursements" to the extent of £2,600. The disbursements were made in respect of coal, stores, provisions, and port expenses.

Held (affirming the decision of Kennedy, J.), that the disbursements were not covered by the words hull and machinery, and that there had been no breach of the warranty.

Quære, whether the later policy, being null and void at law, could, under any circumstances, constitute an infringement of the warranty in the earlier policy.

Appeal of the defendant company from the judgment of Kennedy, J., at the trial without a jury.

The plaintiff claimed under a policy of insurance, dated the 8th of January, 1894, declared to be upon the hull and machinery of the steamship Oxenholme, which were valued at £10,000, "£5,000 warranted uninsured except for running down clause" for six months from the 9th of January, 1894, to the 8th of July, 1894.

The plaintiff effected policies, including this policy, expressly on hull and machinery to the extent of £5,000 and no more. So far, therefore, as regards policies expressed to be upon hull and machinery he complied with the warranty. But he did effect certain insurances upon "disbursements" to the extent altogether of £2,600. These disbursement policies were p.p.i. or "honour" policies, that is to say policies wherein it was stipulated that the policy should be deemed sufficient proof of interest. They were therefore null and void in law under 19 Geo. 2, c. 37. The intention of the plaintiff in effecting these "honour" policies was to cover certain disbursements for coal, engine-room and deck stores, provisions and cabin stores, port expenses and premiums which he had made in respect of the ship in view of her proceeding from the United Kingdom to the coast of South America, and afterwards trading there. Two witnesses of experience in marine insurance were called on behalf of the plaintiff. Their evidence was to the effect that disbursements constituted, apart from hull and machinery, a common subject of insurance, and were recognized by underwriters as a distinct and different subject from hull and machinery, that they covered all expenditure made or to be made in which the insured had an insurable interest, that an insurance on "hull" according to the well-known practice of underwriters would in a voyage policy include such equipment or outfit in the shape of bunker coal and ordinary deck and engine-room stores as would be necessary for the voyage described in the policy. The witnesses did not, however, state what would be covered by "hull" in a time policy such as the policy in this case.

Kennedy, J., held that the "honour" policies though void in law would have constituted infringement of the warranty, but for the fact that the disbursements insured by the "honour" policies did not cover any part of the subject-matters insured by the policy on "hull and machinery." The learned judge, therefore, gave judgment for the plaintiff.

The defendant company appealed.

Joseph Walton, Q.C., and J. A. Hamilton, for the appellants.—The learned judge was wrong in holding that there had been no infringement of the warranty. In order to constitute such an infringement it is only necessary to show that a part of the disbursements, however small, is covered by the words "hull and machinery." Those words do include, at least, so much of the coal as was requisite as outfit or equipment for the voyage to South America. It is submitted "hull and machinery" also includes engine-room stores and provisions. The word "ship" would cover such things: Brough v. Whitmore, 4 T. R. 206, Forbes v. Aspinall, 13 East. 323, and "hull and machinery" has acquired as wide a meaning as "ship" in connection with marine insurance.

(a.) Reported by F. O. ROBINSON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

They also cited Oppenheim v. Fry, 11 W. R. 725, 12 ib. 831, 3 B. & S. 873, 5 ib. 348, and the Master of the Rolls referred to Robertson v. Ewer, 1 T. R. 127.

Pickford, Q.C., and Horridge, for the plaintiff, were not called on.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—In this case the court has to determine a question on the law of marine insurance. The business of marine insurance has given rise to different forms of insurance policies, and during a long course of years these policies have undergone various alterations. At one time the word "ship" in a policy had only a limited meaning, and it is still the custom of underwriters at Lloyd's, and probably of many insurance companies when insuring a ship, not to use the word "ship" and nothing else. Some companies, however, do insure a ship under the term "ship" alone, and then it is for the court to determine what is the meaning of the term "ship" in a policy of insurance against the perils of the sea.

It is not necessary in this case to determine how wide a meaning the word has when so used, it is certain it means more than the mere hull, but the question as to how much more, whether it includes such things as provisions and outfit, is not now before the court. For in this case the insurance company have departed from the form of policy which is in frequent though not universal use, and have used the words hull and machinery. These words taken in their ordinary meaning are not applicable to such things as coals and stores. The question we have to determine is whether it has been proved to our satisfaction that these words, when used in a time policy, have universally, as between the insurer and the assured, acquired a meaning different from their natural and ordinary meaning. I do not think that the defendant company have succeeded in doing that, nor do I think that Kennedy, J., was wrong in holding that these words were to have their ordinary meaning in this policy. On the contrary I am convinced that the words "hull and machinery" do not include any of the things which were insured in the "honour" policy under the term disbursements.

It is unnecessary, in the view which I take of this case, to deal with the other point decided by the learned judge in the court below—viz., whether a policy which is null and void at law could have any effect upon the warranty in the earlier policy. But it must not be taken that I accede to the view expressed by the learned judge.

KAY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. This is an action on a policy of marine insurance, and the question we have to decide is whether, on the true construction of a policy effected upon the hull and machinery of a steamship, the various things which have been insured by the plaintiff under the heading of "disbursements" are covered by the words "hull and machinery." The argument used on behalf of the defendants is to this effect: the word "ship" by itself would, it is said, include these things, and it is the common practice when insuring steamships to use the words "hull and machinery" instead of the word ship, and, therefore, we must construe the words hull and machinery to have the same meaning as ship. No authority has, however, been cited to us for that proposition, and in the absence of authority I am unable to hold that the meaning of the words "hull and machinery" is as wide as that of the word "ship." I, therefore, come to the conclusion that the various things insured by the "honour" policies under the head of "disbursements," are not covered by the policy upon the hull and machinery.

Some evidence was given as to the meaning of the word "hull" in marine insurance, and though that evidence was given on behalf of the plaintiffs it is relied on by the defendant company as establishing a customary use of the word in the wide meaning contended for. That evidence, however, only comes to this, that in a voyage policy an insurance upon the hull would include such equipment and outfit as was necessary for the voyage described in the policy. The witnesses only speak as to the meaning of the word in a voyage policy, which this is not, and, for aught I know, there may be some very good reason for giving the word a different meaning in a voyage policy from that which it has in a time policy. If the defendant company rely on that evidence they must take it as given, and in my view it is no evidence at all as to the meaning of the word "hull" in a time policy.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—I agree. The defendant company say that the plaintiff has broken his warranty that the ship was uninsured to the extent of £5,000, because the plaintiff effected policies for £2,600 on disbursements, and these disbursements, it is said, covered certain things as to which the plaintiff was insured by the policy on the hull and machinery. The case is not one covered by any authority, and there is no evidence that the words "hull and machinery" are used in the policy in any other than their ordinary meaning. I say no evidence, because the evidence that was given relates to voyage policies and not to time policies. We have, therefore, to consider what is the ordinary meaning of the words "hull and machinery," and in my opinion no one with any knowledge of the Queen's English could suggest that hull and machinery means such things as coal, provisions, or stores. An ingenious argument was made use of. It was said that hull and machinery means the same as ship, and that ship has been decided to cover coals and stores and the like. As to that contention, I am not quite satisfied that the authorities relied on do go so far as to decide that coals and stores are covered by the word "ship," but it is not necessary to decide that point now, for in this case we are not dealing with the word "ship," but with the words "hull and machinery," and I am of opinion that Kennedy, J.'s decision on that point was right.

One word as to the effect of "honour" policies. I am inclined to think, though it is unnecessary now to decide the question, that as the plaintiff could not sue on these policies, they were not an infringement of the warranty that he was uninsured to the extent of £5,000.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the appellants, Waltons, Johnson, Bubb, & Whatton.

Solicitors for the respondent, Pritchard, Englefield, & Co., for Simpson, North, Harley, & Birkett, Liverpool.

From Q. B. Div.
Lord Esher, M.R., and Kay and A. L. Smith, L.JJ. [and Q. B. Div.]

June 17; July 29, 1895.

KERSHAW (Appellant) v. TAYLOR (Respondent). (a.)

Metropolis—"Sewer"—"Drain"—Combined system of drainage — Connection with drain made without authority—Nuisance—Metropolis Management Act,

(a.) Reported by F. O. ROBINSON and W. F. BARRY, Esqs., Barristers-at-Law.

1855 (18 & 19 Vict. c. 120), s. 250—Public Health (London) Act, 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. 76), 2.

By section 250 of the Metropolis Management Act, 1855, a drain which, without an order of the sanitary authority, drains more than one house is a sewer; and by the same Act the duty of repairing sewers lies upon the local authority.

A sanitary authority approved a combined system of drainage submitted by a building owner in respect of certain semi-detached houses about to be built by him, by which each pair of houses was to drain by one drain into the sewer. In building the houses the building-owner departed from this scheme, and drained four houses into one drain. Subsequently the houses were sold without any notice to the purchasers as to the system of drainage. The purchaser of one of the houses was summoned for not complying with a notice under section 1 of the Public Health (London) Act, 1891, requiring him to abate a nuisance arising from defective drainage at his premises.

Held, that the part of the drain which received the drainage of the other three houses was a sewer, and that the purchaser was not estopped by the default of the building owner from disputing his liability to repair that part of the drain.

Special case stated by a metropolitan magistrate.

The respondent was summoned under the Public Health (London) Act, 1891, by the appellant, a sanitary inspector of the Wandsworth District Board of Works, for that there existed at the respondent's premises known as "Avon," Tankerville-road, Streatham, by reason of the default of the respondent, a nuisance—namely, a foul and defective combined drain, and house drain connected therewith.

The respondent's house was built in 1887 by one Gatfield, the respondent's predecessor in title. Previously to its being built Gatfield gave written notice to the district board of his intention to build six semi-detached houses in Tankerville-road, with a plan showing the proposed system of drainage, which was that each pair of houses should have a combined system of drainage, by means of one drain into the sewer. In August, 1887, the board approved the plan by resolution, subject to the drainage works being executed to the satisfaction of the surveyor. The building of the houses was forthwith proceeded with by Gatfield, and were completed. They included one semi-detached pair called "Clyde" and "Avon" and another pair called "Wye" and "Severn." At a subsequent date the houses were sold without notice to the purchasers as to the drainage, the respondent becoming the owner of "Avon." In October, 1894, a nuisance, was found to exist at "Avon" owing to defective drainage, and the appellant served the respondent with formal notice requiring him to abate the nuisance and for that purpose to execute certain works. The respondent caused the ground to be opened for the purpose of complying with the notice, and it was then discovered by him for the first time that his house "Avon" and the houses "Clyde," "Wye" and "Severn" were all drained by the drain belonging to "Avon." The respondent thereupon refused to proceed with the work of repairing the drain beyond the point at which it received the drainage of the houses "Wye" and "Severn" on the ground that from that point the drain was a sewer, which was vested in and repairable by the local authority. A further notice having been served on the respondent and not complied with, this summons was taken out.

By the Metropolis Management Act, 1855, the duty of repairing sewers lies in the local authority, that of repairing drains in the house-owner, and by section 250 of the same Act the word "drain" shall mean and include any drain used for the drainage of one building only, and shall also include any drain for draining any group or block of houses by a combined operation under the order of any vestry or district board, and the word "sewer" shall mean and include drains of every description, except drains as defined above.

The magistrate dismissed the summons subject to this case, holding that the drain in question was a sewer.

The question for the court was whether he was right in his decision.

Channell, Q.C. (Earle with him), for the appellant.—The drain having been improperly constructed by the respondent's predecessor in title, the respondent was estopped from alleging that by reason thereof the drain had become a sewer. Further, this combined drain was made without authority, and it did not vest in the district board. A sewer made without authority does not vest in the local authority. If a stranger connected his drain with another drain without the knowledge of the local authority, the latter drain would not thereby become a sewer.

He referred to Bateman v. Poplar District Board of Works, 33 Ch. D. 360, 35 W. R. Dig. 131; Bateman v. Poplar District Board of Works (No. 2), 36 W. R. 501, 37 Ch. D. 272.

R. M. Bray, for the respondent, cited Travis v. Uttley, 42 W. R. 461, [1894] 1 Q. B. 233.

WRIGHT, J.—It is unfortunate that the Metropolis Management Acts are not more complete than they are, but I think that in this case the local authority are without a remedy. If it had been known at the time what Gatfield was doing, the local authority could have proceeded against him under section 73 of the Act of 1855. If they can find him now, and he has got any means, and the Statute of Limitations has not barred their right, they can make the drain as originally ordered and recover the expenses from him, as they could compel Gatfield to do it himself, under section 83, he not having made a drain such as the local authority ordered. The case of Bateman v. Poplar District Board is abundant authority for saying that where a board or vestry has sanctioned a thing to be done in a particular way that is the same as ordering it to be done in that way, and if proceedings are taken under section 73 or section 83, it would not be in a man's mouth to say that the drain had become a sewer, and that, therefore, he could not be ordered to make it into a drain.

The application in this case is, however, not under these sections, but is under the section of the Public Health Act, 1891, which applies only where the thing is actually a drain and not actually a sewer. Here the thing is actually a sewer within the definition in section 250 of the Act of 1855. I cannot see the least ground in law for the contention which Mr. Channell put forward that there was something in the nature of an estoppel to prevent the present owner or occupier from setting up that this is a sewer. It is not contended that he was in any way privy to any representation made by his predecessor as to the construction of the sewer, even if there had been any such representation. I do not think there was.

There was simply a failure, intentional or otherwise, by his predecessor in title to construct a drain in the way authorized. I see nothing in the nature of an estoppel, and I think that the magistrate was right in the conclusion at which he arrived.

KENNEDY, J.—I agree.

Appeal dismissed.

The appellant appealed to the Court of Appeal.

July 29.—Channell, Q.C., and R. Cunningham Glen, for the appellant.

E. Bray, for the respondent.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—The magistrate and the Divisional Court have both held that this is a sewer, that there is nothing to prevent the respondent from saying so, and that the district board must repair it. When the houses were built the building owner prepared a scheme of drainage, and sent the plan to the board, and they passed a resolution sanctioning it, subject to the drainage works being executed to the satisfaction of their surveyor. The plan showed that each pair of houses should have a combined drain. Instead of following the plan the building owner made a drain which drained the sewage of four houses. The surveyor, therefore, did not see that the drain was carried out according to the plan. The building owner, in so doing, made a sewer in fact. When the respondent examined the drain he found that it drained four houses. What, then, is his position as regards the Act of Parliament? He says that it is a sewer within the meaning of the Act, and that the district board is bound to repair it. He has not done anything wrong. He is not estopped from showing the true facts. Under the circumstances of this case—namely, that there was an order of the local board, that the surveyor did not see the work carried out as directed, and that the house is in the possession of a person who is not responsible for what was done—the respondent is not liable to repair this sewer.

We have not to decide what would happen if a stranger had come in and made a connection with the drain. The appeal must, therefore, be dismissed.

KAY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The question is, Is this particular conduit, to use a neutral word, a drain or a sewer? If it is a sewer it is vested in the district board, and they must keep it in order; if it is a drain the householder must keep it in order. By section 250 of the Metropolis Management Act, 1855, a drain means a drain which is used for the drainage of one building only, or a drain for draining more than one house by a combined operation under the order of a vestry or district board. Is this a drain draining one building only? or, if it drains more than one, does it do so by a combined operation under an order of the local authority? It is admitted that it is neither the one nor the other. There was a positive order of the district board, founded upon a notice and plan signed by the builder, that not more than two houses should be allowed to use one drain. This plan was sanctioned by the board. It was an order of the board authorizing two houses only to use one drain. The drain, as a matter of fact, drains four houses, and as this was not done under the order of the board, it is not a drain, but a sewer, within the meaning of the Act, and is vested in the board who must repair it. That is sufficient to decide this case.

It is said that the houses were so drained without the knowledge of the board, and that the board ought to be allowed to say that it is not a sewer. I cannot see the reasoning. The question is, rebus sic stantibus, Is this a drain or a sewer? The surveyor neglected the duty cast upon him by the order of the board. It may be that the board may have a remedy against some other person.

I do not think it necessary to discuss the case of a stranger forming a connection with a drain and making it into a sewer. It is not this case. The board cannot say that this drain has become a sewer by the respondent's default. The respondent was the purchaser, and had no notice of the improper drainage of these houses, and there is not the slightest ground for suggesting that he is estopped from showing the true facts of the case.

A. L. SMITH, L.J., concurred.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the appellant, W. W. Young & Son.

Solicitors for the respondent, Griffenhoofe & Brewster.

App. Bankruptcy.
(Lord Esher, M.R., and Kay and A. L. Smith, L.JJ.) July 5, 1895.

In re SAUNDERS.
Ex parte SAUNDERS. (a.)

Bankruptcy—Jurisdiction—Pension of native officer of Indian Army—Order of court to set aside part of pension—Discretion of the court—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 53, sub-section 2—Indian Pensions Act, 1871 (Indian Act No. XXIII.), ss. 11, 12.

Under section 53, sub-section 2, of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), the court has jurisdiction to order payment to the trustee in bankruptcy of a pension which, by the Pensions Act, 1871 (Indian Act No. XXIII.), ss. 11 and 12, is declared to be inalienable. The discretion of the court to make such an order is absolute, and there is no rule or canon of law that can in the least fetter the exercise of such discretion.

Dicta of Vaughan Williams and Kennedy, JJ., [1895] 2 Q. B., pp. 120, 122, that the court ought not to exercise its discretion by making an order under section 53 with regard to an Indian pension, overruled.

This was an appeal by the official receiver from the decision of Vaughan Williams and Kennedy, JJ. in the Divisional Court on the 23rd of May, 1895.

The bankrupt, who was a retired major-general of the Indian Army, was in receipt of a pension amounting, after deductions, to £330 per annum.

This pension had been granted to him under the Indian Pensions Act, 1871 (Indian Act No. XXIII.), in respect of military service in India.

The county court judge sitting at Wandsworth made an order under the Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), that the bankrupt should pay to the trustee in bankruptcy the sum of £50 per annum out of this pension. By section 53, sub-section 2 of that Act, it is provided that "Where a bankrupt is . . . entitled to any half-pay or pension, or to any compensation granted by the Treasury, the court, on the application of the trustee, shall from time to time make such order as it thinks just for the payment of the . . . half-pay, pension, or compensation or of any part thereof, to the trustee, to be applied by him in such manner as the court may direct."

From this order the bankrupt appealed to the Divisional Court, who reversed the decision of the county court judge and allowed the appeal, being of opinion that there was jurisdiction to make the order, but that as its effect would be to defeat the object of the Indian Legislature, the order had been wrongly made and must be set aside, Vaughan Williams, J., expressing his opinion that "the courts ought not, with regard to an Indian pension, to make any order under section 53, although undoubtedly there is jurisdiction to make an order," and Kennedy, J., remarking that "the discretion should not be exercised by making an order under that section": see [1895] 2 Q. B., pp. 120 and 122.

(a.) Reported by T. MATHEW, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

From this decision the official receiver now appealed.

Section 11 of the Pensions Act, 1871, provides as follows:—"No pension granted or continued by Government . . . on account of past services . . . and no money due, or to become due, on account of any such pension, shall be liable to seizure, attachment, or sequestration, by process of any court in British India, at the instance of a creditor, for any demand against the pensioner, or in satisfaction of a decree or order of any such court."

By section 12 it is provided that "All assignments, agreements, orders, sales, and securities of every kind, made by the person entitled to any pension . . . mentioned in section 11, in respect of any money not payable at or before the making thereof, on account of any such pension . . . or for giving or assigning any future interest therein, are null and void."

Section 266 of the Indian Code of Civil Procedure, which deals with attachment of property, in its first proviso provides that "stipends and gratuities allowed to military and civil pensioners of Government, and political pensions" shall not be liable to attachment or sale.

Section 351 gives power to make orders declaring persons to be insolvent, and appointing receivers of their property.

Section 354 provides that "every order under section 351 . . . shall operate to vest in the receiver all the insolvent's property except the particulars specified in the first proviso to section 266."

Carrington, for the appellant.

Muir McKenzie, for the respondent.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—I think it is perfectly clear that the Court of Bankruptcy has, under the circumstances that exist in this case, ample jurisdiction to make an order under section 53, sub-section 2, of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, and no rule or canon of law can be laid down so as to fetter in the least degree the exercise of the discretion of the court. In this case the learned county court judge has exercised his discretion by making the order to set aside part of this pension, but on the case going to the Divisional Court the judges exercised their discretion by reversing that order, and they were perfectly justified in so doing. Now the case comes to us and we are asked to overrule the exercise of discretion by the Divisional Court. Let us see what the circumstances of this case are.

This Indian officer had, after long service, become entitled to a pension, but, as we understand, he could in case of emergency be called upon to serve again. It is said he has no means of his own besides the pension, and that he had a wife and daughters, the wife owning the house and being in possession of an income that consists of the interest on a sum of £500. Practically, therefore, this officer has nothing beyond his pension. Now the intention of the Indian Legislature in the Pensions Act was that no part of officers' pensions should go to debtors or that the enjoyment of their pensions should be interfered with; but at the same time the Court of Bankruptcy has power to interfere with it: here, by virtue of section 53 of the Bankruptcy Act of 1883, and in India by section 27 of 11 & 12 Vict. c. 21.

In the present case the Divisional Court has exercised its discretion by declining to order part of this officer's pension to be set aside for the benefit of his creditors, and under the circumstances I entirely agree with them in that exercise of discretion. Where the only means of a man for the subsistence of himself and his family is his pension I should not, in the exercise of my discretion, order part of that pension to be set aside for his creditors. But if other circumstances existed, as, for instance, if the wife had such an income that the husband was able to devote the whole of his pension to his own personal expenses, then I should exercise my discretion by ordering part to be set aside. But I lay down no rule of law that will in any way fetter the court in the exercise of its discretion; yet if in any case in which similar circumstances existed to those which exist here, the court ordered part of the pension to be set aside, I should not myself agree with such exercise of discretion.

In the judgment of the Divisional Court there is an expression of opinion made use of by Vaughan Williams, J., that I cannot agree with, and which, I think, goes much too far. He says, "The court ought not, with regard to an Indian pension, to make any order under section 53, although undoubtedly there is jurisdiction to make an order," thus laying down, as it were, the rule that no matter what the circumstances of the case may be yet the court ought not to exercise its discretion in the case of an officer enjoying an Indian pension, by making an order under section 53. Kennedy, J., also at the end of his judgment expresses a similar opinion when he says, "the discretion should not be exercised by making an order under that section."

I think these passages go much to far. I agree, however, with the exercise of discretion by the Divisional Court, therefore this appeal must be set aside with costs.

KAY, L.J.—The words of section 53 of the Bankruptcy Act of 1883 are obviously large, and give the court large discretionary power. Where there is a discretion given to a court by statute I most emphatically say that no court ought to attempt to lay down a rule fettering in any way the exercise of that discretion by any other court under other circumstances. There can hardly be two cases of this kind so exactly alike as to enable any rule to be laid down.

I object most strenuously to any courts attempting to fetter the exercise of our discretion under this section. We have got to look at all the facts and circumstances of this particular case, and having done so, I think that the decision of the Divisional Court was a better exercise of discretion under section 53 than that exercised by the county court, and, therefore, on that ground I think this appeal must be dismissed.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I am satisfied that the judges in the Divisional Court never meant to say that, the court has no discretion to interfere under section 53 with an Indian pension. I think, however, that the courts should be loth to interfere with the enjoyment of an Indian pension under the circumstances that exist in this case.

Appeal dismissed with costs.

Solicitors for the appellant, Ashurst, Morris, Crisp, & Co.

Solicitors for the respondent, G. Twyman.

High Court of Justice.

Chan. Div. } July 5, 1895.
Chitty, J. }

In re BANKS AND JAMES'S TRADE-MARK, No. 52,762. (a.)

Trade-mark — Registration — "Fancy word not in common use" — "Shakspeare" cigars — Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 57, s. 64, sub-section 1 (c).

The word "Shakspeare" as applied to cigars is not a fancy word not in common use within the meaning of section 64, sub-section 1 (c), of the Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883.

Motion.

This was a motion by Messrs. Anstie, tobacco manufacturers, of Devizes, for the rectification of the register of trade-marks by removing therefrom the above mark, which consisted of the word "Shakspere," to be used for cigars.

The mark was registered in 1886 under the Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883.

It appeared that the applicants had since 1888 sold cigarettes of their own manufacture bearing their name and also the word "Shakespeare," and Messrs. Banks & James, the owners of the registered mark (who were tobacco manufacturers at Coventry) had commenced proceedings against Messrs. Anstie for the infringement of their mark (52,762), and also of another mark (170,264), registered in 1893, and consisting of "Shakspere" and a device. These proceedings were still pending.

Levett, Q.C., and Sebastian, for the applicants.—Shakspeare is a family name in common use now, and not a fancy word at all.

Farwell, Q.C., and J. Cutler, for the respondents.—Shakspeare suggests the great dramatist to the ordinary mind, and, as applied to cigars, is a fancy word not in common use within section 64: In re Van Duzer's Trade-mark, 35 W. R. 294, 34 Ch. D. 623. If the fancy word must have been an invented word, where was the need of the amending Act of 1888?

They also referred to In re Densham's Trade-mark (Mazawattee), 43 W. R. 515, [1895] 2 Ch. 176.

Ingle Joyce, for the Comptroller.

CHITTY, J.—The argument in favour of the respondent rests on the meaning of the words "fancy word . . . not in common use," in section 64, sub-section 1 (c) of the Act of 1883. The section has been the subject of much litigation, and the Legislature has very properly, if I may say so, repealed that enactment and expressed itself differently in the subsequent Act of 1888.

Now is Shakspeare a fancy word, whether in common use or not? There can only be one answer in my opinion. The word Shakspeare is well-known in the English language and in common use.

It is said that it is a fancy word because it is fancifully applied. The Court of Appeal in In re Van Duzer's Trade-Mark did not accept that proposition as containing the explanation of the intention of the Legislature in the enactment of 1883. It comes to this that every word with no meaning with reference to the article to which it is applied is to be considered a fancy word. That is not to be deduced from the judgment of the Court of Appeal in Van Duzer's case.

Shakspeare, spelt in this and other ways, is now a common family name in this country. But it is said that the name as used by the respondents is the name of the great dramatist who overshadows all other Englishmen bearing the name. As to the rhetorical part of that proposition I do not feel called upon to express any dissent from it, but it appears to me that a person cannot take the name of a living person and call it a fancy word not in common use, because it was the name of a very great man many years ago. Thus "Miltonic" or some such name applied to collars would not be good as a mark under section 64. Nor could anyone under that section take the name of any celebrated Englishman living at the present time and register it as used for the first time in reference to some article.

I hold by the Act and decide in conformity with the cases on the subject that Shakspeare is not a "fancy word not in common use" within the meaning of section 64. I therefore make the order asked for to expunge the mark from the register.

Solicitors for the applicants, Busk & Mellor, for Lush, Devizes.

Solicitor for the respondent, J. S. Salaman.

Solicitor for the Comptroller, Solicitor to the Board of Trade.

(a.) Reported by J. F. WALEY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Chan. Div. } Aug. 6, 7, 1895.
North, J. }

CHILLINGWORTH v. CHAMBERS. (a.)

Trustee—Breach of trust—Trustee a beneficiary.

If one of two trustees who have been guilty of a breach of trust is also a beneficiary, he is liable to make good out of his share the whole of the loss that has accrued to the trust fund, and can claim no contribution from his co-trustee, when the breach of trust was committed for his benefit.

Summons by the plaintiff to vary the chief clerk's certificate.

The plaintiff, Chillingworth, was one of the trustees and executors of the will of John Wilson, deceased, and as administrator of his wife had become entitled to a beneficial interest in one-fifth of the estate. The defendant Chambers was the other trustee of the will.

A sum of £8,650 out of the trust funds had been advanced to one mortgagor upon eight mortgages. When the property was realized only £7,070 was obtained, so that a loss of £1,580 was incurred, and the trustees were ordered to pay this sum into court. By an order of the 27th of April, 1893, an inquiry was directed, "How, and in what proportions between the plaintiff and the defendant the sum of £1,580 is to be ultimately borne and paid."

Of the loss, £570 was incurred on advances made during the lifetime of the plaintiff's wife, and £1,010 on advances made since her death.

The chief clerk's certificate dated the 23rd of April, 1893, found that the whole of the £1,580 should be borne and paid by the plaintiff, and this summons sought to vary the certificate by declaring that the loss should be borne and paid by the plaintiff and defendant in equal moieties, or in the alternative that the plaintiff was only liable to pay so much of the £1,580 as represented advances made since the death of his wife.

Vernon Smith, Q.C., and Hall, for the plaintiff.—The plaintiff is entitled to contribution. The mortgagor was introduced to him by the defendant, and the plaintiff assented to the defendant's proposals, honestly believing the security to be sufficient. The loss should be borne equally.

(a.) Reported by G. B. HAMILTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Swinfen Eady, Q.C., and Tebbutt, for the defendant. —A beneficiary participating in a breach of trust cannot call upon the trustees to make good the loss to the trust fund. They cited Raby v. Ridehalgh, 3 W. R. 344, 7 De G. M. & G. 104; Prime v. Savell, W. N. [1867] 227; Bahin v. Hughes, 34 W. R. 311, 31 Ch. D. 390; and Evans v. Benyon, 37 Ch. D. 329, 36 W. R. Dig. 208.

Vernon Smith replied.

NORTH, J.—I think that the chief clerk's certificate is right. The plaintiff and defendant were joint trustees, and a loss of £1,580 was incurred. The plaintiff is a beneficiary to the extent of one-fifth of the trust fund, and there ought to have been £1,730 for him and each of the four other beneficiaries. £6,920 ought to have been paid to the other beneficiaries; and the plaintiff should have taken the difference between £1,730 and £1,580—viz., £150. Both trustees are liable to make good the loss. The finding of the chief clerk is that the whole is to be borne by the plaintiff. As I have stated four-fifths of the original fund ought to have been paid to the other beneficiaries, and the residue of the existing fund paid to the plaintiff. He was only a trustee and not a beneficiary when the first four mortgages were made, but Evans v. Benyon shows that this does not affect the question. At the time the money is distributed he is entitled to a share, and he can take nothing until the breach of trust is made good. Mr. Smith suggests that he is entitled to an indemnity, but the breach of trust was committed for his benefit and he is bound to indemnify the other trustee. It follows that the summons must be dismissed.

Solicitor for the plaintiff, Brown, Sons, & Vardy.

Solicitors for the defendant, Bramall, White, & Saunders.

Court of Appeal.

From Q. B. Div. (Kay and A. L. Smith, L.JJ.) July 19, 1895.

HOWARTH v. SUTCLIFFE. (a.)

County court—Costs—Action of tort—Recovery of less than £10—Action which could have been brought in county court—Title to hereditament—Easement—Dispute as to title—County Courts Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 43), ss. 56, 60, 116.

The plaintiff, being the owner in fee of land of a greater annual value than £50, claimed a right by way of easement to a flow of water through a pipe lying in the defendant's land, and brought an action in the High Court for an interference with that right. The defendant denied the plaintiff's title, but paid £2 into court, which the plaintiff took out in satisfaction of his cause of action.

Held, that, as the plaintiff could not have succeeded without proving his title to the easement, the action could not have been brought in the county court, and, therefore, the plaintiff was entitled to his costs of the action.

Appeal from an order of Pollock, B., at chambers.

(a.) Reported by F. G. RUCKER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The statement of claim alleged that the plaintiff was the owner in fee of a mill and a public-house in the occupation of his tenant, and also a main-pipe running through the land of the defendant, and was entitled by way of easement to the flow and exclusive use of a stream of water conveyed along the said main-pipe to the plaintiff's premises; that the defendant wrongfully tapped the said main-pipe and diverted water conveyed along it and used the same, whereby the plaintiff sustained damage, and his reversionary interest was injured; and he claimed damages and an injunction.

The defendant in his statement of defence did not admit the plaintiff's title, and pleaded leave and licence from the occupier of the premises; and further, while denying liability, he brought into court the sum of forty shillings, and said that sum was sufficient to satisfy the plaintiff's claim.

The plaintiff took the forty shillings out of court, and applied to have his costs of the action taxed. The master refused to tax them on the ground that the plaintiff, having recovered less than £10 in an action of tort, which might have been commenced in the county court, was deprived of costs by section 116 of the County Courts Act, 1888.

Section 60 of the County Courts Act, 1888, enacts that a county court "shall have jurisdiction to try any action in which the title to any corporeal or incorporeal hereditaments shall come in question, whether neither the value of the lands, tenements, or hereditaments in dispute, nor the rent payable in respect thereof, shall exceed the sum of £50 by the year, or in case of an easement or licence, where neither the value nor reserved rent of the lands, tenements, or hereditaments in respect of which the easement or licence is claimed, or on, through, over, or under which such easement or licence is claimed, shall exceed the sum of £50 by the year."

It was admitted that the annual value of the hereditaments in respect of which the plaintiff claimed his easement was over £50.

Pollock, B., affirmed the decision of the master.

The plaintiff appealed.

Scott Fox, for the plaintiff.

C. A. Russell, for the defendant.

Cur. adv. vult.

July, 19, 1895.—KAY, L.J., read the following judgment:—The master in this case declined to tax the plaintiff's costs of the action, on the ground that the action was for a tort and that the plaintiff only recovered £2 damages. Pollock, B., agreed with the master, but gave leave to appeal. If the action was improperly brought in the High Court, the decision was right. It was an action by one who claimed to be owner in fee simple of a mill and public-house situate at Todmorden, in the county of York, and also claimed to be owner of a pipe passing through the defendant's land, and to the flow of water through it exclusively. The alleged tort was that the defendant had diverted the water from this pipe in his own land. It was argued that this is not like an ordinary action of trespass in which occupation of the tenement is all that need be proved, the title not coming at all in question. The plaintiff was not in occupation. His tenant was, and the plaintiff sued for injury to his reversion. Unless the defendant admitted it, the plaintiff, it was argued, would be obliged to prove his title to the pipe and flow of water through the defendant's land. In fact, the defendant, by his pleading, refused to admit this, but he said that he had diverted the flow of water with the consent of the occupier of the public-house, and that such diversion has since been discontinued during the lease under which such occupier holds, and he never intended to renew it, and the defendant, denying liability, paid into court forty shillings. The plaintiff was satisfied with this. He took the forty shillings out of court, and applied to have his costs of the action taxed.

Reference is made to sections 56, 60, and 116 of the County Courts Act, 1888, and to various cases which I will proceed to consider, premising only that it seems to me important to put, if possible, such a construction upon the Act as will enable a plaintiff to judge, when he brings his action, whether he should bring it in the High Court or in the County Court. Section 56 of the County Courts Act, 1888, provides that actions for a debt, demand, or damages less than £50 may be commenced in a county court, provided, amongst other things, the title to any corporeal or incorporeal hereditament shall not be in question; unless, by section 60, the annual value of such hereditament shall not be more than £50 a year, or, in the case of an easement, the hereditament in respect of which, or over which, the easement is claimed shall not exceed that annual sum. Then section 116 provides that if, in an action of tort brought in the High Court which could have been commenced in the county court, the plaintiff recovers less than £10, he is not to have any costs unless, amongst other things, the High Court allows costs. In Sewell v. Jones (19 L. J., Q. B. 372), the action was to recover damages for trespass. A motion was made for a prohibition by the defendant on the ground that the land on which the alleged trespass was committed belonged to him, and the rule for a prohibition was made absolute. In Latham v. Spedding, 17 Q. B., 440, it was held that, in an action of trespass, a plea of not possessed did not raise a question of title. In Mountnoy v. Collier, 1 W. R. 179, 1 E. & B. 630, a tenant, in answer to an action for use and occupation, sought to prove that, before the time referred to, his landlord's title had expired, and it was held that this did put the plaintiff's title in question. In Emery v. Barnett, 6 W. R. 634, 4 C. B. N. S. 423, in an action for rent, the defendant had left the premises, and it was held that if he left voluntarily no question of title was raised, but otherwise if he was ejected by title paramount. In Williams v. Jones, 15 L. T. N. S. 248, the defendant, in answer to an action for removing stone from the plaintiff's land, set up an Inclosure Act, by which he alleged that the stone was reserved to him. This, it was held, raised a question of title. In Hawkins v. Rutter, 40 W. R. 238, [1892] 1 Q. B. 668, it was held that, in an ordinary action for trespass, where possession only need be proved by the plaintiff, his title does not come in question; and it was further decided that the easement referred to in section 60 of the County Courts Act, 1888, does not apply to a public right of way, but only to an easement where there is a dominant and servient tenement, and the value of either does not exceed £50 a year. If this were a simple action of trespass, in which the plaintiff need only allege and prove possession, his title would not come in question, even if the defendant pleaded that the plaintiff was not possessed. In such an action the title would only come in question if the defendant set up a title in himself to the locus in quo. The plaintiff here sues for injury to his reversion, and the defendant sets up a right to take the water by agreement with a former tenant of the plaintiff. That rises at once the question whether such agreement was binding on the plaintiff; in other words, whether by such an agreement the defendant acquired a title against him, and this is clearly a question of title which, if the plaintiff had not accepted the forty shillings, must have been decided at the trial. I think, therefore, that on these pleadings the plaintiff's title was put in question, and that the case could not be tried in a county court, and that the plaintiff is therefore entitled to the costs of the action.

A. L. SMITH, L.J., read the following judgment. The question is whether this action, which has been brought in the High Court, could, within the meaning of section 116 of the County Courts Act, 1888, have been commenced in a county court, for, if it could, it being an action of tort and the plaintiff having recovered only forty shillings, he is not entitled to any costs, whereas if the action could not have been commenced in a county court the plaintiff is entitled to costs and to have them taxed against the defendant. As I understand the Act and the cases thereon, the law as to whether an action brought in the High Court could have been commenced in a county court depends upon whether, if the action were brought and tried in the county court, the title to a corporeal or incorporeal hereditament exceeding in value £50 by the year would in reality come in question. If it would, then the action could not have been commenced in a county court within the meaning of the section, for by sections 56 and 60 the county court would have no jurisdiction to try it. It is agreed that in this case the value of the hereditament exceeded £50 by the year, but it was argued for the defendant that no title to any hereditament in reality came in question. It has been held, and in this I agree, that the mere assertion by the plaintiff of title to a hereditament of over £50 in value by the year is not sufficient to show that the action could not have been commenced in the county court, but in order to show that the plaintiff could not sue in the county court, he must establish the fact that a question of title did really and bonâ fide come in issue, not merely that the defendant has so pleaded that it possibly might do so, but that it in reality must do so, Latham v. Spedding, 17 Q. B., at p. 444.

Now the plaintiff's case is that at the time of the committing by the defendant of the wrongs complained of, the plaintiff was owner in fee of a mill and of a pipe connected therewith which was situate under the defendant's land, and as such owner was entitled to the exclusive use of the water conveyed by that pipe to his mill for the use of his tenants, and that in the years 1878 and 1882 the defendant secretly and wrongfully bored into the pipe and tapped the water running therein, whereby the plaintiff's title to the pipe and to the exclusive use of the water running therein has been interfered with and his reversion in the mill has been injured. All these allegations are put in issue by the defendant, and in addition he sets up a leave and licence by the plaintiff's tenant to him to do what is complained of, and he also, but without admitting liability, pays forty shillings into court. The question is, could the plaintiff succeed in this action by mere proof that he was, when the wrongful acts were committed, in possession of the mill by his tenants who were then enjoying the use of the water? If such proof would suffice, I should hold again, as I did in Hawkins v. Rutter, that title to a hereditament did not come into question within the meaning of the sections. But would it suffice? Suppose the plaintiff went to trial merely proving that he was in possession of the mill by his tenants, who were enjoying the water, how would that prove that the pipe under the defendant's land was the plaintiff's property, and that the defendant was in the wrong in boring into the pipe which was upon his own land? It would prove nothing of the kind, and in my judgment if the plaintiff proved nothing more than possession of the mill he ought to be nonsuited. It should be observed that the plaintiff could never prove that he or his tenants were in possession of the pipe, for this was under the defendant's land and not in his possession or that of his tenants. As the plaintiff cannot establish his case by proving a mere possessory title, I am of opinion that he must go further and prove what is his title to the mill and pipe. This being disputed, the title to a hereditament within the meaning of the Act must come in question. It is true that the plaintiff has taken out of court the forty shillings paid in by the defendant with a traverse of the plaintiff's title as adequate damages for the loss he has sustained by the alleged wrongful acts of the defendant; but how does this make the action one which could have been commenced in the county court, for, had it been tried there, the county court would have had no jurisdiction to try even whether the forty shillings was sufficient or not, for this never could have been ascertained until the plaintiff's right to the pipe and mill had been tried out? Kay, L.J., has gone through the cases, and I do not refer to them again. In my judgment, this appeal must be allowed, with costs here and below, and the plaintiff is entitled to have his costs taxed against the defendant.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitor for the plaintiff, G. Trenam, for Sager, Todmorden.

Solicitor for the defendant, Kirkman, for Eastwoods & Sutcliffes, Todmorden.

From Q. B. Div. (Lindley, Lopes, and Rigby, L.JJ.) July 15, 1895.

METROPOLITAN COAL CONSUMERS' ASSOCIATION (LIMITED) v. J. & A. SCRIMGEOUR & Co. (a.) Company — Winding up — Misapplication of funds— Placing shares—Brokerage—Ultrà vires.

Where brokers are properly employed by the directors in the issue of the capital of a company, and the payment of a commission per share is a fair and just payment for services rendered, such payment is not ultrà vires on the part of the company.

Lydney and Wigpool Iron Ore Co. v. Bird, 34 W. R. 749, 33 Ch. D. 85, and In re Faure Electric Accumulator Co., 37 W. R. 116, 40 Ch. D. 141, distinguished.

The plaintiff company was incorporated on the 31st of January, 1889, with a capital of £250,000, divided into 50,000 ordinary shares of £1 each, and 20,000 preference shares of £10 each.

The company was, by an order dated the 20th of January, 1890, ordered to be wound up, and this was an action brought by the official liquidator to recover from the defendants, a firm of stockbrokers, the sum of £26 11s. received by them from the company on the 11th of March, 1889, for brokerage or commission.

By the memorandum of association one of the objects of the company was stated to be "to pay out of the funds of the association all brokerages, commissions, legal and other expenses for the issuing of the capital and in respect of the formation of the association."

Article 113 of the articles of association was as follows: "The business of the association shall be managed by the board, who may pay all brokerages, if any, payable in respect of the placing of any of the shares in the association"; and article 120 declared that the board should have power, "out of the first funds of the association, to pay all costs . . . of placing the shares and debentures of the association, and on behalf of the association to make arrangements or enter into any agreement or agreements they think expedient with any person or persons for the purpose of procuring the capital required by the association."

On the 11th, 12th, and 13th of February, 1889, the defendants made application to the company, in the names of certain clients of theirs, for preference and ordinary shares in the company, and shares were allotted to these clients accordingly.

At a meeting of the subscribers to the memorandum and articles of association, of whom the secretary pro tem. was one, it was resolved, "That the secretary pro tem. be, and he is hereby, authorized to inform any brokers or agents who may be disposed to assist in placing the capital of the association, that the association will pay in consideration of such assistance a brokerage of 5s. per share on preference shares and 6d. per share on ordinary shares."

On the 11th of March, 1889, the secretary forwarded to the defendants a cheque for £26 10s. in respect of brokerage on the above application.

In August, 1892, the fact of the payments for brokerage came to the knowledge of the liquidator, and, the matter having been brought before the chief clerk, the latter gave directions for the present action to be brought.

The trial of the action took place in the Mayor's Court, London, on the 18th of February, 1895, when the Recorder, Sir Charles Hall, gave judgment for the defendants. From that decision the plaintiff company appealed to the Divisional Court, on the ground (1) that there never was any contract between the plaintiff company and the defendants, and that, in the absence of any contract, the defendants became participators in a breach of trust on the part of the directors; and (2) that, even if the £26 10s. had been paid in pursuance of a contract, such payment was ultrà vires the association.

The Divisional Court (Day and Wright, JJ.) dismissed the appeal.

The plaintiff company, by leave, appealed.

Swinfen Eady, Q.C., and R. J. Quin, for the appellants.—The payment of this brokerages was ultrà vires, being equivalent to issuing shares at a discount: Lydney and Wigpool Iron Ore Co. v. Bird, 34 W. R. 749, 33 Ch. D. 85; In re Faure Electric Accumulator Co., 37 W. R. 116, 40 Ch. D. 141.

They also referred to In re Licensed Victuallers Mutual Trading Association, 37 W. R. 674, 42 Ch. D. 1; and Ooregum Gold Mining Co. of India v. Roper, 41 W. R. 90, [1892] A. C. 125.

RIGBY, L.J., referred to In re Almada and Tirito Co., 36 W. R. 593, 38 Ch. D. 415, and Trevor v. Whitworth, 36 W. R. 145, 12 App. Cas. 409.

Jelf, Q.C., and Toller, for the respondents, were not called upon.

LINDLEY, L.J.—This is an attempt to push some sensible and well-recognized doctrines of this court to an absurdity, and I think it is the duty of the court to resist any such extension of these doctrines. The law is clear that limited companies cannot issue shares at a discount. What is the meaning of that? The meaning of that is that shares cannot be issued upon terms which are inconsistent with the provisions of the statute relating to limited companies; or, in other words, the statute having said that every holder of a share shall pay so much of it, the company cannot issue the share upon the the terms that the shareholder shall pay less. That is the whole of the theory of issuing shares at a discount.

(a.) Reported by ARNOLD GLOVER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Now how can this be said to be issuing shares at a discount? The transaction here is this, that the company have authorized their directors to pay brokers a fair and reasonable commission for their services in procuring people to take shares. That is what they have done. What is there wrong in that? What is there contrary to the Act of Parliament in that? What is there illegal in that in any sense or shape? I confess I cannot see the slightest sign of any such thing. That it may be so manipulated as to lead to the issue of shares at a discount is possible, and when such a case arises we will deal with it; but we are free from everything of the sort here. I do not myself attach the slightest importance to the article in the memorandum of association. That clause saying it shall be one of the objects of the company to pay brokers is, to my mind, clear moonshine; it is an authority to the directors to apply the money of the company in that way if the directors, in their judgment, should think it expedient; but to suppose that a clause is any the better for being in the memorandum would be a grievous legal mistake. The directors are authorized to do it, and they have done it.

Now it is said, not only that the directors are liable for misapplying the funds of the company, but that the recipients of the money are liable. That is a step further than any case has gone yet. I do not mean to say, as a matter of law, a company cannot maintain an action at law to recover money which is its own if it is improperly in the hands of other people. I daresay it can, but I am addressing myself to the root of this question, not to the question of remedy, whether it is legal or equitable, but I am addressing myself to the question whether there is anything wrong in this, or whether there is anything ultrâ vires, and I cannot come to the conclusion that there is anything wrong in it at all. My brothers have put a case of paying newspapers for advertising a company, and Mr. Quin felt that the analogy was rather close, and he went the whole length of saying that this is an illegal payment, and that the company could recover back from the newspapers money paid for advertisements. All I can say is it startles me to hear any such doctrine. No court has ever sanctioned such a theory, and I do not suppose any court ever will. But then Mr. Swinfen Eady says that the case has been decided by Kay, L.J., in Re Faure and the Electric Accumulation Co., and also by this court in the Lydney and Wigpool Iron Ore Co. v. Bird. Now as regards the Lydney and Wigpool Iron Ore Co. v. Bird, although there is in the judgment in that case a statement to which Mr. Swinfen Eady referred and to which I stand—"that it would be wrong to make the company pay for the issue of its own shares; no part of the capital of the the company could be properly so applied"—it has application, of course, to the circumstances of that case, and the circumstances of that case have not the slightest resemblance to the circumstances in this case. There was a person named James Bird, who was a promoter of the company, and he secretly made a profit, at the expense of the company, of £10,800, and he was made liable for it. He said, "Well, but I have spent £5,000, as a consideration which I gave to Wm. Bird for guaranteeing me that shares should be taken up in this company," and we disallowed James Bird that bill. The whole thing was a juggle from beginning to end, and we disallowed it on the ground that it was an improper transaction, and so it was. It has nothing whatever to do with, and is far away and remote from, such a case as this, where there is no juggle and no impropriety at all.

As regards In re The Faure Electric Accumulation Co. no doubt Kay, J. (as he then was), did apparently hold that these brokerage payments were illegal, being paid out of capital certainly, and he made the directors there liable for them. If that decision is understood as going as far as to compel us to hold that the payments in this case are illegal, I should say that I dissent from it, and that it goes a great deal too far. I doubt very much, if you look at the facts, whether the Kay, J., did intend to go as far as that. I doubt whether he regarded the commissions there, as ordinary commissions of a reasonable amount payable in the ordinary course of business. I think he treated them rather as improper payments, rather in the shape of bribes. I have not looked exactly at the amount of the commission, but I think that was what was running in his head, and of course, if he took that view, he was perfectly justified in holding the directors liable to replace the money which they had misapplied. If it is to be understood as going further, then I say it appears to me that there is neither principle nor authority to support such an appeal as this, and it must be dismissed with costs.

I should just add that in the Lydney & Wigpool Iron Ore Co. v. Bird, the money sought to be recovered was not money which was paid by the company for placing shares, and it was money which they objected to pay in that way. It is wide of this.

LOPES, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. It is said that these payments of commission to brokers for issuing shares of the company are ultrà vires, and, therefore, illegal. Now, so far as I can ascertain, no case hitherto seems to have gone that length. The case chiefly relied upon was In re Faure Electric Accumulation Co., and I cannot help thinking, after reading it as well as I can, that that case is different, and that the learned judge, Kay, J., proceeded upon different grounds. I think that what he thought was this: he thought that the payments of commission to brokers there were not bonâ fide payments for work and labour done, that they were not payments in the ordinary way of business, but rather in the nature of bribes. I think, if the case is carefully read, that that is the conclusion that anybody so reading it, would arrive at. I do not think for a moment that he regarded the payments there in the same light as we are justified in regarding the payments here; and it is not contended here that these payments to the brokers at any rate were not bonâ fide and honest, and really made in respect of services rendered.

In the result I come to the conclusion that, in any case where it is made out—as it is here—that the services of the broker are reasonably necessary, that the brokers are properly employed in the issue of the capital of the company, and that the payment of a commission of so much per share is a fair and just payment for services rendered, there is no ground, either of reason, of justice, or of principle, why the payment should not be held to be intrà vires and unimpeachable.

I think, therefore, that the decision of the court below was right, and that this appeal should be dismissed.

RIGBY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I do not think that there is anything in the case of The Lydney & Wigpool Iron Ore Co. v. Bird that would at all justify the decision that we are asked to arrive at in this case. There a sum of £10,800 of concealed property was taken by a promoter out of the capital of the company, under an appearance, which was different from the reality—that appearance being that it was bonâ fide purchase-money. There the only question was, Can he be allowed out of that, a sum he paid to his broker for guaranteeing shares? An absolutely different case from the present.

With reference to The Faure Electric Accumulator Company's case I observe that that case is a very peculiar one in some respects. First of all, the man who cast doubt on the company in that case was the broker himself, Pincoffs, who apparently had in his pocket an offer from his client, Morris, to take shares. I say, apparently, I think that was the fact in the case. I do not think he could have been successful in going off for a client and getting him in so short a time; and for that work he got upwards of £20,000. No doubt, looking at it as a percentage on the shares of the company—the nominal value of the shares—that might not be outrageous; but to suppose that a company can fairly pay upwards of £20,000 for work done in that way and call it commission, is at any rate a very different state of things from that which we have to deal with here, where there was actual work done in respect of the shares, and where the brokers were paid what appears to be shown, or is allowed to be, an ordinary brokerage for the work that they did. I confess I am not prepared to hold that any expenditure of a company with a view to having its capital placed is necessarily wrong. If you can place the capital by way of advertisement, I do not see why you cannot incur, in the regular way of expenditure, any brokerage to brokers to procure the applications.

I think for that ground the action altogether fails, and the appeal must be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors, Lumley & Lumley; H. B. Wade.

From Q. B. Div.
(Lord Esher, M.R., and Kay and A. L. Smith, L.JJ.) July 3, 1895.

DOBELL & Co. v. STEAMSHIP ROSSMORE Co. (a.)

Admiralty—Ship—Bill of lading—Liability of owner—Exception — Condition — Due diligence to make ship seaworthy—Want of diligence on part of servant.

A bill of lading contained a clause exempting the shipowner from liability for loss resulting from faults in navigation, provided due diligence was exercised by him to make the ship seaworthy. The ship's carpenter, who was admitted to be a competent workman, omitted to close one of the portholes before the ship started, in consequence of which the ship was rendered unseaworthy.

Held, that the shipowner had not satisfied the proviso on which his exemption from liability depended.

Appeal from a judgment of Lawrance, J.

The action was brought in respect of damage done to the plaintiffs' goods shipped on board the defendants' steamship under a bill of lading for carriage from Baltimore to Liverpool. The goods in question, which were a cargo of oilcake, were put on board the ship through a porthole, and, after the loading was completed, the ship's carpenter omitted to close the porthole, in consequence whereof sea water entered the vessel during the voyage and the plaintiffs' cargo was damaged. The evidence showed that when the vessel started on her voyage it would have been impossible to obtain access to the porthole, for the purpose of closing it, without removing a great quantity of cargo. It was admitted that the carpenter was a competent workman, and it was not suggested that the defendants had been in any way negligent in appointing him.

The bill of lading contained the following exemption clause:—"Neither the vessel, her owners, agents, or charterers shall become or be held responsible for damage or loss resulting from faults or errors in navigation or in the management of the said vessel, provided due diligence has been exercised by her owners to make the said vessel in all respects seaworthy and properly manned, equipped, and supplied. It is also mutually agreed that the shipment is subject to all the terms and provisions of, and all the exceptions from liability contained in, the Act of Congress of the United States, approved on the 13th day of February, 1893." This Act of Congress, which is generally known as the Harter Act, contains the following clauses:—(2.) It shall not be lawful for any vessel transporting merchandise or property from or between ports of the United States of America and foreign ports, her owner, master, agent, or manager, to insert in any bill of lading or shipping document any covenant or agreement whereby the obligations of the owner or owners of the said vessel to exercise due diligence properly to equip, man, provision, and outfit the said vessel, and to make the said vessel seaworthy and capable of performing her intended voyage, or whereby the obligations of the master, officers, agents, or servants to carefully handle and stow her cargo, and to care for and properly deliver same, shall in any wise be lessened, weakened, or avoided. (3.) If the owner of any vessel transporting merchandise or property to or from any port in the United States of America shall exercise due diligence to make the said vessel in all respects seaworthy and properly manned, equipped, and supplied, neither the vessel, her owner or owners, agent, or charterers shall become or be held responsible for damage or loss resulting from faults or errors in navigation, or in the management of the said vessel, nor shall the vessel, her owner or owners, charterers, agent, or master be held liable for losses arising from dangers of the sea or other navigable waters, acts of God or public enemies, or the inherent defect, quality, or vice of the things carried, or from insufficiency of package, or seizure under legal process, or for loss resulting from any act or omission of the skipper or owner of the goods, his agent or representative, or from saving or attempting to save life or property at sea, or from any deviation in rendering such service."

At the trial of the action Lawrance, J., gave judgment for the plaintiffs for the agreed sum of £70.

The defendants appealed.

Pickford, Q.C., and Bateson, for the defendants.—This case is within the exemption clause. The proviso to that clause does not put on the shipowners a liability to make the ship seaworthy, but only to use due diligence to make it so. Here the defendants used due diligence by employing competent agents and workmen.

Joseph Walton, Q.C., and Carver, for the plaintiffs.—The defendants have not satisfied the proviso to the exemption clause. The meaning of the proviso is not merely that the owners should be diligent personally, but that they should use diligence by their agents. It is not enough that they should appoint competent agents. Secondly, assuming that the defendants have satisfied the proviso, this case is not within the exemption, which only applies to loss arising from faults in navigation during the voyage, and not to loss arising from unseaworthiness when the ship starts.

(a.) Reported by F. G. RUCKER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The following cases were cited: Steel v. State Line Steamship Co., 3 App. Cas. 72, 26 W. R. Dig. 216; Hedley v. Pinkney & Sons Steamship Co., 42 W. R. 497, [1894] A. C. 222; The Warkworth, 32 W. R. 479, 9 P. D. 20; Carmichael & Co. v. Liverpool Sailing Ship Owners' Mutual Indemnity Association, 35 W. R. 793, 19 Q. B. D. 242; The Ferro [1893], P. 38, 41 W. R. Dig. 223.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—We have here to deal with an English bill of lading. The defendants, who are shipowners, undertook to bring a cargo of oilcake from America to England and deliver it. During the voyage the cargo was damaged by reason of sea-water having come through a porthole. For this damage the owners of the cargo have brought an action on the bill of lading. The defendants admit the damage, but they say that the bill of lading contained certain exceptions to their liability, and that this case is within those exceptions. The bill of lading incorporates by reference certain words of an American statute. That statute, as a statute, is of course not binding on the parties, but we must construe this bill of lading by reading into it the words so referred to. The introduction of these words is clumsily done, for it involves a repetition; but the effect is that the exception to the shipowner's liability is made to depend on a condition. If the owner exercises due diligence to make the vessel seaworthy, then the exception is to apply, and the owner is relieved from liability for damage or loss resulting from faults or errors in navigation, or in the management of the vessel.

The defendants say that, if the vessel was in fact not seaworthy, they, at any rate, exercised due diligence to make her seaworthy, and, therefore, satisfied the condition on which the exception depends. But the owners themselves were not present at the port of sailing. Even supposing that, for this purpose, the manager was the owner, he was not there. How can it be contended that it was the intention of the parties that the manager should himself be present at the port of sailing to make the ship seaworthy? The meaning of the condition must be that the owner is, by himself or by the agents whom he employs, to see to the seaworthiness of the ship. Here, if the ship was not seaworthy, it was owing to the fault either of the carpenter or of some agent appointed by the owners to employ a carpenter.

Now, was the ship seaworthy? She started on her voyage with one of her portholes open. If it had been easy by ordinary appliances at any time to close the porthole, the ship would not have been unseaworthy. But she started in such a condition, and with her cargo so stowed, that it would have been impossible to close the porthole except with very great trouble and exertion. She was, therefore, not seaworthy at starting, and she was unseaworthy through the fault of some agent appointed by the owners to make her seaworthy before she started. The defendants, therefore, have failed to satisfy the condition on which their exemption from liability depended, and the decision of the learned judge was right.

The appeal must be dismissed.

KAY, L.J.—This is an inartificial bill of lading incorporating the words of two sections of the American statute called the Harter Act. The shipowners meant to exempt themselves from all liability for damage or loss resulting from faults or errors in navigation or in the management of the ship. That seems to me to mean faults or errors committed during the voyage. But before the owners can be entitled to that exemption, they are to exercise due diligence to make the ship seaworthy. If they fulfil that condition, they are not to be liable for faults in navigation. The plaintiffs say that that of which they complain in this case was not a fault in navigation, and, therefore, is not within the exemption. The cargo was loaded through a porthole, and that porthole was insufficiently fastened down before the ship left the port of loading. In consequence of this sea-water got into the ship and did damage to the cargo. Was that a loss resulting from a fault in the navigation? It is not necessary to decide that question; but I think that faults in navigation are faults in sailing the vessel during the voyage, and, if I am right in that view, the present case would seem not to come within the exemption at all.

But did the shipowners fulfil the condition on which they would be entitled to claim exemption? Did they use due diligence to make the ship seaworthy? She was in fact unseaworthy; for the porthole which had been left unfastened could not have been closed without an expenditure of considerable time and labour. The case of Steel v. State Line Steamship Co. shows that under such circumstances a ship is unseaworthy. Was that owing to a want of diligence on the part of the owners. They say it was not, because they appointed a competent and proper carpenter. I do not agree with that contention. I think that the meaning of the proviso was that the owners were by their own eyes, or the eyes of others, to see that the ship was seaworthy before she started. This bill of lading does not exempt the owners from liability for the negligence of their agents, merely because they have appointed competent agents. I am of opinion that the negligence of the carpenter in this case was negligence on the part of the owners within the meaning of the proviso to the exemption clause of this bill of lading, and that, therefore, the plaintiffs are entitled to judgment.

A. L. SMITH, L.J., concurred.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the plaintiffs, Weightman, Pedder, & Co.

Solicitors for the defendants, Batesons, Warr, & Wimshurst.

From Chan. Div. (Lindley, Lopes, and Rigby, L.JJ.) July 2, 1895.

In re COALPORT CHINA Co. (LIMITED). Ex parte MIDDLETON AND BELL. (a.)

Company—Transfer of share—Directors' discretion to refuse—Rectification of register—Companies Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 89), s. 35.

Where the directors have a power to refuse to register transfers of shares, whether the power is general or is a power to refuse for stated reasons, it is for those who allege that the directors have not properly exercised the power to give evidence to that effect.

The directors of a company had power to refuse to register any transfer where they were of opinion that the proposed transferee was not a desirable person to admit to membership.

The directors considered the registration of a proposed transfer, and decided to refuse it, but gave no reasons.

Held (reversing the decision of Kekewich, J.), that the directors had not improperly exercised their power, and that the court could not interfere.

(a.) Reported by ARNOLD GLOVER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Appeal from a decision of Kekewich, J.

The Coalport China Co. (Limited) was registered under the Companies Acts in 1862.

Most of the £100 shares of which the capital consisted were held by the founder and his family.

Article 33 of the articles of association was as follows: "The directors may refuse any transfer (a) where the company has a lien on the shares, (b) where it is not proved to their satisfaction that the proposed transferee is a responsible person, (c) where the directors are of opinion that the proposed transferee is not a desirable person to admit to membership; but paragraphs (b) and (c) of this clause shall not apply where the proposed transferee is already a member."

T. A. Middleton, the holder of one share in the company, and an original subscriber to the articles of association, agreed to sell his share to W. Bell for £160, and gave notice to the company of his desire, pursuant to an article which provided that no share should be transferred to a person not a member of the company so long as the founder, or, failing him, some member of the company, was willing to purchase the share. After the expiration of the time limited for the exercise of the option by the founder or other member, Middleton forwarded to the secretary a transfer of the share to Bell at the price of £160.

The secretary, in reply, informed Middleton that the directors were unable to agree to the proposed transfer, and at a meeting of the board a resolution was passed that the transfer be refused. No reason was given for the refusal.

A motion was accordingly made by Middleton and Bell under section 35 of the Companies Act, 1862, for rectification of the register of the company by the substitution of Bell's name for that of Middleton. There was no lien on the share. Evidence was given that Bell was a responsible person, and this the directors did not deny.

Kekewich, J., was of opinion that the directors had only a discretion to refuse a transfer on a particular ground, and that they had not shown that they had properly exercised their discretion. He therefore made the order asked.

The company appealed.

Bramwell Davis, Q.C., and G. B. Freeman, for the appellants, referred to In re Gresham Life Assurance Society, Ex parte Penney, 21 W. R. 186, L. R. 8 Ch. App. 446.

Warrington, Q.C., and G. Cave, for the respondents.—The directors had a special, not a general, discretion, and it does not appear that they made a single inquiry as to the proposed transferee's eligibility.

They referred to In re Stranton Iron and Steel Co., L. R. 16 Eq. 559; In re Bell Brothers (Limited), Ex parte Hodgson, 65 L. T. N. S. 245, 40 W. R. Dig. 44; and Moffat v. Farquhar, 26 W. R. 522, 7 Ch. D. 591.

LINDLEY, L.J.—It appears to me that this appeal must succeed. The question raised is an extremely simple one, and before I read the articles, I will state shortly the principle which I think is applicable to it. Under the articles the directors have a power to refuse a transfer—I will not say at present for what reasons—I will allude to them presently. They do refuse a transfer and they do not say why. The argument is, and the view taken by the learned judge is, that it is for them to justify their conduct. Now that appears to me to be wrong. It appears to me it is for those who say that they, having the power, have exercised it improperly, to give some evidence to that effect. Here there is absolutely none. Therefore, in common fairness, as a matter of justice between man and man, it strikes me that this decision is based upon an erroneous principle.

Now let us see whether there is anything in the articles which renders that line of reasoning open to observation or excludes it. That was precisely the ground upon which the Court of Appeal in the case of Ex parte Penney, differed from the then Master of the Rolls. I am aware that the articles were not quite the same, but the Master of the Rolls had there held that the directors are bound not only to act bonâ fide (which of course they are), but are bound to preserve some kind of evidence that they act bonâ fide, so that the court may see it. The Court of Appeal said "No, that is not part of their business; show us that they have not acted properly, give us evidence of that kind and we have ample power." Now we must bear in mind that the power of the court invoked in this case rests on the 35th section of the Companies Act, 1862, which enables the court to rectify the register if the name of any person is, without sufficient cause, entered in or omitted from the register, or if default is made, or unneccessary delay takes place. Now who is to prove that? Surely it is for the person invoking the assistance of the court to prove that the name of some person is without sufficient cause entered on or omitted from the register. When all the applicant can say is, the directors have the power to refuse and they have refused, he has not discharged the burden which is imposed upon him.

Mr. Warrington and Mr. Cave have argued that although that may be true under ordinary articles it is not applicable to the present articles, for this reason. These articles are framed upon the theory that the shares shall not be transferred by any shareholder until he has offered them to the other shareholders (that is the short point), and that after he has offered them, and the other shareholders have elected not to buy them, then he has a right to transfer them subject to article 33. [His lordship read clauses (a) and (b) of the articles, and continued:—] The applicant has brought forward evidence to show that he is a responsible person, and nobody says he is not. Then (c):—"Where the directors are of opinion that the proposed transferee is not a desirable person to admit to membership." Now (a) and (b) being excluded, the directors must have acted, if they have acted at all properly, under (c). There is no evidence to show that they have not acted under (c) and no evidence to show that they have acted improperly. Now the contention is, that although they have considered whether they will pass this transfer or not, whether they will approve of the transfer and of the transferee—although they have considered that, and have refused to do it, yet because they have not said or because the minutes do not show that they came to the conclusion that the proposed transferee is not a desirable person—because that does not appear, therefore it is to be assumed that they have improperly exercised this power. I do not assume anything of the kind, nor do I think it is necessary in point of law for the minutes to show or for the directors to show, or for them to state, in the absence of evidence calling upon them to make any statement, that they came to a resolution in those terms. Now it is said that unless they do, the court cannot hold that they have considered the question. Now what is the question? The question for them to consider is whether they will or will not refuse to register the transfer. That is the question. These are only reasons or grounds for it. They have considered that question, and after the evidence given by the applicant I cannot help feeling, inferring, and believing that they have considered the other question, whether he is or not a desirable person. There is no evidence whatever to show that they have acted in the slightest degree improperly or exceeded their powers.

Now I wish to be cautious in this matter, because I have not the slightest doubt that the court has ample power to control the refusal of directors, or the exercise by them of their power to refuse, provided there is any evidence whatever which justifies the court in coming to the conclusion that they have not done their duty; but in the absence of all such evidence the court has no right to presume—(it is contrary to all ordinary principles of justice)—that they have done wrong; on the contrary, it must be presumed that they have done right. I consequently think that the appeal should be allowed with costs here and below.

Lopes, L.J.—I am of the same opinion, and have nothing to add.

Rigby, L.J.—I have only to add, in consequence of Mr. Warrington's argument that where the power is absolute a different rule applies to where the power is limited, that I do not think that distinction can be maintained. Even although, in terms, the power is absolute, it is a fiduciary power to be exercised for the benefit of the company, and with due regard to the rights of the transferor, so that no power is altogether absolute. But even in the case of a power absolute in terms, the courts have held that the directors are not bound to say, "We throw aside all external considerations and apply ourselves to the exercise of the power in the proper manner," and if they need not do it in that case, I do not see why they should do it when the power itself arises only in certain circumstances.

The fact that they have resolved, must be taken, in the absence of positive evidence sufficient to satisfy the court to the contrary, that they had resolved within their jurisdiction and for right reasons.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitors, Hepworth & Co.; Powell & Rogers.

From Lancaster Palatine Court of Chancery. (Lindley, Lopes, and Rigby, L.JJ.) July 5, 1895.

MacIver v. G. & J. Burns. (a.)

Practice — Writ — Domiciled Scotchman carrying on business in England under firm name—Service on manager in England—Motion to set aside—Ord. 48a, r. 11.

B., a domiciled Scotchman, residing in Glasgow, carried on business there and also in Liverpool under the firm name of G. & J. B., but the business belonged to B. alone. The plaintiffs, who had formerly carried on another business in partnership with B., issued a writ in the Palatine Court against G. & J. B., and served it upon the manager of the Liverpool office of G. & J. B. The writ claimed relief in respect of the partnership formerly subsisting between the plaintiffs and B.

Held, that such service was not authorized by ord. 48a, r. 11, and must be set aside.

This was an appeal from an order of the Vice-Chancellor of the County Palatine of Lancaster refusing to make any order on a motion by the defendants, to set aside the service of the writ in the action.

(a.) Reported by Arnold Glover, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

In September, 1856, articles of partnership were entered into between James Burns, George Burns, John Burns, and Charles MacIver for the purpose of carrying on in partnership the business of steamship owners under the name of the Clyde Steam Navigation Co.

Several changes took place in the constitution of the said partnership, and ultimately, in the month of April, 1895, the partners therein were Sir John Burns, Bart., and the plaintiffs, Charles MacIver, Henry MacIver, and William MacIver.

On the 15th of April, 1895, Sir John Burns gave notice to the plaintiffs, under a clause in the partnership articles, of his desire to withdraw from the partnership, and on the 13th of June the plaintiffs gave Sir John Burns notice of their acceptance of his offer.

Sir John Burns was a domiciled Scotchman carrying on business in Glasgow as a shipowner under the style of G. & J. Burns. He had also, for the purposes of his business of G. & J. Burns, an office in Liverpool, of which R. M. Deans was the manager.

On the 20th of June, 1895, the plaintiffs issued a writ in the Liverpool District of the Palatine Court against "G. & J. Burns," whereby they claimed (1) an account as between the plaintiffs and the defendants of the partnership lately subsisting between them, under the name of the Clyde Steam Navigation Co.; (2) damages for breach by the defendants of their agreement or obligation to observe good faith towards the other partners; and (3) that the plaintiffs or any of them might be appointed receivers or receiver of the partnership assets.

This writ was served upon R. M. Deans, the manager of the Liverpool business of G. & J. Burns. It was accompanied by a notice in the following terms: "We hereby give you notice that you are served with the writ in this action as a person having the control or management of the partnership business." A notice of motion for a receiver was served along with the writ.

On the 21st of June the defendants gave notice of motion that the service of the writ in the action and all subsequent proceedings therein might be set aside on the ground that the business carried on under the name of G. & J. Burns belonged to and was carried on solely by Sir John Burns, who was domiciled and resident in Scotland outside the jurisdiction of the court.

On the 25th of June the Vice-Chancellor refused to make any order upon the defendants' motion to set aside service of the writ, his honour being of opinion that the writ was properly served under a rule identical in its terms with ord. 48*a*, r. 11, of the Rules of the Supreme Court, and that the cases of Russell v. Cambefort, 37 W. R. 701, 23 Q. B. D. 526, and St. Gobain Channy & Cirey Co. v. Hoyermann's Agency, 41 W. R. 563, [1893] 2 Q. B. 96, relied upon by the defendants, did not apply to a Scotch defendant.

Ord. 48*a*, r. 11, is as follows: "Any person carrying on business within the jurisdiction in a name or style other than his own name may be sued in such name or style as if it were a firm name, and so far as the nature of the case will permit all rules relating to proceedings against firms shall apply."

The defendants, by leave, appealed.

Sir R. Webster, Q.C., and P. Ogden Lawrence, for the appellants.—Rule 11 of order 48*a* was intended to apply to persons carrying on business under sham names, such as "Waukenphast," and was never intended to authorize the service of a writ on a foreigner or Scotchman. The rule gives no justification or right to serve a Scotchman carrying on business in England. That is a matter for service out of the jurisdiction, in respect to which there is a whole code of rules. If there were any doubt about the matter on principle, the cases of Russell v. Cambefort and St. Gobain Channy and Cirey Co. v. Hoyermann's Agency are conclusive. They apply with even greater force to a Scotchman than to a foreigner. [They were stopped by the Court.]

Cozens Hardy, Q.C., and T. R. Hughes, for the respondents.—Rule 11 is expressed in very general terms, and Russell v. Cambefort gives the only limitation that ought to be set upon it. Scotchmen are subjects of Parliament, and it is not unreasonable to suppose that Parliament may have considered them in authorizing these rules: Grant v. Anderson, [1892] 1 Q. B. 108, 40 W. R. Dig. 191. The judgments of Lord Esher and A. L. Smith, L.J., in St. Gobain Channy and Cirey Co. v. Hoyermann's Agency seem to suggest this distinction. If the same principle applies to Scotchmen as to foreigners, that case is against our contention, but the ratio decedendi there was allegiance, not local domicile. All Sir John Burns' dealing with us were carried on under the name of G. & J. Burns, and we are suing him in respect of something done by him under that name. Worcester City and County Banking Co. v. Firbank, Pauling, & Co., 42 W. R. 402, [1894] 1 Q. B. 784, proves that rule 1 of order 48*a* applies to foreigners not subject to the jurisdiction of English courts except so far as as they are so subject under the order itself.

LINDLEY, L.J.—This is an appeal from a decision of the Vice-Chancellor of the County Palatine of Lancaster, refusing to make an order in the terms of the notice of motion, which in substance was to set aside the writ and all subsequent proceedings in this action of MacIver v. G. & J. Burns. The action was brought by three gentlemen of the name of MacIver against Sir John Burns, sued as G. & J. Burns, and it appears from the indorsement on the writ that the action was a partnership action to take the accounts and wind up the business of what is called the Clyde Steam Navigation Co. The Clyde Steam Navigation Co. was a partnership between the plaintiffs and Sir John Burns, and the dealings and transactions of that partnership relate to the sailings of steamships from the Clyde. Now Sir John Burns being sued simply as a member of that firm, and being a domiciled Scotchman, not residing here, and having nothing whatever to do in this country so far as the cause of the action is concerned, nevertheless does carry on business in Liverpool, apparently under the name of G. & J. Burns, and in consequence of that circumstance he is sued under that firm name, as I will call it. The question is whether that is right.

Now, apart from all rules, let us consider the thing on principle. Here is a partnership action between certain partners. The proper parties to that partnership action are the individual partners. We have ascertained by inquiry that Sir John Burns is not described in the partnership articles as a separate firm carrying on business under the name of G. & J. Burns. Whether it would have made any difference if he had been, I do not pause to inquire. Now, being sued in respect of that partnership business, and being a Scotchman domiciled in Scotland, and not being resident here, if he is to be sued at all in this country, it ought to be under order 11, which relates to the service on and suing of persons not resident in this country. That is the proper order to go under primâ facie. But then it is said, on behalf of the plaintiffs, "As he carries on business in Liverpool under the name of G. & J. Burns, we can sue him under rule 11 of order 48*a*." Order 48*a* refers to actions by and against partnerships. The first ten rules of it relate to actions by and against partnerships only. Partnerships can now be sued in the name of the firm, which they could not before, and inasmuch as they had before to be sued in the names of the persons who composed the firm, it was necessary to frame some rules to carry out the procedure, and rules 1 to 10 of order 48*a* are addressed to motions of that kind.

Then comes rule 11, which has really nothing on earth to do with the partnership rules, but which is tacked on to apply to the case of a single individual who carries on business either in the name of a firm or, as it is expressed in the rule, under some name other than his own. Rule 11 is expressed in this way: "Any person carrying on business within the jurisdiction" —there is no reference whatever to persons carrying on business without the jurisdiction—"in a name or style other than his own name may be sued in such name or style as if it were a firm name." Pausing there, that does not give the court any power to sue a person abroad in the firm name. Then the rule runs on: "And, so far as the nature of the case will permit, all rules relating to proceedings against firms shall apply." That throws us back upon what I may call the code of rules relating to firms—rules 1 to 10. Unquestionably rules 1 to 10 have, to a certain extent, altered the law as it was laid down in Russell v. Cambefort. The law is altered to this extent, that if two or more persons, being foreigners, carry on business in this country in partnership, you may sue them under the firm name, and get judgment against the firm, which judgment can be executed against its assets in this country. But when you come to apply that to the case of a single individual, there are no joint assets and the rule will not work. Take the St. Gobain case. Just consider the difference. If you have a claim against two or more partners, and you get judgment against the firm, the judgment only affects the joint assets. You cannot make it the foundation of a claim on the individual assets. If you obtain judgment against an individual who carries on business in a firm name, your judgment is against him and him only, and you cannot get any other. Therefore there is really no analogy between the two cases. If you are dealing with a single person, whether a foreigner or a Scotchman, the same rule applies, and you must go under Order 11. You cannot get at him under Order 48*a* at all.

Now consider what rule 11 is for. Rule 11 is to enable the suing of persons in the name in which they carry on business—to facilitate the carrying on of actions against persons who conceal their names. For that purpose you must adapt, as far as you can, the rules relating to actions against firms—partners in firms. When you come to apply it to cases in which the reasoning does not apply, it will not work at all. I put a case in the course of the argument, which strikes me as showing what the real object of that rule is. If a man contracts debts with his baker or butcher in his own name, and carries on business under a name not his own, the baker or butcher cannot sue him under the name not his own. The reasoning of rule 11 does not apply at all to such a case. Why should it? When you come to look at rule 11 you observe the words "may be sued in such name or style as if it were a firm name." That is the key to the whole thing. I do not say the language of the rule states it, but it involves this: that you can only sue a man in his firm name in respect of matters which are connected with the business which he does carry on under that name. Now supposing that Sir John Burns in this case had a partner, and carried on business in Liverpool under the name of G. & J. Burns, you could not sue him in such an action as this in that firm name, because that would embrace somebody who had nothing whatever to do with the cause of action.

It appears to me that there has been a confusion of thought in this case altogether and a mistake, which is, to my mind, palpable when you look at the reason of the thing; and I must say that if we were to uphold this order we should be sanctioning a course which would give rise to a great deal of disturbance and outcry, and very legitimate outcry too, on the part of Scotchmen and foreigners. The right course here is to sue Sir John Burns in his own name, and to apply for leave to serve him under order 11.

I think the order ought to be reversed.

Lopes, L.J.—I am entirely of the same opinion. I think the learned Vice-Chancellor has misconceived the effect of this rule 11 of order 48*a*. That rule was not intended to apply to a case like the present; it was intended to apply to the case of an individual who carries on business in an assumed name—such, for instance, as the man who carries on business under the name of "Waukenphast," or, again, under the name of "Madame Louise," the real name being an entirely different one; "Madame Louise" and "Waukenphast" being assumed names. The object of the rule was simply to apply to cases of that kind, and in that respect was to remedy a defect which existed before that rule came into operation.

I entirely agree with what has been said by the Lord Justice. I think if we were to support the order that has been made, a greater storm would arise than arose on a previous occasion when Scotchmen considered themselves aggrieved by a case which was decided in this court.

Rigby, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. First of all, let us consider the literal meaning of the words of rule 11: "May be sued in such name or style as if it were a firm name." That is to say, he may be treated as though he were a member of a firm carrying on business in a firm name. It appears to me that those words necessarily limit the operation of rule 11 to cases arising out of that carrying on of a business. This is not a case of the kind at all, and it would appear to me to be altogether wresting the meaning of that clause into quite a different meaning to attribute the meaning to it which has been taken by the Vice-Chancellor.

With regard to the argument that Scotchmen in a case of this kind are to be treated as in a different position from foreigners, I cannot accede to it at all. Of course, Scotchmen are not foreigners; they are fellow-subjects of ours, and they are in the same position as any other fellow-subjects, with the important exception that their system of jurisprudence differs in very important matters from ours—that there are such differences between our system and theirs that even if you find words which control the jurisdiction of, or confer a jurisdiction upon, our courts, you no more assume them to apply to the case of Scotchmen than to the case of foreigners. Parliament, of course, may legislate for Scotchmen as it may legislate for Frenchmen, so far as they are concerned in matters of litigation in our courts; but mere general language will not be construed necessarily to apply either to foreigners or to Scotchmen. That is, I think, the meaning that is to be attributed to the reasoning in the judgments already cited; and, as I have already pointed out, to call a Scotchman an English subject is a perfect absurdity. No one can ever construe words which have express reference to English subjects—as was said in one case by the Master of the Rolls—as having reference to Scotchmen.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitors, Bircham & Co., for Batesons, Warr, & Wimshurst, Liverpool; Rowcliffes, Rawle, & Co., for Hill, Dickinson, Dickinson, & Hill, Liverpool.

High Court of Justice.

Chan. Div. Stirling, J. } July 27; Aug. 1, 1895.

In re Lamson Store Service Co. (Limited). In re National Reversionary Co. (Limited). (a.)

Company—Reduction of capital—List of creditors not to be dispensed with—Companies Act, 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 131), s. 13.

Where a company seeks the sanction of the court to a proposed reduction of capital, involving either the diminution of any liability in respect of unpaid capital or the payment to any shareholder of paid-up capital, the court has no jurisdiction to dispense with the settlement of a list of creditors of the company or with the ascertainment of the names of such creditors in manner provided by the 13th section of the Companies Act, 1867.

These were two petitions for reduction of capital.

By the first petition it was sought to pay off capital which was in excess of the wants of the company, partly by writing off unissued capital and partly by the return of capital which had been paid up.

By the second petition it was sought to obtain the sanction of the court to the reduction of the capital by writing off a loss which had happened by reason of a large portion of the funds of the company having been vested in the purchase of its own shares.

What had happened in each of these cases in chambers was this. The creditors of both companies were few in number, and in the first case an affidavit was made that the debts up to the date of the affidavit had been paid or satisfied. In the second case no such affidavit was made. The chief clerk in each case made an order dispensing with the necessity for the settlement of a list of creditors of the company.

By section 13 of the Companies Act, 1867, "Where a company proposes to reduce its capital, every creditor of the company who, at the date fixed by the court, is entitled to any debt or claim which, if that date were the commencement of the winding up of the company, would be admissible in proof against the company, shall be entitled to object to the proposed reduction and to be entered in the list of creditors who are entitled so to object. The court shall settle a list of such creditors, and for that purpose shall ascertain as far as possible, without requiring an application from any creditor, the names of such creditors and the nature and amount of their debts or claims, and may publish notices fixing a certain day or days within which creditors of the company who are not entered on the list are to claim to be entered, or to be excluded from the right of objecting to the proposed reduction."

Buckley, Q.C., and Whinney, appeared for the first-named company.

Graham Hastings, Q.C., and Gregson, appeared for the second-named company.

In each case it was argued for the petitioners that there being in fact no creditors of the company the provisions of section 13 of the Companies Act, 1867, did not apply, and that, therefore, the chief clerk's orders were correct.

(a.) Reported by Wm. Scott Thompson, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

STIRLING, J.—[His lordship stated the facts as above set forth, and proceeded:—] The question to my mind is this, Whether that was a proper order under the circumstances. The petitions do not fall within the proviso in clause 4 of the Act of 1877, which is to the effect that where the reduction of the capital of a company does not involve either the diminution of any liability in respect of unpaid capital or the payment to any shareholder of any paid up capital, the creditors shall not be entitled to object or required to consent to the proposed reduction. Therefore the proceedings must be conducted with due regard to the Act of 1867, s. 13 (reads it). Now the first words are imperative, the court "shall" settle a list of creditors. The order which has been made in chambers directs that the proceedings for settling the list of creditors shall be dispensed with. In my opinion that order is wrong in form and ought not to have been made. The second portion of section 13 is also imperative, but to a certain extent this requirement has been complied with, for evidence has been brought before the court by which to a certain extent the creditors have been ascertained. The third part of section 13 is not imperative, but directory. Rules were made in 1868 which guide the proceedings in chambers. I need not go through them. These also I take not to be imperative, but directory, and the court has a certain discretion as to whether it will require the proceedings there pointed out to be taken or not. The question in this case is whether the order of the chief clerk being, as I think it is, wrong in form, it is not also wrong in substance in that the discretionary power vested in the court has been wrongly exercised. I am of that opinion. I do think that this is a case in which the imperative directions of the Act ought to be followed. I think the matter must go back to chambers with a direction that proper advertisements must be issued. I will give a direction that the matter be proceeded with in the vacation.

Solicitors in the first petition, Harwood & Stephenson.

Solicitors in the second petition, Iliffe, Henley, & Sweet.

Chan. Div. }
Kekewich, J. } July 31, 1895.

LLOYD v. NOWELL. (a.)

Vendor and purchaser—Memorandum in writing—Condition of the essence of the contract—Right of vendor to waive condition—Specific performance.

By a memorandum, signed by the plaintiff and the defendant, it was provided that the former should sell to the latter a leasehold house "subject to the preparation by my (the plaintiff's) solicitor of a formal contract." The plaintiff having brought an action for specific performance upon the memorandum,

Held, that this stipulation was a condition precedent to a concluded agreement between the parties; that it could not be waived by the plaintiff, as being for his exclusive advantage; and, therefore, that the action must fail.

The plaintiff, Edwin Lloyd, having agreed to sell to the defendant, Joseph Dove Nowell, and the defendant having agreed to purchase the house No. 365, Camden-road, the agreement was reduced to writing, and was as follows:—

"365, Camden-road,
"Nov. 1, 1894.

"Subject to the preparation by my solicitor and completion of a formal contract, I am willing to sell to you lease of 365, Camden-road, for a term of twenty-eight years at a rent of £110 per annum, you paying me £500 premium for same, and also paying the cost of new lease; £100 paid (and receipt hereby acknowledged) as conditional deposit. The balance to be paid 1st day of January, 1895, and possession given on completion. Plants and conservatory flowers to be included in price named.

"(Signed) E. LLOYD.

"Accepted.
"(Signed) JOSEPH D. NOWELL.
"Witness, GEORGE SQUIRE BONTALL.

The agreement was retained by the plaintiff, and on the 1st of November the defendant paid the said deposit, and the plaintiff handed him a duplicate of the agreement signed by the plaintiff.

The defendant having subsequently refused to complete, the plaintiff, waiving his right to have a formal contract prepared, brought the present action claiming specific performance of the agreement.

The defendant pleaded in his defence that the agreement was not a sufficient memorandum within the Statute of Frauds, and counter-claimed for a return of the deposit, alleging that he had been intoxicated when he gave it.

Warrington, Q.C., and George Henderson, for the plaintiff.—The mere fact that the agreement stipulates for a formal contract does not imply that it is not a concluded agreement: Rossiter v. Miller, 26 W. R. 865, 3 App. Cas. 1124. The stipulation is in favour of the plaintiff only, and he may therefore waive it: Hawksley v. Outram, [1892] 3 Ch. 359, 41 W. R. Dig. 169.

Renshaw, Q.C., and A. Beddall, for the defendant.—The stipulation prevents the agreement from being conclusive. It is not a stipulation in favour of the plaintiff only.

KEKEWICH, J.—It has been stated by Lord Blackburn in Rossiter v. Miller, that it is a question of construction, whether the parties finally agreed to be bound by terms which they have reduced to writing, though they were subsequently to have a formal agreement drawn up. It seems to me that on the true construction of the agreement before me, it is not a concluded agreement, subject merely to something afterwards being done. The stipulation as to the preparation of a formal contract is of its essence, preventing it from being final.

The question then arises, Whether that stipulation is for the benefit of the plaintiff only, so as to entitle him to waive it. The case of Hawksley v. Outram has been referred to as showing that it can be waived. That case, however, is distinguishable. There a partner in a business gave a power of attorney authorising the sale of his share of the business. The agreement for sale contained a clause restraining the vendors from trading within a certain distance of the place where the business was carried on. An action for specific performance having been brought by the purchaser, Romer, J., dismissed the action, holding that that clause was ultra vires the power of attorney. The Court of Appeal, however, decided that even if it was ultra vires, it was for the benefit of the purchaser only, and that he might, therefore, waive it. There could be in that case no doubt for whose benefit the clause was inserted. It was manifestly inserted wholly for the benefit of the purchaser, and not at all for that of the vendor. The purchaser was, therefore, clearly entitled to waive it. But how can I hold that the condition in the present case is only for the benefit of the plaintiff? It was no doubt inserted by his solicitor for his benefit; but it may be for the benefit of the defendant as well. Lord Blackburn, in the case mentioned above, says, "parties do often enter into a negotiation, meaning that when they have (or think they have) come to one mind, the result shall be put into formal shape, and then (if on seeing the result in that shape they find they are agreed) signed, and made binding; but that each party is to reserve to himself the right to retire from the contract, if, on looking at the formal contract, he finds that, though it may represent what he said, it does not represent what he meant to say." It is quite within the limits of imagination that the vendor and purchaser here both meant subsequently to have a formal contract drawn up which should contain not what they had said, but what they meant to say. The words "subject to the preparation by my solicitor and completion of a formal contract, I am willing to sell," seem fairly open to that construction.

(a.) Reported by C. C. HENSLEY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

I am thus of opinion that the stipulation goes to the root of the contract, and is not one which the plaintiff can waive. There will consequently be judgment for the defendant, with costs.

Solicitor for the plaintiff, Wm. Negus.

Solicitors for the defendant, Taylor & Taylor.

Chan. Div. } July 10, 11, 12, 1895.
Kekewich, J. }

In re GOODENOUGH.
MARLAND v. WILLIAMS. (a)

Interest, rate of—Tenant for life—Remainderman—Capital income—Apportionment.

The court, in applying the rule laid down in Re Earl of Chesterfield's Trusts (32 W. R. 361, 24 Ch. D. 643) and analogous cases, ought now to take interest at 3 per cent. instead of 4 per cent. as the basis of calculation.

Under a settlement executed in 1830 the testator, W. Goodenough, was entitled absolutely to a sum of consols, subject to the prior life interests of Dr. and Mrs. Hawkins.

By his will, the testator gave his residuary estate to trustees upon trust for his daughter Mrs. Hawkins for life, with remainder as she should by will or codicil appoint. The will contained a power to retain and vary investments.

The testator died in 1854.

Mrs. Hawkins, who died in 1878, by her will, appointed the fund over which she had power to appoint by the will of W. Goodenough to her husband, Dr. Hawkins, absolutely, and appointed him sole executor.

Dr. Hawkins died in 1894, and the defendant Williams was his sole executor.

The question now raised by the trustees of the will of W. Goodenough was whether the defendant Williams, as legal personal representative of Mrs. Hawkins, was entitled to any and what part of the capital of the consols, the reversion of which, on the death of Dr. Hawkins, formed part of the estate of the testator, and had not been sold as directed by his will.

Crawley, for the trustees of the will.

Badcock, for the defendant Williams.

Marten, Q.C., and Lemon; Renshaw, Q.C., and Methold; Bramwell Davis, Q.C., and Potts, for legatees.

KEKEWICH, J. [after holding that the case was governed by In re Earl of Chesterfield's Trustees, 32 W. R. 361, 24 Ch. D. 643, and that the reversionary interest of the testator in the fund ought to have been converted, and that the legal personal representative of Mrs. Hawkins was entitled to an apportioned part of the capital of the fund on that basis], said:—The rule in Lord Chesterfield's case for ascertaining the amount apportionable between capital and income, is to ascertain what sum—put out at 4 per cent. per annum on the day of the death of the testator and accumulating at compound interest calculated at that rate with yearly rests and deducting income tax—would have produced the amount actually received. This hypothetical sum is to be treated as capital, and the balance income. In most cases this inures greatly to the benefit of the tenant for life. It is obvious that any alteration in the rate of interest will make an enormous difference. Four per cent. has always hitherto been the rate. What rate of interest ought now to be considered as the court rate to be allowed in analogous cases to the present one or charged against trustees in respect of moneys for which they are liable. I think it is a question which ought to receive the consideration of all the judges of the Chancery Division and be finally settled, but I am not aware of any proceeding by which it can be done. The result of adopting 3 per cent. instead of 4 per cent. will be very greatly in favour of capital as against income. Four per cent. has been for generations regarded as the rate to be allowed by the Court of Chancery unless 5 per cent. was chargeable for special reasons. Five per cent. was generally allowed by juries as the current rate of interest applicable to mercantile contracts or as fit to be allowed on the footing of damages. But it is common knowledge that nowadays trustees cannot get 4 per cent. and have to take even less than 2¾, and that ordinary people willing and able to go outside trust securities and yet determined not to speculate find it impossible to get more than 3 per cent. and are very glad to get as much. It seems to me to be bordering on, if not an, actual absurdity to fix 4 per cent. as the court rate where an ordinary prudent investor cannot obtain that return. In In re Dracup, Field v. Dracup, 42 W. R. 264, [1894] 1 Ch. 59, the court charged 3 per cent. interest. In my opinion the time has arrived when 4 per cent., except as a penal rate, ought not to be allowed; and I think the amount should be ascertained in this case on the footing that 3 per cent. is the proper rate of interest.

Solicitors, Frere, Foster, & Co.; Hepburn, Son, & Cutcliffe; Taylor, Son, & Humbert.

Q. B. Div. } June 25; July 4;
(Wright and Kennedy, JJ.) } Aug. 7, 1895.

SMALLWOOD (Respondent) v. SHEPPARDS (Appellant). (a.)

Frauds, Statute of—Interest in land—Landlord and tenant—Parol agreement for non-continuous letting and hiring of land—Entry on land for purposes of occupation after agreement — Exclusive possession during occupation—Statute of Frauds (29 Car. 2, c. 3), s. 4.

(a.) Reported by F. T. DUKA, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

(a.) Reported by ERSKINE REID, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Defendant verbally agreed with plaintiff to hire a field for three consecutive bank holidays, and to pay for the use of it the total sum of £45, which sum was to be paid by three equal payments on the days in question. Defendant occupied the field on the first of the three bank holidays only, and paid the instalment on account, but refused subsequently to pay the balance of the £45, and by way of defence to an action by the plaintiff, pleaded that under section 4 of the Statute of Frauds the agreement was void.

Held, that section 4 of the Statute of Frauds was no defence, because upon the evidence it appeared that the parol agreement was for a single letting (although the period for the agreed letting was not continuous) at a single rent; and there had been an entry by the defendant on the land after the agreement for the purposes of occupation, and a payment of rent on account of entry.

Appeal from the decision of his Honour Judge Chalmers sitting at the Birmingham County Court.

The appellant, the defendant in the action, entered into a parol agreement with the respondent to hire from him a piece of waste land for three successive bank holidays for the purpose of putting up a steam "roundabout," and for the use of the land on these three days he agreed to pay £45. The appellant was also to clear away an old shed that stood on the field and was to be allowed £5 for doing so, which deduction from the £45 was to be spread over the three payments in which the rent was to be paid. It was further agreed that if the land was let during this time for building purposes the appellant's right to have the land should cease.

The appellant pulled down the shed and used the field for the first bank holiday only, and paid a sum on account, which, together with his deposit, and the (pro rata) allowance made him for pulling down the shed came to £15. He did not, however, use the field for the second or third bank holiday, although the land was still unlet, and, therefore, at his disposal had he wished to occupy it.

On being sued for the balance in the county court, the defendant contended that the agreement, being in respect of a future right to use the land, was void by section 4 of the Statute of Frauds, which requires such contracts to be in writing; also that he understood the arrangement to be that he should pay £15 for each "take," so that the agreement that he should have the land on the three bank holidays, if still unlet for building purposes, amounted in fact to three separate contracts, and consequently that he was not liable to pay for the two days on which he did not occupy.

The learned county court judge decided in favour of the plaintiff, on the ground that there had been an entry under the agreement on the land, and a user of the land by the defendant, coupled with a payment on account, which could only be referable to one entire contract, and that whether the arrangement ought to be regarded as a lease or as an agreement to let land under section 4 of the Statute of Frauds, the provisions of the statute had in fact been complied with. He did not, however, decide the question whether or no the defendant was to have exclusive possession of the field during the period that he was to occupy the land.

From this decision the defendant appealed.

J. F. P. Rawlinson, for the appellant, submitted that the licence to use the land on the three bank holidays was founded on three separate agreements. With regard to the second and third bank holidays there had been no part performance to take the case out of the mischief of the statute. The learned county court judge was wrong, therefore, in holding that section 4 of the Statute of Frauds was not a good defence to the claim.

He cited Maddison v. Alderson, 31 W. R. 820, 8 App. Cas. 467, and Lavery v. Pursell, 39 W. R. 163, 39 Ch. D. 508, 36 W. R. Dig. 86.

C. C. Scott, for the respondent.—The learned county court judge has found that the right to use the land on the three bank holidays constituted a single letting at a lump sum for the three dates. There was an entry on the land by the defendant for the purpose of occupation after that agreement was made and a payment in respect of that entry. There was, therefore, a demise of the land for those three specified dates, and section 4 of the Statute of Frauds does not apply. The fact that the rent was to be paid by instalments does not alter the plaintiff's contention that he was to receive £45 for the let. There is no authority to show that because the dates on which the defendant was to occupy were not consecutive, therefore the letting cannot be treated as one contract. The dates on which the land was to be at the disposal of the defendant were clearly agreed upon.

He cited Wright v. Stavert, 8 W. R. 413, 2 Ellis & Ellis 721, and Ryley v. Hicks, 1 Strange 651. The case of Taylor v. Caldwell, 11 W. R. 726, 32 L. J. Q. B. 164, does not apply here.

Rawlinson replied.

Cur. adv. vult.

August 7, 1896.—The judgment of the COURT (WRIGHT and KENNEDY, JJ.) was delivered by WRIGHT, J.—The learned county court judge not having found whether it was intended that the defendant should have the exclusive possession of the land on the dates that he was to occupy it, it was agreed during the hearing that we should draw any inference of fact from the evidence as stated in the judge's notes, which the judge might have drawn. We draw the inference that the parties intended that the defendant should have exclusive possession of the land for the bank holidays. The judge has found that the contract was a single entire contract for £45, by which we understand him to mean that he finds that it was not an agreement for three lettings at a separate rent or price for each of the three bank holidays, but an agreement for the possession and use of the ground on three occasions at a lump rent or price of £45 for the three, in other words, for one letting.

The defendant entered on the land for the purpose of occupation under the agreement on one of the three days. After entry he made (as the county court judge finds) a payment of money on account which can be referable only to one entire agreement. He might have occupied, had he chosen to do so, on the two later days which the letting covered. In order to maintain an action for "use and occupation" after the close of the period for which it is sought to make the party sued liable, actual occupation is not necessary. The defendant is liable if once there has been an entry by him, provided he might have gone on occupying had he chosen to do so. He has "held" although he has not "enjoyed" (11 Geo. 2, c. 19, s. 14). It appears to us that upon the facts, the defence of the Statute of Frauds fails. There having been an entry for the purpose of occupation under the agreement for a single letting (although the period for the agreed letting was not continuous) at a single or lump rent or price and a payment of rent on account of the entry, the plaintiff's right to recover the balance after the termination of the letting period is, in our judgment, not affected by the fact that the agreement was a parol agreement. For these reasons the appeal fails and must be dismissed, with costs.

Solicitors for the appellant, Morse & Simpson for W. H. Whitelocke, Birmingham.

Solicitors for the respondent, Debenham & Walker for J. P. Lambert, Birmingham.

Q. B. Div.
(Grantham and Wright, JJ.) July 31, 1895.

WOOLWICH LOCAL BOARD v. GARDNER. (a.)

Pedlar — Certificate—Market — Pedlar using horse—Hawker—Markets and Fairs Clauses Act, 1847 (10 & 11 Vict. c. 14), s. 13—Pedlars Acts, 1871 (34 & 35 Vict. c. 96), ss. 3, 6; 1881 (44 & 45 Vict. c. 45), s. 2.

By section 13 of the Markets and Fairs Clauses Act, 1847, "every person other than a licensed hawker" selling tollable articles within the limits of a market is liable to a penalty. By section 6 of the Pedlars Act, 1871, a pedlar's certificate shall, for the purpose of the Markets and Fairs Clauses Act, 1847, have the same effect as a hawker's license, and the term "licensed hawker" in the last-mentioned Act shall be construed to include a pedlar holding such a certificate.

Held, that a pedlar was exempted from the penalty imposed by section 13 of the Markets and Fairs Clauses Act only so long as he was trading as a pedlar as defined by section 3 of the Pedlars Act, 1871.

Howard v. Lupton, L. R. 10 Q. B. 598, 23 W. R. Dig. 132, not followed.

Special case stated by a metropolitan magistrate.

Complaint was made before the magistrate by the appellants under section 13 of the Markets and Fairs Clauses Act, 1847, that the respondents had sold or exposed for sale in a cart drawn by a horse within the limits of a market owned by the appellants, articles —namely, potatoes, in respect of which tolls were authorized to be taken in the market.

The facts alleged in the complaint were proved. Neither of the respondents held a hawker's licence, but each of them held a pedlar's certificate obtained under the Pedlars Act, 1871, which certificate by section 2 of the Pedlars Act, 1881, authorized the person to whom it was granted to act as a pedlar within any part of the United Kingdom.

By section 6 of the Pedlars Act, 1871, a pedlar's certificate under that Act is for the purposes of the Markets and Fairs Clauses Act, 1847, to have the same effect within the district for which it is granted as a hawker's licence, and the term licenced hawker in the last-mentioned Act is to be construed to include a pedlar holding such certificate.

On behalf of the respondents it was contended on the authority Howard v. Lupton, L. R. 10 Q. B. 598, 23 W. R. Dig. 132, that they were by virtue of section 6 of the Pedlars Act, 1871, licensed hawkers for the purpose of section 13 of the Markets and Fairs Clauses Acts, 1847, and, therefore, exempt from the penalties prescribed by the later section.

On behalf of the appellants it was contended that the effect of section 6 of the Pedlars Act, 1871, was merely that the term "licensed hawker" in section 13 of the Markets and Fairs Clauses Act, 1847, was to be construed to include the persons within the meaning of the term "pedlars" as defined by section 3 of the Pedlars Act, 1871; and that neither of the respondents came within that definition.

The magistrate was of opinion that he was bound by Howard v. Lupton, and dismissed the summons.

Section 3 of the Pedlars Act, 1871, defines "pedlars" to mean "any hawker, pedlar . . . or other person who without any horse or other beast drawing or bearing burden, travels and trades on foot and goes from town to town into other men's houses, carrying to sell, or exposing for sale, any goods, wares, or merchandise. . . ."

The Markets and Fairs Clauses Act, 1847, s. 13, enacts that "Every person other than a licensed hawker" selling tollable articles within the limits of the special Act authorizing a market is liable to a penalty.

R. C. Glen (Channell, Q.C., with him), for the appellants.—The contention of the respondents is that, for the purposes of the Markets and Fairs Clauses Act, section 6 of the Pedlars Act, 1871, puts a pedlar upon the same footing as a hawker. If this be so, the result will be, that so far as regards as the Markets Act, a hawker's licence will be unnecessary, for a pedlar's certificate will protect both classes. The correct interpretation of section 6 is, that a pedlar is exempted, only so long as he is trading as a pedlar—i.e., without a cart and horse. The magistrate held that he was bound by Howard v. Lupton. The court were not unanimous in that case, for Lush, J., dissented, and Mellor, J., only assented doubtfully. Moreover, the law has been altered since that decision. A pedlar's certificate was formerly issued for a particular district only, now by section 2 of the Pedlars Act, 1881, it enables the holder to trade as a pedlar throughout the whole country.

Travers Humphreys, for the respondent.—Howard v. Lupton is right, and ought to be followed. [WRIGHT, J.—This is a criminal case with no appeal, and, therefore, we are not bound to follow Howard v. Lupton.] Section 6 of the Pedlars Act, 1871, means that for the purposes of the Markets Act a pedlar shall be entitled to trade as a hawker.

GRANTHAM, J.—I am of opinion that we ought not to follow Howard v. Lupton, which is not a decision binding upon us in this case. Section 3 of the Pedlars Act, 1871, defines what is meant by a pedlar, and then by section 6 a pedlar's certificate is for the purpose of the Markets and Fairs Clauses Act, 1847, to have the same effect as a hawker's licence. That means that a pedlar, having a certificate, is exempted from penalties, only so long as he is acting as a pedlar. In this case the respondents were not acting as pedlars, for they had a horse and cart. The magistrate ought to have convicted, and the case must go back to him with an intimation of our opinion.

WRIGHT, J.—I agree. I do not desire to criticize the decision of the court in Howard v. Lupton more than this. We have come to the same conclusion as Lush, J., did in that case, and I think that it is clear from the judgment of Mellor, J., that he would have decided in the same way if the Act of 1881 had then been in force.

Appeal allowed; case remitted to magistrate to convict.

Solicitor for the appellants, Edwin Hughes.

Solicitors for the respondents, C. O. Pook.

(a.) Reported by F. O. ROBINSON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Q. B. Div.
(Wills and Wright, JJ.) June 24, 1895.

GREATOREX v. SHACKLE. (a.)

County court—Interpleader—Auctioneer's commission—Independent claims by different parties in respect of sale of same property—County Court Rules, 1889, ord. 27, r. 13.

The plaintiffs, a firm of auctioneers, sued the defendant in a county court for commission in respect of the sale of a house. Another firm of auctioneers claimed from the defendant a different sum for commission in respect of the same sale of the same house.

Held, that the two claims were not opposing or competing, and could not be made the subject of an interpleader order.

Appeals from an order of his honour Judge Stonor, the judge of the Marylebone County Court, directing a new trial of this action.

The action was brought in the county court by Messrs. Greatorex & Co., a firm of auctioneers and estate agents, to recover a sum of £35 12s. for commission upon the sale of the defendant's house.

In November, 1893, the defendant placed the house on the plaintiffs' books for sale, and in the following February the plaintiffs introduced a Mrs. Ricketts as a probable purchaser, but after some negotiations the offer made by Mrs. Ricketts was withdrawn.

In March, 1894, the defendant wrote to the plaintiffs withdrawing the house from their books, and at the same time instructed Messrs. Walton & Lee, another firm of auctioneers, to sell the house.

In June, 1894, Messrs. Walton & Lee received an offer from a firm of solicitors to purchase the house on behalf of a client, and in the following November a contract was entered into, the purchaser being Mrs. Ricketts, the person whom the plaintiffs had originally introduced.

The defendant agreed with Messrs. Walton & Lee that their charges should be £25.

After the plaintiffs' action had been commenced the defendant paid £25 into court and obtained, ex parte from the registrar, an order for a summons to issue to Messrs. Walton & Lee in the following terms:—"Whereas the defendant has had notice that you claim the subject-matter in this action, and whereas she has paid into court in satisfaction and on deposit the sum of £25, being part of the amount claimed and admitted to be due by the defendant to abide the order of the court in the above action. This is to give you notice that you must appear at a court to be holden on the 7th day of May, 1895, at the hours of ten in the forenoon when the court will adjudicate."

This summons was issued under ord. 27, r. 13, of the County Court Rules, 1889, which provides that, where the defendant in an action for debt &c., "has had notice of any other opposing or conflicting claims to such debt, &c., he may within five days of the service of the summons, apply to the registrar for a summons against . . . the person making such conflicting claim, and the registrar shall thereupon issue an interpleader summons according to the form in the appendix, returnable as soon as conveniently may be, and upon the return day of such summons the judge shall hear the case of the defendant and of the plaintiff in the action, and also of the . . . person making such opposing or conflicting claim, and shall give such judgment therein as shall finally determine the rights and claims of all parties as if the same had been an ordinary action into which a third party had been introduced by counter-claim."

(a.) Reported by T. R. COLQUHOUN DILL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

At the hearing Messrs. Walton & Lee appeared and objected that the interpleader summons was wrongly issued and that they ought not to be made parties to the action. The county court judge thereupon discharged them from the action with costs to be paid by the defendant. He then proceeded to try the action between the plaintiffs and the defendant, and gave judgment for the plaintiffs for the amount claimed. The defendant afterwards applied for a new trial on the grounds "that the claim of the claimants (Messrs. Walton & Lee) herein ought to have been adjudicated upon as a party to the issue, and that material facts were not brought before the court, and that in any event the claimants were not entitled to any costs as against the defendant, and that the plaintiffs were not entitled to more than £25, and that evidence was excluded which would have enabled the court to come to a different decision, and that if the judgment stood there would be error or mis-carriage of justice."

The county court judge was of opinion that the case fell within the 89th section of the Judicature Act, 1883, and order 57 of the Rules of the Supreme Court and ord. 37 r. 13 of the county court rules, and he ordered a new trial and hearing of the action and interpleader summons, reserving all questions of law and costs.

From this order the plaintiffs and Messrs. Walton & Lee now appealed.

Cagney, for the plaintiffs.—There was no jurisdiction to make an order for interpleader in this case. The claims by the plaintiffs and by Messrs. Walton & Lee are separate and independent. [He was stopped by the court.]

Ernest Pollock, for Messrs. Walton & Lee was not heard.

Moyses, for the defendant.—The interpleader order was right. The claims of the plaintiffs and of Messrs. Walton & Lee are in respect of the same sale and the same house and the defendant is not liable to pay more than one commission in respect thereof. The question is which firm effected the sale, and that question ought to be determined by interpleader: Barnett v. Brown, 6 Times L. R. 463. The order giving costs to Messrs. Walton & Lee was clearly wrong. The county court judge had power to order a new trial under section 93 of the County Court Act, 1888.

He also referred to Murtagh v. Barry, 38 W. R. 526, 24 Q. B. D. 632.

WILLS, J.—This case appears to me to be unarguable. It is evident that a series of mistakes have been made in the county court, and the order of the county court judge directing a new trial must be set aside. The facts are shortly these:—The plaintiffs, a firm of auctioneers, brought an action against the defendant for commission in respect of the sale of a house. Messrs. Walton & Lee, another firm of auctioneers, were also claiming commission from the defendant in respect of the sale of the same house. An interpleader order was obtained ex parte by the defendant, and notice was given to Messrs. Walton & Lee to appear at the hearing and support their claim. At the hearing Messrs. Walton & Lee objected that the interpleader order was made without jurisdiction, because their claim was entirely distinct from that of the plaintiffs. The county court judge dismissed them from the action, and gave them their costs. That order was right for they had been wrongly brought before the court. It is said that they ought to have taken the less expensive course of moving to set aside the interpleader order, and that they ought not to have been given their costs of appearing at the trial: that is a point arising on taxation and is immaterial upon this appeal. Upon the trial judgment was given for the plaintiff against the defendant, the judge finding that the plaintiffs were entitled to the commission of £35 12s. which they claimed. The defendant asked for a new trial on several extraordinary grounds, and the application was granted on the ground that the case fell within section 89 of the Judicature Act, 1873, and order 57 of the Rules of the Supreme Court and ord. 27, r. 13, of the County Court Rules, 1889, and that, therefore, the interpleader order was right. But the claims were not in respect of the same subject matter; they were wholly distinct, and the judge had already found for the plaintiffs on their claim. Under these circumstances the judge had no jurisdiction to grant a new trial on the grounds upon which he granted it, and his order must be set aside.

WRIGHT, J.—I am of the same opinion. It may be that the defendant has a real grievance as to the amount of the costs payable to Messrs. Walton & Lee, but that question does not arise here. As to the main question it is clear that the enactments on which the county court judge relied have no application. He seems to have thought that wherever two auctioneers claim commission for the sale of the same house the subject matter of the claims must be the same. That is not so. These are not opposing or competing claims adverse to each other; they are not claims to the same money but entirely separate and independent claims. I think that on the facts which were before the county court judge he had no jurisdiction to grant a new trial.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitor for the plaintiff, Albert Myers.

Solicitors for Messrs. Walton & Lee, Bell, Brodrick, & Gray.

Solicitor for defendant, Arthur Cayley.

C. C. R.
(Lord Russell of Killowen, C.J., Pollock, B., and Grantham, Lawrance, and Wright, JJ.)
July 27, 1895.

REGINA v. FARNBOROUGH. (a.)

Criminal law—Larceny—Verdict—Absence of finding as to felonious intent—Conviction.

At the trial of a prisoner on an indictment for larceny no evidence (except as to character) was called for the defence. In reply to a question from the presiding judge, the jury said they were not agreed on their verdict. He then asked them if they believed the evidence for the prosecution, and they replied that they did. The judge directed that this statement by the jury amounted to a verdict of guilty, and it was so recorded.

Held, that the effect of the judge's ruling was to supply a finding that the prisoner had a felonious intent; that he had exceeded his functions in so doing; and that the conviction was bad.

Case stated by the chairman of the Middlesex Quarter Sessions as follows:

At the Midsummer quarter sessions of the peace for the county of Middlesex on the 6th day of July, 1895, the prisoner was charged with stealing milk.

The facts of the charge are immaterial to this case.

It appeared to me that if the jury believed the evidence for the prosecution the prisoner was in law guilty as charged, and I so directed them. No evidence except as to character was called for the defence and the counsel for the defence did not seriously dispute my ruling.

The jury retired to consider their verdict and after they had been absent some time I sent for them and asked if they were agreed, and they replied that they were not. I then asked them did they believe the evidence of the prosecution and the foreman replied that they did.

Counsel for the prisoner objected that no question could be asked except the ordinary ones, "Are you agreed on your verdict," and "Do you find the prisoner guilty or not guilty." I overruled the objection and directed the jury that their verdict amounted to one of guilty and it was so recorded, but I released the prisoner on his own recognizance pending the decision of this case.

It is laid down in 4 Bl. Comm. (ed. 1813), p. 328, "such public or open verdict may be either general guilty or not guilty, or special, setting forth all the circumstances of the case and praying the judgment of the court whether for instance on the facts stated it be murder, manslaughter, or no crime at all. This is when they doubt the matter of law and therefore choose to leave it to the determination of the court, though they have an unquestionable right of determining upon all the circumstances and finding a general verdict if they think proper so to hazard a breach of their oaths." He then goes on to show how (by laws either since repealed or fallen into desuetude) such jurors could be punished.

The question is, Had I the power to put the question and direct such verdict to be recorded, the facts in the judgment of the court clearly constituting in law the offence charged if proved to the satisfaction of the jury?

Arthur Hutton, for the prisoner, read the case. The court called upon

J. P. Grain and Rowsell, for the prosecution, who after some argument admitted that the ruling of the chairman could not be supported.

LORD RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN, C.J., after stating the facts said:—If it were not that this case raises a very important question I would have been content simply to say that the conviction could not stand. The verdict of guilty was entered upon the statement made by the foreman of the jury in answer to a question by the chairman that the jury believed the evidence for the prosecution. What did that statement amount to? The foreman had already said that the jury were not agreed, and their believing the witnesses for the prosecution was perfectly consistent with the belief that the facts were not such as to show that the prisoner took the milk animo furandi which is an essential ingredient in the offence. They might have thought that he was allowed to take it or that he intended to pay for it. The evidence is not before us, but it is abundantly clear that the jury declined to draw the inference that the prisoner took the milk with the felonious intent. The chairman in directing a verdict of guilty really supplied this essential part of the offence. In so doing he went outside his proper functions, and decided a question of fact which was for the jury only, and the result is that the conviction must be set aside.

POLLOCK, B.—I agree, and I wish to add that this decision must not be taken as interfering with the practice in criminal trials of a jury finding what is called a special verdict. Where a jury find all the facts necessary to constitute an offence, the judge may direct judgment to be entered in accordance with the finding. But that was not the case here.

(a.) Reported by T. R. COLQUHOUN DILL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

GRANTHAM, LAWRANCE, and WRIGHT, JJ., concurred.

Conviction quashed.

Solicitor for the prisoner, Herbert Firth.

Solicitor for the prosecution, C. H. Mason.

Court of Appeal.

From Q. B. Div. (Lord Esher, M.R., and Kay, and Rigby, L.JJ.) Oct. 29.

MOWBRAY AND ANOTHER v. MERRYWEATHER. (a.)

Master and servant—Warranty—Damages—Remoteness.

The plaintiffs, who were stevedores, undertook to unload the defendant's ship. The defendant supplied the necessary chains and other plant. One of the chains was unsound and broke, thereby injuring a workman in the plaintiffs' employ. The workman sued the plaintiffs under the Employers' Liability Act, 1880, and the plaintiffs settled the action for an admittedly reasonable sum. In an action by the plaintiffs to recover that sum from the defendant, it was admitted that the defendant had warranted the chain to be fit for the purpose for which it was to be used, and that there had been a breach of that warranty. It was also admitted that the plaintiffs might, by the exercise of reasonable care, have discovered the defect in the chain.

Held (affirming the judgment of Charles, J., 43 W. R. 528), that the plaintiffs were entitled to recover, as damages for the defendant's breach of warranty, the sum paid by them in settlement of their workman's claim.

Appeal of the defendant from the judgment of Charles, J., in favour of the plaintiffs at the trial of the action without a jury (see the report, 43 W. R. 528).

The plaintiffs were stevedores at West Hartlepool, and the defendant was owner of the steamship Wenby.

The plaintiffs, on the 10th of August, 1894, undertook to discharge a cargo of deals from the ship, and, in accordance with the custom of the port, the defendant promised to provide all necessary and proper derricks, cranes, chains, winches, and other gearing reasonably fit for the purposes of discharging the cargo. He failed to do so, and supplied a chain so defective that, whilst it was being used in discharge of the cargo it broke, and thereby a workman of the plaintiffs was seriously injured. The injured workman thereupon brought an action against the plaintiffs under the Employers' Liability Act, 1880, ss. 1, 2, basing his claim upon the defective condition of the chain, a defective condition which, he alleged, might have been discovered by the plaintiffs by the exercise of reasonable care. The plaintiffs did not contest the action, and paid the workman £125, which sum they sought to recover from the defendant in this action. It was not suggested by the defendant that the settlement was an improper one, and it was admitted upon the trial by the defendant, on the one hand, that there had been a breach by him of the implied warranty, that the derrick, cranes, and chains should be reasonably fit for the purpose for which they were supplied; and by the plaintiffs, on the other hand, that they might by the exercise of reasonable care have discovered the defect in the chain.

Charles, J., gave judgment for the plaintiffs for the amount claimed.

Tindal Atkinson, Q.C., and H. Gavan Taylor, for the defendant, in support of the appeal.—The damages claimed by the plaintiffs are too remote, for they are the result, not of the defendant's breach of warranty, but of the plaintiffs' own negligence. There is no direct authority on the point. The opinion of Martin, B., in Burrows v. March Gas and Coke Co., 18 W. R. 348, 20 Ibid. 493, L. R. 5 Ex. 67, 7 Ibid. 96, which the plaintiffs will rely on, was a mere obiter dictum and not necessary for the decision of the case before him. The dictum of Denman, J., in Kiddle & Son v. Lovett, 34 W. R. 518, 16 Q. B. D. 605, and the opinions of the judges of the Court of Sessions in Ovington v. M'Vicar, 2 Court of Sess. Cas., 3rd series, 1066, are in favour of the defendant's contention.

They also referred to Wrightup v. Chamberlain, 7 Scott 598.

Robson, Q.C., and Meynell, for the plaintiffs, were not called on.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—I have no doubt whatever as to what our decision ought to be in this case, although it is the first time that the point to be determined has arisen. It is an action upon a warranty. The plaintiffs say that the defendant warranted that the chain was efficient for the work which it was to do; that was, as the defendant knew, to be used by the plaintiffs' workmen in the plaintiffs' business of stevedores. The defendant admits that he gave such a warranty and that there has been a breach of the warranty. That is sufficient to support an action for, at least, nominal damages. But the plaintiffs say that they have suffered more than nominal damages, because the defendant warranted the chain for use in the plaintiffs' business, knowing that the chain would be used by the plaintiffs' workmen, and that the defendant must, therefore, have known that if an inefficient chain was supplied injury would result to the plaintiffs' workmen.

The plaintiffs also knew that, and the parties, therefore, if they had thought about it, would both have agreed that the almost certain result of a breach of the warranty would be an injury to a workman of the plaintiffs, and an action for damages by him against the plaintiffs. That is what did happen. It is true that the injured workman could not have recovered damages against the plaintiffs unless they had been guilty of negligence, as between the workman and themselves. But the plaintiffs, relying on the defendant's warranty, refrained from examining the chain, and it was that which caused them to be guilty of want of care towards their workmen. Everything which has happened is, therefore, a natural result of the defendant's breach of warranty. The question in this case is whether the damages claimed by the plaintiffs are too remote. The test to be applied is, are the damages the natural consequences of the breach of warranty, or a consequence that might reasonably have been within the contemplation of the parties? If so, the damages are not too remote. If the parties had considered the matter they would have known that the natural consequence of a workman's being injured through using an unsound chain would be an action against his employer. That was the view of Martin, B., in Burrows v. March Gas and Coke Co., which I prefer to the opinion of the Scotch judges in Ovington v. M'Vicar. In my opinion it is clear that in this case the particular damage for which the plaintiffs sue is not too remote, but is a natural consequence of the defendant's breach of warranty. The plaintiffs owed no duty to the defendant, and the defendant cannot rely on the negligence of the plaintiffs, and on the breach of a duty which they owed to a different person—viz., their workman.

(a.) Reported by F. O. ROBINSON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

KAY, L.J.—This is an action for breach of warranty. Neither the warranty nor the breach are denied. The defendant supplied a chain to the plaintiffs, who are stevedores, to be used by them in their business. The chain was unsound, one of the links having a crack, and in consequence of this defect it broke and injured a workman in the plaintiffs' employ. The plaintiffs seem to have relied on the defendant's warranty and not to have examined the chain before using it. The injured workman would, therefore, have a remedy against two persons, either (under the principle laid down in Heaven v. Pender, 11 Q. B. D. 503) against the present defendant, who supplied the chain, or against the plaintiffs, for their negligence in failing to discover the defect. The workman brought his action against his employers, the present plaintiffs, and they settled the action by paying £125. It is admitted by the defendant—and it is a very important admission—that the settlement of the action was a proper one, that if the workman had sued the defendant, he would have recovered the same amount. In the present action the plaintiffs seek to recover the sum paid by them to their workman. On behalf of the defendant it is contended that the plaintiffs would not have had to pay anything if they had not themselves been guilty of negligence in failing to discover the defect in the chain. Now, supposing that the accident had happened not to a workman but to one of the plaintiffs, it is clear that he could have recovered damages from the defendant.

It is no defence to say that the plaintiffs refrained from examining the chain to see if it were sound. There was no duty on the plaintiffs, as between them and the defendant, to do so, the defendant having warranted the chain to be fit for the purpose for which it was to be used. In my opinion the case comes within the well-known rule that damages are recoverable when they may fairly be said to be a natural result of the breach of warranty, and a result which it must be assumed was within the contemplation of the parties.

With regard to the cases to which we have been referred, they are all, with two exceptions, distinguishable. In Wrightup v. Chamberlain, the question was whether the plaintiff had improperly defended an action brought against him by the purchaser of a horse with a warranty, and whether the plaintiff could recover the costs of defending that action from the person who sold him the horse with a similar warranty. If in the present case the plaintiffs had defended the action by their workmen, and so incurred costs, those costs would not be damages naturally resulting from the defendant's breach of warranty, and, therefore, could not be recovered. Then, as to Kiddle & Son v. Levett, in that case the employer settled with his workman when he was not really liable at all, and, therefore, the amount so paid was clearly not the measure of damages as between him and the person who gave the warranty. That leaves two cases, Burrows v. March Gas & Coke Co., and Ovington v. M'Vicar; in the former case Martin, B., distinctly gives his opinion that damages, such as these, are, under the circumstances, recoverable. On the other hand, in Ovington v. M'Vicar, the Scotch judges intimate that the opposite view was in their opinion the correct one. I prefer to adopt the opinion of Martin, B.

I think the decision of Charles, J., was right, and that this appeal must be dismissed.

RIGBY, L.J., concurred.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the plaintiffs, Baker, Lees, & Postlethwaite, for Higson & Simpson, West Hartlepool.

Solicitors for the defendant, H. A. Crump & Son, for Turnbull & Tilly, West Hartlepool.

From Q. B. Div. (A. L. Smith and Rigby, L.JJ.) Oct. 25.

SADLER v. GREAT WESTERN RAILWAY CO. AND MIDLAND RAILWAY CO. (a.)

Practice—Parties—Joinder of defendants—Nuisance caused by concurrent acts of defendants—Ord. 16, r. 4.

The plaintiff, who occupied premises situate between receiving offices belonging to the defendant companies respectively, brought an action against both companies in the Queen's Bench Division wherein he alleged that each of them frequently caused or permitted access to his premises to be blocked by its vans and carts at a time when access was already blocked by vans and carts on the other side by the other defendant company, and that by their respective combined acts the defendants thus prevented all access to the plaintiff's premises. The plaintiff claimed damages and an injunction.

One of the defendant companies took out a summons that proceedings in the action might be stayed unless the plaintiff struck out the other company as defendants.

Held (Rigby, L.J., dissenting), that the defendant companies were, if at all, separate tortfeasors, and that, upon the authority of Smurthwaite v. Hannay, 43 W. R. 113 [1894] A. C. 494, the attempt of the plaintiff to sue them jointly ought not to be allowed.

Thorpe v. Brumfitt, L. R. 8 Ch. App. 650, distinguished.

Appeal from Day, J., in chambers.

The plaintiff, who traded as the Cycle and Sports Association, occupied a shop, No. 268, Strand, which he used for the sale of cyclists' requisites and for storing and repairing cycles.

Upon one side of the plaintiff's shop were premises occupied by the Great Western Railway Co. and used as a receiving office for parcels and goods, and on the other side were premises occupied by the Midland Railway Co. and used for the same purpose.

The plaintiff brought this action against both companies, and in his statement of claim alleged that each of the companies caused a number of vans to assemble for long periods of time on the public highway in front of his premises, and great quantities of parcels, crates, and boxes to be conveyed to and from the vans, and had thereby caused inconvenience and danger to the public, and special inconvenience to the plaintiff.

Paragraph 5 of the statement of claim was as follows: "Each of the defendant companies frequently causes or permits access to the plaintiff's premises to be blocked by its vans and carts in the manner aforesaid at the same time while access to such premises is already blocked by vans and carts on the other side of his premises by the other defendant company in manner aforesaid; and by their respective combined acts the defendants thus prevent all access to the plaintiff's premises by vehicle or cycle, and also cause special inconvenience to the plaintiff and his servants and customers on the footway."

(a.) Reported by ARNOLD GLOVER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The plaintiff claimed (1) £1,000 damages; (2) the like sum from each of the defendant companies; and (3) an injunction to restrain the defendant companies and each of them.

The Great Western Railway Co. took out a summons to stay proceedings in the action, unless the Midland Railway Co. were struck out as defendants.

Day, J., on the 6th of August, 1895, affirming the decision of the Master, granted the application.

The plaintiff, by leave, appealed.

Ord. 16, r. 3, is as follows: "All persons may be joined as defendants against whom the right to any relief is alleged to exist, whether jointly, severally, or in the alternative. And judgment may be given against such one or more of the defendants as may be found to be liable, according to their respective liabilities, without any amendment."

Dickens, Q.C., and Chester Jones, for the appellant.—We rely on Thorpe v. Brumfitt, L. R. 8 Ch. App. 650. [A. L. SMITH, L.J.—That case does not cover a claim for damages.] If defendants can be joined for injunction they can be joined for damages: Thorpe v. Brumfitt was approved by Chitty, J., in Lambton v. Mellish, 43 W. R. 5, [1894] 3 Ch. 163. If the Midland Railway Co. is struck out, the plaintiff will be debarred from giving evidence as to that company's acts. We do not allege that the defendant companies have combined in the sense of conspiring to commit a nuisance, but that by their concurrent acts a nuisance is caused.

They referred to Smurthwaite v. Hannay, 43 W. R. 113, [1894] A. C. 494, and Booth v. Briscoe, 25 W. R. 838, 2 Q. B. D. 496.

Hon. A. Lyttelton, for the respondent company.—There is no joint right of action, and, therefore, Smurthwaite v. Hannay applies and shows that the defendant companies cannot be joined. It is not the case that, if the Midland Co. is struck out, the plaintiff will be debarred from giving evidence as to the acts of that company. In Thorpe v. Brumfitt, James, L.J.. must have looked upon each of the defendants as a separate tortfeasor. The present action, being a claim for damages, must be amended or stayed.

Dickens, Q.C., replied.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—I am sorry to say that I cannot agree with my brother Rigby in this case. This is an appeal from the decision of Day, J., who affirmed the master, and I understand that the case came before him in this way. The plaintiff brings a common law action for damages, claiming £1,000 and £1,000—a common law action for damages—against two railway companies, the Great-Western Railway Co. and the Midland Railway Co. for committing a nuisance, and he also adds—which is an everyday occurrence now—a claim for an injunction at the end of his statement of claim. The substance of this case is, in my judgment, a common law action for damages to be tried by a jury and a judge. It is conceded that the Great-Western Railway Co. have not acted in combination with the Midland Railway Co. in doing what they have done, and also that the Midland Railway Co. have not acted in combination with the Great-Western Railway Co. in doing what the Midland Railway Co. have done. What is complained of is this. The plaintiff has a shop in the Strand, on one side of which is the Great-Western Railway Co., carrying on a receiving office for parcels and goods, and on the other side there is the Midland Railway Co., also carrying on the business of a receiving office. They are two separate and independent companies, carrying on separate and independent businesses. One has no control over the other, and both act independently in what they do; and it seems to me that each is only responsible for its own acts and is not responsible for the acts of the other company. I agree that in considering whether the Great Western Railway Co. have committed a nuisance or not—assuming the Midland Railway Co. (as is the fact) is now struck out—the doings of the Midland Railway Co. would have to be taken into consideration in considering what the Great Western Railway Co. was doing. I agree with that. And vice versa, if the action had been against the Midland Railway Co. the doings of the Great Western Railway Co. would have had to be taken into account. But that is not what the plaintiff is trying to do here. He is trying to sue two independent separate alleged tortfeasors, neither of whom has any control or power over the acts of the other. He is trying to sue them jointly in one action, and he does not know what are the respective acts of one or the other. How can he do that? The procedure was taken out to stay this action upon the facts which I have stated unless one of these companies was struck out. That procedure was taken in the same way as was adopted in a case that went to the House of Lords of Smurthwaite v. Hannay. These two defendants were joined, as I understand, under ord. 16, r. 4, and the basis of the application to strike out one is that under ord. 16, r. 4, there is no power, under these circumstances, to join the two defendants. My brother Day came to that conclusion, and so did the Master, and so do I.

It seems to me that these two companies, who are, as I say, independent tortfeasors, if they are liable for anything at all, ought not to be joined in one action by the plaintiff, and, as I read Smurthwaite v. Hannay, the question of the joinder of two plaintiffs equally applies to joinder of two defendants. As I read that decision, it does say, as far as it is applicable to this case, that the defendants cannot be joined in this case, and I agree with what Mr. Lyttelton said, that Smurthwaite v. Hannay has decided that ord. 16, rr. 1 and 4, has relation to the joinder of parties, and not to the joinder of causes of action.

I think that I differ from my brother Rigby in this case, because he thinks that there is a joint cause of action against the two companies, and no other. I do not think that it is so, and, with submission, in my opinion, these two torts, if they are torts, are independent torts by the different companies, although, as I have already stated, the acts of each company can be taken into account in considering the acts of one company, and deciding whether they amount to a nuisance or not. The acts of both companies should be taken into account, because it may be that the one company ought not to have done what it was doing when the other company was doing what it was doing. But that does not make these two causes of action a joint cause of action, or give any right to join one company with the other in one action. If it is said that I am not following loyally the decision of the court in the case of Thorpe v. Brumfitt, and the judgment of James, L.J., in this court, I answer that in that case the Lord Justice was not dealing with an action at law, or with the question of damages at all, but he was dealing with an action brought for the purpose of restraining a nuisance; and if the plaintiff's counsel in this action had accepted that position—namely, that he would strike out all question of damages and simply go for the injunction, I will not say what my judgment would have been: but, inasmuch as he adheres, in this case, to what I say is a common law action for the damages which he claims, with the injunction thrown in, I think that Day, J., properly exercised the jurisdiction he had by making the order which he did make, and I think that it ought to be upheld.

RIGBY, L.J.—I regret to say that I cannot see the case in the same point of view as my brother Lord Justice. The question turns upon the 5th clause of the statement of claim in which it is alleged that "each of the defendant companies frequently causes or permits access to the plaintiff's premises to be blocked by its vans and carts in the manner aforesaid at the same time, while access to such premises is already blocked by vans and carts on the other side of his premises by the other defendant company in manner aforesaid, and by their respective combined acts." I do not rely upon the word "combined" because it was fairly explained as being nothing more than concurrent. It does not mean combination. It is that by the effect of their concurrent acts they "prevent all access to the plaintiff's premises by vehicle or cycle." Well, that is a substantive matter for a complaint if it is made out, and it appears to me, if it is made out, to be a nuisance, not two nuisances, but one, a nuisance to which each of the defendants contributes, and contributes not in such an uncertain degree that the plaintiff does not know which it is, but the plaintiff says that each of them frequently contributes, one by stopping access on his side while access is stopped on the other side by the other, so that altogether any access of a wheeled vehicle to his premises is totally prevented. I conceive that this is a case in which an action can be brought jointly.

It is suggested that it is a common law action. I confess that I do not know what a common law action is at the present day. There is no such thing as a common law action with reference to a question of this kind. A common law action is brought in a common law division in respect to a matter over which the ancient common law courts had jurisdiction, so much so that in Chancery, in the olden days, the question of injunction never could be raised if the right at law was in dispute, or until the right at law had been settled; and in the olden times, if the case of Thorpe v. Brumfitt had arisen, we should have had to send it back to a common law court to find out whether there was a nuisance at all. To be sure, that has been modified in modern times, but that was the original idea. You rested upon a legal right. James and Mellish, L.JJ., in that case, to my mind, decided that the acts of a plurality of people might, in themselves, when concurrently done, create a nuisance, where the act of each one of those individuals taken alone would be no nuisance at all, but a mere ordinary exercise of his own right. That is recognised by Chitty, J., in the case which has been referred to (Lambton v. Mellish), though I quite agree that that case had directly nothing to do with the question of parties. Now if the Court of Appeal were right in Thorpe v. Brumfitt—and I think that we are bound to assume that they were right—it appears to me that their decision was in accordance not only with what is convenient, but with what is the law, as I understand it—namely, that two or three people, though they do not combine in the sense of planning any scheme of action, may, in fact, act in such a manner, taking into consideration the acts of those acting with them, as to make them liable, and not only liable (I will not say now whether they were jointly liable at common law), but liable to be sued in a joint action under the effect of the Judicature Acts, and of rule 4 of order 16. At any rate, I am inclined to think that they would be suable at common law for a nuisance. Suppose there be a carriage road, which I have a right to use, and there are two people who have a similar right to use it. It may be that one of them, if he were on the road, would not stop me, but if two of them actually got into my road, though it might be by reason of a dispute between themselves, and not by reason of a bargain between themselves—if they got in my way and actually stopped me, I conceive that they would be doing an injury to my right of way, and might have been sued, I should have supposed, at common law. But at all events, that being the state of things, there being an action which is an action for an injunction, what right has one defendant to say "I will not be restrained unless my co-defendant is removed from the action, and unless you can get an injunction against him (if you get it at all) in an independent action?" I know of no such right. It appears to me that it is singularly inconvenient that such a doctrine should be laid down, and it appears to me that unless we are absolutely forced by some doctrine, or by some decision, which has not been brought before us, it is not desirable to lay down any such rule.

If it be said that damages being asked for is a reason why the action should be stayed, I again want authority for that. I have never heard of, or I do not remember, any authority, and no authority has been cited before us. The relief sought, or I should say, the main relief sought, is the injunction to do away with the state of things which, if the statement of claim be correct, must be doing perpetual and grave injury to the business of the plaintiff. That I should look upon as the main thing, not as an incident.

It is not an incident that an injunction is granted. An injunction is granted according to the rules which used to govern the Court of Chancery. If, indeed, there be a difficulty about assessing damages against these defendants separately, or if it be an impossibility, well, that is all the worse for the plaintiff. He may fail, I say nothing about that, for it is not necessary to do so—he may fail in establishing his damages, but I do not see how any objection can be taken to his injunction, and the injunction, as I said before, is the main part of the relief that he asks for. As to the case in the House of Lords of Smurthwaite v. Hannay, as I understand it, I take it to be shortly this, that you cannot bring plaintiffs, and by parity of reasoning you cannot bring defendants, before the court where the causes of action vested in the different plaintiffs, or the causes of action that exist against the different defendants, are separate. I do not look upon this case as one where the liability of the defendants is severable. No doubt, in the action, they allege it, but in clause 5 the plaintiff alleges what may be a much more formidable case, that the concurrent action of the two creates a nuisance.

Therefore, if my judgment had to decide this matter, I should differ from the learned judge, but, of course, as my learned brother does not take the same view, the decision stands.

Solicitors, Kennedy, Hughes & Kennedy; R. R. Nelson.

From Q. B. Div.
(Lord Esher, M.R., and Kay and A. L. Smith, L.JJ.) July 30, 1895.

METROPOLITAN DISTRICT RAILWAY CO. v. VESTRY OF FULHAM. (a.)

Metropolis—New street—Paving expenses—Apportionment—Owners of land—Discretion of local authority—Metropolis Management Amendment Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 102), s. 77.

A vestry or district board, in apportioning the expenses of paving a new street, under section 77 of the Metropolis Management Amendment Act, 1862, has a discretion, if it thinks fit, to charge particular owners of land in a less proportion than other owners of land.

Appeal from the decision of a divisional court on a special case stated by a metropolitan police magistrate.

The vestry of the parish of Fulham, having resolved that a certain new street within their district should be paved, estimated the total expenses of such paving at £944 8s. 5d., and apportioned the same between between the owners of houses and land bounding or abutting on the new street in the sums set forth in a list of apportionments.

The Metropolitan District Railway Co. were charged as owners of land bounding or abutting on the new street, the sum apportioned to them being £404 13s. 5d.

The railway company having refused to pay the sum charged on them, the clerk to the vestry laid a complaint before one of the metropolitan police magistrates. At the hearing of the summons the railway company objected that the apportionment was bad in law, on the ground that certain persons named in the list of apportionments were charged, as owners of land, sums representing two-thirds of the estimated expense of the paving opposite to their land, whereas the railway company were charged, as owners of land, a sum representing the full estimated expense of the paving opposite to their land. The said charges of two-thirds of the estimated expense of paving were made pursuant to a resolution of the vestry, that it was just and expedient so to make the said charges.

The magistrate was of opinion that the apportionment was valid and binding, and made an order against the railway company for payment of the sum charged, but stated a special case in order to enable them to appeal to the Queen's Bench Division.

By section 105 of the Metropolis Management Act, 1855, if a vestry or district board shall deem it necessary or expedient that any new street shall be paved, the vestry or board shall well and sufficiently pave the same, "and the owners of the houses forming such street shall on demand pay to such vestry or board the amount of the estimated expenses of providing and laying such pavement, such amount to be determined by the surveyor for the time being of the vestry or board."

By section 77 of the Metropolis Management Amendment Act, 1862, where any vestry or district board shall have paved or be about to pave any new street under the powers of the above section, "the owners of the land bounding or abutting on such street shall be liable to contribute to the expenses or estimated expenses of paving the same, as well as the owners of houses therein, provided that it shall be lawful for the vestry or district board to charge the owners of land in a less proportion than the owners of house property, should they deem it just and expedient so to do, and any such costs or expenses, including the costs of paving at the points of intersection of streets, and all other incidental costs and charges, shall be apportioned by the vestry or board."

The Divisional Court (GRANTHAM and WRIGHT, JJ.), upheld the order of the magistrate, and dismissed the appeal.

The railway company appealed to the Court of Appeal.

Courthope Munroe and F. O. Robinson, for the appellants.

Channell, Q.C., and R. Cunningham Glen, for the respondents.

The following cases were cited besides those which are referred to in the judgments: Davis v. Greenwich Board of Works, [1895] 2 Q. B. 219, 43 W. R. Dig. 118, Whitchurch v. Fulham Board of Works, 14 W. R. 277, L. R. 1 Q. B. 233.

Cur. adv. vult.

July 30, 1895.—KAY, L.J., read the following judgment:—Before the passing of the Metropolis Management Amendment Act, 1862, the local authority entrusted by the Metropolis Management Act, 1855, with the duty of paving a new street and recovering the expenses from the owners of the houses forming such street, had not the power to charge the owners of land abutting on the street nor any express power of apportioning the expenses. The object of section 77 of the first-mentioned Act was to supply these deficiencies in the power of the local authority. The question in this case is whether, when an apportionment has been made in which some owners of land have been charged with a larger proportion of the expenses than others, the magistrate or the High Court in the absence of mala fides has any right to interfere. In other words, does the Act impose an obligation upon the local authority to make the apportionment rateably or upon any other principle? At once the question arises, What is meant by rateably or principle? Is the apportionment to be according to length of frontage value of land, or what is to be the basis of it? Length of frontage can hardly be in all cases the basis. One owner might have land only a few yards deep on which no valuable building could be erected. The next might, with the same frontage, have a considerable depth of land which might be available for the erection of large buildings and might be of much greater value. I should expect that the Legislature would leave a large discretion to the local authority to consider all the circumstances of each case, and to make what would be in their opinion a fair apportionment, having regard to all such considerations.

The appellants are owners of land adjoining a new street in the parish of Fulham. They complain that in the apportionment of the expenses of paving that street, other owners of land abutting upon the street have been charged only two-thirds of the estimated expense of paving the footpath and half the carriageway opposite their respective pieces of land, whereas the appellants have been charged with the full costs of the paving opposite their land.

Section 77 of the Act of 1862, provides, first, that the owner of land abutting upon a new street "shall be liable to contribute to the expenses or estimated expenses of paving the same, as well as the owners of houses therein." It is not said whether the contribution is to be according to length of frontage, value of land, or what is to be the ratio. The next words do create some difficulty: "provided that it shall be lawful for the vestry or district board to charge the owners of land in a less proportion than the owners of house property, should they deem it just and expedient so to do," and any such costs and expenses are to be apportioned by the vestry or board. The proviso seems to imply that the vestry could not have charged the owners of land in a less proportion than the owners of houses without that express provision. In other words, that the statute means that owners of houses and land must primâ facie be charged rateably, but, as between land and houses, land may be charged in a less proportion than houses. Therefore, it is argued, that as between owners of houses and between owners of land the charge must be rateable, and though the one set of owners may be charged in a less proportion than the other set, the charge upon each set must be rateable inter se. But the difficulty still remains, what does rateable mean? The word is not used in the Act, but if implied it must be intended that the local authority is not to divide the charge according to length of frontage only. No express principle of division is laid down. It seems to me that is intentionally avoided for the very purpose of giving the local authority a large discretion.

(a.) Reported by F. G. RUCKER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

In Stroud v. Wandsworth Board of Works, 42 W. R. 355, [1894] 2 Q. B. 1, the Court of Appeal had to consider the third section of the Metropolis Management Amendment Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 66), which empowered the local authority from time to time to execute any necessary works of repair upon a carriage-road, and upon a consideration of the scheme and object of these Acts, the court came to the conclusion that, although it was not expressed in distinct words, the necessary implication was that the question whether the repair was necessary or not was left to the discretion of the local authority, and that the magistrate or court could not interfere.

In Stotesbury v. Vestry of St. Giles, 59 L. T. N. S. 473, 37 W. R. Dig. 121, the same question that arises in the case before us came before a divisional court. The difficulty upon the words of section 77 of the Act of 1862, to which I have referred, does not seem to have impressed the Divisional Court, though it is noticed in the judgment of one of the learned judges. They held that a bonâ fide apportionment among different owners of land could not be interfered with by the magistrate. In my opinion a large discretion as to apportionment is intentionally by the statute vested in the local authority, and so long as it is exercised bonâ fide, as in this case, the magistrate or court has no jurisdiction to interfere.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—The question in this case depends upon what is the true meaning of section 77 of the Metropolis Management Amendment Act, 1862, and is whether, when a local authority has paved or is about to pave a new street within the metropolis, that authority has a discretion as to how it will apportion the expenses of so doing between the owners of land abutting thereon, or whether it is bound to apportion the expenses equally between each owner of land, either as regards frontage or rateable value, or on some other defined principle, wholly irrespective of the varying amenities the different plots of land may possess, and the different advantages they may derive from the paving of a new street.

I agree that an apportionment made by a local authority is unimpeachable upon appeal in a court of law (Nisbet v. Greenwich Board of Works, 24 W. R. 223, L. R. 10, Q. B. 465), unless that authority has exceeded its jurisdiction in doing what it has done: Reg. v. Marsham, 40 W. R. 84, [1892] 1 Q. B. 371. Unless, therefore, section 77 enacts that the local authority shall have no discretion as to how it shall apportion the expenses of paving a new street between the abutting landowners, then the apportionment in this case must stand, for the local authority has acted within its jurisdiction in apportioning, as it has done, the expenses of paving between different landowners.

In the year 1855 it was enacted by the Metropolis Management Act, 1855, that the owners of houses forming a new street should, on demand, pay to the local authority the estimated expenses of paving such street. This section in no way directed in what manner the expenses were to be borne by the different houseowners, nor did it provide for any apportionment being made by the local authority between them. So matters rested until the year 1862, when the Act of 1855 was amended by the Metropolis Management Amendment Act of that year. By section 77 of this Act, owners of lands abutting upon a new street were placed under contribution towards these paving expenses as owners of houses had theretofore been, and the section enacts that where "any vestry or district board, under the powers of the Act of 1855, had paved, or were about to pave, any new street, the owners of land abutting upon such street shall be liable to contribute to the expenses, or estimated expenses, of paving the same, as well as the owners of the houses therein, provided that it shall be lawful for the vestry or district board to charge the owners of land in a less proportion than the owners of house property, should they deem it just and expedient so to do; and any such expenses shall be apportioned by the vestry or district board, who were empowered to recover the same from the owners, or, at their discretion, to accept payment of the amount apportioned in respect of each house or premises by instalments." It is clear that this apportionment of the expenses is to be made between the owners of houses and of lands abutting upon the new street, and it will be noticed that the section in no way enacts how this apportionment is to be made, whether according to frontage or to rateable value, or to any defined principle. This is left to the discretion of the local authority.

It is not suggested in this case that the local authority, in the apportionment which they have made, have charged the owners of land more than the owners of houses, but what the authority have done, and what is complained of by the appellants, who are landowners, is that they have not apportioned the expenses equally between each landowner. To test the point taken, suppose the case in which there is no landowner and nothing but houseowners in the new street. Is there anything in this section, which was passed to bring landowners under contribution and to give the right of apportionment to the local authority, to compel that authority to apportion the same amount between one landowner in a street who has, say, a house with a twenty-foot frontage and a depth of eighteen feet, and the next houseowner, who has a house with a like frontage and treble or quadruple its depth? It certainly was not so enacted by the Act of 1855, and I cannot find it in the Act of 1862, and, indeed, the case of London School Board v. St. Mary, Islington, 24 W. R. 137, 1 Q. B. D. 65, would tend to show that there is no such restriction. It is true that the point now taken was not argued, though it stood out clearly upon the case. If the local authority have a discretion as to how to apportion the expenses of paving between the different houseowners in a new street, it seems to me that they have a like discretion as regards the different landowners therein.

It was said that the words in section 77, which make it lawful for the local authority to charge owners of land a less proportion than owners of houses, show that this is the only inequality tolerated by the section, and it is upon this that the appellants rest their case. If this be the meaning of the Legislature, in my judgment it would not have been left in this ambiguous manner, but there would be found some provision that the local authority were to apportion the expenses, either upon frontage, as in section 150 of the Public Health Act, 1875, or upon rateable value, or upon some other principle of equality. But instead of this we find that the apportionment is left wholly to the vestry to decide, without fetter or restriction, except these words have the effect contended for.

In my judgment that is not the true interpretation of these words, which were inserted not for the purpose of showing how an apportionment upon owners of houses was to be made—for they have no relation thereto—but to make it clear that landowners, when brought under contribution, might be charged less than owners of houses as regards paving expenses, if the local authority thought fit, and the discretion which is otherwise given to the local authority by the rest of the section is not taken away by these words. For these reasons, as well as those given in the judgments of my Brothers Wills and Grantham in the case of Stotesbury v. Vestry of St. Giles, in the year 1888, to review which the present appeal is brought, I am of opinion that it fails, that the local authority have acted within the jurisdiction given them, and that this appeal must, therefore, be dismissed with costs.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—I am entirely of the same opinion.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the appellants, Baxter & Co.

Solicitors for the respondents, T. Blanco White.

From the Mayor's Court. (Lord Esher, M.R., and Kay and Lopes, L.JJ.) Oct. 29.

CHAMBERLAIN v. VOGAN. (a.)

Corporation of London—Revenue—Duty on grain—Mixture of grain and other articles—The Metage on Grain (Port of London) Act, 1872 (35 & 36 Vict. c. c.), s. 4.

The Metage on Grain (Port of London) Act, 1872, s. 4, imposes a duty of three-sixteenth of a penny per cwt. in respect of "grain brought into the Port of London for sale."

Held, that the duty was imposed upon grain which was brought into the Port of London for sale as grain, and was not leviable in respect of grain which was brought in for the purpose of being mixed with other articles and sold for horse food.

Appeal of the plaintiff from the Mayor's Court.

The action was brought by the plaintiff, who was the Chamberlain of the City of London, to recover duty under section 4 of the Metage on Grain (Port of London) Act, 1872.

That section provides that the Corporation of London "may demand and receive, in respect of all grain brought into the port of London for sale, a duty at the rate of three-sixteenths of a penny per cwt., to be called the City of London Grain Duty, and such duty shall, subject to the provisions of this Act, be held by the corporation for the preservation of open spaces in the neighbourhood of London, not within the metropolis as defined by the Metropolis Management Act, 1855."

The jury found a special verdict that the defendants were the owners and consignees of a quantity of grain—namely, maize and oats which had been brought into the port of London; that a portion of the maize was sold to the purchasers in the same state as it arrived, and that the defendants admitted their liability to pay duty in respect of that; that the residue of the maize and the oats were taken to the defendants' mills, and a portion of the maize was ground into meal, and then sold in that condition; the remainder was crushed and cracked between rollers, and then sifted so as to separate the crushed and cracked maize from the meal, which was sold, while the crushed and cracked maize was mixed with beans, peas, and oats which had been similarly treated and sold for horse food. The oats brought in by the defendants were treated in a similar manner and were also sold for horse food. The jury further found that the maize and oats were brought into the port of London for the purpose of being dealt with as described and then sold.

On these findings, the Common Serjeant entered judgment for the defendants.

The plaintiff appealed.

Sir E. Clarke, Q.C., and Danckwerts, for the plaintiff.—In spite of the treatment of the maize and oats, as described in the special verdict, they still remained "grain" within the meaning of the section, and were, therefore, liable to duty. The statute provides that the duty shall be paid on grain brought into the port of London "for sale," but it does not say that the grain must be sold separately. In Attorney-General v. Green, 4 Price 224, it was held that a vendor of blacking containing vinegar and other ingredients was liable to the excise duty of vinegar. Suppose, a cargo of maize and oats brought into London for sale; separately they would both be liable to the duty, but according to the defendants' contention, if they were mixed and the mixture sold, no duty at all would be payable. That is a most unreasonable conclusion.

They also cited Scott v. Taylor, 48 J. P. 424, and Pharmaceutical Society v. Armson, 42 W. R. 662, [1894] 2 Q. B. 720.

Joseph Walton, Q.C., and Albert Gray, for the defendants.—There are three purposes for which grain may be brought into London; it may be for sale, or for manufacture, or for consumption. The duty is imposed only in the case of sale. In this case the defendants have not sold grain, but a mixture for horse food. A person who had contracted to buy maize would not accept this mixture in fulfilment of his contract.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—I have come to the conclusion that this Act of Parliament being an Act dealing with commercial matters, its phraseology must, therefore, be construed according to its ordinary commercial meaning. When in a commercial transaction grain is said to be brought into a place for sale, that would mean for sale as grain. In this case the grain was not brought in for sale as grain, but as something else, and the defendants are, therefore, not liable to pay duty in respect of it. The appeal must be dismissed.

KAY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion, having no doubt about the meaning of the Act. If grain is brought in for the purpose of being manufactured into something else, which, if delivered, would not be a fulfilment of a contract to sell grain, then it cannot be said that the grain was brought in for sale. In this case the sale was not a sale of grain, but of a different article of commerce, although it is true grain formed part of it. Sale is not the only antithesis to consumption. There is also the manufacturing of a distinct article out of the grain and a sale of that article. That is this case, and in my opinion it is outside the provisions of the Act.

(a.) Reported by F. O. ROBINSON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

RIGBY, L.J., concurred.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitor for the plaintiff, H. H. Crawford.

Solicitors for the defendants, Wansey, Son, & Bowen.

From Chan. Div. (Lindley, Lopes, and Rigby, L.JJ.) June 11, 12, 1895.

EBBETTS v. CONQUEST. (a.)

Landlord and tenant—Underlease—Covenant to keep in repair—Measure of damages.

In an action for damages on a breach of covenant to keep demised property in repair, the proper measure of damages is the difference in value between the reversion with the covenant performed and the value of that reversion with the covenant unperformed.

In the case of an underlease, if the underlease discloses the fact that it is an underlease, the liability over of the underlessor to his superior landlord is a material circumstance to be taken into account in ascertaining the amount of damages to be paid by the underlessee to the underlessor for breach of covenant to keep in repair.

Appeal from a decision of an official referee as to the amount of damages payable by the defendants for the breach of a covenant in an underlease to keep the premises in repair.

The original lease of the premises, known as the Grecian Theatre in the City-road, was granted by the trustees of St. Botolph, Bishopsgate, in 1840, to Thomas Rouse for a term of sixty-one years from Michaelmas-day, 1837.

In March, 1851, Rouse granted an underlease of his whole term, less the last ten days thereof, to Benjamin Oliver. The plaintiffs now represented Rouse, and the defendant Conquest now represented Oliver, whilst William Booth was a co-defendant, being an assignee of the underlease.

The underlease contained a covenant to "keep" the premises in repair, and showed, on the face of it, that it was an underlease and not a lease by a freeholder. The action was brought for breach of that covenant.

Romer, J., at the trial of the action, held that there had been a breach of the covenant, and referred it to the official referee to assess the amount of the damages. He assessed the damages at £1,305 treating the proper measure of damages as the sum which it would cost to put the premises in a proper state of repair, with an allowance for the unexpired term of the underlease. It was admitted that on this principle the sum of £1,305 was the right amount.

The defendant Booth appealed.

Haldane, Q.C., Sargant, and H. Courthope-Munroe, for the appellant.—The plaintiffs say the damages should be the amount it would cost to fulfil the the covenant. We say the damages should be based on the depreciation in the selling value. These premises would be of no value even if they were put in repair, the only value attaching to them is as a building site. The official referee, acting on the first principle, has assessed the damages at £1,305. We say the amount should be £200, for if they were put into repair they would be worth £200 more for pulling down than if not put into repair. The covenant to keep in repair is not one of which the courts grant specific performance. Only damages are recoverable, and those damages, as the cases show, are arrived at on the principle of making good the loss which the plaintiff has suffered. Vivian v. Champion, 2 Lord Raym. 1125, is against us, but ever since that case there is a consistent line of authorities, showing that in the case of covenants to "keep in repair" the right principle is the one contended for by us, though in some of the cases there are, no doubt, dicta to the effect that the rule is different in the case of covenants "to yield up in repair." These cases are as follows: Smith v. Peat, 9 Exch. 161, 2 W. R. Dig. 164; Hadley v. Baxendale, 2 W. R. 302, 9 Ex 341, 2 Smith, L.C., 9th ed., 594; Turner v. Lamb, 14 M. & W. 412; Davis v. Underwood, 6 W. R. 105,2 H. & N. 570; Mills v. East London Union, 21 W. R. 142, L. R. 8 C. P. 79; Joyner v. Weeks, 39 W. R. 583, [1891] 2 Q. B. 31. [LOPES, L.J., referred to Inderwick v. Leech, 1 Times L. R. 95, 484, referred to in Joyner v. Weeks.] Henderson v. Thom, 41 W. R. 509, [1893] 2 Q. B. 164; Whitham v. Kershaw, 34 W. R. 340; 16 Q. B. D. 613; Wigsell v. School for Indigent Blind, 30 W. R. 474, 8 Q. B. D. 357. From the cases it is now established that the dictum of Lord Holt in Vivian v. Champion is not sound.

They also referred to Coward v. Gregory, 15 W. R. 170, L. R. 2 C. P. 153.

R. F. Norton (Jelf, Q.C., with him), for the respondents.—The argument of the appellant comes to this, that if a freeholder lets a chapel, the lessee's surveyor may come and say "This property would let better as a public-house. Therefore we will only pay damages on the footing of the house being pulled down." That cannot be the law, and the case of a leaseholder letting a house is an a fortiori case. There is no difference between the covenant to keep in repair and to yield up in repair, except that in an action on the former discount is allowed.

He referred to Clow v. Brogden, 2 Man. & G. 39, 54.

Haldane, Q.C., replied, and referred to Mayne on Damages (5th ed.), p. 99, Key and Elphinstone's, and Prideaux's, Precedents in Conveyancing.

LINDLEY, L.J.—I think that the official referee was right in the view which he took. This is an action brought by the plaintiffs, who may be treated as standing in the place of Mr. Rouse, against Mr. Conquest, who may be treated as standing in the place of Mr. Oliver, to whom I will refer presently, and against Mr. William Booth, who is an assignee, as I understand it, of Mr. Oliver. Now the action is brought in respect of a breach of covenant to repair. This is contained in an indenture of underlease of the 24th of March, 1851, made between Mr. Rouse, who was himself a tenant under the Bishop of London, and Mr. Oliver. Mr. Oliver is dead, and as I have said Mr. Conquest represents him, and he has assigned to Mr. Booth. Now the underlease itself shows plainly enough what the position of the parties was; that is to say the underlessee knew perfectly well that his lessor was himself a lessee; and knew perfectly well that he was taking an underlease. Whether or not he looked at the lease under which his immediate lessor held I do not know. But it is important to observe that the parties knew perfectly well their relative positions, because when we look at the under-lease we see constant references to the superior landlord there. For example, there is liberty reserved to the agents of the superior landlord to come in and do repairs, and there is a covenant not to do anything which will annoy the immediate lessor's landlord or the tenants of the superior landlord.

(a.) Reported by W. SHALLCROSS GODDARD, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Now the covenants which are contained in the underlease, and with which alone we have to deal, are covenants to repair. I understand those covenants to mean to put into repair the premises demised —which now practically consist of this Grecian Theatre—to repair them and to keep them in repair, and to deliver them up at the end of the term in good repair.

Now there is not in this underlease any covenant to indemnify the immediate lessor against his liability to his superior landlord in respect of repairs. The consequence of that is, that under these covenants the immediate lessor cannot get, by a long way, so much in the shape of damages as he might if he were suing upon a covenant for indemnity. Now this property demised by the underlease is out of repair. The plaintiffs are reversioners. Their reversion consists only of about ten days, but they are liable over, on the expiration of their lease, to deliver up this property to their landlord, who is the Bishop of London, in proper repair. That is conceded, and the circumstance is all important in investigating what is the proper amount of damages to which they are entitled for breach of the covenant on which they sue. The underlease itself has not yet run out. When this action was commenced there were about four or four and a-half years to run, and there are now about three and a-half years. But the action is not brought for a breach of the covenant to leave in repair, because the time for suing on that has not arrived. The action is brought for a breach of the covenant to keep in repair.

Now what is the rule as to ascertaining the damages for a breach of that sort? The breach is not in controversy. It appears to me that this is an ordinary action for a breach of contract, and that the general principle applicable to it is that laid down in Hadley v. Baxendale. I will refer to that case, because it appears to me to cover the present case. As appears from the report, Alderson, B., in delivering the considered judgment of the court, said: "We think the proper rule in such a case as the present is this: Where two parties have made a contract, which one of them has broken, the damages which the other party ought to receive in respect of such a breach of contract should be such as may fairly and reasonably be considered, either arising naturally, that is according to the usual course of things, from such breach of contract itself, or such as may reasonably be supposed to have been in the contemplation of both parties at the time they made the contract, as the probable result of the breach of it. Now, if the special circumstances under which the contract was actually made were communicated by the plaintiffs to the defendants, and thus known to both parties, the damages resulting from the breach of such a contract which they would reasonably contemplate would be the amount of injury which would ordinarily follow from a breach of contract under these special circumstances so known and communicated." I take that to be the rule, and I apply it to this case, and it is because of the importance of the underlessee knowing the position of his lessor that I refer to this underlease. If this underlease had not disclosed the fact that it was an underlease, possibly the observations which I have made would require some modification. What, then, are the damages which the plaintiffs have sustained by reason of the breach by the lessee of his covenant? It appears to me that, applying Hadley v. Baxendale, the damages which they have sustained are to be measured by their liability over to their lessor, which was one of the circumstances, special if you like, but known to and reasonably within the contemplation of the defendants, and far short of a covenant of indemnity. Surely the damages sustained by the plaintiffs, for which the defendants are liable upon the principle of Hadley v. Baxendale, must be reckoned thus: Ascertain what is the difference in value between the reversion with the covenant performed as it ought to be and the value of that reversion with the covenant unperformed, which it ought not to be? That represents the damages which, it appears to me, the defendants ought to pay the plaintiffs. The learned official referee has taken that view, and he has assessed the damages upon that principle. He says that it will cost over £1,500 to put the property in repair, and he discounts that sum, and makes the damages £1,305.

Now Mr. Haldane says that that is wrong in principle, because that is really giving the plaintiffs an indemnity when there is no covenant for it. My answer to that is that it may be in this particular case an indemnity, but if the plaintiffs were suing upon a covenant of indemnity, they might get a great deal more. Mr. Haldane says that you must treat this as an ordinary case of landlord and tenant where the landlord is the reversioner. He says you must look at the value of the reversion apart from these special circumstances to which he alluded, and, apart from that which is all-important in this case—namely, the liability over. If you were dealing with a reversion in fee, I do not suppose that this sum of £1,305 would be the measure of damages. I think that that is very likely; but you cannot leave out the cardinal point in this case, on which the whole case turns—namely, this liability over. It seems to me, therefore, that the learned referee is right, and, at all events, it would not be prudent to say he was wrong. I have not gone into these calculations, but there is nothing wrong in the principle he has adopted. Therefore, I think that the appeal ought to be dismissed, with costs.

LOPES, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The general rule with regard to damages in actions of this kind may be stated thus: Where the term has come to an end and the action is on the covenant to leave in repair, the measure of damages is the sum it will take to put the premises into the state of repair in which the tenant ought to leave them according to his covenant; and the measure of damages for the breach of a covenant to keep in repair during the currency of the term is the loss which is occasioned to the lessor's reversion—a loss which will be greater or less according as the term of the tenant at the time of the breach has a greater or less time to run. Those I think, are the general rules which are deducible from the cases. But there are special circumstances in this case which prevent this particular case from coming exactly within either of these rules. The special circumstances which I allude, to are that there is a liability over. In this case the underlessee knew that he was taking from a lessee, and I cannot doubt that he knew of the covenants in his lessor's lease, and amongst those covenants is a covenant to yield up in repair on the termination of the lease. To my mind that is the most important matter in this case when we have to deal with the question of damages. We have, therefore, under these circumstances, to consider what is the loss to the lessor's reversion; in other words, what is its marketable value. Supposing he offers it for sale, I presume the purchaser would say: "If I buy, I buy subject to a liability to yield up the premises in repair. I can only, therefore, give you such a sum as the premises are worth, after deducting from that sum the cost of repairs." In my view the plaintiffs are entitled to say: "We are liable to our lessor to give up these premises in repair. If you had observed your covenant and kept the premises in repair the reversion would be worth so much. You have not kept it in repair, and it is worth so much less, that so much less being what it will cost to put it in repair. Therefore the loss to the reversion is the cost of putting those premises in repair." Now if I had to deal with this case with a jury, I should have left the question to them in the way I have already stated. I should say what you have to consider is, What is the loss inured to the plaintiffs' reversion. In order to arrive at that you must in your own minds determine what is the value of this reversion with this covenant observed, and what is the value of this reversion with the covenant not observed, and the difference between those two sums will be the loss which the plaintiffs have sustainted in respect of their reversion. I did not at first very clearly understand how the official referee had dealt with the matter. But it seems to me that that is the way in which he has dealt with it. He has taken all those matters into consideration, and he said that practically the loss that has accrued to the reversion is the difference between the value of the reversion with the covenant performed and the value with the covenant unperformed. That amounts to £1,500, which discounted, as it ought to be, will amount to the sum of £1,305. Whether that is a proper figure or not I am not prepared to say, because we have not the figures before us. But most distinctly I cannot say that the official referee is applying a wrong principle. Nor can I say that is not a right and proper figure for him to have assessed.

I think, therefore, that the appeal fails.

RIGBY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. This is a question of principle and principle only. No attempt has been made, and I presume no attempt could be really made, to affect the figures unless we can affect the principle upon which they are arrived at. The authorities referred to by Mr. Haldane clearly show that as a general rule there is a difference in the assessment of damages in the case of a breach of a covenant to yield up in repair, brought after the determination of the term, and the case of a breach of a covenant to keep in repair, brought during the continuance of the term. In the first case, by the authorities it is laid down upon grounds of convenience, and, indeed, it is no doubt an arbitrary rule, that whether or not the lessor in fact loses, he shall be paid the amount which would be necessary to place the premises in good repair. It may happen that even a payment of that amount would not induce him to repair. It may be far more to his interest to let the buildings be pulled down. But these considerations are not taken into account, principally because they depend upon the arrangements which the lessor has made with other persons, with which the lessee has nothing at all to do and as to which in general, he will have no information, and as to which at the time he enters into the bargain, he can have none.

Then there is, as to the covenant to keep in repair, another rule which is this. On a covenant to keep in repair the general rule is that you are to take the effect upon the value of the reversion treating it as though it were carried into the market for sale under such circumstances that the purchaser might do whatever he liked with the property, turn it to the best advantage, which I will assume in this case would be by pulling down the buildings altogether and treating the property so purchased as a mere building site. The very fact that the rule is stated in those terms appears to me to prevent the possibility of applying it to a case of this kind. This reversioner for ten days cannot take his reversion into the market and sell it to a purchaser, who shall be able to deal with it as he pleases as building ground. His interest is such that he cannot touch the buildings, except for the purpose of repairing them. He cannot pull them down, and cannot convert the property into a building site. Therefore, the supposed standard which is a perfectly good standard of reason and sound sense, as well as of authority, when applicable to the case of a freeholder who can deal with his reversion as he likes, and give similar rights to the purchaser, ought certainly not primâ facie to apply to a case of the present kind. Mr. Haldane was not able to point out any authority in which that principle had been so applied. And I think, from the very terms of the rule, and in the absence of authority, it ought to follow, upon common sense grounds, from the very statement of the rule itself, that it cannot apply. My conclusion is that that rule does not apply to the present case. What rule then ought to apply? We must consider what the position of the parties is. Mr. Oliver, through whom Mr. Booth claims, and by whose bargain he is bound, knew well that this property was not the freehold of Mr. Rouse, who demised to him. He had clear notice, upon the face of his own underlease, that it was an underlease, and that there was a subsisting lease from the superior landlord, the Bishop of London, represented at the present time by the plaintiffs. Knowing that, What is the clear rule of law? Oliver must be taken to have known all the terms of that superior lease, in the same way as if they had been cited at length in his own underlease. It would appear that the original lessee was under liability himself to keep in repair, and a further liability, at the end of the term, under the covenant, to yield up in repair.

Now, applying the rule of Hadley v. Baxendale, what must be taken to have been in the contemplation of the parties? The fact which was known to the underlessee, that his immediate lessor was under liability to keep in repair, and to yield up in repair, becomes one of the circumstances of the case to be looked at in the assessment of damages. The measure of damages is the injury to the plaintiffs. I do not say to the plaintiffs' reversion necessarily, but the loss to the plaintiffs arising directly out of the breach—a loss which must be known to be the necessary consequence of the breach under the circumstances of the plaintiffs' covenant with the superior landlord. The learned official referee appears to me to have taken the right view.

I will only observe that, if the supposed general rule of the diminution of the reversion were to apply to a case of this kind, the result would seem to follow that, in a case of ten days' reversion or three days' reversion, nothing but nominal damages could be recovered, during the term, upon the covenant to keep in repair.

I am of opinion that there has been no miscarriage, and that the sum of £1,305, so far as I can say without the figures being before us, represents fairly the damage which the plaintiffs have sustained. Under these circumstances the appeal must be dismissed, with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the appellants, Ranger, Burton, & Frost.

Solicitors for the respondents, Clarke & Calkin.

App. Bankruptcy.
(Lord Esher, M.R., and Kay and A. L. Smith, L.JJ.) Aug. 2, 1895.

In re CAREY.

Ex parte JEFFRIES v. CAREY CYCLE CO. (LIMITED). (a.)

Bankruptcy — Conveyance with intent to defeat and delay creditors — Conversion of bankrupt's business into a limited company—Respective rights of creditors of the bankrupt and of the limited company.

The bankrupt, when insolvent, had converted his business into a "one-man" company, limited.

Held, that the trustee in bankruptcy was entitled to a declaration that the conveyance of the bankrupt's business to the company was void against him, and that he was entitled to take the assets of the company; but that he must pay the new creditors of the company in full, in priority to the creditors of the bankrupt.

This was an appeal from the judgment of Vaughan Williams, J., dated the 20th of May (43 W. R. 605), declaring that a transfer of the business of Carey, a bankrupt, to the Carey Cycle Co., was void as against the trustee in bankruptcy, but that the assets of the company formed part of the general estate of the bankrupt, and that they were subject in the first place to the creditors of the company being paid in full out of them. The bankrupt had used the company as his agent, and must, therefore, indemnify it, and the trustee could only take its assets subject to this obligation to indemnify.

Crisp, for the appellant, the liquidator.—The order appealed from is wrong so far as it orders the liquidator to hand over the assets of the company to the trustee in bankruptcy.

Herbert Reed, Q.C., and Carrington, for the trustees, were not called upon.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—This appeal must be dismissed. All we have to decide is whether the point taken on behalf of the appellant is a good one or a bad one. I think it is an utterly bad one.

KAY and A. L. SMITH, concurred.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors, Arthur Pyke; Bassett & Co.

High Court of Justice.

Chan. Div.
Chitty, J. Aug. 9, 10, 1895.

In re LORD COLERIDGE'S SETTLEMENT. (b.)

Settlement—Settled Land Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 38), ss. 21, 22 (2), 53—Capital money—Investment—Tenant for life, direction by—Trustees.

The tenant for life under a settlement has power conferred on him by the Settled Land Act, 1882, of directing the mode of investment of capital money arising under the Act and selecting the particular investment, subject only to the limitations expressed in the Act itself, and cannot be controlled by the trustees or the court in the exercise of this statutory power so long as he really and honestly exercises his discretion.

Summons.

This was an application by the trustees of the settlement executed by the late Lord Coleridge in 1887 for the purpose of obtaining the decision of the court on the question whether they would be justified in investing certain capital money which had arisen from a sale of a leasehold house, part of the settled property, according to the direction of the present Lord Coleridge, the tenant for life in possession. The sale was effected by him under his statutory power.

The settlement expressly referred to the Settled Land Act, 1882, and declared that capital money arising under that Act might be invested in the names of the trustees, or under their control, in any investment in which trustees were by law authorized, or in other various investments specifically mentioned.

The several investments which the tenant for life directed were all within the scope of the settlement power; but they were not such as the trustees would themselves select. The prices of the stock were considerably above par, and the net annual proceeds of the investments as a whole were not much more than £3 per cent.

The trustees, amongst other objections to the investments, pointed out that, in the event of certain redeemable stock being paid off at par, the capital of the trust fund would be diminished.

Romer, for the trustees.

Macnaghten, for the tenant for life.

CHITTY, J.—The question turns upon sections 21, 22, and 53 of the Settled Land Act, 1882. Section 21 enacts that capital money under the Act shall be invested or otherwise applied wholly in one or partly in one and partly in another or others of the modes after-mentioned, and these modes are specified in the ten following sub-sections. This division into ten sub-sections is merely for the sake of clearness and convenience. Sub-section 1 runs thus:—"In investment on Government securities" (by section 2 this term includes stocks, funds, and shares), "or on other securities on which the trustees of the settlement are by the settlement or by law authorized to invest trust money, or on" other securities mentioned in the sub-section. Section 22 enacts that the investment or other application of capital money by the trustees "shall be made according to the direction of the tenant for life, and in default thereof according to the discretion of the trustees."

It was argued by counsel for the trustees that the only direction which the tenant for life could give to the trustees was to invest or apply the money according to some one or other of the ten sub-sections in section 21, each sub-section being regarded as a whole; and that, in regard to the various modes of investment or application specified in each sub-section, the choice of the particular investment or application lay with the trustees. There was nothing in the Act to justify this construction; it would cut down the power of the tenant for life in a manner not contemplated by the Legislature, and render it almost nugatory. The argument was abandoned, and rightly, by counsel on my pointing out some of the results which ensue from its adoption.

The power thus conferred on a tenant for life of directing the mode of investment, and of selecting the particular investment, is, no doubt, extensive. The enactment is in accordance with the general policy of the Act; in cases falling within its provisions the Act transfers, in regard to investment, a function ordinarily exercised by trustees, from the trustees to the tenant for life. The only limitations imposed on him are those to be found in the Act itself—notably in the 21st and 53rd sections. By the 53rd section a tenant for life, in exercising any power under the Act, is bound to have regard to the interests of all parties entitled under the settlement, and, in relation to the exercise thereof by him, is deemed to be in the position and to have the duties and liabilities of a trustee for those parties. Supposing that this case had not fallen within the Act, and that the trustees had, in the exercise of their ordinary discretion, selected these securities in good faith, their discretion could not have been questioned: they would have been acting within the scope of the authority conferred on them by the settlement. Similarly the tenant for life, in the exercise of his statutory power, cannot be controlled by the trustees or by the court, so long as he really and honestly exercises his discretion. This the present tenant for life has done; he has considered the question of the propriety of the investments, and has consulted a broker of good standing in the City of London, who has advised him on the subject. He has offered to produce an affidavit verifying the paper on which the broker's advice is given. This should be done. I hold, then, that the trustees will be safe in complying with the direction given, and that they are bound to comply with it.

(a.) Reported by T. MATHEW, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

(b.) Reported by J. F. WALEY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Solicitors, C. & S. Harrison & Co.; Spencer Whitehead, for Blackmore, Shield, & Mackarness, Alresford.

Chan. Div. }
North, J. } Aug. 2, 1895.

Crompton and Evans Union Bank v. Burton. (a.)

Practice—Payment into court—Order for payment into court on motion—Admission by defendant of receipt of money—Improper payments by defendant.

Upon an interlocutory motion, money will not be ordered to be paid into court by a constructive trustee unless it is actually in his hands. It is not sufficient that it has been in his hands and that he is responsible for it.

Neville v. Matthewman, 42 W. R. 675, [1894] 3 Ch. 345, and Nutter v. Holland, 43 W. R. 18, [1894] 3 Ch. 408, followed.

Motion by the plaintiffs for an order directing George Burton and William James Burton, two of the defendants, within four days to pay into court to the credit of the action, a sum of £2,835 19s., being the balance of the purchase-moneys of certain real estate, after deducting therefrom £2,500 due on a first mortgage.

The plaintiffs were second mortgagees of the property which had been sold, the amount of their mortgage being £3,000. Henry Green, the mortgagor, died on the 3rd of July, 1893. The executors and trustees of his will were also made defendants to the action. Acting under the advice of the defendant, George Burton, who was their solicitor, the trustees of the will put the mortgaged property up for sale. Eighteen lots were sold, realizing in all £5,335 19s. It turned out, however, on investigating the title, that the trustees had only a future power of sale under the will, and, therefore, could not make a title, whereupon the defendant, George Burton, procured a transfer of the first mortgage to his son, William James Burton, who carried out the contract by selling, as mortgagee, under the power of sale. George Burton acted as solicitor for his son in the completion of the contracts, and the purchase-money was paid to him; the son did not receive any of the money, and was in fact a mere nominee throughout. In answer to the motion, the defendant, George Burton, had filed an affidavit admitting the facts, and the receipt of the whole sum, but exhibiting an account purporting to show how he had disposed of the whole of the money with the exception of £1,035. He claimed to be entitled to deduct, besides the money due under the first mortgage, certain payments, amounting to a considerable sum, made to the testator's executors in respect of costs incurred by them in carrying on a colliery, which formed part of their testator's estate, and also to retain the costs of the transfer and sale, and the amount of a promissory note still outstanding, given by him as collateral security for money borrowed by the executors from their bankers.

Swinfen Eady, Q.C., and E. S. Ford, for the plaintiffs.—The only deduction the defendants were entitled to make from the proceeds of sale was the amount due to the first mortgagees; they ought not to be allowed their claim in respect of the other items in the account, such payments were breaches of trust, and the defendants must be treated as if they still had the moneys in their hands.

Vernon Smith, Q.C., and A. W. Rowden, for the defendants Burton.—The defendant, George Burton, was acting for the executors and not for the first mortgagees. Even if he has wrongfully parted with the money, the order cannot be made against him: Nutter v. Holland, 43 W. R. 18, [1894] 3 Ch. 408, and Neville v. Matthewman, 42 W. R. 675, [1894] 3 Ch. 345. Orders on motion are only made for the security of the fund, not by way of penalty or by way of prejudging liability.

E. S. Ford, in reply.—Neville v. Matthewman differs from this case, inasmuch as there the executor never got the money. Nutter v. Holland was a case under ord. 55, r. 3 (d), where the actual words are "money in the hands of the executors or trustees."

North, J., after stating the facts, disallowed the claim on the promissory note, and also the costs of the sale, on the ground, as to the latter, that there was no evidence that they had been paid, and continued:—Then I come to deal with the item relating to the payments made by the defendant to the executors. In his affidavit the defendant says that he paid the sums to Hardwicke (one of the executors) to enable him to carry on the colliery, and it was understood that he (the defendant) should be paid out of the proceeds of sale of the property, and the plaintiffs would be paid somehow else. This arrangement was a gross breach of duty on the part of the trustees and the solicitor, and I should accordingly have thought it was a matter of course that these moneys should be paid into court, but I feel embarrassed by the cases of Neville v. Matthewman and Nutter v. Holland. I do not think those cases can go quite as far as the defendants contend—namely, that if a man wrongly paid away money yesterday, he cannot be ordered to pay it into court to-day; but, having regard to the practice of the court as modified by those cases, and to the fact that these moneys have been paid to the executors, and are not now in the hands of the defendants, I cannot order the moneys so parted with to be paid into court. I, therefore, order the defendants Burton to pay into court the balance of the proceeds of sale of the mortgaged property after deducting the sum paid to the first mortgagees and the payments made to the executors.

Solicitors for the plaintiffs, Johnson, Weatherall, & Sturt, for W. G. Ekin, Nottingham.

Solicitors for the defendants, Peacock & Goddard.

(a.) Reported by R. Sillem, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Chan. Div.
North, J.

June 26, 1895.

In re JEFFERY.
ARNOLD v. BURT. (a.)

Infant—Maintenance—Income — Contingent interest — Conveyancing Act, 1881 (44 & 45 Vict. c. 41), s. 43.

Where property is settled on trust for such members of a class as shall attain twenty-one, the accumulated income will be divisible into as many shares as there are members in existence, one of such shares being payable to each adult, and one of such shares being applicable under the Conveyancing Act, 1881, s. 43, for the maintenance of each infant.

The fact that the class is capable of increase will make no difference.

Adjourned summons.

William Jeffery, who died in February, 1887, gave the residue his estate, both real and personal, to his trustees upon trust to sell and convert the same, and out of the income to pay certain life annuities and subject thereto to hold the same "in trust for all and every the present and future born children of my son Clayton William Jeffery and all and every the present and future born children (except William Charles Burt, who I declare shall take no benefit or interest whatsoever under this my will), of my said daughter Matilda Jane Burt, and all and every the present and future born children, including Frank Harry Burt of my daughter Pauline Mary Burt, who, whether in my lifetime or after my decease, being a son or sons, shall have attained or shall attain the age of twenty-one years, or being a daughter or daughters shall have attained or shall attain that age or shall have married or shall marry, and if more than one, in equal shares as tenants in common."

In In re Jeffery, Burt v. Arnold, 39 W. R. 234, [1891] 1 Ch. 671, North, J., held that the surplus income belonged to the grandchildren who had attained twenty-one at the time such income accrued and that section 43 of the Conveyancing Act, 1881, did not apply. He did not, however, make any order as to future income.

Application was now made by the trustees in consequence of the decision in In re Holford, 42 W. R. 563, [1894] 3 Ch. 30.

Carter Price, for the plaintiffs.

Coltman, for the adult grandchildren, said that the case was distinguishable from In re Holford, because there the class was not capable of increase.

Seddon, for great grandchildren.

Wright Taylor, for grandchildren under age.

North, J., said that in In re Jeffery, Burt v. Arnold, and afterwards in In re Adams, 41 W. R. 329, [1893] 1 Ch. 329, he took a certain view of the law; but in In re Holford the judges in the Court of Appeal had expressly said that In re Jeffery was wrongly decided. He there decided how the income then accrued due was to be applied, and that was past and done with; but he was now asked to make a declaration as to income that had not then accrued due. He did not think that the question was res judicata by his former decision, and the Court of Appeal having said that he was wrong in his former decision he would not then follow it, but hold that the income was not to be divided only among those who had attained twenty-one. He would accordingly make a declaration that the trustees had power under section 43 of the Conveyancing Act, 1881, to apply the shares of those under twenty-one for the maintenance and education of the respective infants.

Solicitors, Whitehouse & Etherington, for Tylee & Mortimer, Romsey; J. J. Harlow, for Goates & Blatch, Southampton.

(a.) Reported by G. B. HAMILTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Chan. Div.
Stirling, J.

July 3, 4; Oct. 31.

In re MASON'S ORPHANAGE AND THE LONDON AND NORTH-WESTERN RAILWAY CO. (a.)

Charity — "Scheme legally established" — Deed of foundation — Powers of sale — Consent of Charity Commissioners to the exercise of—Charitable Trusts Act, 1855 (18 & 19 Vict. c. 124), s. 29—Vendor and Purchaser Act, 1874.

The deed of foundation of a charity is not a "scheme legally established" within the meaning of section 29 of the Charitable Trusts Act, 1855:

Consequently, the trustees of a charity who contracted to sell land in exercise of powers of sale contained in their deed of foundation could not force their title upon the purchasers without first obtaining the sanction of the Charity Commissioners to the sale.

The trustees of a charity based their title to certain hereditaments, the subject of this summons, under a deed of foundation dated the 29th of July, 1868, the terms whereof it is immaterial to here set out.

The said deed was duly enrolled and perfected in accordance with the provisions of 9 Geo. 2 c. 36 and the amending Acts thereunto.

The said deed contained, inter alia, certain powers of sale and exchange, in exercise of which the trustees contracted with the London and North-Western Railway Co. to sell to the company the hereditaments aforesaid.

The railway company objected to the title on the ground that under section 29 of the Charitable Trusts Act of 1855 the trustees were precluded from exercising the said powers of sale without the consent of the Charity Commissioners, and they demanded that such consent should be obtained.

In the alternative they proposed to pay the purchase-money into court under section 69 of the Lands Clauses Act of 1845. The trustees declined to comply with either alternative, and the company then took out this summons to have it determined by the court whether the trustees could exercise the powers aforesaid without the consent of the Charity Commissioners.

Underhill, for the summons.—The sole question is whether the deed of foundation is a "scheme legally established" within the meaning of section 29 of the Charitable Trusts Act of 1855, which provides that it shall not be lawful for the trustees or persons acting in the administration of any charity to make or grant, otherwise than with the express authority of an Act of Parliament, or of a court or judge of competent jurisdiction, or according to a scheme legally established, or with the approval of the board, any sale, mortgage, or charge of the charity estate. I say the deed of foundation is not such a scheme. The phrase "scheme" occurs frequently both in this Act and also in that of 1853, of which it is an amending Act, whereas neither Act refers to a "deed of foundation." The policy of these Acts was to secure the proper administration of charitable funds through the supervision of some responsible public authority. If the trustees in the exercise of these powers of sale are only to be controlled by the terms of the deed of foundation the object of the Acts will clearly be evaded. The purchasers are entitled to ask that the trustees obtain the consent of the Charity Commissioners before the purchasers can be called upon to accept the title.

(a.) Reported by ARTHUR MORTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Hastings, Q.C., and Ingle Joyce, for the trustees of the charity.—The trustees of this charity have power to sell without consulting the Charity Commissioners, on the ground that the deed of foundation is a "scheme legally established" within the meaning of section 29 of the Act of 1855. The deed was duly enrolled and properly attested, and that makes it a "scheme legally established." Plaintiff's argument practically is that the word "scheme" has acquired a technical meaning, but the court ought not to give a technical meaning to a word without very careful consideration and upon very weighty grounds: Massy v. Rowen, L. R. 4 H. L. App., at p. 300, 18 W. R. H. L. Dig. 20. Then clearly in section 54 of the Act of 1853 the word "scheme" means a "plan"—i.e., a deed of foundation, and that indicates that the word has the same meaning in section 29: In re Campden Charities, 30 W. R. 496, 18 Ch. D. 310. The legislature never intended, by section 29 of the Act of 1855, to take away from trustees their powers of sale, and the word "legally" only means "in a legal way."

Underhill, replied.

Stirling, J. (after stating the facts as above set out) delivered a reserved judgment as follows:—What is usually meant by a scheme in connection with a charity is not the instrument of foundation, but a document sanctioned by some properly constituted authority containing directions for the administration of the charity. Previously to the passing of the Charity Act of 1853 such schemes were made by the Court of Chancery only, and they were mainly made in three classes of cases—i.e., (1) Where the directions in the instrument of foundation were ambiguous, imperfect, or otherwise insufficient; (2) where the directions had become under altered circumstances unsuitable to carry out the intention of the founder; and (3) where a scheme sanctioned by the court had in like manner become unsuitable for that purpose. In the Act of 1853, however, other authorities than the Court of Chancery were authorized to make schemes. Now the word scheme occurs in several sections of the Act of 1853 and in section 39 of the Act of 1855, and in all these places it is used to designate such an instrument as I have described. Primâ facie, then, it might be expected that the word would also bear the same meaning in section 29 of the latter Act. [His lordship here dealt with the language of the various sections of the Acts, and continued:—] Now I think that the use of the words "legally established" in connection with the word "scheme" seems to point to the intervention of some duly constituted authority, and as a matter of verbal construction I come to the conclusion that the words "scheme legally established" do not include the instrument by which the charity was founded.

It would, however, I think, be unsatisfactory to dispose of the case without considering what object the Legislature intended to attain by the enactment of section 29. Now this section prohibits three classes of transactions—i.e., (1) sales; (2) mortgages or charges; and (3) certain kinds of leases of charity estates; and it is desirable to see how the law stood with respect to such transactions prior to the passing of the Act of 1853. A sale, lease, or mortgage under an express power was good: see the judgment of Lord Cranworth in Attorney-General v. Hardy, 1 Sim. N. S. 338. Even where no express power of sale existed a sale might be made provided it were in accordance with a provident administration of the estate for the benefit of the charity, but the purchaser took subject to the obligation of showing that the sale was beneficial to the charity and justified by the circumstances, Attorney-General v. Warren, 2 Swans. 291; and In re Clergy Orphan Corporation, 43 W. R. 150, [1894] 3 Ch. 145, the court, although it had power to sanction the alienation of charity lands, exercised that power with great caution: Attorney-General v. The Mayor of Newark, 1 Hare 395. [His lordship here considered, at length, the principles which had been applied by the court in the cases of leases of various kinds made in respect of charity lands, and continued:—]

The statement of the law, which I have just made appears to disclose two blots, at least, in charity administration.

In the first place it was obviously difficult in many cases for a trustee, not acting under the direction of the court, to satisfy himself that the transaction in which he was engaging might not afterwards be held to be a breach of trust, and in the second place many transactions held by the courts to be within the powers of trustees, were, to say the least of it, of very doubtful expediency in the interest of the public.

By sections 21 and 24 of the Act of 1853 the Legislature authorized the Charity Commissioners to sanction leases, mortgages, sales, and exchanges of charity lands, and thus enabled the trustees to obtain protection in a cheap mode, and without putting either the charity estate or themselves to the expense of Chancery proceedings. In this way the first of the two blots was removed, and I think the second was intended to be wiped out by section 29 of the Act of 1855.

The view of the Legislature was that alienations of charity estates, by way of sale or mortgage, or by leases in reversion, or for lives or long term, or in consideration of fines, gave rise to abuses, which the law as it stood prior to 1855 did not adequately prevent, and that such transactions ought not to take place, except by the direct authority of Parliament, or with the sanction of the court or the Chancery Commissioners, both being authorities familiar with charity administration, and likely to be vigilant in guarding against its abuses. But founders of charities and their legal advisers were not necessarily cognizant of what had been done in past times, and might unwittingly introduce into the instruments of foundation, clauses which the experience of the courts or the Charity Commissioners would lead them to regard as highly objectionable. I do not suggest that the present vendors have done, or intended to do, anything which could possibly be treated as an abuse of their powers; but if their contention is well founded, it follows that the founder of a charity might, by introducing appropriate clauses into the foundation deed, effectually authorize his trustee to grant leases in reversion, or for lives, or long terms, or in consideration of fines, without the consent of the Charity Commissioners.

Now I do not think that that was intended by the Legislature. Section 29 of the Act of 1855 prohibits (inter alia) sales except under certain circumstances. It is for those who claim that their case falls within either of the excepted cases to make this out, and, upon a fair construction of the enactment, I think the present vendors have failed to do so.

The objection, therefore, raised by the purchasers is, in my opinion, well founded, and there will be declaration accordingly.

Solicitors, C. H. Mason; Burton, Yeates, & Hart, for Johnson, Barclay, Johnson, & Rogers, of Birmingham.

Chan. Div.
Vaughan Williams, J. } May 16; July 17, 1895.

In re STANDARD GOLD MINING CO. (a.)

Company—Winding up—Practice—Right to inspection of depositions taken under section 115 of the Companies Act, 1862—Companies (Winding-up) Rules, April, 1892, rr. 11, 32.

When a company is being wound up by the court, and an examination has been taken under section 115 of the Companies Act, 1862, every creditor and contributory whose claim or proof has been admitted is entitled under rule 32 of the Companies (Winding-up) Rules, April, 1892, as of right to inspect the file of proceedings and take copies of any documents therein.

Motion.

This was a motion by a contributory in the winding up of the company which was being wound up by the court to discharge an order made by his lordship in chambers refusing liberty to inspect and take copies of depositions taken under section 115 of the Companies Act, 1862. The motion also asked in the alternative for a declaration that the depositions were upon and formed part of the file of proceedings of the company under rules 11 and 12 of the Companies (Winding-up) Rules, April, 1892. The depositions in question were not filed on the ordinary file open to the inspection of contributories, but on a supplemental file kept for the purpose.

Bramwell Davis, Q.C., and Theobald, for the application, said that the applicant had first, an absolute right to inspect; or if not, the court in its discretion would allow inspection. They referred to General Order, November, 1862, r. 58; Companies (Winding-up) Rules, 1890, r. 180; Companies (Winding-up) Rules, April, 1892, rr. 11, 32; Re London v. Lancashire Paper Mills Co., 57 L. J. Ch. 766, 36 W. R. Dig. 25; Re Beall, [1894] 2 Q. B. 135; Re Greys Brewery Co., 32 W. R. 381, 25 Ch. D. 400, 408.

Gore Browne, for the liquidators, referred to the Bankruptcy Rules, 1870, rules 9 and 12, and Bankruptcy Act, 1883, s. 27; Ex parte Pratt, 31 W. R. 187, 21 Ch. D. 439; Vaughan Williams on Bankruptcy, ed. 4, p. 80; Re Norwich Equitable Fire Insurance Co., 32 W. R. 964, 27 Ch. D. 515; Re American Exchange in Europe, 58 L. J. Ch. 706, 38 W. R. Dig. 11; Re Gold Co., 27 W. R. 757, 12 Ch. D. 77.

Bramwell Davis, Q.C., replied.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J.—The question I have to decide is whether in a winding up a creditor or contributory is entitled under the rules to inspection of everything on the file, including depositions taken under section 115 of the Companies Act, 1862. The rules are rules 11 and 32 of the Companies (Winding-up) Rules, April, 1892. For the purposes of the present case I shall treat the depositions as if they were on the ordinary file directed to be kept by rule 11.

In Ex parte Pratt, which was a case in bankruptcy, the court seems to have considered that a creditor had not an absolute right to a copy of his depositions, but that it was a matter of discretion whether he should be allowed to have a copy. The right in bankruptcy was also discussed in Re Beall, where Lord Davey said: "The depositions were taken by the court at the instance of the official receiver, and were taken down by a shorthand-writer, who was sworn, who thereby became the agent of the court. They were, in fact, taken by the court itself for the purpose of the proceedings in the bankruptcy. Why they should not be placed on the file, like any other proceedings in bankruptcy, I am at a loss to understand, and, they being on the file, I can see no ground whatever for taking them off. They are placed there for the inspection of the debtor and of any other person who is entitled to inspect them under rule 12." Lord Davey says that it is a matter of right and I have some difficulty in reconciling what he says with what was said by the late Sir George Jessel in Ex parte Pratt.

I do not understand, from the statement of facts in North Australian Territory Co. v. Goldsborough Short & Co., 41 W. R. 501, [1893] 2 Ch. 381, which was a case in the winding up of a company, that the defendants, who were asking for leave to inspect the depositions, were creditors or contributories in the winding up; and it seems to me, therefore, that that case has no application to the present. I wish to say, however, that the rule applied by Lord Esher seems to be the same as that which used to be applied in bankruptcy, where inspection was invariably refused, even on the application of a creditor, until notice had been given of an intention to use the deposition in some judicial proceeding. Where the practice is inconsistent, I must give effect to the words of the rule. I cannot say that the applicant has not the right to see these depositions. It is very inconvenient that the practice should be in this state, as the court should have a discretion in the matter. If I had a discretion I should allow the applicant to see his own deposition, but not those of the other deponents.

Solicitors, Linklaters; Loughborough, Gedge, & Nisbet.

(a.) Reported by V. DE S. FOWKE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Q. B. Div.
(Cave and Wright, JJ.) } Oct. 26.

TANNER v. OLDMAN. (a.)

Metropolis — Building — Buildings to be carried out under a contract—London Building Act, 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 213), s. 212.

The provision in section 212 of the London Building Act, 1894, which exempts from compliance with its requirements buildings to be carried out under any contract entered into before the Act, includes buildings to be carried out under a building agreement made for the development of an estate.

Case stated by the metropolitan police magistrate sitting at Greenwich, under 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, and 42 & 43 Vict. c. 49.

Section 212 of the London Building Act, 1894, provides as follows:—"Notwithstanding anything contained in this Act, a building, structure, or work which has been commenced before and is in progress at the commencement of this Act, or which is to be carried out under any contract entered into before the passing of this Act, may be completed, subject to and in accordance with the provisions of the Acts relating thereto as in force immediately previous to the passing of this Act."

(a.) Reported by C. G. WILBRAHAM, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The appellant, a district surveyor under the Act for the district of Hatcham, served on the respondent a notice of objection to certain buildings which he proposed to erect in Musgrove-road, in the parish of St. Paul's, Deptford, on the ground that the plans did not conform to the requirements of the Act.

Under a building agreement between the Haberdashers' Co. and the respondent, dated the 3rd of January, 1894, the respondent had agreed to build forty-three dwelling-houses on four several plots of land, of which those to which objection was taken formed a part. They were to be built at a cost of not less than £380 each, at various times between the years 1894 and 1899. They were to be erected and completed in accordance with plans and specifications approved of by the company's surveyor, and it was further provided that the works should be executed in accordance with the regulations of the Metropolitan Building Act then in force, and any other Act for the time being affecting the premises.

The proposed houses would have satisfied the requirements of the Metropolitan Building Acts in force previously to 1894, but did not satisfy the provisions of the present Act. There was no evidence that the company's surveyor had seen or approved of the plans and specifications.

The respondent appealed to the police magistrate, sitting as a court of summary jurisdiction, who disallowed the objection and stated this case.

Cripps, Q.C., and Daldy, for the appellant.—The sole question is whether the word "contract" in the section includes an ordinary building agreement entered into for the development of an estate. It only includes a contract for the carrying out of a specific building or buildings. If building agreements were intended, the working of the Act would be postponed for an indefinite period, for such contracts often extend over a long period of time. The builder who enters into them takes the risk of the legislative requirements being altered. The buildings in this case could not be said to be "carried out" under the building agreement. The contract under which they would be carried out would be the specifications prepared and approved before their erection.

Jelf, Q.C., and Grain, for the respondent.—The owner is just as much interested as the builder in the continuance of the conditions on which he made his contract; for if a fixed sum had been named to be expended on each house, and the Legislature subsequently required, as in the present Act, increased thickness of walls, the builder, in order to recoup himself, would reduce the size and lower the character of the houses, a circumstance which might have a material effect on their selling and letting value and on the value of adjacent property. The Legislature must be taken to have declared, by means of section 212, that it will not interfere with arrangements made on the faith of the old law.

Cripps, Q.C., in reply.—It is admitted that if the respondent in this case were to make a sub-contract with another builder for the execution of the work the buildings would then be subject to the provisions of the Act. It follows that they are equally subject to those provisions if he executes the work himself.

CAVE, J., after reading section 212, said: The question in this case is whether the buildings were to be carried out under a contract entered into before the passing of the Act. There can only be one answer to that question—that they were. Several houses were to be erected at various times under a building contract. It was by that contract alone that the builder had power to enter on the land, and build the houses. Without that contract he would have been a trespasser. We are asked to narrow the meaning of the word "contract" in the section, and to say that it is limited to a builder's specifications. If the Legislature had desired that construction it could have substituted the word "specification" for "contract." A specification may be a contract, but all contracts are not specifications. The appeal must be dismissed.

WRIGHT, J.—I am of the same opinion. I cannot help thinking that when an Act like this is passed, which is capable of being opposed by private persons, a section of this kind occurring in it ought to be treated as a sort of compromise. At any rate, there is no reason for narrowing the ordinary meaning of the word contract.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitor for the appellant, Blaxland.

Solicitors for the respondent, Watson, Son, & Room.

C. C. R.
(Lord Russell of Killowen, C.J., Pollock, B., and Grantham, Lawrance, and Wright, JJ.) July 27, 1895.

REGINA v. WAUDBY. (a.)

Criminal law—Wounding—Aiding and abetting—Indictment for felonious wounding—Conviction for misdemeanour only—Prevention of Offences Act, 1851 (14 & 15 Vict. c. 19), s. 5—Accessories and Abettors Act, 1861 (24 & 25 Vict. c. 94), s. 8.

Where a prisoner is indicted for felonious wounding, and is convicted only of the misdemeanour of unlawful wounding, a person who is indicted with him for aiding and abetting the felony may be convicted of aiding and abetting the misdemeanour.

Case stated by Lawrance, J., as follows:—

John Waudby and William Waudby were tried before me on the 17th of May last, at the assizes held at Leeds, upon an indictment charging John Waudby with feloniously, &c., shooting, with intent to do grievous bodily harm to one William Featherstone, and William Waudby was charged with aiding and abetting John Waudby to commit the said felony.

In the second count of the indictment the charge against John Waudby was for feloniously wounding, with intent to do grievous bodily harm, and against William Waudby for being present, aiding, and abetting, &c., the said John Waudby to commit the said felony.

The jury found John Waudby guilty of unlawfully wounding, and William Waudby guilty of aiding and abetting, and it was objected on behalf of the prisoner, William Waudby, that, as he was only aiding and abetting a misdemeanour, he was entitled to be acquitted on the said indictment.

I overruled the objection, and released the said William Waudby on recognizances to come up for judgment when called upon.

The question for the consideration of the court is whether I was right in so holding.

No counsel appeared for the prisoner or for the prosecution.

LORD RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN, C.J., after reading the case, said:—We are of opinion that the learned judge was clearly right. It is provided by section 5 of 14 & 15 Vict. c. 19, that "if, upon the trial of any indictment for felonious wounding, the jury are satisfied that the defendant is guilty of the wounding, but are not satisfied that he is guilty of the felony, they may acquit him of the felony, and find him guilty of unlawful wounding, and he is to be liable to the same punishment as if he had been convicted of the misdemeanour of wounding."

(a.) Reported by T. R. COLQUHOUN DILL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Then section 8 of 24 & 25 Vict. c. 94, provides that, "whosoever shall aid, abet, counsel, or procure the commission of any misdemeanour, shall be liable to be tried, indicted, and punished as a principal offender." I think that these two enactments must be read together, and that William Waudby was properly convicted of the commission of the misdemeanour, in which fn fact he was a principal offender.

POLLOCK, B., and GRANTHAM, LAWRANCE, and WRIGHT, JJ., concurred.

Conviction affirmed.

Privy Council.

(From the Supreme Court of New South Wales.)

July 3, 1895.

MORRIS v. THE OFFICIAL ASSIGNEE OF THE ESTATE OF E. W. COOKE. (a)

Bill of sale—Fraudulent assignment—Intent to defeat and delay creditors—13 Eliz. c. 5.

The appellant made an advance of £600 in good faith to a man apparently solvent, but who afterwards became bankrupt, taking as security an assignment of the stock-in-trade, book debts, and other property of his debtor. It was arranged that the bill of sale was not to be registered, but there was no evidence that the assignment was made with intent to defeat or delay creditors. Possession was only taken by the appellant just before the bankruptcy, but in time to prevent the instrument being avoided under the Bills of Sale Act.

Held, that the title of the appellant was complete, and did not depend upon his taking possession, though, if he had not done so, the provisions of the Bills of Sale Act might, in certain events, have deprived him of his security.

In re Ash, 20 W. R. 849, L. R. 7 Ch. App. 636, distinguished.

This was an appeal from the Supreme Court of New South Wales. The facts sufficiently appear in the judgment of their lordships.

Warmington, Q.C., and F. Thompson, for the appellant.

Reed, Q.C., and Carrington, for the respondents.

The judgment of their lordships (Lord HERSCHELL, L.C., and Lords HOBHOUSE, MORRIS, DAVEY, and Sir RICHARD COUCH) was delivered by the Lord Chancellor.

This is an appeal from an order of the Supreme Court of New South Wales reversing an order of Owen, J., sitting as judge in bankruptcy, who refused to declare a bill of sale given by the bankrupt to the appellant on the 11th of July, 1892, void as against the official assignee of the bankrupt.

The assignment included all the stock in trade, book debts, and other property of the bankrupt. It appears that he was indebted in a sum of £500 to a Mr. Warner, who required payment. The bankrupt accordingly sought, through the agency of a Mr. Tomkins, to obtain a loan for the purpose of enabling him to discharge this debt, and of providing him with further funds. Tomkins applied to the appellant to make the advance. He promised to lend £600, upon obtaining as security a bill of sale. While the negotiations were proceeding, the appellant was under the impression that the proposed borrower was a brother of the bankrupt. Upon his discovering that this was not the case, he at first refused to make the loan, but ultimately agreed to do so, and a bill of sale was executed and the money advanced on the 11th of July, 1892.

Owen, J., who heard the case, states in his judgment (as their lordships think with perfect correctness) that there was no evidence that the bankrupt was at that time in any financial difficulties. The case then stands thus:—The appellant made the advance of £600 in good faith, as the judge found, to a man who, as far as appears, was solvent, taking as security the assignment in question, of which he is primâ facie entitled to the benefit. It is asserted, however, that the assignment was made with intent to defeat or delay creditors within the meaning either of the Act 13 Eliz. c. 5, or of the Bankruptcy Act then in force, and is, therefore, void as against the respondent. The bill of sale was not registered, and possession was not taken by the appellant until immediately before the bankruptcy, but it was taken in time to prevent the instrument being avoided under the provisions of the Bills of Sale Act.

It was incumbent, therefore, on the respondent to prove the intent, which he alleges, to defeat or delay the creditors of the bankrupt. For this purpose he relies on what passed with reference to the registration of the bill of sale at the time the transaction was entered into. There is some conflict of evidence as to this. The appellant asserts that it was he who insisted that the bill of sale should not be registered, on the ground that as he was a medical man and not a money-lender he did not wish his name to appear, in connection with a loan, upon the trade register. His evidence is confirmed in this respect by Tomkins. In a prior deposition in bankruptcy the appellant said:—"It was aranged that the bill of sale was not to be registered. I agreed to this." There appears to be no inconsistency between this statement and his evidence at the hearing. The bankrupt in his evidence did not contradict the appellant's statement that the idea of non-registration emanated from the appellant, though on his examination in bankruptcy he had said that he thought he asked the appellant not to register the bill of sale as it would injure his credit. The appellant denied this, and the learned judge in whose presence the witnesses were examined believed this denial, and said that no one who heard the bankrupt give his evidence could doubt that he was an unreliable witness.

Their lordships, therefore, can have no hesitation in accepting the appellant's account of what had happened. They entertain no doubt that the sole reason why the appellant did not register the bill of sale was that which he gave, and that there was no agreement that he should refrain from registering it at the instance, and for the benefit, of the bankrupt.

The respondent, however, further relies upon an alleged agreement by the bankrupt to inform the appellant if "things were not looking so bright," so that he could either register the bill of sale or take possession under it. The learned judge says:—"The respondent" (the present appellant) "at first denied this, then he said he did not remember, and finally he volunteered the statement that he would not undertake to say that the words were not used. I must, therefore, take it that those words may have been used, but even so, it does not show an intent on the respondent's part to defeat or delay his creditors."

(a.) Reported by CHARLES H. GRAFTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

In view of the fact that the learned judge treated the appellant as a witness of truth, and characterized the bankrupt as an unreliable witness, it may well be doubted whether, if it were material, any finding adverse to the appellant could properly be based upon this evidence of the bankrupt, even though the appellant would not undertake absolutely to contradict it. But their lordships entirely agree with learned judge of first instance that even if the bankrupt volunteered, as he alleges he did, to give the appellant information if his circumstances should become precarious, it does not assist the respondent's case.

The question is, with what intent the assignment was made, and not why the appellant refrained from registering or postponed taking possession. Their lordships see no evidence that the assignment was made with intent to defeat or delay creditors. They think the transaction was a perfectly honest and straightforward one. The intent of the bankrupt who made the bill of sale was to obtain an advance of £600, which he could not get except upon the terms of his giving that security. The intent of the appellant who made the advance was to obtain security for his loan. Their lordships do not believe that there was on the part of either of them any other intent.

It was suggested for the respondent that as the appellant knew that Warner, who was unsecured, was to be repaid out of the advance of £600, it was really a device for transferring Warner's debt to the appellant, and so giving a security for it which could not safely have been given to Warner in respect of an antecedent debt due to him. There appears to their lordships to be no pretence for this suggestion. If the assignment was not vitiated by any such intent as is alleged, it is immaterial to inquire why the appellant refrained from registering or postponed taking possession. He was under no legal obligation to do either. No doubt unless he registered or took possession he incurred the risk of losing his security. So long as he did neither, his security would have been avoided by an execution or a bankruptcy. But he was entitled to run this risk if he pleased. Subject to this risk the law in England as well as in New South Wales allows a title to be acquired by an assignment without delivery of possession.

This is, in their lordships' opinion, the answer to the reasons which appear to have mainly influenced the Supreme Court. It is quite true that credit may probably have been given to the bankrupt after the date of the bill of sale which he would not have obtained if that transaction had been made public either by registration or a change of possession. But when the Legislature determined to interfere with secret bills of sale they did not render all assignments void unless accompanied by delivery or followed by registration. The operation of the Bills of Sale Act was much more limited.

The learned chief justice in the Supreme Court relied much on the case of In re Ash, 7 L. R. Ch. Ap. 636. In that case a bill of sale was given in respect of an antecedent debt, and at a time when the grantor was in a condition of insolvency. It was, therefore, primâ facie bad. It was sought to validate it upon the ground that the advance had been made on a promise that a bill of sale should be given, and that the sum advanced was, therefore, to be treated as a present advance on the security of that instrument. The court whilst admitting that as a general rule this would be so, thought that the rule did not protect transactions where the giving of a bill of sale was purposely postponed until the trader was in a state of insolvency in order to prevent the destruction of his credit, which would result from registering a bill a sale.

The chief justice said in his judgment in the present case that "there was a close analogy between the case of postponing the giving of a bill of sale and postponement in entering into possession." Their lordships cannot agree with this view. In the case relied on, the bill of sale was given by an insolvent person without any present advance, and of itself could not avail the grantee. He invoked the aid of a prior promise made at the time of the advance but, for the reasons given, the court held that he could not derive any benefit from this promise.

In the case under appeal the bill of sale was granted, in respect of a present advance, by a person not shown to be insolvent. The title of the grantee was then complete, and did not depend upon his taking possession, though, owing to his not doing so, the provisions of the Bills of Sale Act might in certain events have deprived him of his security. Beyond this his title was unaffected by it.

Their lordships will humbly advise Her Majesty that the judgment appealed from should be reversed and the order of the judge in bankruptcy restored, and that the respondent should pay the costs in the Supreme Court and the costs of this appeal.

Solicitors for appellant, Field, Roscoe, & Co.

Solicitor for respondent, Lumley & Lumley.

Court of Appeal.

From Chan. Div. (Lindley, Lopes, and Rigby, L.JJ.) — Aug. 9, 1895.

LINFOOT v. POCKET. (a.)

Bill of sale—Condition or defeasance—Book of "rules and regulations"—Payment of principal and interest by instalments—Form—Validity—Bills of Sale Act, 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 31), s. 10 (3)—Bills of Sale Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 43), Schedule.

The plaintiff, having borrowed £100 from the defendant, executed a bill of sale which provided for the repayment of the sum by instalments. Upon paying the first instalment, about a month after the execution of the bill of sale, the plaintiff received from the defendant a book in which to enter receipts for instalments, and which contained upon the cover a "notice" and certain "rules and regulations which are strictly adhered to." The "notice" and the "rules and regulations" prejudicially affected the position of the plaintiff as borrower, and the defendant subsequently attempted to enforce the rules against him.

Held (reversing the decision of Kekewich, J.), that the "notice" and the "rules and regulations" were not in any way a part of the bargain, and could not be considered as a "condition or defeasance" so as to avoid the bill of sale under section 10 (3) of the Bills of Sale Act, 1878.

The bill of sale provided for the repayment of the £100 and interest as follows:—"The sum of £6 on the 5th of December, 1894, on account of interest and princi- pal, and a like sum of £6 on account, as aforesaid, on the 5th day of each and every succeeding month thereafter."

(a.) Reported by ARNOLD GLOVER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Held, that, upon the true construction of the bill of sale, instalments of £6 were to be paid until the last instalment, when, if less than £6 was found to be due, such less sum only was to be paid; that, though the calculation involved might be a little more difficult than in the case of the form in the Schedule to the Bills of Sale Act, 1882, the bill of sale was not thereby rendered void; and that there was nothing in the form in the Schedule which forbids a loan upon the terms that the principal and interest shall both be paid by equal instalments.

In re Bargen, [1894] 1 Q. B. 444, approved.

Appeal from Kekewich, J.

On the 5th of November, 1894, the plaintiff was induced by an advertisement offering to lend money at five per cent. and issued by the defendant under the name of Wilberforce, to borrow £100 upon a bill of sale of his furniture.

The bill of sale contained an assignment of chattels by way of mortgage to secure payment of £100 and interest thereon at 1s. in the pound per month, and the plaintiff thereby agreed to pay "the sum of £6 on the 5th of December, 1894, on account of interest and principal, and a like sum of £6 on account as aforesaid, on the 5th day of each and every succeeding month thereafter."

On the plaintiff paying the first instalment on the 6th of December, he received from the defendant a small book in which to enter receipts for instalments and which, upon the cover, contained a "notice" and also certain "rules and regulations which are strictly adhered to."

The notice was in the following terms:—"It has come to the knowledge of Mr. Wilberforce that certain unprincipled persons have written to clients (the more especially where there is a bill of sale existing) offering and professing to assist them in evading the repayment of their loans (their sole object being to extort large sums of money by way of fees, &c.) Borrowers are hereby informed that they render themselves liable to be convicted of felony should they either remove their goods, chattels, or effects, or assign them by way of security to anyone, or should they obtain a loan on the same elsewhere without the consent of Mr. Wilberforce, and furthermore should any county court or other judgment be registered, or any executions be entered against them, or whenever Mr. Wilberforce considers he is likely to lose the security of the goods, chattels, or effects, the bill of sale will be immediately enforced without notice. Should you, therefore, receive any communication from persons offering their assistance, Mr. Wilberforce will feel obliged by your forwarding the same to him without delay."

The "rules and regulations" contained a number of provisions adversely affecting the position of the borrower, which the defendant subsequently attempted to enforce against the plaintiff. In a letter addressed to the plaintiff on the 21st of December, 1894, the defendant stated that he treated the instalment-book as part of the contract.

The plaintiff brought this action to have the bill of sale declared void, two grounds of objection being taken before Kekewich, J.—viz., 1 That the plaintiff was induced by fraud to execute the bill of sale, and (2) that the instalment-book constituted a "condition or defeasance" which avoided the bill of sale by virtue of section 10 (3) of the Bills of Sale Act, 1878. That section provides that "if the bill of sale is made or given subject to any defeasance or condition, or declaration of trust not contained in the body thereof, such defeasance, condition, or declaration shall be deemed to be part of the bill, and shall be written on the same paper or parchment therewith before the registration, and shall be truly set forth in the copy filed under the Act therewith and as part thereof, otherwise the registration shall be void."

Kekewich, J., decided in the defendant's favour on the first point, but on the second objection he decided in the plaintiff's favour, and set aside the bill of sale.

The defendant appealed. By a cross notice of appeal the plaintiff raised the further objection that the bill of sale was not in the form prescribed by the schedule to the Bills of Sale Act, 1882.

Reed, Q.C., and A. Powell, for the appellant.—The book of rules and regulations is merely a convenient way of informing the borrower of dates for the payment of instalments. It is no part of the contract.

They referred to Counsell v. London & Westminster Loan Co., 36 W. R. 53, 19 Q. B. D. 512.

Bramwell Davis, Q.C., and Manby, for the respondent.—The book of rules and regulations ought to be treated as a condition. The defendant intended to enforce them, and he cannot be heard to say they were not a part of the contract. The policy of the Bills of Sales Acts will be violated if such a course is sanctioned. Moreover, the bill of sale is void by section 9 of the Bills of Sale Act, 1882, inasmuch as it is not in accordance with the schedule to that Act. It is not permissible to have an instalment made up partly of principal and partly of interest. The case of In re Bargen, [1894] 1 Q. B. 444, is wrongly decided. In the present case it is impossible for the borrower to tell how long it will take him to pay off the debt. The defendant's conduct constitutes an indirect violation, an evasion of the Act: Jefferies v. Alexander, 8 H. L. Cas. 594, 9 W. R. Dig. 10.

They referred to Davis v. Burton, 32 W. R. 423, 11 Q. B. D. 537; Goldstrom v. Tallerman, 35 W. R. 68, 18 Q. B. D. 1; Edwards v. Marston, 39 W. R. 165, [1891] 1 Q. B. 225, and Moorhouse v. Wolfe, 46 L. T. N. S. 374, 30 W. R. Dig. 51.

Reed, Q.C., in reply.—The statutory form contemplates the payment of principal and interest together. The bargain is only to pay while something remains due, therefore the last instalment need not be exactly £6.

He referred to Hazlewood v. Consolidated Credit Co., 39 W. R. 54, 25 Q. B. D. 555; Simmons v. Woodward, 40 W. R. 641, [1892] A. C. 100; Lumley v. Simmons, 35 W. R. 423, 34 Ch. D. 698; Weardale Coal & Iron Co. v. Hodson, 42 W. R. 424, [1894] 1 Q. B. 598; In re Wood, Ex parte Wolfe, [1894] 1 Q. B. 605.

Bramwell Davis, Q.C., replied upon the question of form.

LINDLEY, L.J.—This is an appeal from a decision of Kekewich, J., declaring that a bill of sale is void, and in contravention of the Bills of Sale Act, and that the same ought to be delivered up by the defendant to the plaintiff to be cancelled. Then there is an offer to redeem on payment of £100, and interest at the rate of 5 per cent.

Now the question arises in this way. On the 5th of November, 1894, the plaintiff was induced, by an advertisement issued by the defendant, a person named Pocket, who trades as Wilfrid Wilberforce, described as of 11, Stroud Green-road, Finsbury Park, to go and borrow money of him, and he has good reason to repent it ever since. The plaintiff borrowed £100, and signed this document. [His lordship read the material part of the bill of sale, and after referring to the fact that five per cent. in a money-lender's mouth meant five per cent. per month, continued:—] Now the plaintiff in this action impeaches this document, mainly on the ground of fraud, and upon the ground that it is subject to a condition or defeasance which is not expressed in it; and there was also a point raised that it is not in accordance with the Bills of Sale Act, 1882.

As far as the plaintiff's case rested upon the ground of fraud, Kekewich, J., decided against him; that is to say, the learned judge decided against him so far as he sought relief on the ground that he had been taken in and cheated when he signed the bill of sale. There is no reason whatever for quarrelling with that decision, because the man was not cheated into signing the bill of sale. Although he was fool enough to be attracted by this advertisement, he, being a man of some intelligence and quite capable of reading what he signed, went and signed this document, wanting, of course, the money. That part of the case, therefore, fails.

The next point, and the one which has been the most urged before us, is that this document was accompanied by some condition or defeasance which was not expressed in it, and which, by reason of its not being expressed, rendered the bill void under the Bills of Sale Act, 1878, s. 10, clause 3, which runs thus—[His lordship read the clause, and continued:—] Was there any condition or defeasance which ought to have been embodied in this Bill of Sale? It appears to me, when one understands the facts, that obviously there was not. The bill of sale was executed, and there was no bargain, no condition, no defeasance, nothing which was part of that bargain. The bargain was complete, the money was paid, and the bill of sale was executed.

What happened afterwards was this. The plaintiff paid the first instalment of £6, and then he received a little book containing certain things called "rules and regulations which are to be strictly adhered to." Those "rules and regulations" are oppressive in the extreme. [His lordship referred to the notice, which he described as preposterous and atrocious, and to the rules and regulations, and continued:—] Now, if those "rules and regulations" were part of the bargain, no doubt they would fall within section 10, clause 3, of the Act of 1878. But they were not part of the bargain; and although Mr. Wilberforce said he understood them to be so, or rather said that they were actually so, we cannot, I am afraid, fairly or properly retort upon him: "We will take you at your word and hold that to be part of the bargain which never was so." He tried to bully or frighten his borrower, and he succeeded in doing so, I dare say, but we cannot on that account hold that these regulations which were first seen by the borrower a month and more after the contract was complete were in any way part of the bargain. He knew nothing about them, and I cannot accede to the suggestion that we ought to hold them as conditions of the bargain merely because one side said he thought they were part of the conditions when the other side had never heard of them. We could not so hold in a case where the parties concerned were two honest people, and we certainly cannot so hold in a case like this in favour of one man, who certainly deserves censure.

Then comes a totally different point. It has been argued before us, and I thought at first there was something in it, that this bill of sale was void as not being in accordance with the form in the schedule to the Act of 1882; and the objection is that by mixing up, as this bill of sale does, the principal and interest together and making the whole debt payable by equal instalments of £6 monthly, the first being payable on the 5th of December, 1894, the borrower cannot find out when he has paid off his security—that he cannot find out when the last instalment of principal is due or when the last instalment of interest is payable.

Now unquestionably this is a serious matter to borrowers, because such a piece of paper as this in the hands of unscrupulous men like Wilberforce would possibly be used for the purpose of gross oppression. I feel that very strongly, but it does not follow that it constitutes a ground on which we can hold this bill of sale to be void. The first thing we have to do is to construe it; and we must construe a bill of sale as we would construe any other instrument, that is with the view of understanding it in reference to the transaction to which it relates. After all, the transaction comes to this: it is one for lending money—it is a loan transaction; and although the principal sum and interest is to be repaid by instalments of £6 each, if, when you come to the last instalment, there is not so much as £6 due, you must pay what is due. I think that is the obvious construction to be put upon it. But it has been urged that that does not get over the difficulty, because you cannot find out when the loan is at an end—when the principal has been paid off; and at first I thought that was a serious matter. But when we look closely at the form, I do not think we can go so far as to say this bill of sale is void as not being in accordance with the form. The form given in the schedule runs thus: [His lordship read the form, and continued:—] There is no time specified there, but as the whole loan must be repaid I agree that, if you construe this form of document as it was construed by Fry, L.J., in the case of Goldstrom v. Tallerman and read it as a contract to pay the principal and interest by equal instalments, "interest then due," in parentheses, you can ascertain by a not very difficult calculation how much principal or interest you have paid off, and how much you ought still to pay. But still calculations have to be made—you cannot get at it without some calculation—and I cannot say that a bill of sale is void because that calculation is made a little more troublesome. I think that is a sound principle to go on, and I observe that Lord Halsbury in the case of Simmonds v. Woodward says this, addressing himself to another objection, which I do not deal with now: "It appears to be this, that whereas an example is given of the form in the schedule, in which you are to state when the instalments are to be due, and the Legislature has there suggested a form in which the instalments are to be equal, therefore, unless the sum lent, together with interest"—now this is the important part—"(because it appears to me that the interest is an essential part of the instalments, according to the provisions both of the Act itself and of the forms suggested in the Act, to give effect to the bill of sale) is capable of accurate sub-division, you cannot do it—that you cannot possibly make a bill of sale which shall have an unequal division of the sum lent." If I understand that, it means this: That the then Lord Chancellor did not quite adopt the construction put upon this bill of sale by Fry, L.J.; but whether that is so or not, in the face of that and of the other decisions which have been referred to, and which I will refer to presently, I do not think we can say that because a bill of sale requires a little more calculation than the form in the schedule, it must necessarily be void under the clause in the Act which says that bills of sale shall be void if they are not in accordance with that form. If you look at the form it is impossible to say that it forbids the loan upon the terms that the principal and interest shall both be paid by equal instalments. It is not possible to say that, though the interpretation is not so clear as at first sight appears; but what we have been asked to say is that a bargain such as this, which is common enough in the case of building societies, is necessarily bad if made in the form of a bill of sale. We are not prepared to go that length.

Now, with regard to the authorities which have been cited, I do not think it is necessary to look at them, or at all events to refer to them at any length. The cases of Goldstrom v. Tallerman and Edwards v. Marston are not very difficult to deal with, because you can find out what the payments are without much difficulty as regards principal and interest. Then as regards the case before Vaughan Williams, J., Bargen's case, where the terms were a little different, you have not got what you have here, that the instalments, the £6 per month, are to be on account of interest and principal, still it is quite obvious from the reasoning of that learned judge that he was of opinion, and I think he was right, that you cannot say that a bill of sale which is otherwise unobjectionable, is void because you have to make a calculation a little more difficult than that which you must make even if you adopt the form which is given in the schedule.

For these reasons I am of opinion that this appeal must be allowed.

LOPES, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I am bound to say I have felt, if it could be done legally, that I should like to declare this bill of sale void, but after much consideration I fear that is not possible.

Several points were taken before the learned judge in the court below. It was contended that this bill of sale was obtained by fraud. The learned judge heard evidence upon that matter and considered it and came to the conclusion that that point was not established, and I think he was right in so holding, because it is impossible to say, having regard to the circumstances, that the borrower was deceived by the bill of sale. He was an intelligent person, able to read and write and able to understand what he saw. He read the bill of sale, and had an opportunity of forming his own opinion with regard to its effect, and he signed it. It is impossible, therefore, to say that he had been induced by fraud to sign and become a party to that bill of sale. I should so hold, and I think the learned judge was right. That disposes of that point.

Then another point was taken and it was this. It was said that the bill of sale was subject to a certain condition or defeasance such as is contemplated by the Act of 1878, section 10, sub-section 3, which has been already referred to and read by my brother Lindley. Well, I think that means a condition or defeasance which is part of the bargain, but here, as far as I can discover, it is impossible to say that there was any condition or defeasance which was part of the bargain. It was said there was a book sent containing rules and regulations, and that they formed part of the bargain, and that in point of fact by subsequent letters the borrower himself admitted they were part of the bargain. Now, I cannot come to that conclusion. That those rules and regulations, dealt with as they were by Mr. Pocket, were very much in the nature of a scandalous attempt on his part to affect the borrower and terrify him, I have not the slightest doubt. When did that book first come to the knowledge of the borrower? Never until a month after the bill of sale had been executed. It was then that that book was first introduced to his notice; he had never heard of it, and knew nothing of it at the time of the bargain; and in my opinion he never assented in any way which would have been binding upon him to any one of the terms which are contained in that book. It was an attempt, in my opinion, of a most disgraceful kind, to intimidate the borrower, but to say that it amounts to such a condition or defeasance as is contemplated by section 10 of the Act of 1878 is impossible, and, therefore, that point fails.

But then there is another point raised, which is more difficult to deal with. It is said the bill of sale is bad in not complying with the statutory form. It was put in this way: that with regard to that portion of the bill of sale which provides for repayment of the loan, it mixes up principal and interest in a way which makes it difficult to understand (the amount being payable by equal instalments) what portion is attributable to principal, and what to interest, difficult to say when the debt or loan would be paid off, difficult to know on what terms the borrower might redeem. It was said that all this is so ambiguous, so uncertain, and so embarrassing and confusing that it amounts to a deviation from the statutory form, and, therefore, renders the bill of sale bad. Upon that point the form adopted was relied upon in this way—namely, that it was impossible, except by extending the period of payment to a very remote time, to come to the conclusion that it was to be paid off by equal instalments—the instalments provided for being these equal amounts—of £6. At first I was rather struck with that difficulty, but on consideration I do not think much of that point, because at the end, assuming the balance did not amount to £6, it could be paid off according to the cases which have been brought to our notice. The question is whether this point is a good one. Is there such a deviation from the statutory form as would render this bill of sale bad? In my opinion there is not. If you look at the statutory form it is impossible to say that even where there is a literal observance of that form some calculation will not be involved—that is to say, a calculation of what is principal and what is interest, and other matters; and the only difference I can see between the statutory form and the present form is this, that in the present case it would be a rather more complicated calculation to make, than that which would have to be made if the statutory form were observed. I do not think that is enough to render a bill of sale bad. I adopt the opinion expressed by Vaughan Williams, J., in In re Bargen, which was referred to, and which is as follows:—"The statutory form contemplates that the principal sum, together with the interest then due, may be paid by equal instalments covering principal and interest."

I feel, therefore, that it is impossible to set this bill of sale aside; and I again say I am very sorry to have to come to that conclusion.

RIGBY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. With regard to the point of fraud I do not think there was any fraud in the procuring of the contract. I think there was fraud attempted in reference to the rules and regulations, which Wilberforce knew as well as anybody else were not part of the contract. In that attempt, and in the unprincipled way he put them forward as part of the contract I think there was fraud, though I do not see that it succeeded, because the borrower, upon taking advice, was able to see that this was an attempt to impose upon him and he was not really imposed upon.

With reference to the point of condition, of course that cannot be a condition in any way which was not made known to the other side; and, therefore, the putting forward of those rules and regulations, however improper it might have been or otherwise, would not make them part of the contract.

With reference to the other point, I confess that for some time I was rather disposed, if possible, to find an objection; I should not have been sorry, that is to say, if any objection ultimately satisfactory to me could have been made to this form. But we are bound, of course, to administer the law and to construe the document, and not, because we disapprove of the conduct of one of the parties, to strain the construction too heavily against him; and I think there is nothing contained in the form given in the schedule to the statute which would prevent an instrument in the form we have in this case taking effect as a bill of sale.

I cannot quite follow Mr. Bramwell Davie's argument upon the case of Goldstrom v. Tallerman. There the suggestion was very much that the form given for an instrument of this kind was the only form which could be permissible under the statute. Fry, L.J., says:—"It is suggested that the form here requires the computation of the whole interest upon the principal at once, the addition of this sum to the principal and the division of such total sum into a stipulated number of instalments." That is not exactly the present case, because he assumes there a stipulated number of instalments. But it is very like the present case, like it, I think, in all respects except that one circumstance that the instalments were to work themselves out and there was no number of instalments stipulated for. Then he says that construction is excluded. That is the construction he puts upon it. He does not say at all, as I understand, that it is improper to include principal and interest in one instrument, in one instalment, but that you are not obliged to do it, and he got at that by saying, "We think the words 'together with interest then due' are parenthetical." I dare say they are, but whether parenthetical or not I see no decision here that it would not be legal, that it would be a substantial departure from the form in the schedule to take principal and interest into account at once and to make the loan repayable in that manner, which is practically the way in which building societies loans are very generally made repayable.

Now, if that be so, I do not think there is much left, except this, which weighed upon me a good deal at first, that it would require not an easy calculation but a somewhat difficult one, a calculation which in fact a vast number of people entering into these small transactions would not be able to make. There again it is pointed out that it is not quite a simple thing to calculate interest upon the statutory form, and agreeing that it is rather a simpler case if you pay instalments of principal until the whole of the principal is got rid of, and then pay the interest, still it is not quite a simple thing to calculate even that, that is to say, there are a vast number of people who could not do it to save their lives, but would have to get assistance even if fairly intelligent people; and I certainly cannot adopt as a principle that because in this case the arithmetic would be somewhat more difficult, there is, therefore, a substantial departure from the form given in the schedule. If we were to hold on a very literal construction that you are bound to have a state of things in which the whole principal and interest could be paid by equal instalments, these being instalments of £6, I am still of opinion that if that were a problem proposed to a mathematician he would answer in the way I did, that in order to do that, you would be obliged to calculate interest on the principal first of all, treating it as a loan for a term, and in doing that it would take a very long time, indeed, I gave it I think during the argument as 100 months.

I am satisfied that is not the way to construe the contract, but that it really comes to this, that you are to pay the instalment of £6, until there comes a last instalment which will not equal £6, and that when you get to that you must pay that last instalment, though it is not £6. It seems to me that that is the business-like way of dealing with the contract, and I am unable to find that there is anything in it on which we can say that this bill of sale is void.

LINDLEY, L.J.—The appeal will be allowed with costs, and judgment will be entered for the defendant, but without costs.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitors, J. W. Greig; R. Aylward.

High Court of Justice.

Chan. Div. / North, J. — Oct. 28.

In re GOODALL.
GOODALL v. GOODALL. (a.)

Inland Revenue—Probate duty—Partnership—Option to purchase partnership premises within period after testator's death—Will—Extension of period—Option exercised in extended period—Conversion—Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1881, s. 27.

The proceeds of sale of real estate, sold after a testator's death, in order to be liable to probate duty must have been sold pursuant to a contract subsisting at the death.

A testator, in partnership with his sons, agreed in the partnership deed that the sons should have the option to purchase the partnership premises, consisting of freeholds and leaseholds, within a certain period after his death. By his will he extended the period. The sons exercised the option after the original period fixed by the articles had expired, but within the extended period.

Held, probate duty not payable on the proceeds of sale of the freeholds.

Originating summons asking (inter alia) whether probate duty was payable under the following circumstances.

Prior to 1889 the testator, Josiah Montague Goodall, carried on business at the "Camden Works," such works were his private property, and were partly freehold and partly leasehold.

On the 17th of October, 1889, the testator took into partnership his two sons, and the deed of partnership, article 4, after reciting that the testator had demised to the two sons the Camden Works by deed of even date for the term of twenty-one years at the annual rental of £2,000, and subject to the covenants and conditions therein contained, continued: "The said two sons are hereby declared trustees of the said lease for the firm, and it is hereby agreed that if the firm shall be desirous of purchasing the reversion in fee simple of the said Josiah Montague Goodall in such part of the said premises as is of freehold tenure, and the unexpired residue of the term of years granted in such part of the said premises as is of leasehold tenure, subject to the rent and lessor's covenants reserved by and contained in the last mentioned premises by the lease under which the said J. M. Goodall holds the same, at the price of £27,000, and shall, within six months from the death of the said J. M. Goodall, give to the trustees of his will, or one of them, a notice in writing to that effect; then and in such case the persons then constituting the firm shall be deemed the purchasers of the freehold and leasehold reversion to the premises aforesaid, at the price of £27,000, subject to the following conditions." [It is unnecessary to state the conditions as they were not followed in the purchase when it took place.]

(a.) Reported by R. SILLEM, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

By a subsequent agreement endorsed on the partnership deed, and dated 26th of August, 1892, it was agreed that the purchase money, if the option were exercised, should be £30,866, and the option given to the firm was ratified and confirmed.

By his will dated the 9th of August, 1893, the testator devised and bequeathed all his real and personal estate to his trustees upon trust to convert, "subject as respects the premises where the business of Goodall & Sons is now carried on to the option of purchase hereinafter mentioned," and he directed the trustees if the option to purchase given by the articles of partnership were not exercised, to sell the said premises under the trust for sale of his residuary real and personal estate: and his will continued: "And whereas, under the articles of partnership entered in between me and my two sons dated the 17th day of October, 1889, as modified by a deed endorsed thereon dated the 26th day of August, 1892, the persons constituting the firm of Charles Goodall & Son have the option for a period of six calendar months after my death of purchasing the business premises of the said firm at the price of £30,866, Now I hereby declare that such period of six calendar months shall be extended to three years."

The testator died on the 15th of October, 1893.

The sons did not exercise the option within six months of the death, but gave a verbal notice within the period of three years that they would purchase on certain terms not contained in the articles or in the will, and the property was conveyed to them by two deeds, one deed dealing with the freehold and the other with the leaseholds. In the former were included certain other freeholds which the testator, by his will, gave the sons the option of also purchasing. They were duly valued pursuant to the directions contained in the will at the sum of £3,900. The total purchase moneys in these deeds amounted to £34,766, from which being deducted the £3,900, left the sum of £30,866 the agreed purchase money for the Camden Works. These conveyances did not refer to the option given by the articles, but purported to be made by the trustees pursuant to the trust for sale contained in the will.

The Crown claimed probate duty on the proceeds of sale of the freeholds produced by the exercise of the options, and consented that the question should be raised in the originating summons which had been taken out to have decided sundry questions arising on the will.

Upjohn, for the executors.—The will created another option—viz., an option to purchase the same property on the same terms, except that the option is exerciseable at any time within three years from the death instead of only within six months. And since the sons exercised the option given them by the will, that is to say, after the expiration of the time limited by the articles, the doctrine of Lawes v. Bennett, 1 Cox 167, has no application, as the conversion did not take place by virtue of any contract entered into by the testator in his lifetime, but took place solely by virtue of the directions contained in the will. It is similar to a devise of real estate upon trust for sale, in which case probate duty is not payable upon the proceeds of sale. Probate duty is only payable on property vesting in executors virtute officii: Attorney-General v. Brunning, 8 W. R. 362, 8 H. L. Cas. 243; Attorney-General v. Hubbuck, 32 W. R. 170, 12 Q. B. D. 275.

Vernon Smith, Q.C., and Vaughan Hawkins, for the Crown.—The property was purchased under the original option given by the articles, but extended to three years. The testator in his will refers to the to the articles of partnership, and says: "I hereby declare that such period of six calendar months shall be extended to three years." The mere extension of the time within which the option is to be exercised does not affect the contract by which the deceased had bound himself under the partnership articles to sell at a given price. The other essentials of the contract were to remain the same as before. The term of three years is substituted for the period of six months, but that is all. The deceased remained bound to sell for £30,866. If the option had been exercised within six months probate duty would have been payable. The term of three years instead of six months became of the essence of the contract: Barclay v. Messenger, 22 W. R. 522.

NORTH, J., after stating the facts and referring to the material parts of the partnership deed and will, continued:—In my opinion, in the present case probate duty is not payable on the proceeds of sale of the real estate. The option was not exercised within six months after the testator's death. Nothing at all was done until after the time had expired, and then a verbal notice of an intention to exercise the option was given. Whether or not a verbal notice was sufficient is not worth considering, because a conveyance has been executed, and it may be that that would supply any deficency in the notice in the first instance. It was not, however, until six months had expired that notice was given, even verbally, that the surviving partners would exercise the option. Some time afterwards the property was taken over by the sons. I should say this—that when they did give notice they only gave notice that they would purchase on certain terms, which were not contained either in the partnership article or in the will—viz., that the purchase-money should be left on mortgage for some time, and that appears to have been done. Now there are three points that might be suggested. First, that the purchase was made under the option contained in the partnership articles; secondly, that the purchase was made under the option contained in the will; and, thirdly, that the purchase was made as on the face of the conveyance it is expressed to be made, by agreement between the trustees with power to sell and the persons purchasing. The question as to probate duty being payable depends upon whether or not the option given under the partnership articles was exercised. In my opinion it clearly was not exercised. It was an option to be exercised by notice in writing given within six months after the testator's death. It was a contract existing between the parties at the time of the testator's death, and his estate was subject to that contract. If that contract had been carried out by the sons exercising the option, the conversion effected by the acceptance of the option takes effect from the time at which the contract was made; that is a period antecedent to the death of the testator. If, in the events which have happened, there turns out to have been a contract subsisting at the death of the testator for the sale of the property, which has been carried out, the purchase-money arising from that sale is subject to probate duty. But unless there was some such contract existing at the date of the testator's death there was no conversion at that time, and if there was no contract in existence at the testator's death resulting in a conversion, a trust for conversion or an option to purchase contained in the will itself would not make probate duty incident to the proceeds of what was, in that view, real estate at the time of the testator's death.

Now, as to what the effect of the contract contained in the articles was I have expressed my opinion. I think it is clear that there was a contract pending at the testator's death. If it had been carried out and the parties had exercised their rights under it, there would have been a conversion, but when the six months expired after the testator's death, without the notice being given, it was impossible for the sons then to say that they had any rights whatever in this property under a contract contained in the articles. Any right which they had when they actually agreed to purchase, could only have been under the will, and the extension in the will of the period, during which the option might be exercised, was, no doubt, a beneficial disposition in favour of the members of the firm. If the value of the property had increased beyond the price fixed to be paid for it, the increased value would have been a benefit given to the members of the firm, which they could have taken if they liked. But that would have been a legacy under the will, and could not affect the question as to what property there was at the testator's death, upon which probate duty was actually payable. I have abstained from expressing any opinion whatever upon whether the sons did take under the option contained in the will, or by virtue of an independent contract with the trustees, because I have not before me the persons interested in that question, nevertheless, as regards the crown, the result is the same. Probate duty is not payable, because, no matter who took the property under the dispositions contained in the will, it was real estate at the time of the testator's death.

Solicitors, Morley, Shirreff & Co.; Solicitor to Inland Revenue.

Chan. Div. North, J. June 22, 25, 1895.

PEGGE v. NEATH AND DISTRICT TRAMWAYS CO. (a.)

Tramway company—Tramways Act, 1870 (33 & 34 Vict. c. 78), ss. 28, 56—Enforcing penalties against tramways company—Distress—Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879, s. 43—Debentures—Receiver and manager.

There is nothing against public policy in allowing penalties imposed for the protection and the safety of the public to be enforced by distress and sale of the goods and chattels of a tramway company.

Summons for leave to distrain.

The Neath District Tramways Co. was formed in 1873 by a provisional order made under the Tramways Act of 1870, and confirmed in the usual way by Act of Parliament.

Clause 8 of the provisional order provided that "the promoters shall at all times maintain and keep in good condition and repair the rails of which any of the tramways should for the time being consist, and if the promoters at any time fail to comply with this provision or with any of the requirements of the Tramways Act, 1870, they shall be subject to a penalty not exceeding £5 for every day on which such act of omission continues, and such penalty may be recovered as by clause 56 of the said Act, is provided."

Section 28 of the Tramway Act, 1870, provides that "the promoters shall, at their own expense, at all times maintain and keep in good condition and repair with such materials and in such manner as the road authority shall direct, and to their satisfaction, so much of any road whereon any tramway belonging to them is laid as his between the rails of the tramways, &c."

Section 56 of the same Act provides that " . . . all penalties . . . may be recovered and enforced as follows:—In England before the justices of the peace, in manner directed by the Act 11 & 12 Vict. c. 43, and any Act amending the same."

On the 8th of February, 1895, the Neath Petty Sessional Divisional Court at the instance of the Glamorgan County Council as the road authority imposed on the company penalties to the amount of £435 for not keeping in good condition and repair the rails of their tramways, and the payment of the penalties was to be enforced by distress and sale as provided by the Tramways Act, 1870.

In 1875 the company had issued debentures by which they charged "the undertaking, lands, houses, stables, plant, property, and effects, both present and future, of the company."

The debenture-holders commenced an action in September, 1894, to realize their security, and on the 3rd of October the vacation judge made an order appointing a receiver and manager of the undertaking and business of the company.

This order was not appealed from, and in January, 1895, the usual judgment in a debenture-holders' action was pronounced.

This was an application for the leave of the court that, notwithstanding that the receiver was in possession, the county council might enforce the penalties by distress. By consent the summons was treated as if it had asked for a declaration of the rights of the council under the distress—viz., whether the council were entitled to proceed to sale.

Vernon Smith, Q.C., and J. G. Wood, for the county council, argued that Marshall v. South Staffordshire Tramways Co., 43 W. R. 469, [1895] 2 Ch. 368, showed that the court would not now appoint a receiver and manager, and that, as the county council were not parties to the application appointing the receiver and manager, they could not be prejudiced by it, and that an application to the court was only necessary because its officer was in possession. Gardner v. London, Chatham, and Dover Railway Co., 15 W. R. 325, L. R. 2 Ch. App. 201, has no application here, and does not prevent these penalties being recovered as provided. The penalties exist in order that the public may be protected by the tramway being kept in good repair.

Ashton Cross, for the debenture-holders and the company.—There are, no doubt, cases where a distress could issue and a sale take place without interfering with the undertaking, but that is not so in this case, for there is no surplus stock or anything of that kind which could be sold. Any sale must make it impossible for the company to carry on business, and so the public will be inconvenienced. These debentures were only a floating security till the appointment of a receiver, but on that happening the debenture-holders became entitled to the undertaking: Legg v. Mathieson, 2 Giff. 71, 8 W. R. Ch. Dig. 67.

NORTH, J., after stating the facts and that there could be no distress levied without the leave of the court, because of the appointment of the receiver and manager, continued:—The result, therefore, is that the application now is made by the county council for leave, notwithstanding the appointment of a receiver, to exercise their rights of distraining. The debenture-holders object, and it is necessary to see what their position really is. Now in Gardner v. London, Chatham, and Dover Railway Co. Lord Cairns said—[the learned judge read from p. 211 of the report (L. R. 2 Ch. App.), and continued:]—Let me remark that what was charged there was the undertaking; but in my opinion the words in the present debentures really mean the same thing. The operative words begin by charging "the undertaking." Then certain details which are included in it are mentioned, but that, in my opinion, does not alter the effect of its being a general charge on the undertaking. Gardner's case, as is well known, related to a railway company, and the courts have to some extent regarded a tramway company as in a different position. There is a power contained in the Tramways Act to sell a tramway with the consent of the Board of Trade, while there is no such power in the case of a railway. The order appointing a receiver and manager made by the vacation judge in this case merely followed other orders made by other judges to a similar effect in similar cases. There has been no appeal from that order, but the question whether there is jurisdiction to make such an order has in the meantime been decided with respect to a tramway company by the Court of Appeal in Marshall v. South Staffordshire Tramways Co. There it was decided that the rule laid down as to a railway company in Gardner's case applies to a tramway company, overruling certain decisions to the contrary effect. The principle of Gardner's case applies to all tramways governed by the Tramways Act, 1870, whether the promoters are local authorities, or private individuals, or companies formed under the Companies Acts, 1862, or companies created by special Act of Parliament.

(a.) Reported by R. SILLEM, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

It is clear, therefore, that according to that decision, in the case of such a tramway company as the present, a receiver and manager such as was appointed in this case ought not to have been appointed, a special receiver of tolls might have been appointed, but that is a different matter altogether. The order made in this action by the vacation judge has not been the subject of appeal, and therefore it is binding upon the parties to it; but the county council are not parties to the action, not represented in it, and they are not bound by that decision. It is open to them to say that, notwithstanding that the receiver and manager has been appointed in very large terms, they are not affected by it. Of course they are affected to the limited extent that, there being an officer of the court in possession, they cannot touch the property which he holds without the leave of the court. But they get over that difficulty by coming here for leave to distrain. It is a case, therefore, in which the debenture-holders have not, in my opinion, as against the county council any right by reason of there having been a receiver and manager appointed in this action. It follows, therefore, that I must give the county council leave to exercise their power of distress, notwithstanding the appointment of the receiver.

But, then, counsel on both sides asked me to decide what the rights would be under the power to distrain, and Mr. Cross pointed out that, if in point of fact, there is a power to distrain and sell what is distrained, the very difficulty will arise that the public convenience arising from the existence of a tramway will be impaired and interfered with. He says that if part of the rolling stock is seized and sold the use of the tramway for public purposes will, in Lindley, L.J.'s, words, be defeated, or at all events seriously affected; and, so far as the public are concerned, they will be equally affected by a sale, whether the sale is made by the debenture-holders or by anybody else. But to that observation I think two remarks apply. In the first place the cases I have referred to are cases dealing with the power of debenture-holders. The Glamorgan County Council do not stand in the position of debenture-holders or anything like it. Their powers, are express statutory powers, given to them by the Tramways Act, 1870, and the provisional order relating to their own tramway, confirmed by Parliament in 1873. It is not a question, therefore, of the company handing over its property to its creditors. It is a case of a body whom the Legislature recognizes as having a right to distrain, and in my opinion I cannot interfere with that right. There is this further to be said; the argument that the property comprised in the undertaking of the tramway must not, in the interests of the public, be interfered with, really has not any application. The provisional order provides that the promoters shall, at all times, maintain and keep in good condition and repair the rails of which any of the tramways shall for the time being consist. This power of distress is expressly conferred for the purpose of compelling the promoters, as far as they can be compelled, to maintain and keep in good condition and repair the lines of the tramway. If that is neglected, the public convenience will be sacrificed, because if the rails are not safe they cannot possibly be used by the public. This power, which is given here, is really a power not doing something that will interfere with public convenience, but a power given to secure public convenience in the best way.

It is a case, therefore, in which the exercise of the power will not defeat any such purpose of giving rights to the public as Lord Cairns referred to in Gardner's case.

In my opinion, therefore, the Glamorgan County Council must have leave to distrain, and, in my opinion, they are entitled to exercise the power of distress without any interference by and notwithstanding the claim of the debenture-holders of the company. I have not said anything as to how they can sell. I think their rights in that respect are regulated by the statute.

The statute of 1879, it is suggested, repealed the earlier statute. The Act is altered, no doubt, and varied to a considerable extent, but I do not find that it is repealed. The 43rd section of the Act of 1879 says "the following regulations shall be enacted with respect to warrants of distress issued by a court of summary jurisdiction." Then it proceeds to lay down how they are to be executed, and, of course the county council must proceed in accordance with the Act of Parliament.

Solicitors, Helder, Roberts, Son, & Walden, for Morgan & David, Neath; Charles Everitt, for Curtis, Neath.

Chan. Div. }
Stirling, J. } July 23; Nov. 5.

CARTER v. CARTER. (a.)

Married woman—Deed of settlement by—Acknowledgment—Copyholds—No surrender made—Declaration of trust—Fines and Recoveries Act (3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 74), s. 77.

A., a married woman, with the concurrence of her husband, by a deed duly acknowledged made a declaration of trust in respect of certain copyhold hereditaments. No surrender was ever made by A.

(a.) Reported by ARTHUR MORTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

On the death of A., her customary heir, B., was duly admitted tenant on the court rolls in her stead.

Held, that the declaration of trust was a disposition within the meaning of section 77 of the Fines and Recoveries Act, and, consequently, that B. was bound by the trusts thereof.

This was an action for the execution of the trusts of a post-nuptial settlement.

The settlement was dated the 2nd of January, 1878, and was made between James Carter and Susannah Carter, his wife, of the one part and the defendants, John and Edward Sayers (his trustees), of the other part, whereby after reciting, inter alia, that Susannah Carter was admitted tenant on the court roll of the Manor of West Tarring in the county of Sussex in respect of certain copyhold hereditaments, the said James Carter covenanted with the trustees to concur with the said Susannah Carter in surrendering to the lord of the manor the said copyholds to the use of the trustees, their heirs and assigns, to the intent that the trustees should, when admitted, hold the same upon the trusts thereinafter declared concerning them. And it was also agreed that in the meantime and until the said premises should be surrendered, the said Susannah Carter and her heirs should stand seised of the said premises upon the aforesaid trusts. The deed reserved to the said Susannah Carter, an absolute power of appointment, and until and in default of such appointment, the trustees were to hold the said premises upon trust to pay the annual income thereof to the said Susannah Carter during her life for her separate use, and after her death to pay the same to the said James Carter if he survived her, and after the decease of the survivor to sell the said premises and to divide the proceeds thereof amongst the children of the marriage in equal shares.

The said deed of settlement was acknowledged by Susannah Carter and a memorandum thereof duly enrolled in the Court of Common Pleas on January 4, 1878. Susannah Carter died on November 20, 1884, without having exercised the power of appointment aforesaid. The copyhold hereditaments settled by the indenture of settlement were never surrendered to the trustees, the said Susannah Carter continuing tenant upon the court rolls up to the date of her death. James Carter, her husband, died on the 24th of October, 1892. There were several daughters but only one son born of the said marriage and he predeceased his mother, leaving issue a son, the defendant, Alfred James Carter, who was, according to the custom of the said manor, her customary heir, and he was duly admitted as tenant in respect of the above-mentioned copyhold hereditaments on the 8th of May, 1894. There was no custom in the manor which required the lord thereof to take notice of trusts, nor was there a custom which entitled the husband of a female copyholder to any estate by the curtesy.

The question for the court was whether the defendant, A. J. Carter, as the customary heir of Susannah Carter, was beneficially entitled to the said copyhold hereditaments, or whether he was only a trustee thereof for the beneficiaries under the said deed of settlement.

Robertson Macdonald, for the beneficiaries other than the infant customary heir.—The heir is bound by the trusts. Copyholds can be bound by a declaration of trust by a feme sole; of that there is no doubt: Steele v. Waller, 28 Beav. 466, 9 W. R. Ch. Dig. 17. As to the proviso in section 77 of the Fines and Recoveries Act, "Provided always that this Act shall not extend to lands held by copy of court roll, of or to which a married woman, or she and her husband in her right, may be seised or entitled for an estate at law in any case in which any of the objects to be effected by this clause could, before the passing of the Act, have been effected by her, in concurrence with her husband, by surrender into the hands of the lord of the manor of which the lands may be parcel," that proviso has no application, because the wife cannot, by surrender into the hands of the lord of the manor either before or after the Act, declare herself a trustee of the copyholds. The lord of the manor is not bound to take any notice of trusts. With respect to the construction of section 77, it has been laid down that it enables a married woman to pass her separate real estate by deed or will as a feme sole: Crofts v. Middleton, 4 W. R. 439, 8 De G. M. & G., at p. 212; Pride v. Bubb, 20 W. R. 220, L. R. 7 Ch. App. 64.

W. D. Rawlins, for the infant defendant.—The infant heir is not bound by this trust, on the ground that no surrender was ever made by Mrs. Carter. The Fines and Recoveries Act has no application to the property, because of the proviso at the end of section 77. The wife ought to have surrendered to the use of the trustees, and then a deed should have been executed declaring the trusts, whether the declaration appeared on the court rolls or not. Before the Act a married woman could dispose by surrender with the concurrence of her husband. The object of the Act, therefore, was not to provide for dispositions by a married woman, but rather to enable her to dispose of the equitable estate. This is a voluntary settlement, and therefore the infant beneficiaries are volunteers, and must not be assisted by the court; and, moreover, a declaration of trust is not a disposition for the purpose of barring an estate tail, and hence it is not a disposition for any other purpose: Green v. Paterson, 34 W. R. 724, 32 Ch. D. 95. A declaration of trust is inoperative without a surrender, and the heir is consequently absolutely entitled.

Swann, for the trustee.

Macdonald replied.

Cur. adv. vult.

STIRLING, J. [after stating the facts above set out, continued:—] The deed of settlement was purely voluntary. An effectual disposition of property may be made without consideration in two ways—i.e., either by doing such acts as amount at law to a conveyance or assurance of the property, or the legal owner of the property may, by one or other of the valid modes, constitute himself a trustee thereof, and may, without an actual transfer of the legal title, deprive himself of the beneficial interest: Richards v. Delbridge, 22 W. R. 584, L. R. 18 Eq. 11.

Now I think the draftsman of this deed knew the law, and intended to avail himself of the second mode of disposition I have just mentioned, and the question is, Has he effectively done so? Mrs. Carter never divested herself of the legal ownership of the property, but she did by the deed of 1878 declare herself a trustee for it, and if she had been at that date a feme sole, I think these trusts would have been binding on her heir. She was, however, under coverture, and the question which I have to decide reduces itself to this, whether a married woman, tenant on the rolls of copyholds, can, by deed acknowledged under the Fines and Recoveries Act, effectually declare herself a trustee of those copyholds. The answer depends on section 77 of the Act. It is thereby enacted that a married woman may dispose of land of any tenure (excepting in the case where she is tenant in tail, which is elsewhere provided for), provided that the disposition be by deed, concurred in by her husband and acknowledged by the wife in the manner therein stated. (There is a proviso to the section, which I will consider later.) With all these requirements the deed of 1878 complies. The first question which arises on the enactment is whether a declaration of trust is a disposition. The words "dispose" and "disposition" in the Fines and Recoveries Act are not technical words, but ordinary English words of wide meaning. Where not limited by the context, those words are sufficient to extend to all acts by which a new interest (legal or equitable) in the property is effectually created. A declaration of trust on the part of a feme sole, whereby she effectually parts with the entire equitable interest in property of which she remains legal owner, certainly appears to me to be a disposition in equity of that property. This appears to have been the opinion of Lord Hatherley, L.C., in Pride v. Bubb.

It was said, however, that the contrary was decided in Green v. Paterson, which is a decision binding upon me. That case, as far as it is material to the present, related to copyholds of which a married woman was tenant in tail, and tenancies in tail are expressly excluded from the operation of section 77 of the Fines and Recoveries Act, and depend on the prior sections 15 and 40. It is quite true that section 15, by which a tenant in tail was empowered to dispose of the lands entailed, uses the word "dispose," which is used again in section 77; but section 40 limits the mode of disposition by enacting that every disposition of lands under the Act by a tenant in tail thereof should be effected by some one of the assurances (not being a will) by which such tenant in tail could have made the disposition if his estate were an estate at law in fee simple absolute, and no disposition by a tenant in tail vesting only by contract should be of any force at law or in equity under the Act. The effect of that is that the mode of disposition to bar an estate tail is limited to such an instrument inter vivos as would be effectual to pass a legal estate in fee simple. A mere declaration of trust, of course, could not pass a legal estate, and consequently I entirely agree, if I may be allowed to say so, in the decision of the Court of Appeal in Green v. Paterson, that a mere declaration of trust would not bar an estate tail. The language of Fry, L.J., might, no doubt, admit of a wider meaning, and that is what is relied upon. He says: "In the first place, the statute requires that the instrument to bar the estate tail shall be a disposition, and I find in this case nothing like a disposition. It is a mere declaration of trust by the lady." Those words, taken literally, would seem to indicate an opinion that a mere declaration of trust was not a sufficient disposition within the Fines and Recoveries Act, but I think that they ought to be read as applying only to the point then actually calling for decision, and not as intended to affect the construction of section 77, which was not then under consideration by the court, and all the more so as I do not observe that Pride v. Bubb was cited to the court in the argument. In section 77 I find nothing which requires the disposition to be made by such an assurance as is required by section 40.

It is next contended on behalf of the heir that the transaction falls within the concluding proviso of section 77, which is this: "Provided always that this Act shall not extend to lands held by copy of court roll of or to which a married woman, or she and her husband in her right, may be seised or entitled for an estate at law in any case in which any of the objects to be effected by this clause could, before the passing of the Act, have been effected by her in concurrence with her husband by surrender into the hands of the lord of the manor of which the lands may be parcel." In my opinion, the object intended to be effected by the deed of 1878 was that Mrs. Carter should declare herself a trustee of the legal estate in the copyholds then vested in her, or, in other words, to effect a disposition of the equitable interest without disturbing the legal title. I fail to see how this object could be effected by a surrender of that estate into the hands of the lord of the manor, for the effect of such a surrender would be to alter the legal title, and, therefore, the present case does not seem to me to come within the proviso.

In my opinion, therefore, the heir is bound by the trusts, and judgment must be given in favour of the plaintiffs. I declare that the heir is bound by the trusts of the deed, and that he is a trustee of the legal estate vested in him for the purposes of the deed, and I direct a proper assurance to be executed, with liberty to apply in chambers for a vesting order.

Solicitors, H. Sowton, for J. C. Buckwell, Brighton; Henshall Fereday; H. E. Griffith, for G. P. Holmes, Worthing.

Chan. Div. }
Stirling, J. } Oct. 30

In re DARLING.

FARQUHAR v. DARLING. (a.)

Charity—Will—Gift to "service of God."

A gift by will for the "service of God" is a good charitable bequest.

Adjourned summons.

Elizabeth Caroline Darling made her will, dated the 13th of May, 1871, in the following terms:—"I, Elizabeth Caroline Darling, desire that at my death all of which I may die possessed with the exception of the few legacies and gifts I may hereafter make, shall go to the poor and the service of God." The testatrix then, after directing a sale of her effects and appointing executors of her will, specified certain charitable, &c., institutions intended to be benefited by her bequest.

By a codicil to her will, dated the 13th of May, 1891, the testatrix directed an annuity to be purchased for the benefit of her coachman and bequeathed a legacy to her cousin.

The testatrix died on the 10th of February, 1895, and her will and codicil were proved on the 9th of March, 1895.

This was a summons by the executors asking what were the several charitable institutions meant and intended by the testatrix in the bequests given by her will to several charitable institutions nominatim, and for an order that the executors might be at liberty to distribute the ultimate residue of the testatrix's personal estate in certain proportions among certain named charitable institutions. The question arose whether the bequest to the poor and the service of God was a good charitable gift.

Phipson Beale, Q.C., and Dundas Gardiner, in support of the summons.

Graham Hastings, Q.C., and Onslow, for the next of kin.—This is not a good charitable gift: Budget v. Hulford, W. N., [1873] 175; Townsend v. Carus, 3 Hare, 257.

Ingle Joyce, for the Attorney-General.—This is a good charitable purpose: Tudor's Charitable Trusts, p. 10; Powerscourt v. Powerscourt, 1 Moll. 616; In re Sutton, Stone v. Attorney-General, 28 Ch. D. 464, 33 W. R. Dig. 243. In the latter part of the will there is a good gift to charities even if you strike out the earlier part. The fact that legacies are given is sufficient to pass the whole residue.

(a.) Reported by ARTHUR MORTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Dibdin, for one of the charities named in the will.

STIRLING, J.—In this case the testatrix commences her will as follows:—[His lordship read the clause set out above, and continued:—] The question is whether that is or is not a good charitable gift. When it is said that it is not good, the meaning is that it includes under it objects which are not recognized by the laws of charity. There can be no question that a gift for the benefit of the poor is good, but it is said that one for the "service of God" is not. It is said that the "service of God" includes much that is not religious, and in a sense that is true. There is an ancient document where the congregation is desired to pray for the welfare of those who serve God in Church and State. A distinction is drawn, therefore, between Church and State, but equally the persons prayed for are to serve God. Hence in a certain sense acts which are not religious are said to be in the service of God. But I have to construe this according to the plain and ordinary meaning of words used by English testators, so that when the service of God is referred to, it must be taken to mean service in a religious sense, similar to such services as are referred to in the document I have mentioned when service in the Church is spoken of. Therefore, I come to the conclusion, even if the point were unaffected by authority, that a gift to the poor or for a religious purpose is good. But the point is not without authority. The same or a similar question came before Manners, L.C., in Ireland in a case of Powerscourt v. Powerscourt. There there was a devise to lay out, at their discretion, £2,000 per annum until the testator's son came of age, "in the service of My Lord and Master, and, I trust, Redeemer." This was held a good charitable devise. The judgment of the Lord Chancellor is this: After referring to certain Statutes of Elizabeth, he says: "These cases prove that pious uses are a branch of charity, and as such are recognized and and carried into effect in this court. . . . I am of opinion that a bequest to pious uses sufficiently designate a specific object, and that this cannot be distinguished from a bequest to pious uses." It has not been disputed before me that a bequest for religions purposes is a good charitable bequest, and, on the authority of the case to which I have referred, I hold that the whole estate is well given to charity.

Solicitors, H. W. Lyall; Bell, Steward, May & Snow; Solicitors to the Treasury; Bridges & Co.

Chan. Div.
Kekewich, J. } Aug. 7, 1895.

WILLIAMS v. QUEBRADA RAILWAY, &c., CO. (LIMITED). (a.)

Practice — Discovery — Privileged communications — Production — Fraud—Inspection by judge—R. S. C., ord. 31, r. 19a, sub-rule 2.

Communications between a solicitor and his client as to the subject-matter of an alleged fraud are not privileged from production in an action where fraud is charged.

Summons.

This was a debenture-holder's action for enforcing their securities.

By the statement of claim it was alleged that the company entered into an agreement shortly before the commencement of the action with its agents, Messrs. Matheson & Co., the sole consignees for the sale of the company's ores, by which, without disclosing the existing charges, the company purported to charge all its property with a large sum alleged to be due from it to their agents, Matheson & Co.; that the company was at the time insolvent and its stoppage imminent, and that the charge was only given to defeat and delay the holders of the debentures.

Matheson & Co. were defendants with the company, and it was asked that the agreement might be set aside.

The company shortly after went into liquidation, and the liquidators filed an affidavit of documents in this action claiming privilege for portion of the minute and agenda books as containing copies of or extracts from counsels' opinions and solicitors advice on matters on which the company required and obtained advice.

The plaintiff now applied for production.

A. R. Kirby, for plaintiff.—The statement of claim charges the defendant company with fraud, and so privilege cannot be claimed: R. v. Cox, 33 W. R. 396, 14 Q. B. D. 153.

Rowden, for defendant company.—All communications between a party and his solicitor are privileged: Minet v. Morgan, 21 W. R. 467, L. R. 8 Ch. App. 361. R. v. Cox and R. v. Orton cited in R. v. Cox were both criminal cases: Follett v. Jefferyes, 1 Sim. N. S. 3; In re Postlethwaite, Postlethwaite v. Rickmer, 35 W. R. 563, 35 Ch. D. 722.] His lordship suggested that he should see the documents, to which both parties consented.]

KEKEWICH, J., said.—It is essential to the proper administration of justice that the privilege of protection from production to an opponent of those communications which pass between a litigant or an expectant one and his solicitor should be upheld. It is said that this case, being one of fraud, is taken out of the ordinary rule, and that no protection can be claimed on the ground of privilege. What are the facts? The plaintiff and others are holders of debentures and debenture stock of the defendant company—a first charge—which, it is said, is obstructed by another charge given by the defendant company in favour of their agents with the intention of defeating and delaying their security. It is also said the company was insolvent and the charge was given to prevent for a time the inevitable stoppage. It is difficult to say that that is not a charge of fraud. The liquidators make an affidavit of documents claiming protection for the copies or extracts from the opinions of counsel and advice of the sompany's solicitors with reference to this charge contained in the minute books. Are they entitled to it? In R. v. Cox it was held that where there is a charge of fraud the protection of confidential communications between a client and his solicitor on the ground of privilege is not allowed. But it is said that was a criminal case, and that in civil cases something more is necessary; but R. v. Cox is based on general principles and does not draw any distinction between crime and civil fraud, and is applicable to both civil and criminal cases.

Ord. 31, r. 19*a*, sub-rule 2, provides that: "Where on an application for an order for inspection privilege is claimed for any document it shall be lawful for the court or a judge to inspect the document for the purpose of deciding as to the validity of the claim of privilege." My difficulty here was whether I could insist on seeing the documents in question, because the rule says for the purpose of deciding as to the validity of the claim of privilege, and I had already made up my mind that the claim of privilege was invalid. I wished to see them because I wished to stop if I could the production of useless documents. Counsel assented to my seeing them, and I have come to the conclusion that the plaintiff's counsel must have the opportunity of seeing them. They are certainly relevant, but whether they support the plaintiff's charge of fraud I do not say.

(a.) Reported by F. T. DUKA, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Order for production. Defendants to pay costs in any event.

Solicitors, Ashurst, Morris, Crisp, & Co.; Henry Kimber & Co.

Chan. Div. }
Romer, J. } Oct. 29.

ROOKE v. DAWSON. (a.)

Scholarship — Education — Award — Passing best examination — Number of marks — Discretion of examiner.

When a scholarship under a trust is to be awarded to such candidate as shall have passed the best examination in subjects to be determined by an examiner, such scholarship may be refused to the candidate who has obtained the highest number of marks if, in the opinion of the examiner, he has not passed a satisfactory examination.

This was an action brought by the plaintiff as an infant, suing by his father as next friend, for a declaration against the trustees of an indenture dated the 31st of October, 1854, establishing a scholarship known as "the Bousfield Scholarship," at Mill Hill Nonconformist Grammar School, Hendon, Middlesex, for a declaration that he, the plaintiff, was entitled to be put in possession of a scholarship which the defendants refused to award to him.

The facts of the case were as follows.

Under the indenture above mentioned it was declared that the trustees of the scholarship in question should stand possessed of the sum of £1,000, and of the investments for the time being representing the same, as a scholarship at the Protestant Dissenters' school at Hendon aforesaid to be held at one of the two colleges therein named, one of which was University College, London, and tenable for three years. It was provided in the deed that after the avoidance of the scholarship by the founder's grandsons, who were therein named as scholars without examination (which avoidance had long since occurred), and every subsequent avoidance thereof, except such avoidances as were mentioned in rule 8 of the said indenture, that the scholarship should be awarded to the pupil leaving school and going to such colleges as aforesaid who should pass the best examination in subjects to be determined upon from time to time by the examiners, and who should have been at Mill Hill School for the time and age therein prescribed.

Condition 8 provided that in the event of the avoidance of the scholarship by any means within three years from the date of the last avoidance of the scholarship, if no half-yearly payment should have been made, the next highest boy at the examination who was duly qualified should succeed, otherwise it should remain vacant until the next June and should then be offered at a public examination as aforesaid.

At an examination held in September, 1893, at which four boys competed, the plaintiff obtained the third place. The successful candidate, however, did not comply with the conditions, and the scholarship in consequence was not awarded to him. The second candidate subsequently by deed poll disclaimed all interest in the scholarship. The trustees, however, did not award the scholarship, but in June, 1894, held a second examination at which the candidates were the plaintiff and another boy, H. M. Spicer.

In this examination the plaintiff obtained 570 and Spicer 496 marks. The examiner, however, reported that neither candidate, in his opinion, deserved the scholarship, and that the plaintiff did not show sufficient knowledge of the subjects in which he was examined to justify an award to him. If awarded at all he suggested that the scholarship should be divided between the two boys, either equally or proportionately to the number of marks obtained by them.

The plaintiff subsequently entered at University College, London.

Hopkinson, Q.C., and Wurtzbury, for the plaintiff. —The plaintiff is entitled to the scholarship, as he has fulfilled all the conditions required by the trust deed. He obtained the highest number of marks in the examination, and he has entered at University College, London. It is not a question as to what sort of an examination he passed. [ROMER, J.—Suppose only one boy presented himself, would he be at once entitled to the scholarship, without passing a satisfactory examination?) We do not go so far as that; but under the circumstances we say that the plaintiff is entitled.

Birrell, Q.C., and Micklem, for the defendants.— The words of the indenture are "pass the best examination." The plaintiff did not pass a satisfactory examination at all in some subjects. This is a case in which the examiner has a discretion.

Hopkinson, Q.C., replied.

In the course of the argument In re Nettle's Charity, 20 W. R. 965, L. R. 14 Eq. 434, was referred to.

ROMER, J.—I am of opinion that the plaintiff's action fails, and on this ground, that on the words of the deed no boy is entitled to the scholarship who does not pass a satisfactory examination in the subjects to be determined on from time to time by the examiner. If no boy passes such examination, it is clear that the examiner is entitled to say that no boy has passed a satisfactory and proper examination for so valuable a scholarship. The examiner has decided that no boy deserved the scholarship, and that the plaintiff is not entitled to it. The trustees have taken a proper course in refusing to award it, and the plaintiff's action fails, and must be dismissed, with costs.

Solicitors, Rooke & Sons, Pennington & Sons.

(a.) Reported by J. ARTHUR PRICE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Q. B. Div.
(Lord Russell of Killowen, C.J., and Grantham and Vaughan Williams, JJ.)

Nov. 11.

DRAX v. FFOOKS. (a.)

Election law — Registration — Parochial register — Ownership qualification—Right of women to be electors—Local Government Act, 1894 (56 & 57 Vict. c. 73), ss. 2 (1), 3 (2), 43, 44 (1), 44 (6) (b).

Notwithstanding section 3 (2) and section 43 of the Local Government Act, 1894, a woman, whether married or unmarried, is not entitled to be a parochial elector or to be on the register of parochial electors in respect of the ownership of property.

Case stated by the revising barrister for the northern division of the county of Dorset.

The appellant, who was a married woman, claimed to be placed on the parochial electors' list of Milborne St. Andrew in respect of the ownership of property in that parish. The appellant was owner in her own right of the freehold farm in respect of which she claimed, her husband not being interested in it, nor on the register in respect of it. She was living more than three miles from the parish of Milborne St. Andrew. The property was of sufficient value to sustain the claim.

The revising barrister disallowed the claim and expunged the name of the appellant, holding that a woman, whether married or not, was not by law entitled to claim a parochial vote in respect of the "ownership" of property, that being a qualification which would confer a parliamentary vote; and that, by virtue of section 43 of the Local Government Act, 1894, a married woman could only claim to be placed on the parochial electors' list in respect of an occupation qualification such as would entitle her, if unmarried, to be on Division 3 of the occupiers' list of voters for the parish.

He referred to Chorlton v. Kessler, L. R. 4 C. P. 397, 17 W. R. C. L. Dig. 49; and Chorlton v. Lings, 17 W. R. 284, L. R. 4 C. P. 374.

Section 2 (1) of the Local Government Act, 1894, provides that "the parish meeting for a rural parish shall consist of the following persons, in this Act referred to as parochial electors, and no others—namely, the persons registered in such portion either of the local government register of electors or of the parliamentary register of electors as relates to the parish"; and section 44 (1) further provides that "the local government register of electors and the parliamentary register of electors, so far as they relate to a parish, shall, together, form the register of the parochial electors of the parish."

Section 3 (1) of the same Act provides that "the parish council for a rural parish shall be elected from among the parochial electors of that parish or persons who have during the whole of the twelve months preceding the election resided in the parish, or within three miles thereof"; and sub-section (2) of section 3 declares that "no person shall be disqualified by sex or marriage from being elected or being a member of a parish council."

Section 23 (2) provides that "a person shall not be qualified to be elected or to be a councillor unless he is a parochial elector of some parish within the district, or has, during the whole of the twelve months preceding the election, resided in the district, and no person shall be disqualified by sex or marriage for being elected or being a councillor"; and section 20 (2) contains similar provisions with regard to guardians.

Section 43 is as follows:—"For the purposes of this Act a woman shall not be disqualified by marriage for being on any local government register of electors, or for being an elector of any local authority, provided that a husband and wife shall not both be qualified in respect of the same property."

Alexander Macmorran, for the appellant.—In order to give effect to section 3 (2) the appellant's name ought to be placed on the parochial register, for by section 3 (1), in order to become a parish councillor, she must either be on that register or live within three miles of the parish. She does not live within three miles of the parish, so she must have a right to be on the parochial register. To hold otherwise would be to disqualify her on account of her sex. The same reasoning applies when you consider the effect of sections 20 (2) and 23 (2). Section 43 expressly enacts that a woman is not to be disqualified by marriage for being on the register. Section 44 (9) gives her the right to have her name placed on the parochial list, notwithstanding it does not appear on the local government or parliamentary registers. The revising barrister was wrong in expunging the appellant's name. He ought to have placed a mark against it signifying that she was entitled to vote only as a parochial elector in accordance with section 44 (6) (b), which enacts that "where the revising barrister in any list of voters for a parish would, in pursuance of section four of the Registration Act, 1885, erase the name of any person otherwise than by reason of that name appearing more than once in the lists for the same parish, the revising barrister shall, instead of erasing the name, place against the name . . . . if he is entitled to vote only as a parochial elector, a mark signifying that he is entitled to be registered as a parochial elector, and the name so marked shall not be printed in the parliamentary register of electors, but shall be printed . . . in a separate list of parochial electors."

No counsel appeared on behalf of the respondent.

Lord RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN, C.J.—It is to be regretted that we have not had the assistance of counsel on both sides. In my judgment the revising barrister was right. The question is whether a married woman can, in respect of the ownership of property, be properly placed on the register as a parochial elector, she not residing within three miles of the parish in respect of which she claims. The question turns on the construction of various sections of the Local Government Act, 1894, and I will state my reading of those sections. The effect of section 2 (1) is that the parochial electors are to be made up of two classes—(1) the persons on the local government register or burgesses, and (2) those on the parliamentary register. By section 44 (1) the local government register and parliamentary register are to constitute the parochial register. To get on the local government register occupation and payment of rates are necessary. These qualifications the appellant has not got. Then, can she be on the parliamentary register? No. She is ineligible for the parliamentary register on account of her sex. Whether or not she can be retained on the list of voters with a mark against her name, she cannot, at all events, be placed there for any effective purpose in connection with the parliamentary register. Section 3 (2) contains a general provision that no person is to be excluded from becoming a councillor by reason of sex or marriage; and by section 43 for the purposes of the Act no person is to be disqualified by marriage. The observation to be made with regard to both these sections is, that they do not profess to give a qualification. Therefore it seems to me that, for the purpose of this question, the effect of them is that if she has the necessary qualification for being on the local government register or the parliamentary register, then the fact of her being a married woman shall not take that qualification away.

(a.) Reported by C. G. WILBRAHAM, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Counsel referred also to section 44 (6) (b). That section was provided for a class of cases in which, under an antecedent state of the law, certain names appearing on the list of voters would have been erased by the revising barrister. The names, instead of being erased, are now to be differently dealt with. But the section does not apply to married women at all, because, under the antecedent state of the law referred to, their names could not appear on the register at all.

GRANTHAM, J.—I am of the same opinion. The sections of the Act of 1894 are somewhat conflicting, and I had some doubt on this question until I recognized the distinction between section 3 (2) and section 43. The former says that neither sex nor marriage shall disqualify, while the latter is confined to removing the disqualification of marriage. But, as neither married nor unmarried women can get on the parliamentary register, the sections do not touch women with an ownership qualification only.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J.—The appellant is not disqualified because of her sex, but because she has not got the statutory qualification. She has neither the local government qualification nor the parliamentary qualification. It may be that it is because of her sex that she has not the parliamentary franchise; still, she is without it, and it is the absence of that franchise, and not her sex, that is the disqualification.

Appeal dismissed; leave to appeal granted.

Solicitor for the appellant, H. W. Parker, Blandford.

IN BANKRUPTCY.

Q. B. Div.
(Vaughan Williams, J.) July 23, 1895.

In re SMITH AND HARTOGS.
Ex parte OFFICIAL RECEIVER v. LEVERSON. (a.)

Bankruptcy—Landlord and tenant—Distress—"Rent accrued due prior to date of order of adjudication"—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 42 (1).

A landlord let premises at £200 a year, but agreed to take £100 a year for the first two years, and £250 a year for the succeeding two years of the term. The tenants became bankrupt before the first two years had expired, and the landlord distrained for rent at the rate of £200 a year.

Held, that he was entitled to distrain for rent at that rate, for the agreement had not altered the rent, but only the mode of paying it, and was not such that the tenant could claim to enforce it if he were in default in the payments thereunder.

Motion by the official receiver for an order that the respondent should pay over to him £78 10s., forming part of a sum of £103 10s., the proceeds of a distress levied by the respondent, upon the premises occupied by the bankrupts, after the date of the receiving order.

In the month of October, 1890, the respondent, Mr. Leverson, let the premises to one Flatau, for twenty-one years, at the rent of £150 per annum for the first two years of such term, and £200 per annum for the remainder. In 1893, when the rent payable was £200 per annum, Flatau assigned the lease to Smith & Hartogs, the bankrupts. They were unwilling to pay rent at the rate of £200 per annum to begin with, so Mr. Leverson agreed to allow them to pay £100 per annum for the first two years of their occupation—viz., from the 29th of September, 1893, to the 29th of September, 1895—and £250 per annum for the next two years, and after that £200 per annum for the remainder of the term assigned to them by Flatau. Smith & Hartogs having gone into occupation on the 29th of September, 1893, paid one instalment of £25 on account of rent on the 31st of January, 1894, a second instalment of £25 on the 30th of April, but defaulted in payment at the Midsummer quarter, and Mr. Leverson distrained upon their premises for £25 in August.

Upon the 29th of September a receiving order was made against Smith & Hartogs, whereupon Mr. Leverson distrained upon the premises for £100, proportion of rent due at the rate of £200 per annum.

Muir Mackenzie, for the official receiver.—The rent was only at the rate of £100 per annum, and all that was due at the date of the receiving order was £25 in respect of the quarter from the 24th of June to the 29th of September. The agreement by the landlord to accept £100 per annum has altered the rent. He cited Fitzgerald v. Portarlington, 1 Jones 431. [VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J.—The rent was not altered at all, merely the manner of paying it. In the case of Fitzgerald v. Portarlington, the tenant was ready and willing to pay his rent at the reduced rate, in this case he was not, and the landlord might have distrained for rent at the rate of £200 per annum, when he levied the distress in August.]

Leverson, for the respondent.—Not only was the rent not altered, but there was no consideration for the agreement to accept payment at the rate of £100 per annum for two years, and it was therefore nudum pactum.

Muir Mackenzie, replied.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J.—In my opinion the agreement in this case was merely an agreement by the landlord not to enforce his remedies for the recovery of rent in the event of the instalments agreed upon being duly paid. It being admitted that the terms of the agreement were not carried out by the tenant, it appears to me that the rent originally reserved became payable. Putting the case in the most favourable way for the official receiver, it can only be said that if the tenant paid the rent by certain instalments, the landlord could not enforce his rights to the higher rent. It seems to me that the agreement is not one which the tenant could insist upon if he were in default. I am not sure that the contention is not right that there was no consideration for the agreement, but that it was a mere voluntary statement by the landlord that he would accept the rent in this way. But even if there was consideration, the agreement was not such that the tenant could claim to enforce it if he were in default in the payments agreed upon.

Application dismissed.

Solicitors for the official receiver, Adams & Adams.

Solicitors for the respondent, Campbell, Reeves, & Hooper.

(a.) Reported by P. M. FRANCKE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Court of Appeal.

From Chan. Div. (Lindley, Lopes, and Rigby, L.JJ.) — June 17, 18, 19, 20, 21; Aug. 6, 1895.

In re THE LONDON AND GENERAL BANK. (a.)

Company — Winding up — Auditor — Duties of — Misfeasance — Companies (Winding-up) Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 63), s. 10 — Companies Act, 1879 (42 & 43 Vict. c. 76), s. 7, sub-sections 1, 5, 6.

It is no part of an auditor's duty to give advice, either to directors or shareholders, as to what they ought to do, and he is not concerned as to whether the business of the company is prudently or imprudently carried on, or as to whether dividends are properly or improperly declared, provided he discharges his own duty to the shareholders.

The duty of an auditor is to ascertain and state the true financial position of the company at the time of the audit, and, in examining the books of the company for that purpose, to take reasonable care to ascertain that they show the company's true position.

A person whose duty it is to convey information to others does not discharge that duty by simply giving them so much information as is calculated to induce them, or some of them, to ask for more, and an auditor who gives shareholders means of information, instead of information, does so at his peril. The words "the value of the assets as shown in the balance-sheet are dependent on realization," though unusual in an auditor's report, are unimportant, the auditor's duty being to convey in direct and express terms any information which he may think proper to be communicated.

Appeal from an order of Vaughan Williams, J., made, under section 10 of the Companies (Winding-up) Act, 1890, on the 20th of December, 1894, whereby he found W. Theobald, the appellant, liable as one of the auditors of the London and General Bank (Limited) to make good to the assets of the company, jointly with other persons and severally, two sums of £5,946 12s. and £8,486 11s., being respectively the amounts declared and paid by the bank for the years 1890 and 1891, with interest on those sums.

The auditor's certificate, in respect of the balance-sheet for 1891, was as follows: "We have examined the above balance-sheet and compared it with the books of the company, and we certify that it is a correct summary of the accounts therein recorded. The value of the assets as shown in the balance-sheet is dependent on realization."

By section 7 of the Companies Act, 1879, it is enacted as follows:

"(1) Once at the least in every year the accounts of every banking company registered after the passing of this Act as a limited company shall be examined by an auditor or auditors, who shall be elected annually by the company in general meeting."

"(5) Every auditor shall have a list delivered to him of all books kept by the company, and shall at all reasonable times have access to the books and accounts of the company; and any auditor may, in relation to such books and accounts, examine the directors or any other officer of the company. . . ."

"(6) The auditor or auditors shall make a report to the members on the accounts examined by him or them, and on every balance-sheet laid before the company in general meeting during his or their tenure of office; and in every such report shall state whether, in his or their opinion, the balance-sheet referred to in the report is a full and fair balance-sheet properly drawn up, so as to exhibit a true and correct view of the state of the company's affairs, as shown by the books of the company; and such report shall be read before the company in general meeting."

Article 106 of the articles of association was as follows: "At every ordinary meeting the directors shall lay before the meeting a balance-sheet showing the financial state of the company for the previous financial year, duly audited, and every such balance-sheet shall be accompanied by a report of the directors as to the state and condition of the company, and as to the amount which they recommend to be paid out of the profits by way of dividend or bonus to the shareholders, after allowing for any interim dividend which the directors may have declared and any sum which they may have set aside under article 116 hereof."

Article 107 provided that "the accounts of the company shall be from time to time examined and the correctness of the statements shall be from time to time ascertained, by two or more auditors, in accordance with these presents."

Article 114 was as follows: "The auditors shall be supplied with copies of the statement of accounts intended to be laid before the meeting, and it shall be their duty to examine the same with the accounts and vouchers relating thereto."

The circumstances under which the auditor's reports were made and the arguments of counsel appear from the judgments of the court.

Cohen, Q.C., Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and Whinney, for the appellants, referred to The Bernina, 35 W. R. 314, 12 P. D. 58; Leeds Estate Building and Investment Co. v. Shepherd, 36 W. R. 322, 36 Ch. D. 787.

Finlay, Q.C., E. S. Ford, and Muir Mackenzie, for the respondent, the official receiver.

Cohen, Q.C., in reply, referred to Cavendish Bentinck v. Fenn, 36 W. R. 641, 12 App. Cas. 652.

Cur. adv. vult.

LINDLEY, L.J.—This is an appeal by Mr. Theobald, one of the auditors of the above bank, which is being wound up, against an order made by Vaughan Williams, J., under section 10 of the Companies (Winding-up) Act, 1890. By this order Mr. Theobald and the directors of the bank are declared jointly and severally liable to pay to the official receiver, as liquidator of the company, two sums of £5,946 12s. and £8,486 11s., being respectively the amounts of dividends declared and paid by the bank for the years 1890 and 1891, with interest on those sums. The grounds on which this order was made on Mr. Theobald are, that these dividends were paid out of capital, and that such payment was made pursuant to resolutions of the shareholders based upon recommendations of the directors of the bank, and upon balance-sheets prepared and certified by Mr. Theobald, and which did not truly represent the financial position of the company. Mr. Theobald's appeal was supported by arguments to this effect:—(1) That Mr. Theobald was not an "officer" of the company within the meaning of section 10 of the Act of 1890; (2) that the balance-sheets and certificates given by Mr. Theobald were in accordance with the books of the bank, and that his duty as auditor was confined to framing balance-sheets, which showed the position of the bank as disclosed by its books; (3) that the dividends in question were not really paid out of capital, and that, however improvident and reckless it may have been to pay them, Mr. Theobald, as auditor, is not legally responsible for that payment; (4) that, even if Mr. Theobald, as auditor, failed adequately to discharge his duty, and even if the dividends were paid out of capital, his failure to discharge his duty was the remote, and not the proximate, cause of the wrongful payment of the dividends, and that he consequently is not legally liable to make good the amount so paid; (5) that at any rate the order is wrong in declaring him jointly and severally liable with the directors to repay the dividends in question.

(a.) Reported by ARNOLD GLOVER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The first of these contentions was argued and decided last April (43 W. R. 481, 1895, 2 Ch. 166), and this court then held that an auditor of a banking company, governed by the Companies Act, 1879, and by such articles as regulated the present company, was an "officer" of the company within the meaning of section 10 of the Winding-up Act of 1890, and was liable to have proceedings taken against him under that section. This point having been then decided was, of course, not again raised, and nothing further need be said about it.

It remains, however, to consider what the duties of an auditor are as respects banking companies governed by the Companies Act, 1879, and by such articles as regulated this particular company. It will be convenient to do this before examining the facts relied upon by the liquidator as rendering Mr. Theobald liable to make good the dividends which he has been ordered to pay. The duties of the auditors in this case were governed by section 7 of the Companies Act, 1879. [His lordship referred to sub-sections 1, 2, 5, 6 & 7 of that section, and to articles 106, 107 & 114 of the Articles of Association, and continued:—] These are the enactments and relations which bear directly on the duties of the auditors, and although clauses 107 & 114 are in terms more explicit than section 7 of the statute as regards the duty of the auditors to examine and ascertain the correctness of the statements laid before them, and of the accounts laid before the shareholders, yet it is tolerably plain from the language of section 7, clause 5, that the articles add little, if anything, to the duty imposed on the auditors by the statute alone. In connection with these articles, and in order to save repetition, it should be stated that by the articles of this bank it is the duty of the directors, and not of the auditors, to recommend to the shareholders the amounts to be appropriated for dividends (clause 98), and it is the duty of the directors to have proper accounts kept, so as to show the true state and condition of the company (clause 103), Lastly, it is for the shareholders, but only on the recommendation of the directors, to declare a dividend (clause 115). It is impossible to read section 7 of the Companies Act, 1879, without being struck with the importance of the enactment that the auditors are to be appointed by the shareholders and are to report them directly, and not to or through the directors. The object of this enactment is obvious. It evidently is to secure to the shareholders independent and reliable information respecting the true financial position of the company at the time of the audit. The articles of this particular company are even more explicit on this point than the statute itself, and remove any possible ambiguity to which the language of the statute taken alone may be open if very narrowly criticized. It is no part of an auditor's duty to give advice, either to directors or shareholders, as to what they ought to do. An auditor has nothing to do with the prudence or imprudence of making loans with or without security. It is nothing to him whether the business of a company is being conducted prudently or imprudently, profitably or unprofitably. It is nothing to him whether dividends are properly or improperly declared, provided he discharges his own duty to the shareholders. His business is to ascertain and state the true financial position of the company at the time of the audit, and his duty is confined to that.

But then comes the question: How is he to ascertain that position? The answer is, by examining the books of the company. But he does not discharge his duty by doing this without inquiry and without taking any trouble to see that the books themselves show the company's true position. He must take reasonable care to ascertain that they do so. Unless he does this his audit will be worse than an idle farce. Assuming the books to be so kept as to show the true position of a company, the auditor has to frame a balance-sheet showing that position according to the books and to certify that the balance-sheet presented is correct in that sense. But his first duty is to examine the books, not merely for the purpose of ascertaining what they do show, but also for the purpose of satisfying himself that they show the true financial position of the company. This is quite in accordance with the decision of Stirling, J., in Leeds Estate Co. v. Shepherd. An auditor, however, is not bound to do more than exercise reasonable care and skill in making inquiries and investigations. He is not an insurer; he does not guarantee that the books do correctly show the true position of the company's affairs; he does not even guarantee that his balance-sheet is accurate according to the books of the company. If he did, he would be responsible for error on his part, even if he were himself deceived without any want of reasonable care on his part, say, by the fraudulent concealment of a book from him. His obligation is not so onerous as this. Such I take to be the duty of the auditor; he must be honest—i.e., he must not certify what he does not believe to be true, and he must take reasonable care and skill before he believes that what he certifies is true. What is reasonable care in any particular case must depend upon the circumstances of that case. Where there is nothing to excite suspicion very little inquiry will be reasonably sufficient, and in practice, I believe, business men select a few cases at haphazard, see that they are right, and assume that others like them are correct also. Where suspicion is aroused more care is obviously necessary; but still an auditor is not bound to exercise more than reasonable care and skill, even in a case of suspicion, and he is perfectly justified in acting on the opinion of an expert where special knowledge is required. Mr. Theobald's evidence satisfies me that he took the same view as myself of his duty in investigating the company's books and preparing his balance-sheet. He did not content himself with making his balance-sheet from the books, without troubling himself about the truth of what they showed. He checked the cash, examined vouchers for payments, saw that the bills and securities entered in the books were held by the bank, took reasonable care to ascertain their value, and, in one case, obtained a solicitor's opinion on the validity of an equitable charge. I see no trace whatever of any failure by him in the performance of this part of his duty. It is satisfactory to find that the legal standard of duty is not too high for business purposes, and is recognized as correct by business men. The balance-sheet and certificate of February, 1892—i.e.,, for the year 1891—was accompanied by a report to the directors of the bank. Taking the balance-sheet, the certificate, and report together, Mr. Theobald stated to the directors the true financial position of the bank, and, if this report had been laid before the shareholders, Mr. Theobald would have completely discharged his duty to them. Unfortunately, however, this report was not laid before the shareholders, and it becomes necessary to consider the legal consequences to Mr. Theobald of this circumstance.

A person whose duty it is to convey information to others does not discharge that duty by simply giving them so much information as is calculated to induce them, or some of them, to ask for more. Information and means of information are by no means equivalent terms. Still, there may be circumstances under which information given in the shape of a printed document circulated amongst a large body of shareholders would, by its consequent publicity, be very injurious to their interests, and in such a case I am not prepared to say that an auditor would fail to discharge his duty if, instead of publishing his report in such a way as to insure publicity, he made a confidential report to the shareholders, and invited their attention to it, and told them where they could see it. The auditor is to make a report to the shareholders, but the mode of doing so and the form of the report are not prescribed. If, therefore, Mr. Theobald had laid before the shareholders the balance-sheet and profit and loss account, accompanied by a certificate in the form in which he first prepared it, he would, perhaps, have done enough under the peculiar circumstances of this case. I feel, however, the great danger of acting on such a principle, and, in order not to be misunderstood, I will add that an auditor who gives shareholders means of information instead of information respecting a company's financial position does so at his peril and runs the very serious risk of being held judicially to have failed to discharge his duty. In this case I have no hesitation in saying that Mr. Theobald did fail to discharge his duty to the shareholders in certifying and laying before them the balance-sheet of February, 1892, without any reference to the report which he laid before the directors, and with no other warning than is conveyed by the words, "The value of the assets as shown on the balance-sheet is dependent upon realization." The most important asset on that balance-sheet is put down as "Loans to customers and other securities, £346,975," and on these a full and detailed report was made to the directors, showing the very unsatisfactory state of these loans and securities, and it is impossible to read the oral evidence, the report of Balfour and Brock, dated the 22nd of December, 1891, and the report of the auditor to the directors of the 3rd of February, 1892, without coming to the conclusion that the entry of that large sum as a good asset without explanation was unjustifiable. It is a mere truism to say that the value of loans and securities depends on their realization. We were told that a statement to that effect is so unusual in an auditor's certificate that the mere presence of those words was enough to excite suspicion. But, as already stated, the duty of an auditor is to convey information, not to arouse inquiry, and, although an auditor might infer from an unusual statement that something was seriously wrong, it by no means follows that ordinary people would have their suspicions aroused by a similar statement if, as in this case, its language expresses no more than any ordinary person would infer without it. But Mr. Theobald relies on the fact that he was induced to omit from his certificate all reference to the report which he made to the directors because Mr. Balfour, the chairman, promised to mention such report in his speech to the shareholders, and he did so. But, although Mr. Balfour twice alluded to the report, he did so in such a way as to avoid attracting attention to it. The second time he mentioned it was after a dividend had been declared, and when a motion to reappoint the auditors was before the meeting. The truth is that not a word was said to convey to shareholders the substance of the information contained in the report or to induce them to ask any question about it. The balance-sheet and profit and loss account were true and correct in this sense—that they were in accordance with the books. But they were, nevertheless, entirely misleading, and misrepresented the real position of the company.

Under these circumstances I am compelled to hold that Mr. Theobald failed to discharge his duty to the shareholders with respect to the balance-sheet and certificate of February, 1892. Possibly he did not realize the extent of his duty to the shareholders as distinguished from the directors, and he unfortunately consented to leave the chairman to explain the true state of the company to the shareholders instead of doing so himself. The fact, however, remains, and cannot be got over, that the balance-sheet and certificate of February, 1892, did not show the true position of the company at the end of 1891, and that this was owing to the omission by the auditor to lay before the shareholders the material information which he had obtained in the course of his employment as auditor of the company, and to which he called the attention of the directors.

But then it is contended that, even if this be so, there was after all no payment of dividend out of capital, and further that, even if there was, still that payment was not the natural and immediate result of Mr. Theobald's certificate and of the accounts which he prepared. Whether payment was made out of capital or not is a question of fact. The payment was professedly made out of profits made by the bank, by charging its customers with interest and commission on loans and discount. The books showed such profits, but the question is, Where did the money come from with which the dividends were paid? The money came from cash at the bankers' or in hand, but this cash could not be properly treated as profit, and the directors and auditors knew this perfectly well. This part of the case has been most carefully investigated by the learned judge whose decision we are reviewing, and, after attending closely to the observations of counsel on the reasonings and conclusions contained in the judgment appealed from, I see no reason whatever for dissenting from them. On the contrary, I entirely agree with the learned judge in saying that the profits for the year 1891 never really existed, except on paper, and that, to use his words, "whatever may be the right line to draw as to when profit not received may be carried to profit for the purpose of the annual revenue account, it is plain that there was no justification for so doing in the present case." The real truth is that the assets of the bank were put down in the balance-sheet at far too high a figure, and this entry, though not misleading if explained (as it was to the directors), was seriously misleading in the absence of explanation. Mr. Theobald says that he regarded the assets of the bank as only locked up, but his report and the schedule to it go far beyond this. The value of the principal asset depended on the probability of the Balfour group of companies and some of the other large borrowers repaying their loans. They were financing each other; their indebtedness to the bank had increased largely during the year; the securities held by the bank for these loans were, to say the least, to a great extent of very doubtful value; and yet the total amount due to the bank in respect of these loans is inserted in the balance-sheet as a good asset, without any deduction and without a word of explanation to the shareholders. We know now that those assets have realized a comparatively small sum, and we were very properly warned against the danger of doing injustice by being wise after the event. But, disregarding the result of realization, and attending only to what was known to the auditors in February, 1892, the entry in the balance-sheet of the sum of £346,975 as a good asset was wholly unjustifiable, unless explained. We are now in a position to understand the true meaning of the passage contained in the auditors' report to the directors of the 3rd of February, 1892, and which runs thus:—"We cannot conclude without expressing our opinion unhesitatingly that no dividend should be paid this year." I find it impossible to treat this as a statement by the auditors that there are profits divisible amongst the shareholders, but that the auditors cannot recommend a dividend. I can only regard the passage as meaning that there are no funds out of which a dividend can properly be paid, and, therefore, no dividend ought to be paid this year. A dividend of seven per cent. was, nevertheless, recommended by the directors, and was resolved upon by the shareholders at a meeting furnished with the balance-sheet and profit and loss account certified by the auditors, and at which meeting the auditors were present, but silent. Not a word was said to inform the shareholders of the true state of affairs. It is idle to say that these accounts are so remotely connected with the payment of the dividend as to render the auditors legally irresponsible for such payment. The balance-sheet and account certified by the auditors, and showing a profit available for dividend, were, in my judgment, not the remote, but the real operating cause of the resolution for the payment of the dividend which the directors improperly recommended. The auditors' accounts and certificate gave weight to such recommendation, and rendered it acceptable to the meeting. It was wholly unnecessary for the Official Receiver to call a shareholder to say that he was induced by the auditors' certificate to concur in the resolution to pay a dividend. As to this part of the case res ipsa loquitur.

A point was made that the form of the order was wrong. But there is nothing in this. Mr. Theobald could obviously be sued alone in an action at law for breach of his statutory duty as auditor, and for damages resulting from such breach of duty, and the measure of damages would be the sum which he has been ordered to pay. Whether a similar action at law could be maintained against him and the directors jointly is more open to question. I am by no means satisfied that it could not, seeing that the wrongful payment of the dividend was caused by his improper certificate and accounts, and by the use made of them by the directors. But, be this as it may, there was a clear breach of trust by the directors, facilitated, and, indeed, only rendered possible, by the auditor who failed in discharging his own duty to the shareholders; and I have no doubt that in equity both he and they could be properly declared jointly and severally liable for the misapplication of the company's money which constituted that breach of trust: see Leeds Estate Co. v. Shepherd. With respect, therefore, to the sum of £8,486 11s., wrongly paid as dividend in 1892, in respect of the alleged profits made in 1891, the appeal, in my opinion, fails.

I agree with Vaughan Williams, J., in holding that the dividend for 1890 was in fact improperly declared and paid. But the evidence that Mr. Theobald was guilty of any breach of duty in certifying the accounts in February, 1891, is far less cogent than that which presses so heavily against him with reference to the accounts of February, 1892. The truth is that the conviction that the bank's affairs were every year getting worse and worse grew upon him year by year. This state of things was shown by the decrease of its investments and reserve capital and the increase of its loans to customers. But the loans to customers and other securities were, speaking roughly, £100,000 less at the end of the year 1890 than at the end of 1891, and, seeing that the accounts prepared by the auditors did accurately represent the position of the company as shown by the books, and that it is not proved that Mr. Theobald really knew, or ought then to have known, that the position of the bank was not correctly shown by the books, I think Vaughan Williams, J., has gone too far in holding Mr. Theobald liable for this sum. The reasons which induced the learned judge to decide that Mr. Theobald was not liable for the dividends paid in 1889 and 1890 appear to me to apply also to the dividend paid in 1891 in respect of the profits of 1890. No doubt the change made by the auditors in 1886 in the form of the certificate they had previously given is very significant, and, unexplained, leads to the inference that the auditors did not believe that the books of the company and the balance-sheet prepared from them correctly showed the position of the bank. But Mr. Theobald's evidence does, in my opinion, show that in February, 1891, matters were not known or believed to be so bad as to lead him to the conclusion that there were then no profits out of which a dividend could properly be paid. It is true that the position of the bank was very unsatisfactory in 1890, and the auditors knew it to be so. This, however, appeared from the balance-sheet and accounts which they laid before the shareholders. It is known now that the assets were put down at too high a figure; but it is not proved that the auditors knew it, or ought to have known it. The Balfour group of companies, though dependent on each other, were by no means in so tottering a state as they were a year later. Wilkinson's debt was still treated by the directors as bearing interest and as a good, or at all events, not as a bad debt. Benham's debt was unsatisfactory, but the auditors can hardly be blamed for treating it as good, having regard to the solicitor's statement as to the security held for it. This part of the case is very near the line, but, having carefully considered it, I do not think that the evidence is sufficiently strong to establish a case of misfeasance on the part of Mr. Theobald in February, 1891. I am not satisfied that he was then guilty of more than an excusable error of judgment; although, now that all the facts are known, the error is seen to have been very serious in its consequences.

As to the sum of £5,946 12s., therefore, the appeal must be allowed. As regard's costs, Mr. Theobald's appeal has resulted in reducing the sum for which he has been held liable, but in other respects, and as regards his main contention, it has failed. Under these circumstances he ought not to receive or pay any costs of the appeal, and the only order as to costs will be that the official receiver be paid his costs out of the assets of the company.

[The Lord Justice added that Lopes, L.J., had read his judgment and concurred in it.]

RIGBY, L.J.—I have had the advantage of reading and considering the judgment just delivered by Lindley, L.J., and I might have confined myself to saying I concur in it, but as I have gone carefully into the evidence as against the appellant, I think that I shall do well to show how I have come to the conclusion on which my judgment is founded. I shall not attempt to repeat all that is contained in Lindley, L.J.'s judgment. Where no reference is made to a particular topic it must be taken that I have nothing to add, though I do not wish to detract from anything said.

The appeal is against that part of the order of the 20th of December, 1894, of Vaughan Williams, J., which finds Mr. Theobald liable as one of the auditors of the London and General Bank, Limited, to make good to the assets of the company, jointly with other persons, and severally, the amount with interest from the date of the order, of two sums, £6,768 6s. 9d. and £9,328 17s. 4d., being the dividends with interest thereon down to the date of the order recommended by the directors and declared by meetings of the company in the years 1891 and 1892 for the years 1890 to 1891. I have not taken the same figures as Lindley, L.J., did, because there has been added to to dividends the amount of interest down to the date of the order. I think it will be the exact figure. The order was made on a summons taken out by the liquidator of the company in the matter of the Companies Acts and in the matter of the bank, asking, so far as is material for the present appeal, for a declaration of the joint and several liability of the directors and auditors of the company, on the ground that the dividends before mentioned were not paid out of profits but out of capital, and so far as the auditors were concerned on the ground that they certified and reported that the balance-sheets which were laid before the company at the said meetings purported to show profits in excess of the sum paid as dividends. I understand the application to have been in substance an application against the auditors as officers of the company under the 10th section of the Act of 1890 to compel them to contribute to the assets of the company by way of compensation for their misfeasance such sums as the court may think just.

The main issues seem to be—(1) whether the auditor has been guilty of any misfeasance in relation to the company; (2) whether the misfeasance had occasioned to the company loss for which compensation ought to be directed to be made, which will involve the question whether the dividends were in fact paid, not out of profits, but out of capital, and whether such payment was the fault of the auditor; and (3) the amount of compensation which ought to be made. In order to determine the first question it will be necessary to consider in some detail the position and duty of the auditors—what they ought to have done and what they have done. [His lordship referred to the provisions of the Companies Act, 1879, and the articles of association set out above, and continued:—] The articles of association cannot absolve the auditors from any obligation imposed upon them by the statute, and it may be that, in this case, they do not impose any greater obligations as to the balance-sheet, though they make it clear that similar obligations extend to the accounts placed before the company, including the profit and loss account, as well as the balance-sheet. Under the statute the members of the company are entitled to have the safe-guard of an expression of an opinion by the auditors to the effect that the balance-sheet is a full and fair balance-sheet, and that it is properly drawn up so as to exhibit a true and correct view of the state of the company's affairs. The words "as shown by the books of the company" seem to me to be introduced to relieve the auditors from responsibility as to affairs of the company kept out of the books and concealed from them, but not to confine their duty to a mere statement of the correspondence of the balance-sheet with the entries in the books. A full and fair balance-sheet must be such a balance-sheet as to convey a truthful statement as to the company's position. It must not conceal any known cause of weakness in the financial position, or suggest anything which cannot be supported as fairly correct from a business point of view. The provision as to its being properly drawn up so as to exhibit a correct view of the state of the company's affairs is taken from, though it does not go quite so far as, article 9 of table A and the schedule to the Act of 1862. Treated as an addition to the requisition for a full and fair balance-sheet it may not be easy to define the full extent of the obligation which it imposes, nor is it necessary to do so in this case; for it certainly requires a more detailed explanation of the affairs of the company than is contained in any of the balance-sheets of this bank. It will be important to see what information the auditors actually acquired as to the business of this company and the way in which they reported upon the successive balance-sheets. Mr. Theobald and Mr. Timms were auditors of the bank from its incorporation in 1882, and they made the audits for successive years, down to and including the audit for 1891. The reports of the auditors to the members always took the form of a certificate or memorandum written on the balance-sheet for the year. Their reports on the accounts for 1882 and 1883 contained a statement to the effect that, in their opinion, the balance-sheet exhibited a true and correct view of the position of the bank. In their report on the accounts for 1885 a somewhat less emphatic statement to the same effect appears; but in the subsequent reports no such statement is to be found. In a report to the directors, dated February 11, 1886, dealing with the accounts for 1885, Mr. Theobald, after noticing that the first-class investments, kept by bankers for quick realization in case of need, stood at a considerably reduced sum, and that more than the whole capital of the company was invested in four accounts—namely, the Liberator Society, the Lands Allotment Company, the House and Lands Company, and the Building Estates Company—and that these investments would not be easily realized in critical times, proceeds to say:—"You are doubtless aware that it is a rule with bankers to have at hand, in cash or easily realizable securities, an amount equal to at least one-third of the customers' current accounts. Considering the small amount of uncalled capital, I think that in this case this proportion is scarcely sufficient." There can be no doubt that, even at that time, Mr. Theobald was aware that the state of affairs of the bank was unsatisfactory in the important points of lock-up of capital and consequent deficiency in realizable securities. The reports of the auditors to the members for the years 1886-1890, both inclusive, are simply to the effect that the cash and bills receivable were correct, that securities had been produced for the investments and loans (no information being given as to the amount of the securities), and that the balance-sheet agreed with the books of the company. The report on the accounts for 1891 states that the balance-sheet is a correct summary of the accounts recorded in the books, and contains, for the first time, the statement, "The value of the assets, as shown in the balance-sheet, is dependent on realization." Great stress has been laid by counsel for the appellant on the statement last quoted. They argued that it was sufficient to put members upon inquiry, and that from the course taken at the trial they were debarred from giving the evidence of experts as to its importance and signification. But I may say at once that it was the duty of the auditors to convey in direct and express terms to the members any information which they thought proper to be communicated; that the words of the statement, though perfectly clear in their meaning, are also entirely unimportant, amounting to a mere truism; and that no evidence of experts would have been of the slighest use for the purpose of giving to the words a greater importance or significance than they possess in themselves, even if such evidence were admissible. To me it appears from all the reports from 1886 onwards were imperfect, and that the auditors, in giving reports in such a form, failed entirely to fulfil the statutory duties imposed upon them. Counsel for the appellant argued that such a failure would not amount to misfeasance, but only to negligence, and that the appellant is not charged on the summons with negligence. I cannot admit the cogency of that argument. The reports were made in order to fulfil the statutory obligation and to be read to the meetings in accordance with the statutes. Mr. Theobald says with reference to this:—"My certificate means the same as the Act," and further, "I was not aware that it was considered necessary for me to give the certificate (for 1891) either in the words of the Act, or not at all." Mr. Theobald's interpretation of his own certificate cannot be received, either in his favour or against him, and we should not unduly press against him apparent admissions made in the course of a very trying cross-examination; but his evidence does, I think, go so far as to show that the certificates were, in fact, given as reports under the Act; and, independently of that evidence, I think there can be no doubt that they were intended to be, and were, received and acted upon as reports under the Act. I consider the giving of the certificates, assuming them to be to the knowledge of the auditors misleading certificates; to be a misfeasance within meaning of section 10 of the Act of 1890, and not a mere act of negligence; and that this was the meaning of the charge contained in the summons. I can have no doubt, having regard to the terms of the certificates given and the explanations of Mr. Theobald himself, that there was a strong and growing feeling of dissatisfaction in his mind at the state of the bank's affairs, as shown by its books, and I find no sufficient communication of facts causing this dissatisfaction. The balance-sheets, when examined, do not, in my opinion, fulfil the statutory requirements of being full and fair balance-sheets, and are not properly drawn up so as to exhibit a true and correct view of the state of the company's affairs, as shown by the books of the company.

To establish this, I think it necessary to give a short summary of the evidence, as to the years 1889, 1890, and 1891, the only years as which we have sufficient evidence to be able to arrive at definite conclusions. From the tables set out at page 7 of the official receiver's report it appears that during the years 1889, 1890, and 1891 the greater part of the business of the bank consisted in making loans to and discounting bills for a group of companies, nine in number, conveniently referred to as the Balfour group or the Balfour companies.

Loans were also made or discounting facilities afforded to other companies allied to the Balfour companies, to certain directors of the bank, and customers, including Wilkinson and Benham, who are named in the table, by reason of special considerations effecting their accounts. These accounts of allied companies and the persons last mentioned are for convenience hereinafter referred to as "the special accounts."

The balance due from the Balfour companies at the end of the years 1889, 1890, and 1891 were, for 1889, £119,000; for 1890, £218,000; and for 1891, £308,000. Corresponding balances in the "special accounts" being for 1889, £196,000; for 1890, £321,000; for 1891, £429,000. The corresponding balances due from all other customers and persons were, for 1889, £135,000; for 1890, £103,000; for 1891, £100,000. Roughly speaking, the proportion of what may be called the outside business to that with the Balfour companies and on the special accounts was, at the end of 1889 two-thirds, at the end of 1890 one-third, and the end of 1891 one-fourth. The paid-up capital increased in 1890 by about £76,000, and in 1891 about £43,000, or altogether £120,000, but the whole of this and considerably more than £100,000 in addition had been absorbed into the accounts of the Balfour companies and the special accounts.

It has already been pointed out that the amount of cash and easily realizable securities, at the end of 1891, was hardly more than one-sixth of the amount due to the customers on current accounts, or about one-half of what Mr. Theobald had in 1886, pointed out to be required according to the usual practice of bankers.

These figures show an alarming absorption during the three years of the available assets of the company in advances to the Balfour companies and on the special accounts, and a perilous diminution of easily-realizable assets. As is usual with banking companies, profits alleged to have been earned by the bank consisted with unsubstantial exceptions of interest on loans, discounting of bills, and commissions. The gross profits entered in the books as having been earned from the Balfour companies, between the incorporation of the bank and the end of 1891, amounted to upwards of £84,000. The amount distributed in dividends during the same period was upwards of £58,000, and the amount carried to reserve fund, £13,000. I include there £3,000 carried to reserve fund in accordance with the report on the accounts of 1891, making together £71,000. The reserve fund, however, was not required by the articles of association to be kept separate, and was not kept separate from the general funds of the bank. It was employed in the bank's business, quite rightly, no doubt.

Subject to an argument as to the appropriation of payments dealt with hereafter, the profits supposed to have been earned from the Balfour companies were not actually paid, but they were only debited in the accounts current of the different companies, and, speaking generally, the moneys owing by the different companies went on increasing from year to year. It is evident that, unless these profits could be fairly treated as not only earned but payable within a reasonable time, there would at the end of 1891 be no profits out of which a dividend could be paid; but, on the contrary, a large deficiency.

The learned judge, after a careful consideration and investigation of the evidence before him, has found, as a fact, that the credits of these companies at the end of each year were generally credits created temporarily for the purpose of audit, and that such credits, in the majority of cases, were created either by the discounting of bills of companies like Hobbs & Co., which bills constitute a mere paper asset, or by loans direct or indirect from the bank itself, the bulk of which were ill-secured. I see no reason to differ from this conclusion, but it is a conclusion arrived at to an important extent from comparing the books of the bank with the books of other companies of the Balfour group to which the auditors had no access, and it is only to the extent to which it is founded on entries in the books of the bank itself that it can be used for the purpose of charging the appellant, with knowledge of the facts, though it is very important on the question whether the dividends were really paid out of the capital or not. The books themselves show that in many instances the accounts were put in credit in the manner described by the learned judge, but in other cases, and especially with reference to the indirect loans, that is to say, loans made by the bank to one of the companies out of which that company made an advance to another of the group for the purpose of putting the accounts of the latter in credit at the end of the year, the auditors would have no sufficient means of tracing the transactions.

Having made these general observations, I will go on to examine more completely the important case of the accounts for the year 1891. For that purpose, as being more fair to the auditors, I will assume, without at all deciding that, down to the end of 1890, no knowledge that the former balance-sheets were misleading has been brought home to the auditors, and will endeavour to ascertain what additional information the auditors acquired during the audit for 1891. In the year 1891 the indebtedness of the Balfour companies to the bank, as appearing by the bank books, was increased by the sum of between £89,000 and £90,000, without any additional securities of importance being given, though, no doubt, to a considerable but unascertained extent money was expended on buildings already charged to the bank, which would make the property charged, though not necessarily the charges in favour of the bank, more valuable. The securities consisted in the main charges on buildings being constructed under building agreements, on which large sums had already been charged in priority to the bank. The buildings were unfinished, and required further expenditure of very large sums before they could advantageously be disposed of, and, in my judgment, there was abundant evidence to show that these securities of the bank were very insufficient, and not realizable at all without the expenditure of further money, which the bank was unable to advance. The sums due on the special accounts had increased from £102,000 to £121,000—that is to say, between £18,000 and £19,000. With regard to these special accounts, I do not think it necessary to go in detail through the list, but I find that the auditors comment very unfavourably on the security for the following debts—that of William Blewitt for £7,849; that of Blewitt and Balfour for £2,148; and that of Balfour for £12,000. I think, however, that they may have considered the personal security in these cases sufficient, and I do not found anything on those cases. Wilkinson, at the end of 1890, was indebted to the bank in the sum of £24,000, practically unsecured. Mr. Theobald complained about interest being debited, on the ground that the directors had then more definite information as to the security. This was going on through the audit for 1890. The fact is that the security consisted of debentures of a tramway company whose tramway was never built. Interest, accordingly, ceased to be debited to this account in March, 1891. When Mr. Theobald was pressed to explain why the full sum was returned as an asset, he replied that it would have to be provided for out of the reserve fund. He further explained that he thought the account wanted watching, but that it was likely to turn out all right. In examination before the judge with reference to this debt, he said that he had conferred with the manager, who knew all about the circumstances. "First of all," says he, "I suggested the whole should be written off, but afterwards, Mr. Brock, I think it was, sent for Mr. Blewitt. We had a very serious conference about it, and they convinced me that the time had not come to do that (write off the whole), and they might yet get the whole of the amount back, but I thought it was not wise to charge interest."

This, I think, falls very far indeed short of showing that the auditor believed, or could have believed, that the debt was a good debt, thought it might have justified the carrying of it to a suspense account, instead of writing it off as bad. The importance of the case depends upon the fact that if the debt had not been entered in the balance-sheet as a good debt, there would have been no profit at all to show for the year 1891. At the end of 1891 Mr. Wilkinson's debt, which had arisen from discounting bills, all of which would appear by the dates to have been dishonoured, was reduced to £16,000 on account of discount by a loan of £10,000, but the indebtedness remained unaffected. With regard to Benham's debt, which increased in the year 1891 from £31,635 to £47,745, it was proved that in 1891 Mr. Theobald refused to pass the security for another year, and to satisfy him a letter purporting to come from Benham's solicitor, Mr. Waring, containing an undertaking to pay off £15,000 within a week, was produced. He had also been told, during the audit for 1890, that there was a security under a supposed will which had not been proved, and that they expected to get the will proved very soon. During the audit for 1891 he ascertained that the debt had increased from £31,000 to £47,000, that the £15,000 promised to be repaid had not been repaid, and that the alleged will had not been proved—indeed, it turned out afterwards that such a will never existed. The explanation of Mr. Theobald, that he trusted to the solicitor seeing that the security was all right is not, under the circumstances, altogether satisfactory, but I think it is safer to allow Mr. Theobald the benefit of the defence, though his own report sufficiently shows that he was not himself thoroughly satisfied. I wish to make it plain, so far as I can, that I am only relying on matters which Mr. Theobald ought to have known and must be presumed to have known. The debt of £7,300 from the Medway Portland Cement Co. had, like Wilkinson's, ceased to be charged with interest, and could not properly have been treated as a fund for the payment of dividend.

With reference to that of the Public Works Co. (Limited), amounting to £8,105, the auditors, in their schedule to their report to the directors, say this:—"The realization of this is very doubtful." There could, therefore, be no justification for treating this as a fund for payment of dividend. Whilst Mr. Theobald was engaged upon the audit of the accounts for 1891, or previously, a report of Messrs. Balfour and Brock, dated the 22nd of December, 1891, was produced to him as to the way of putting into credit current accounts of Hobbs & Co. (Limited), George Newman & Co. (Limited), the London, Edinburgh, and Glasgow Insurance Co., and C. H. Wilkinson, by loans from the bank. With reference to Mr. Wilkinson's account, the proposal "that the overdraft should be made in part by a loan and in part by fresh acceptances of both secured as may be arranged, we think the further loan should be £10,000 on loan and £15,000 on bills." The loan was made, and, apparently, £16,000 was left on security of acceptances, but it does not appear that any security was then arranged for or given, or that Mr. Theobald investigated this matter. Attention was, therefore, called in this particular case to the mode in which the accounts were put in credit as found by the learned judge. Several facts which appear to me to be most material with reference to the debt of 1891 are to be gathered from the text of the report. I have dealt, to a certain extent, with the schedule in the remarks I have previously made, but as to the text of the report of the auditors of February, 1892, almost every sentence is full of serious meaning. In it they state "that they are unable to give a more satisfactory certificate than the one set forth," which is a mere statement that the balance-sheet is a correct summary of the accounts as recorded in the books, followed by a statement that the value of the assets as shown on the balance-sheet is dependent upon realization, which I have already commented upon, an important sentence: "On this subject we have reported specifically to the board." This may mean they have reported as to the value of the assets, or as to their realization, or (as I think is the true construction) as to both. The auditors were induced to withdraw this sentence which, though it would have given no information of the slightest value to the members, yet would have been calculated to put them upon inquiry. They go on:—

"We are not qualified, nor is it the province of the auditors, to estimate with exactitude the value of the securities." The words "with exactitude" seem to me to be emphatic, and to point out that they had, as appears by the report, made a general estimate of the securities which was very unfavourable. They say:—"Nevertheless, we feel it our duty to send you herewith a schedule of the securities amounting to £487,000, which we desire should have the special and very serious consideration of the directors." In the £487,000 are included every one of the sums owing by the Balfour companies and on the special accounts, and nearly £60,000 more out of the £100,000 owing by other customers of the bank. Auditors who feel it their duty to call the special and very serious consideration of their directors to £487,000 out of a total of £530,000 of the debts due to the bank must indeed have arrived at the opinion that the state of affairs of the company was critical and dangerous, but, as will appear, Mr. Theobald does not deny this, though he attempts, unsuccessfully, I think, to explain it away by saying that all his anxiety arose from the fact of the assets being locked up. Further on in the report the auditors say, "The gravity of the situation is enhanced by the fact, as we believe it to be, that the board is, in many cases, powerless to decline further help because they are powerless to realize." This appears to me to be a very just but a very serious statement. The Balfour companies were indeed so much bound up with one another by a system of inter-financing, and some of them had committed themselves so deeply in the building schemes of Hobbs & Co., Newman & Co., and others, that they would only be kept going in the future as they had been in the past by continued advances from the funds of the bank. The last-quoted extract from the report seems to me to show that the auditors fully appreciated this view of the state of affairs of the company. They continue as follows:—"We beg also respectfully to point out that the quarters from which the bank obtains by far the larger proportion of its business," meaning, I conclude, the Balfour companies, and some of the special accounts, "are such that the constitution of the board must make it difficult, if not impossible, to obtain a sufficiently independent judgment upon many vital questions which have to be decided in its management." No doubt this refers to the fact that some members of the board of the bank, the financing company, were members also of the board of different Balfour companies requiring advances, and the difficulty arising from this is obvious and serious. Then follows a sentence which forms an appropriate ending to such a report. "We cannot conclude without expressing the opinion unhesitatingly that no dividend should be paid this year." The auditors were unfortunately persuaded by Mr. Balfour, assisted by Mr. Brock, to strike out this clause, I believe, before the report reached the hands of the other directors of the bank. Mr. Theobald explains this by saying that he came to the conclusion that it was beyond the province of the auditors to express an opinion as to the policy of declaring a dividend, and if that were all I should be disposed to agree with him. It is no part of the auditor's duty to consider what is good or what is bad policy. They have only to examine into facts, and see that the members have their opinion as to the balance-sheet showing the state of affairs of the company. But the context seems to oblige me to read the excised sentence as meaning, not that it was impolitic, but that it would be improper, having regard to the state of affairs of the company, to declare a dividend.

Having regard to the explanations given by Mr. Theobald in his evidence, I think the postscript to this report very significant. It runs thus: "We do not wish it to be understood that we consider all the accounts in the schedule are unsecured, but as a whole the capital therein represented is locked up." That is the defence, that all their alarm arose from the capital being locked up. This is not, I think, the language that would have been used if the auditors had thought that the only mischief was in the locking up, and an examination of the schedule, to my mind, confirms this conclusion. To a great extent the memoranda in the schedule explain themselves, and I have already dealt with many of the items. The accounts of each one of the Balfour companies is referred to in such a way as to show the unsatisfactory state of the securities. Mr. Theobald now says that he had no doubt as to the solvency of any of the Balfour companies, and in a certain sense I am ready to believe this; that is to say, he thought that if they continued to be financed in the future as they had been in the past, and so were enabled to complete the buildings which had been commenced, they might ultimately be able to repay the advances to them with interest and commission. But this is not the meaning of solvency in a legal or business sense, and it is quite plain that Mr. Theobald knew perfectly well that some at least of these companies were, and were likely to remain for an indefinite period, unable to meet their liabilities as they became due. In no other way can the memoranda as to the want of security, or the defective nature of the securities of the several Balfour companies be explained. Similar observations apply to the memoranda as to the special accounts. Notwithstanding this report, every item of the £487,000 was entered as a good debt in the balance-sheet for 1891. No valuation was made of any one of the debts, or of the securities for them. If any such valuation had, in fact, been made, I think it plain that there could have been no profit shown for the year.

Mr. Theobald gave evidence several times over to the effect that whilst he was engaged in the audit for 1891 he felt that it was a very important crisis in the bank's affairs, and that if they could only get over the next month or so they would save it. His explanation of his withdrawal of the words in the proposed report to the members is that on this point he had reported specifically to the board. In explanation he gave, among other carefully prepared and considered reasons, the following: That "Mr. Balfour was so thoroughly aroused to the necessity of taking the affairs of the bank resolutely in hand as to lead me to believe that he would do so, and, being a man of great financial resource, he would be able to save the bank," and that Mr. Balfour also spoke of an amalgamation. "Mr. Balfour said that, while doing this, he would confer with me continuously, and that no interim dividend should be paid without consultation with me." The first intimation received of payment of an interim dividend was an announcement in the press of an interim dividend for 1892, for which it is not suggested Mr. Theobald was in any way liable. This would have given twelve months to work, during which time it would have been quite possible for Mr. Balfour to obtain very large payments from the borrowing companies with which he was connected, and thus for the bank to be saved. That is a very important point to make.

In another place he says, "My main point is this, that the bank could be saved if many of these accounts were collected. Mr. Balfour had absolute power over most of the companies, and he was so thoroughly alarmed that I quite believe that, if we could only tide over that period, he would use his influence over other companies to bring the money into the bank. I quite imagined he would do that, even if it meant that some of the other companies would have to go to the wall." What becomes of his statement that he thought the companies were solvent? He says, it is a critical time; if you can tide over the next month or two—as to which he never expresses an opinion—if you can do that, then the resources of Mr. Balfour are so great, his influence with the other companies so great, that it is quite possible he may collect a number of the accounts, even if the other companies have to go to the wall. I think it impossible to avoid the conclusion that Mr. Theobald, when about to make his report on the account of 1891, was thoroughly alarmed at the critical position of the bank, as he thought it more than likely the bank would not tide over another month or two, but that if it did, it could only be saved by extraordinary exertions on Mr. Balfour's part, and that in the process some of the other Balfour companies might have to go to the wall. He represents Mr. Balfour as fully sharing his alarm. If we turn to the balance-sheet to see whether the state of the companies affairs, as apprehended by Mr. Theobald, was in any way indicated therein, we shall, I think, be obliged to answer the question in the negative. The liabilities appear to be sufficiently set forth. It is the statement of the assets which most calls for criticism. The cash at the bank was correctly stated, and so are the bills receivable, though the amount £180,000 there, appears only to have been arrived at by transferring £58,000 on the 31st of December, 1891, from bills receivable to a loan account for unpaid expenses. Disregarding the small items for stamps, the only other items on the credit side are as follows:—"Investments, including reserve fund"—the reserve fund at that time was £10,000—"Two and three-quarter per Cent. Consols and Prescott and Arizona Railway Bonds, £7,820." That could not be the investments which included the reserve fund of £10,000. "Loan to customers and other securities, £346,000." In the two items, bills receivable and loans to customers and other securities are, as above pointed out, included the whole of the sums amounting to £487,000, the subject of the report of the auditors to the directors, at their full value. This item, "loans to customers and other securities," is, of course, altogether inaccurate, and may be very misleading. What the £346,000 really consists of is "loans to customers partly secured," which is a very different matter. It would be open to any ordinary reader of the balance-sheet to suppose that there were securities to an indefinite amount apart from loans to customers, and available to meet moneys due on the current accounts of customers. I am at a loss to understand for what purpose this item could have been so entered. It was not through inadvertence, for it was a correction of a still more misleading entry occurring in former balance-sheets. It was suggested that such an item frequently appears in balance-sheets. It may be so for anything I know, but it is none the less improper in the particular balance-sheet, which we have to consider. In short, the balance-sheet, as it stands, would have given no hint to any ordinary reader of the critical position arising, either from the locking up of capital or from the doubtful nature of many of the debts entered at their full value. In reporting this balance-sheet without explanation, the auditors were, in my judgment, guilty of a misfeasance within the meaning of the 10th section of the Act of 1890, as charged in the summons, and were in this case, at any rate, thoroughly alive to the unsatisfactory state of the affairs of the bank. They could not but be aware that the balance-sheet was not properly drawn up so as to show the state of the affairs of the bank as shown by the books.

The next question is whether the misfeasance was the cause of the loss to the company. On examination of the evidence there set forth, I should be led to the conclusion that the auditors did not know that a dividend could not properly be paid out of profits. Assuming all the Balfour companies and Benham and Wilkinson to have been able to pay the whole of the sum owing by them except the amounts debited in 1891 for interest and commissions, not only the profits available for dividend would be swept away, but of the reserve fund itself little or nothing would remain. Such an assumption would, however, in my opinion, be extravagantly favourable to the auditors, and it only required that one of the debts owing by Wilkinson or by almost any one of the Balfour companies should prove to be bad, in order to exhaust everything belonging to the bank that was not capital. It turned out that each one of the Balfour companies and Wilkinson and Benham, as well as other debtors of the bank, were insolvent; and it is established that the bank had no funds out of which dividends could, in any point of view, be properly paid. I wish to make it plain, as far as I can, that I am only relying upon matters which Mr. Theobald, as auditor, knew, or must reasonably be assumed to have known. The auditors must have known, and did know, that the balance-sheet for 1891 was not properly drawn up so as to show the state of the bank's affairs. That the dividend was, in fact, paid out of capital cannot, I think, admit of doubt. It has been argued that the payment of the dividend was not the proximate result of the auditors' report, as the recommendation of the directors and the vote of the meeting had to intervene. This appears to me, however, to misrepresent the state of things. The report of the auditors was a continuing representation, made, indeed, before, but in law and in good sense to be treated as repeated after, the recommendation of the dividend. It was perfectly well known to Mr. Theobald (at any rate, at the meeting where he was present and heard the reading of the report recommending a dividend, and the speech of Mr. Balfour) that this report of his was intended to be relied upon as justifying the recommendation, and as an invitation to the shareholders to vote the dividend. Not only was the report a causa sine qua non of the vote, but it was, in my judgment, a causa causans. How far the judgment should go against the appellant is a question which has given me considerable difficulty. A great deal of the reasoning which has led me to hold that the auditors reporting on the accounts of 1891 as they did, was a misfeasance in relation to the company, applies only to the case of that last report. The learned judge has held Mr. Theobald liable, not only for the 1891, but also for the 1890, dividend. I am far from saying that he is clearly wrong, but I cannot satisfy myself that he is clearly right. In the case of the 1890 dividend it is not, upon the evidence, made out to my full satisfaction that the auditors knew the balance-sheet to be substantially misleading, and I think it safer to confine the order to the dividend in respect of 1891.

Solicitors, Walters, Johnson, Bubb, & Whatton; Phelps, Sidgwick, & Biddle.

From Q. B. Div.
(Lord Esher, M.R., and Lopes and Kay, L.JJ.) Nov. 19.

WATSON v. ROYAL INSURANCE CO. (a.)

Inland Revenue—Income tax—Deductions—Money laid out or expended for the purposes of trade—Money paid to an employee in compensation for his dismissal—Income Tax Act, 1842 (5 & 6 Vict. c. 35), s. 100, Schedule.

By the terms of an agreement for the purchase by the appellant company of the business of another insurance company, the appellant company agreed to take into their service the manager of the other company at a salary of £4,000 a year, or, in the event of their electing not to retain him, to pay him a lump sum in commutation of his salary, the manager undertaking not to enter the service of any other insurance company. Shortly after the transference took place, the appellant company elected not to retain the manager, and paid him a lump sum.

Held, that the sum so paid could not be properly deducted from the gross profits of the business of the appellant company for the purpose of ascertaining the amount on which income tax was payable, seeing that it was not money "wholly and exclusively laid out or expended for the purposes of" the business.

Appeal from the Divisional Court upon a case stated by the commissioners for the general purposes of Income Tax Acts.

In estimating their profits for the year 1892-93, for the purpose of the payment of income tax, the Royal Insurance Co. sought to deduct the sum of £55,846. That was a sum they had paid to one who had been in their employment as manager under the following circumstances:—

The Royal Insurance Co. agreed to purchase the business of the Queen Insurance Co. By the terms of the agreement, the Royal Insurance Co. were to take into their service the manager of the Queen Insurance Co. at a salary of £4,000 a year. They also undertook, in the event of their at any time wishing not to retain the manager in their employment, to pay him in commutation of his salary a sum of money calculated according to the Queen annuity tables applicable to his then age, on condition that he bound himself not to enter the service of any other insurance company.

The business of the Queen Insurance Co. was duly taken over by the Royal Insurance Co., and the manager was taken into their service; but shortly afterwards the directors of the Royal Insurance Co. decided to terminate the manager's employment. They accordingly dismissed him, paying him the sum above referred to in commutation of his salary.

The question was whether the money so paid could be properly deducted from the gross profits of the company for the purpose of fixing the amount of income tax.

The Divisional Court disagreed. Vaughan Williams, J., did not decide the point, saying that he was unable to do so on the facts as they stood, while Wright, J., decided in favour of the Crown. Wright, J., subsequently withdrew his judgment, and Vaughan Williams, J., made an order remitting the case to the commissioners. This appeal was taken on behalf of the Crown against the order of Vaughan Williams, J.

5 & 6 Vict. 35 s. 100 Schedule D. first case, deals with "duties to be charged in respect of any trade, manufacture, adventure, or concern in the nature of trade, not contained in any other schedule of this Act."

By rule 1 "the duty to be charged in respect thereof shall be computed on a sum not less than the full amount of the balance of the profits or gains of such trade, manufacture, adventure, or concern, upon a fair and just average of three years . . . and shall be assessed, charged, and paid without other deduction than is hereinafter allowed."

By rule 1 of those applying to the first and second cases "in estimating the balance of the profits or gains to be charged according to either of the first or second cases, no sum shall be set against or deducted from or allowed to be set against or deducted from such profits or gains, for any disbursements or expenses whatever, not being money wholly and exclusively laid out or expended for the purposes of such trade, manufacture, adventure, or concern."

Sir Robert Finlay, S.G. (Danckwerts with him), for the appellants.—The sum of money paid to the manager is practically a part of the purchase-money paid for the business of the Queen Insurance Co.: City of London Contract Corporation v. Styles, 2 Tax Cas. 239. The election made by the company to pay him off involves the negation of the contention that the money payment was made for his services, and for the purpose of earning the profits of the year. This deduction is even more objectionable than the deduction of annuities expressly disallowed by rule 4.

Joseph Walton, Q.C. (Maxwell and Horsfall with him), for the respondents.—Taking into consideration the agreement under which the manager came into the company's employment, the lump sum paid to him in the event of their dismissing him must be considered as payment for his services, and was therefore a proper deduction. Gresham Life Assurance Society v. Styles, 38 W. R. 696, 25 Q. B. D. 351.

Sir Robert Finlay, S.G., in reply, cited Dillon v. Corporation of Haverfordwest, 39 W. R. 478, [1891] 1 Q. B. 575.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—In order to construe the Act, one must in the first place know what it is dealing with. It is dealing with the profits or gains earned in a trade or business on an average of three years. That is to say, for instance, not profits or gains earned in fifty years. How is that amount which is to be taxed to be ascertained? It is to be estimated according to rules laid down in the Act, not according to the rules which a tradesman might adopt in ascertaining his position at the end of the year, or which a partnership might adopt in estimating the profits which are to be divided among the partners. The amount is to be ascertained by taking the gross earnings, and by making certain deductions therefrom. There must be an account with two sides to it; on the one side, the gross earnings—and no earnings are to be brought into the account, except earnings of the trade; on the other side, deductions from the earnings. What deductions? Disbursements. What disbursements? Those disbursements which are named in the Act. They are—any disbursement "wholly and exclusively laid out and expended for the purposes of the trade."

Now we have to put a construction on those words. It seems to me the only construction we can put upon them is—disbursements wholly and exclusively laid out for the purpose of earning that profit which is the subject-matter of taxation—the average profit on three years. In this case I doubt whether this disbursement could be considered as a part of the purchase-money of the business of the Queen Insurance Co. What I think was, as it were, part of the price agreed to be paid for that business, was an undertaking by the Royal Insurance Co. to enter into a contract with the manager on the terms indicated in the agreement. They fulfilled that undertaking by taking the manager into their employment on those terms, and in that way they paid the price.

(a.) Reported by C. G. WILBRAHAM, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Therefore, we must now consider the case as if the Queen Insurance Co. had never existed, and the Royal Insurance Co. had agreed to employ the manager for an indefinite time, and had further agreed to compensate him if they dismissed him. Under such a contract they would pay him for his services, and such payment would be properly deducted in estimating the profits of the business. Then they dismiss him. When once he has been dismissed it cannot be said that anything they paid to him afterwards is a disbursement for services which go to earn the profits, the subject-matter for taxation. It is a payment for him not to serve them. On the true construction of the rule this money cannot be brought into the computation of the sum on which income tax has to be paid.

LOPES, L.J., after stating the facts and after setting out the material portions of the Income Tax Act, proceeded as follows:—It is necessary to show that the sum claimed to be deducted was a sum expended for the purpose of the trade—that is, a sum contributing to the earning of the profits and reducing those profits. I cannot say that this sum was paid for the purpose of making the profits. It was paid in order that the company might get rid of the manager, and it in no way contributed to the earning of the profits. For myself, I say, further, that it might be maintained that the money was part of the price to be paid in respect of the acquisition of the Queen Insurance Co.

But I think the former reason a complete answer to the claims of the Royal Insurance Co. to deduct the sum paid to the manager from the profits to be taxed.

KAY, L.J.—Besides the undertaking on the part of the Royal Insurance Co. to employ the manager at a salary of £4,000 a year, or to pay him a sum in commutation of the salary if they dismissed him, it was also part of the contract that the manager was to be bound not to act for any other company. This is a point for consideration. The real question is whether the deduction of the sum paid in commutation is one allowed by the Income Tax Act.

Now that Act does not use the word "profits" in the same sense as a tradesman would do when estimating his "profits" at the end of the year. A tradesman might possibly deduct a sum like the sum in question. The truth is that certain deductions are allowed by the Act, and section 159 says that "it shall not be lawful to make any other deductions than such as are expressly enumerated in the Act." In order that a deduction may be allowed, it must be brought within rule 1 of the first and second cases. Was this money "wholly and exclusively laid out and expended for the purposes of the trade"? It was expended in order to enable the company to dispense with the services of the manager. Whether they were reducing their staff or not is not shown. But the actual reason for paying the money to the manager was to get rid of him. Can that be said to be for the purposes of the trade?

It is admitted that while he was manager the £4,000 a year salary was paid for his services, and was properly deducted; but how can it be deducted when it was not paid for his services, but in order to get rid of him? Suppose it were the case that the company's object in dismissing the manager were that they were dissatisfied with him, and wished to get another manager. They would deduct the second manager's salary, and that would be a proper deduction. But suppose they were to deduct also a sum paid as compensation to the old manager, that would be making a double deduction in respect of the same services. Again, suppose the company had never employed him at all, but had dispensed with his services at once, as they had the right under their agreement to do, how would it be possible to say that the money then paid to him was a payment for his services, when, in fact, he never rendered any services at all? Mr. Walton said that this money was paid to the manager in respect of his engaging never to enter into the service of any other insurance company, and that, to that extent, it might be said to be expended for the purposes of the business. But suppose the company had had a manager in their employment with whom they had made no such agreement about commutation, and on his expressing a desire to leave, they had agreed to compensate him on his undertaking not to enter the service of any other company. Could it, then, be said that the compensation so paid would be a proper deduction? I think not. But, Mr. Walton went on to say, here the money was paid under an antecedent bargain that this should be the arrangement with the manager, and it was because of that antecedent bargain that the company could obtain the services of the manager on no other terms than that they should pay him compensation if they dismissed him. I confess that that distinction is altogether too fine, and I do not see it. The truth is that the necessity for the payment arose from the company dismissing the manager, a course which it was entirely within their option to pursue.

I think that this payment was not a deduction that could properly be made.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitor for the appellants, Solicitor for Inland Revenue.

Solicitors for the respondents, G. L. P. Eyre & Co., for Garnett, Tarbett, & Co.

From Q. B. Div.
(Lord Esher, M.R., and Lopes, and Kay, L.JJ.) } Nov. 13.

STRACHAN v. UNIVERSAL STOCK EXCHANGE CO. (a.)

Gaming—Stocks and shares—Payment of differences—Money deposited as cover—Repudiation of gaming contract—Betting Act, 1845 (8 & 9 Vict. c. 109), s. 18.

The plaintiff deposited with the defendant a sum of money as cover in respect of certain gaming transactions in stocks and shares entered into with the defendant. Before the plaintiff gave notice that he repudiated the gaming contracts, the deposit had been absorbed by the winnings of the defendant.

Held, that, having regard to the provisions of section 18 of the Betting Act, 1845, the money could not be recovered.

Appeal from the decision of Cave, J.

The action was brought to recover certain securities and money deposited with the defendants as security or cover in respect of transactions in stocks and shares.

At the trial of the action the jury found that the transactions were gambling transactions, and Cave,

(a.) Reported by C. G. WILBRAHAM, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

J., gave judgment for the plaintiff in regard to the securities, but for the defendant in regard to the money deposit.

The defendants made an application to the Court of Appeal for judgment or a new trial, which was dismissed on the 23rd of May last. A report of this appeal is given 43 W. R. 611.

The plaintiff now appealed from that part of the judgment which had reference to the money deposited as cover.

The facts, as well as the arguments used, sufficiently appear from the judgments of the Master of the Rolls and Kay, L.J.

Bigham, Q.C., and Muir Mackenzie, for the apellant.

Lawson Walton, Q.C., and Pollard, for the defendants, were not called upon.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—The plaintiff was an officer in the army. He betted with a broker, knowing him to be the principal, to the extent of £3,000,000. The broker was unwilling to trust to the honour of the plaintiff, so he insisted on the plaintiff giving him security. Accordingly the plaintiff deposited with the broker certain securities, together with a sum of £3,000. The bets came off, the plaintiff lost, and the broker assumed to pay himself with the money deposited and kept the securities. Whereupon the plaintiff brought an action to recover both the money and the securities. Cave, J., held that he was entitled to recover the securities but not the deposit. An appeal was made against that judgment by the defendant in this court on a former occasion, and this court decided that the learned judge was right in holding that the plaintiff could recover the securities. The question is now whether he can recover the money as well. I believe the necessity for delivering this further judgment is mainly due to me, because I was unwilling that the plaintiff should not recover, for the broker is a person who understands this business, and he persuades the people who bet with him to give him a deposit. What I am bound to hold is that where a person is so foolish as to give a deposit he can never afterwards recover it, so that, even if he were to win his bet, the other person could laugh in his face and say: "I am neither going to pay you the money you have won nor return you your deposit." It seems to me that the decision must go that length. That is the proper construction of the Betting Act. I am aware that it has been held that before the wager has been determined the deposit can be recovered. Though these decisions seem to me to be an encroachment upon the Act, I do not wish to say anything against them, but when I am asked to go further still, I must decline to do so. I am fortified in this opinion by the judgments in Manning v. Purcell, 3 W. R. 274, 7 De G. M. & G. 66.

Knowing the result—the disgusting result—of my decision, nevertheless I am bound to pronounce that that is the law. The ruling of Cave, J., must be affirmed.

KAY, L.J., read the following judgment:—The plaintiff and defendant in September, 1893, entered into a contract for gambling in stocks and shares by pretending to buy for a future day, and debiting and crediting one another for any change in the market price over the day named, without, in fact, buying or selling any stock or shares. The plaintiff deposited with the defendants, who are brokers, certain property as security for the performance of this contract. These securities were not realized, and he has been held entitled to recover them.

But he also deposited with the defendants £3,000 in money, in two different sums of £2,000 and £1,000. The former sum on the 10th of February, 1894, the latter on the 27th of the same month. The receipts for these sums show that they were deposited as what is called cover, that is to abide the result of the gambling, and if the result was in favour of the brokers to enable them to pay themselves by appropriating the deposit or so much of it as was necessary. Accounts were furnished by the brokers every three months, and in the first rendered after these deposits were made, they were entered to the brokers' debit on the days of receipt, the balance being £2,413 16s. 11d. in favour of the plaintiff. Thus £586 3s. 1d. of the £3,000 was shown to have been used, and the account showed that to make up the required cover of £3,000 for future transactions £586 3s. 1d. must be paid to the brokers, and on the assumption that this would be done there was an entry "Deposit retained, £3,000."

Interest was credited to the plaintiff upon this £3,000 on one side of the account, and on the other he was debited with interest on the particular purchases. The plaintiff paid £586 3s. 1d. on the 8th of March, and the £3,000 having been thus made good the gambling went on till the 25th of April, when the plaintiff gave notice to the defendants to close the account. On the 26th of April the plaintiff commenced this action to recover the £3,000.

It appears from the account since rendered, which has been put in by the plaintiff, that at that date he was indebted to the defendants to an amount much exceeding the £3,000, the account being stated precisely in the same way as the former account which he had received, and the £3,000 being entered in two sums of "Balance, £2,413 16s. 11d. and cash, £586 3s. 1d." as the first items to the plaintiff's credit.

But attention was particularly called to the fact that interest on £3,000 was credited to the plaintiff up to the 22nd of June, the day of delivery of this last account, this it was said showed that the £3,000 had not been appropriated. Before the commencement of this action there was no repudiation by the plaintiff of the gambling transaction.

By section 18 of 8 & 9 Vict. c. 109, the contract between the plaintiff and the defendants for gambling was null and void. By the latter part of the same section it is provided that "no suit shall be brought or maintained in any court of law or equity for the recovery of any sum of money or valuable thing alleged to be won upon any wager or which shall have been deposited in the hands of any person to abide the event on which any wager shall have been made." If this deposit comes within those words it cannot be recovered. It is suggested that the statute only refers to money or valuables deposited with a third person as stakeholder. The statute does not say so. It says with "any person." And I am not able to conceive any valid reason for construing it to have the suggested meaning. The object is to discourage gaming and wagering by making the money won or lost irrecoverable, and also by making any deposit made to abide the event irrecoverable. What can it matter with whom it was deposited? If it could be recovered, the intention as well as the letter of the statute would be violated. It was quite familiar that money was deposited with one of the gamblers as well as with a third party as stakeholder. For example, it was common in betting with a bookmaker to deposit the amount which he might win on cash bets in his hands, to be his in case he won; if not, to be returned when he paid his loss.

In Manning v. Purcell the testator kept a betting office and betted on horse races, and received deposits from the persons who betted with him. Some of these bets were determined against him in his lifetime. Some after his death. His widow and administratrix paid the bets decided in the testator's lifetime, and returned the deposits as to them. She also returned the deposits as to those bets which were decided after the testator's death. With respect to the latter it was held that she was right to return the deposits, because the bets undecided were cancelled by the testator's death. But as to those decided in his lifetime she was not allowed to retain the amount out of the estate, on the ground that 8 & 9 Vict. c. 109, s. 18, made both the bets and deposits irrecoverable. Turner, L.J., said that as to these payments, "having regard to the provisions of the statute they could not have been recovered from the testator in his lifetime, and that, therefore, the payments by the administratrix in respect of these can be regarded only as voluntary payments, and not valid against the estate." I should consider this decision binding on me if I disagreed with it. But for the reasons already indicated I respectfully say I entirely agree with it.

But then it was argued that at any time before the money was appropriated by the defendants the plaintiff could repudiate the void contract, and reclaim the deposit. This was decided in Varney v. Hickman, 5 C. B. 271; Hampden v. Walsh, 24 W. R. 607, 1 Q. B. D. 189; and in the Privy Council case Trimble v. Hill, 28 W. R. 479, 5 App. Cas. 342. One of the grounds in the first of these cases—and, I confess, the most intelligible to me—is that upon the repudiation the money ceased to abide the event and became money of the plaintiff in the hands of the defendant without any good reason for detaining it. But in Gatty v. Field, 9 Q. B. 431, it was held that the repudiation must be made before action brought, and, as there is no cause of action until repudiation, this is not a merely technical objection. But there is a question whether the plaintiff in this case at the time of bringing the action had repudiated so as to entitle him to a return of the deposit. And upon the facts which I have stated I do not think he could. He did not bring this action until the £3,000 was more than absorbed by his losses, and he knew, from the manner in which the accounts sent to him were stated, that the £3,000 would be treated as appropriated towards these losses. It was sought to avoid this difficulty by saying that in this account rendered after action the plaintiff was credited with interest on the £3,000 down to the date of sending in that account, although it showed a large balance against him. But as the £3,000 was entered as the first item of the plaintiff's credit, this credit of interest must be treated as a mistake if it credited interest beyond the 25th of April, when the account was closed. For these reasons I think the appeal fails.

A. L. SMITH, L.J., in a written judgment, after stating the facts and section 18 of the statute 8 & 9 Vict., c. 109, proceeded as follows:—It will be seen that this section does not make the agreement illegal but renders it void, and, as was well pointed out by Lush, J., in Haigh v. Town Council of Sheffield, 23 W. R. 547, L. R. 10 Q. B. 109, a wager by the statute is made a thing of a neutral character, it is not forbidden, it leaves an ordinary betting debt a mere debt of honour depriving it of all legal obligation, but not making it illegal. It is manifest that no action can be brought by the one against the other to enforce any contract so declared to be void, but it has been held by authorities that it is far too late now to question that as soon as one party to a gaming contract receives notice from the other party that the former declines to abide any longer by the wagering contract, money deposited by him thereupon ceases to be money deposited in the hands of the latter "to abide the event on which any wager shall have been made," and any money still in the latter's hands unappropriated by him, becomes money of the former without any good reason for the latter detaining it, and in such circumstances an action for money had and received to the plaintiff's use will lie. This was held as long ago as the year 1828 by the King's Bench in Hastelow v. Jackson, 8 B. & C. 225; Varney v. Hickman; followed by Hampden v. Walsh; and adopted in 1880 by the Privy Council in Trimble v. Hill. This principle was also, as it appears to me, enunciated by Turner and Knight Bruce, L.JJ., in the case of Manning v. Purcell. This notice may be given both before as well as after the event, to abide which the money has been deposited, has come off, but in the latter case it must be given before the money has been appropriated to the purpose for which it had been deposited, for if appropriated it is no longer money of the plaintiff's in the defendant's hands. If it is still unappropriated the defendant cannot set up the gaming and wagering contract to retain it, for the statute enacts that such a contract is void, and the result, therefore, is that if one party to a gaming and wagering contract gives to the other party notice in time that he withdraws from the contract, he can recover back his deposit whether in the hands of his co-better or of a third party. Aliter if he does not.

Now, in the present case, when the plaintiff gave the notice to the defendants that he withdrew from any further carrying on of the gaming contract, which he was entitled to do, it is admitted that he was largely indebted to the defendants for differences, and, in my judgment, my brother Cave took the correct view (notwithstanding Mr. Bigham's criticism of the accounts) of the transactions between the parties when he held that, as the plaintiff became from time to time in debit to the defendants for differences, the £3,000 pro tanto became used up, and that, as a matter of fact, every farthing of the £3,000 had been exhausted and more, when the notice was given by the plaintiff, and that this being the real truth of the case the plaintiff could not recover back the £3,000 nor any part of it.

Cave, J., was right in refusing to order the return to the plaintiff of the £3,000. In the case of the securities deposited, the plaintiff was in time with his notice, and in this he was not. His appeal must share the same fate as that of the defendant's appeal, and be dismissed, with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitor for the plaintiff, Theodore Allingham.

Solicitors for the defendants, Last & Sons.

From Q. B. Div. (A. L. Smith and Rigby, L.JJ.) Nov. 11.

THE SHOE MANUFACTURING CO. (LIMITED) v. CUTLAN. (a.)

Practice — Patent action — Jurisdiction of Court of Appeal to allow amendment of particulars of objections—46 & 47 Vict. c. 57, s. 29—R. S. C., ord. 58, r. 4.

The Court of Appeal has, under ord. 58, r. 7, juris- diction to allow the amendment of particulars of objections; but,

(a.) Reported by WM. SCOTT THOMPSON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Held, that, on the merits, leave to amend ought not to be given, as the defendant would not be prejudiced by the judgment in the action if he afterwards sought to have the plaintiff's patents revoked.

This was a motion by the defendants to an action for the infringement of certain letters patent, for leave to amend their particulars of objection and adduce further evidence upon the hearing of the appeal.

The action was brought seeking an injunction to restrain the infringement of three letters patent (hereinafter respectively referred to as patents A., B., & C.).

The defendants delivered with their defence particulars of objections, by which as finally reamended the defendants in effect alleged that the patents were invalid by reason of twelve instances of prior publication or user therein mentioned.

The action was tried before Romer, J., on the 3rd, 4th, 13th, 14th & 15th of May, 1895.

By his judgment delivered on the 12th of June, 1895, his lordship held that the plaintiffs' patents A., B., & C. were respectively valid, and his lordship further held that the defendants had infringed patents A. & B. respectively, and granted an injunction and other relief in respect of such last-mentioned patents.

The defendants served notice of appeal against that judgment, and now moved that they might be at liberty to further amend their particulars of objections, by alleging seven further instances of alleged anticipations specified in their notice of motion. From an affidavit filed by the defendants it appeared that the failure of the defendants to discover these seven alleged anticipations and include them in the particulars of objections prior to the trial of the action was due to the mistake of the person employed to search at the Patent Office.

T. Terrell, Q.C., and Micklem, for the appellants.—This court has a discretion under ord. 58, r. 4, to allow such an amendment as now asked for, and whether such leave will be granted depends on the circumstances of each case: Pirrie v. York-street Flax Spinning Co., Limited, 11 Pat. Rep. 429; Cropper v. Smith, 33 W. R. 60, 26 Ch. D. 700 (in the House of Lords, 33 W. R. 753, 10 App. Cas. 249). The judgment of Bowen, L.J., in the last case (26 Ch. D., at p. 711) shows that this amendment ought to be allowed. If allowed of course it will be on the terms settled in the case of Baird v. Moule's Earth Closet Co., 17 Ch. D., at 139*n*.

Moulton, Q.C., and Lawson, for the respondents.—This court has no jurisdiction to allow the amendment of particulars of objections in a patent action. The words "the court or a judge" in ord. 58, r. 4, refer solely to a judge of first instance: see the judgment of Cotton, L.J., in Cole v. Saqui, 37 W. R. 109, 40 Ch. D., at p. 133. [A. L. SMITH, L.J.—After the trial the judge of first instance is functus officio.] Section 29 of the Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883, does not apply to the Court of Appeal. [RIGBY, L.J.—The words of rule 4 are very wide.] If the judge at the trial omitted to certify in respect of certain of the particulars of objections, the Court of Appeal would have no power to supply the omission. [SMITH, L.J.—It is only a question of costs.] Yes, but it envolves a question of right. Even if the defendants fail on this appeal they will not be estopped from applying to have these patents revoked: In re Deeley's Patent, 43 W. R. 517; [1895] 1 Ch. 687.

Terrell, Q.C., in reply, referred to In re Haddan's Patent, 33 W. R. 96, 54 L. J. Ch. (N. S.) 126.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—This is a application under ord. 58, r. 4, that the defendants may be allowed to make an amendment in their particulars of objections, and to introduce evidence upon the hearing of the appeal.

The action was brought in respect of the infringement of certain patents, and it occupied five days before Romer, J. The defendants gave particulars of objections, amounting to twelve in number. Romer, J., gave judgment that the defendants had infringed patents A. and B. The defendants appeal to this court, and say that Romer, J.'s judgment was incorrect. They now apply for leave to add seven further particulars of objections, and they ask us to overhaul Romer, J.'s judgment on the twelve objections, and to go into a new case as to the seven. I should be very reluctant to accede to such an application, because if it were to accede to it this court would be inundated with similar applications.

It is said that we have no jurisdiction to allow these amendments. In my opinion we have that power. It is said that section 29 of the Patents, Designs, and Tramways Act, 1883, has enacted that the amendment of particulars of objections shall only be made by "the court or a judge," and it is said that in Cropper v. Smith it has been decided that the Court of Appeal is not a court or a judge within the meaning of that section. [His lordship pointed out that in Cropper v. Smith the defendant had expressly refused to ask for leave to amend: 26 Ch. D., at p. 708.] Now we have the express provision of ord. 58, r. 4. [His lordship read the rule.] In my judgment a patent and any other action stand in the same position in this respect, and there is no difference between the law in a patent action and in any other action in this court. If authority were wanted I think the case of Cropper v. Smith in this court decided that there is this power given to this court to order amendment. In that case both Cotton and Fry, L.JJ., base their decisions on the fact that the applicants had deliberately refused to ask for leave to amend. With what Bowen, L.J., said in the same case on the question of amendment I cordially agree. I have not the slightest doubt that we have a discretion to allow amendment in this action.

Ought we, however, to exercise our discretion by allowing these amendments? If we grant leave this would happen. When this appeal comes on we shall have to try the question not only as to the twelve old objections, but also as to the seven new ones.

Nothing could be more inconvenient than that. How the defendant missed discovering these specifications, which, as he alleges, show that these patents are invalid, I cannot understand. There will be no irremediable damage done to the defendant if we refuse this application, for our decision in In re Deeley's Patent shows that the defendant will not be estopped by the judgment in this action from taking proceedings to have the plaintiff's patents revoked. In this case the defendant, owing to a blunder, has not been able properly to impeach these patents, but he can properly impeach them by means of a petition for their revocation. The application ought, therefore, in my judgment, to be dismissed with costs.

RIGBY, L.J., concurred.

Solicitors, Sharpe, Parker, Pritchard & Barham; J. H. Johnson, Son, & Ellis, for Dennis & Faulkner Northampton.

High Court of Justice.

Chan. Div.
North, J.

Oct. 26.

In re Copland.
Mitchell v. Bain. (a.)

Administration—Costs—Real and personal estate.

Where the costs of administration are increased by the administration of real estate, such increased costs must be borne by the real estate.

Further consideration.

Caroline Stewart Copland, by her will dated the 18th of July, 1889, devised three freehold houses to trustees to the use that her sister should receive thereout an annuity of £100 a year during her life, and, after her death, the testatrix directed that the three houses should fall into her residuary estate, and, except as aforesaid, she devised all her real and leasehold estate upon trust to sell and stand possessed of the proceeds upon trust to pay her just debts, funeral, and testamentary expenses and legacies, and in case the proceeds should be insufficient for that purpose, she directed that such deficiency should be made up and payable out of her personal estate; and after giving her personal estate other than chattels real upon trust to pay certain charitable legacies, she gave the residue of her estate to her executors absolutely.

The testatrix's real estate consisted of the three houses devised by her will.

On the same day, but subsequently to signing her will, testatrix signed and handed to the trustees of her will a letter, directing them to hold the three houses upon a secret trust for charitable purposes.

The testatrix died on the 7th of July, 1891.

On the 9th of November, 1892, her trustees commenced an action for the administration of her estate, in the course of which questions of considerable difficulty arose, owing to the way in which the testatrix had disposed of her real estate.

The point was raised, whether part of the costs ought not to be borne by the real estate.

Vernon Smith, Q.C., and Kenyon Parker, for a co-heir in gavelkind.—The testatrix has directed how "testamentary expenses" are to be paid, but the devise of real estate is invalid, and the testamentary expenses, which include costs in this action, must be paid out of personal property.

Ingle Joyce, for the Attorney-General.—It is only just, that, so far as costs have been increased by the administration of the real estate, they should be borne by the real estate. That was the view taken in Patching v. Barnett, 51 L. J. Ch. 74, 30 W. R. Dig. 54, and followed in In re Middleton, Thompson v. Harris, 30 W. R. 293, 19 Ch. D. 552.

Vernon Smith, Q.C., replied.

S. Eady, Q.C., and H. Greenwood, L. T. Dibdin, and J. H. Boome, for other parties.

North, J.—I consider that the question is settled by the two cases cited. The proper order will be that costs are to be paid out of personal estate, except so far as they have been increased by administering real estate.

Solicitor for the co-heir in gavelkind, T. F. Adshead.

Solicitor for the Attorney-General, The Solicitor to the Treasury.

(a.) Reported by G. B. Hamilton, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Solicitors for the other parties, R. H. Bentley, A. Slater, Clayton, Sons, & Fargus.

Q. B. Div.
(Lord Russell of Killowen, C.J., and Cave, J.)

Oct. 25.

Moore v. Pearce's Dining and Refreshment Rooms (Limited). (a.)

Margarine—Exposure for sale—Restaurant keepers—Sale of margarine by retail—Margarine Act, 1887 (50 & 51 Vict. c. 29), ss. 4, 6.

The defendants were restaurant keepers, and supplied their customers with (inter alia) "slices" of bread and broiled haddocks, to be consumed on the premises. In the shop was a lump of margarine which was only used to spread upon the slices of bread, and small portions of it were also placed as a condiment upon the broiled haddocks. In both cases the price charged for the slices of bread and for the haddocks was the same whether a portion of margarine was supplied with them or not. The lump of margarine had no label upon it.

Upon an information laid by one of the customers the magistrate refused to convict the defendants of exposing for sale margarine not labelled as required by the 6th section of the Margarine Act, 1887.

Held, on appeal, that the magistrate was right, as there was evidence to show that the defendants did not sell margarine except in conjunction with some other article, and, therefore, that there was no "exposing for sale" by retail within the meaning of the section.

Special case.

This was an appeal by John Moore, an officer of the Butter Association, against the decision of Mr. Haden Corser, a metropolitan police magistrate, sitting at Worship-street, who had refused to convict the respondent company for an alleged offence under the Margarine Act of 1887.

The facts were substantially as follows: On the 22nd of January, of this year, Moore, with another officer of his association, went to the defendants' establishment known as the "Wilberforce" in Great Eastern-street, City. He called for some coffee, bread and butter, and was served. Subsequently Moore asked the attendant for four slices of dry bread and three-penny worth of butter, and was told that the compound used as butter was a mixture of margarine and butter, and he replied that that would do. Then, according to his version of what took place, the girl went to the counter and cut a piece off a big lump of margarine on the shelf and weighed it, but the manager intervened, and told Moore that he could not be supplied with the article in order to take it away. The complainant said he wanted it for analysis and offered 3d. The manager then repeated his former observation and pointed out notices on the walls containing the following announcement:—"Pearce's Dining and Refreshment Room, Limited.—Notice.—Slices, ½d. each. Nothing but a mixture of the best Danish butter and margarine is sold at this establishment." The defendants admitted that except these notices there was no label either on the plates containing the slices or on the big lump of the compound; and also admitted that in the shop there was a board on which was a notice to the effect that "bread and butter" was sold there. In the end Moore and his colleague were ordered out of the shop by the manager without their obtaining the piece of the compound which had been cut off.

(a.) Reported by Erskine Reid, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

In the evidence given before the magistrate it was stated that slices were mostly cut behind the counter from which customers helped themselves. The margarine was only sold spread on slices or placed on haddocks and in neither case was the price of the article reduced if no margarine was taken. For the complainant it was contended, that having regard to the facts the mixture had been exposed for sale under circumstances, which brought the defendants within reach of the Margarine Act. Reliance was more especially placed on the fact that no label was placed upon the large lump of the mixture. For the defendant company the contention was that they did not sell margarine by retail but only on slices, and that they were therefore not bound to comply with the provisions of the Margarine Act.

The magistrate dismissed the summons, being of opinion that the Act did not apply. In his opinion the defendants were refreshment-room keepers and were not sellers of margarine by retail. They only sold margarine as a compound article — i.e., as "slices," or bread spread with margarine, and not separately as margarine. He considered that the Act only applied to shops, such as butter shops or grocers' shops, where margarine was usually sold. The lump on the shelf was only there for the purpose of being used to spread on bread and was not "exposed for sale" within the meaning of the 6th section, and, therefore, neither it nor the slices required a label.

From this decision Moore appealed.

Morton Smith (with him Dickens, Q.C.), for the appellant.—The object of the Act is to protect the public from having margarine palmed off on them as butter. I shall be contented if your lordships hold that the lump on the shelf must have a label, though strictly speaking one should also be attached on every plate of slices. The Act applies to everybody dealing in margarine for profit. Section 4 directs that every person dealing in margarine whether wholesale or retail, whether a manufacturer or importer, or as a consignor or consignee, or as a commission agent or otherwise, who is found guilty of an offence under this Act shall be liable to a fine. Section 6 directs that where margarine is exposed for sale by retail there shall be attached to every parcel thereof so exposed and in such manner as to be clearly visible to the purchaser a label on which is printed the word "margarine," otherwise the vendor is liable to a fine under section 4.

Ogle, for the respondents, was not called upon.

Lord RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN, C.J.—It is an important question which is raised in this case. The statute on which the point turns was, no doubt, mainly passed to protect the public against deception. Before I say anything else, I should like to make this general observation, that the persons here charged with the offence have throughout acted entirely above board, and no manner of deception has been alleged against them. The question the court has to decide is whether the defendants have committed a technical offence under the Act. Section 4 of the Act does not create the offence, it only imposes the penalty. Section 6 creates the offence, and it is with that section that we have to deal. Did the defendants commit an offence within the meaning of the middle clause of that section, which deals with "exposure for sale"? That section directs that every person dealing in margarine in the manner described in the preceding section, shall conform to the following regulations:—"Every package, whether open or closed, and containing margarine, shall be branded or durably marked 'margarine,' and if such margarine be exposed for sale by retail, there shall be attached to each parcel, in such manner as to be clearly visible to the purchaser, a label marked 'margarine,' and every person selling margarine by retail, save in a package duly branded or durably marked shall, in each case, deliver the same to the purchaser in or with a paper wrapper, on which shall be printed in capital letters, of a certain size, the word 'margarine.'" Has that section been contravened in this case? In my opinion it has not. The facts were these. The defendants kept a refreshment house, and did not sell any of the articles in which they dealt to be taken away. It was strictly a refreshment room in which the customers eat whatever they called for. There was a notice in the shop that nothing but a mixture of the best Danish butter and margarine was sold at this establishment. The slices of bread that were sold at ½d. each had the mixture spread upon them, and the twopenny haddocks had a piece of it supplied with them as a condiment. The informant asked to be supplied with some of the butter from the lump, in order that he might take it away. If this had been sold to him, I think there would have been a great deal to be said for the view taken by the complainant that in fact margarine was sold at that establishment by retail. The manager, however, promptly informed him that they did not sell margarine, and that it was only used by them in conjunction with bread or haddocks.

Then I come to this question: Was this a case of "exposing for sale by retail 'margarine'" within the the meaning of the last part of the section? To answer that we must carefully read the last part of the section, which provides that every person selling margarine by retail must sell it either in a package or wrapper in order to get light upon the meaning of the words "exposed for sale by retail" in the middle clause of the section. Reading the two together it seems to me that such words are wholly inapplicable to the business as it was carried on by the defendants. It would be ridiculous to attempt to enforce the directions as to the labelling of every portion of margarine sold to a purchaser, when they came to be applied to the pats of margarine that were spread on each slice of bread or supplied as a condiment to the haddocks. The evidence shows, however, that the margarine was only used at that establishment in these two ways, and was, in fact, never sold as a separate article. I think, indeed, the learned counsel, when he came to argue the point, found great difficulty in supporting the wider view taken by the prosecution. It is as if the Act was sought to be enforced in respect of melted butter or pommes frites, if margarine had been used in the cooking. The main stress of the complainant's argument was directed to show that the lump on the shelf ought to have had a label on it. But before he could establish that point he must establish this point—that the lump was exposed for sale by retail. In my opinion it was not an exposing for sale by retail at all within the meaning of the section.

I think it is also of importance to note that it was in the one case a sale of slices of bread with the mixture spread upon them, and in the other of haddocks to which a piece was added as a condiment, and that in both cases the price charged for the bread and the haddocks was not reduced if no margarine were taken. For these reasons I think the decision of the learned magistrate was right.

CAVE, J.—I am of the same opinion.

Appeal dismissed, with costs.

Solicitor for the appellant, C. Urquhart Fisher.

Solicitor for the respondent, Thomas Charles.

IN BANKRUPTCY.

Q. B. Div.
(Vaughan Williams and Kennedy, JJ.)

Oct. 28, 29.

In re MORGAN.
Ex parte TURNER. (a.)

Bankruptcy—Protected transaction—Notice of act of bankruptcy—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 4, sub-section 1 (h); s. 49, sub-section 2.

Knowledge by a creditor that the debtor's solicitor has instructions to prepare a notice that the debtor intends to suspend payment of his debts is not notice to such creditor that the debtor has committed an act of bankruptcy.

Appeal from an order of His Honour Judge Harris Leigh, in the County Court at Hereford, declaring that an assignment by the debtor, Morgan, of a debt due to him from one Terry, to the appellant Turner was void by reason of Turner having taken the same with notice of an act of bankruptcy committed by Morgan.

Upon the 12th of March, 1875, Turner sold Morgan seventy bullocks and received in return a cheque dated the 13th of March, which was dishonoured on the 14th of March.

Morgan resold the bullocks to Terry on the 13th of March, and received from him a cheque which he ultimately returned, leaving Terry indebted to him for the price of the bullocks.

Upon the 14th of March Morgan committed an act of bankruptcy by writing to the manager of his bank that he should be compelled to suspend payment, and asking the manager to instruct Philpin, a solicitor, to prepare a circular calling a meeting of his creditors for the 19th.

The circular, though prepared, was never, in fact, sent out.

Upon the 15th of March Turner called on Philpin, who said to him, "Morgan has given me instructions to call his creditors together because he cannot pay his debts," but he did not tell Turner of the letter written by Morgan to the bank manager.

Turner wrote to Terry on the 16th of March, saying, "Morgan is now compounding with his creditors"; and upon the 20th of March went to see Morgan and compelled him to assign Terry's debt to him.

The petition was presented upon the 1st of April, receiving order made on the 10th of April. A trustee was appointed who moved upon the 21st of May in the County Court of Hereford for a declaration that the assignment of the 20th of March was void as against him.

The county court judge decided in favour of the trustee, and from that decision this appeal was brought.

Muir Mackenzie, for the appellant, stated the facts, and was stopped by the court.

Gwynne James, for the respondent.—A debtor commits an act of bankruptcy when he gives notice to a creditor that he is about to suspend payment, therefore if Turner knew that Philpin had instructions from Morgan to call a meeting of his creditors, then he must have known that Morgan had given notice that he was about to suspend payment.

Muir Mackenzie, in reply.—Philpin had no right in the course of conversation with Turner to give him notice of an act of bankruptcy on the part of Morgan, nor was he Morgan's agent to commit an act of bankruptcy for him by telling Turner that he could not pay his debts.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J.—With every possible desire not to differ from the learned county court judge, I have come to the conclusion that he was wrong in the judgment he gave. I am not at all sure that I really am differing from him at all. The case made before him was that there had been an act of bankruptcy committed by the debtor, by his notice to the bank manager of his intention to suspend payment within section 4, sub-section 1 (h) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, the bank manager being a creditor. That was the case in the county court. Now if one looks at the evidence of the two people, who might have given notice of that act of bankruptcy to the appellant—viz., the bank manager and Philpin, I think it plain that neither of them did in form give notice to the appellant, that the debtor had given this notice of intention to suspend payment of his debts. First, take the conversation between the appellant and the bank manager. The affidavit of the bank manager does not suggest that he gave the appellant any notice of the letter he had received from the debtor, and the appellant, in his evidence, gave a point-blank denial to the suggestion that he had received any such notice from the bank manager.

Then take the conversation with Philpin, the same observations apply, his affidavit does not say that he told the appellant the contents or effect of that letter. It is impossible to say that Philpin, in conversation, gave any notice of this act of bankruptcy.

It did, however, occur to me that the conversation between the appellant and Philpin might constitute a notice of an act of bankruptcy, for it might be said that the very conversation was notice by the debtor, through his agent, that he had suspended or intended to suspend payment of his debts. Nevertheless, I have come to the conclusion that Philpin was not authorised by the debtor to give any such oral notice, he only had authority to issue a circular calling a meeting of creditors on a date which had not arrived, and the debtor might have withdrawn that authority at any time before that date.

Knowledge that a debtor intends to give notice of his intention to suspend payment is not notice of an act of bankruptcy, nor is knowledge that the debtor's solicitor has instructions to prepare a notice of intention to suspend payment, notice that the debtor has committed an act of bankruptcy; and it does not amount to notice by the debtor to the appellant, unless we hold that the instructions to the solicitor gave him authority to give oral notice before the circular was issued.

KENNEDY, J.—I concur. It seems to me, on the evidence, that it is quite clear that the appellant never knew of the contents or effect of the debtor's letter to the bank manager, and also that the solicitor had no authority to give oral notice of an act of bankruptcy on behalf of the debtor, but that his authority was limited to sending out the circulars.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitor for the appellant, A. Hunt.

Solicitor for the respondent, H. P. Davies.

(a.) Reported by P. M. FRANCKE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Court of Appeal.

From Q. B. Div. (Lord Esher, M.R., and Kay, L.J.) — Nov. 11.

SOUTH STAFFORDSHIRE TRAMWAYS CO. (LIMITED) v. EBBSMITH. (a.)

Practice—Evidence—Bankers' Books Evidence Act, 1879 (42 & 43 Vict. c. 11), s. 7.

The court will refuse an application, made under the Bankers' Books Evidence Act, 1879, for leave to inspect before trial bankers' books containing entries of the banking account of a party to the action, if that party swears in an affidavit that there is no item therein relevant to the matters in question, unless the applicant can show from some other document in the cause that such affidavit is inaccurate.

Semble, that the court has jurisdiction under that Act to give leave to inspect the banking account of a person not a party to the action, if items in it would be evidence at the trial against a party to the action; but the court will act in such an application with great caution, and will require evidence from the applicant that items of that nature are to be found in the banking account in question.

Per Kay, L.J.—An application for leave to inspect the banking account of a person not a party to the action should not be granted without his being heard in opposition.

Appeal from an order made by Hawkins, J., at chambers, reversing a decision of the master, and refusing an application by the plaintiff company under section 7 of the Banker's Books Evidence Act, 1879, for leave to inspect, before trial, the books of the Staffordshire Joint Stock Bank, Limited, containing entries of the banking accounts of the defendant and of the Dickinson Tramway Appliances Co.

The plaintiffs were a tramway company, and had taken over the rights and property of another company, called the South Staffordshire and Birmingham District Steam Tramways Co., Limited.

The plaintiffs alleged that the defendant, who had been solicitor to the latter company, had promoted the Dickinson Co., and had used his fiduciary position to induce the tramway company, his employers, to purchase articles, and obtain licenses to use patents at exorbitant prices from the Dickinson Co. They alleged also that the Dickinson Co. was a sham, and was in fact identical with the defendant, and they claimed an account of the defendant's profits in the transactions between the tramway company and the Dickinson Co., and a rescission of the contracts between them.

Hawkins, J., refused the plaintiff's application.

The plaintiffs appealed.

Affidavits were filed on their behalf with the view of showing that the Dickinson Co. was identical with the defendant, and that the banking account kept in their name was, in fact, the defendant's banking account. In an affidavit sworn by the secretary of the Dickinson Co., he stated that there were no entries in the company's banking account, shewing payments to the defendant, except entries of payments of dividends. The defendant swore an affidavit, in which he said that there were no entries in his banking accounts, in respect of which inspection was being then sought relating to the matters in question, other than and except three items which he mentioned.

(a.) Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Sir Frank Lockwood, Q.C. (Scrutton with him), cited Howard v. Beall, 37 W. R. 555, 23 Q. B. D. 1, and Arnott v. Hayes, 36 W. R. 246, 36 Ch. D. 731.

G. Spencer Bower, for the defendant, cited Parnell v. Wood, 40 W. R. 564, [1892] P. 137, and Emmott v. The Star Newspaper Co., 62 L. J. Q. B. 77, 41 W. R. Dig. 76.

Lochnis, for the Dickinson Co.

Sir Frank Lockwood, Q.C., in reply, referred to Perry v. Phosphor Bronze Co., 71 L. T. N. S. 854, 43 W. R. Dig. 138.

LORD ESHER, M.R.—This is an application under the Bankers' Books Evidence Act, 1879, in which the plaintiffs ask for leave to inspect before trial the banking accounts of the defendant, and of the Dickinson Tramway Appliances Co. There is no doubt that the court has jurisdiction to grant the application so far as regards the defendant's banking account. The question is as to the rule of conduct by which the court should be guided in an application under this Act. Previously to the passing of the Act the court had made a rule not to grant an application for leave to inspect documents before trial, if the person, against whom it was made, put forward at the time in his affidavit an answer of a particular kind. The rule of the court was that the answer must be accepted and acted upon for the purposes of that application. The present application is made under the provisions of the Bankers' Books Evidence Act, 1879, but I think that the court should exercise its jurisdiction under that Act in granting inspection before trial, in accordance with that rule of the court I have mentioned. The defendant has in his affidavit made the answer I referred to, and has sworn that the three items in his banking account which he mentions, are the only items in it which are relevant to the issues in the action. We must accept that statement and act upon it, and we must therefore refuse the application for inspection before trial. Any future application for inspection must be made to the judge at the trial.

The other part of this application is as to the banking account of the Dickinson Tramway Appliances Co. That company is not a party to the action, but I have no more doubt as to the power of the court to grant inspection in their case than in the case of the defendant's banking account, and for the reasons given in Howard v. Beall. But I think that the jurisdiction of the court to give leave to inspect a banking account, which is, at least nominally, that of a person not a party to the action, should be exercised with very great caution. One rule of conduct—I do not lay this down as exhaustive—which should guide the court, is this: if it be proved to the satisfaction of the court, so that the court is persuaded that the banking account, said to be that of a third person, is really, and in truth, an account of a person who is a party to the action, or if the court is persuaded that though the banking account in question may not belong to a party to the action, yet that he is so closely connected with it that items in it will be evidence against him at the trial, in such a case as that the court would be justified, if there should be no valid reason to the contrary, in making an order for inspection before trial. But the court should, at least, be convinced to that extent. In the present case I believe that the account of the Dickinson Co. was either the account of the defendant or else he was so intimately connected with it that it might contain items which would be evidence in the action. But that is not enough. I think that the applicant should show to the court that there are strong reasons for expecting to find some items which would be evidence against the defendant. Now in the present case no item has been fixed upon as one which would be of use to the plaintiffs at the trial, nor can I imagine why there should be any item in the account which would suggest itself as useful, in addition to facts of which they are already aware. Therefore, though we have jurisdiction to grant inspection of the Dickinson Co.'s banking account, we should, in exercising that jurisdiction, be merely giving to the plaintiffs an opportunity to search the account in hopes of finding some entry which would be useful to them. We cannot give leave to inspect for such a purpose as that. I think that the order of Hawkins, J., was right, and this appeal must be dismissed.

KAY, L.J.—I entirely agree with what the Master of the Rolls has said. The Bankers' Book Evidence Act, 1879, gave to the court a power which it had not possessed before of giving leave to inspect before trial the books of bankers who were not parties to the action. Now the rule as to inspection of documents before trial has always been that liberty was given to the person against whom the application was made, to seal up any parts of the documents if he swore that they were not relevant to the issues in the action. The rule which the court made was that no affidavit should be received in contradiction of such an affidavit as that, which was accepted as true for the purposes of the application unless the applicant could show from documents in the cause that the statement in the affidavit was inaccurate.

The question is whether that rule applies to an application under the Bankers' Books Evidence Act, 1879. I agree with what was said by the Court of Appeal in Parnell v. Wood that it was never intended that that Act should do away with any privilege which a person might have in resisting inspection. The Act was intended to enable the Court to give leave to inspect banker's books in certain cases where, before the Act, inspection could not have been obtained at all. Now in the present case the defendant mentions in his affidavit three items in his banking account, and swears that they are the only ones relevant to the matters in dispute in the action. We must accept that statement, and, therefore, we must refuse leave to inspect his banking account before trial.

Then as to the banking account of the Dickinson Co. That company is not a party to the action. The plaintiffs seek to get over that fact by saying that, though it is a corporation, it is practically identical with the defendant, and the banking account of the company is really an account kept by the defendant in a name other than his own. Now it is not necessary at present to give any decisive opinion on this point. But I may say I see no reason for differing from the decision of the Divisional Court in Howard v. Beall, that the Act gives power to the court to order inspection of the banking account of a person not a party to the action. But if the court acts with caution in the case of an application to inspect the account of a party to the action, it will act with still greater caution in an application for leave to inspect the banking account of some one who is not a party to the action. Such a person should appear before the court, and he should be heard in opposition to the application. Notice has in this case been served on the Dickinson Co., and they have appeared here and argued their case. Now I admit that there is strong ground for suspecting that the Dickinson Co. is identical with the defendant, but it is not necessary to give any decision on this point because the court ought to be satisfied, not only on that point, but that there are items on which, so to speak, a finger can be laid which would be evidence at the trial against the defendant. I am not satisfied that there is any such item in the company's account, and leave to inspect their banking account must, therefore, be refused. In coming to this conclusion we are not in any way interfering with the power of the judge at the trial to make any order which, in his discretion, he may think fit. All that we now decide is that this is not a case in which, in the exercise of the discretion of the court, inspection should be ordered at this stage of the action.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the plaintiffs, Munns & Longden.

Solicitors for the defendant, Walter Webb & Co.

Solicitors for the Dickinson Co., Walker, Son, & Field.

From Q. B. Div. (Lord Esher, M.R., and Lopes and Kay, L.JJ.) Nov. 5.

HODDER v. WILLIAMS. (a.)

Sheriff—Execution—Writ of fieri facias*—Breaking open outer door—Shop.*

It is lawful for a sheriff in executing a writ of fieri facias to break open the outer door of a shop which is not connected with a dwelling-house.

Appeal from the judgment of Vaughan Williams, J., at the trial of the action with a jury.

The action was brought to recover damages from the Sheriff of Dorset for having, by his officer, broken open the outer door of the plaintiff's premises in the execution of a writ of fieri facias directed against the plaintiff's goods.

The premises in question were not a dwelling-house, but consisted of a shop where the plaintiff carried on the business of a coachbuilder, and a place of storage for his stock-in-trade.

The jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff for £50, but Vaughan Williams, J., directed judgment to be entered for the defendant. From this judgment the plaintiff appealed.

Mackaskie, for the plaintiff.—It is a well-established rule that a sheriff may not, in executing a writ of fieri facias, break the outer door of a house. It was so laid down in an Anonymous case, 1 Brownl. & Gold. 50, decided in the 44th year of Elizabeth. In Semayne's case, 5 Coke 91, 1 Smith's Leading cases, 9th ed., p. 115, the rule was affirmed in one of the resolutions of the judges, where it was crystallized into the maxim that "a man's house is his castle"; but in that case the goods were not the goods of the person in whose premises they were, and it was resolved that the privilege did not extend to such a case. Penton v. Browne, 1 Keb. 698, Sid. 186, was a similar case, and it was there held that the sheriff was justified in breaking open a barn to levy execution. It must be admitted that Penton v. Browne is cited in all the text books as an authority for the proposition that the privilege only extends to a dwelling-house. But that doctrine is not necessary to support the decision, nor is there any express authority that the privilege is so limited. It is certainly not limited to the place where a man sleeps, and a distinction ought to be drawn between a barn and a shop. Brown v. Glenn, 16 Q. B. 254, was a case of a landlord distraining for rent, and Lord Campbell's remarks on

(a.) Reported by F. G. RUCKER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Penton v. Browne were obiter. In American Concentrated Must Co. v. Hendry, 5 R. 331, Bowen, L.J., expressed disapproval of Penton v. Browne.

Channell, Q.C. (E. U. Bullen and Muir Mackenzie with him), for the defendant.—The rule that the protection extends only to a dwelling-house was clearly recognized by Lord Mansfield in Lee v. Gansel, 1 Cowp. 1; by Lord Campbell in Brown v. Glenn; and by Lord Blackburn in Hobson v. Thellusson, 15 W. R. 1037, L. R. 2 Q. B. 642.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—Where we have a decision two hundred years old on a matter which is the subject of daily practice, I think it is a good rule that we should not overrule it unless we are obliged to do so. And if we find that such decision has, through all that space of time, been handed down as law in text books which have to be acted on every day, and, further, that it was founded on a definite principle, which has since been recognized by many judges, we should be still more disinclined to overrule it, even if we differed from it.

In the case of Penton v. Browne, which is reported by Keble, the court, acting on the view which they took of Semayne's case, decided that the privilege, which was there said to be founded on the maxim that a man's house is his castle, exists only in favour of a man's dwelling-house, and that, therefore, a barn or outhouse not connected with a dwelling-house may be broken open in order to levy execution. The rule so laid down was considered by Lord Mansfield in Lee v. Gansel, and he adopted it, and gave a reason for it. He thought that the privilege was founded on the protection of a man and his family, and that such protection did not require the privilege to be extended to such a place as a barn, where, certainly, a man's wife and children would not be likely to be found. It is clear that, in his opinion, the mischief against which the privilege was intended to protect a man was mischief to his dwelling-house. The question then came before Lord Campbell in Brown v. Glenn, and he adopted the rule laid down in Penton v. Browne as good law. And subsequently it has been adopted by Lord Blackburn in Hobson v. Thellusson. It is admitted that it has been stated as settled law in all the text books dealing with the subject.

The doctrine being that the privilege only extends to a dwelling-house, no question arises whether any distinction can be drawn between a shop and a barn. The only question is whether the premises are a dwelling-house. That this is so has been the uniform view of lawyers from the beginning, and we cannot now overrule a doctrine which has been handed down for ages, and give in to a view which is now presented for the first time. In the present case the premises were not a dwelling-house, and, therefore, whatever they were, they were not protected.

LOPES, L.J.—The principle that the privilege for which the plaintiff contends is grounded on the protection of a man in his dwelling-house is of old standing. And, in accordance with this principle, it has been said again and again that the privilege only extends to a dwelling-house and buildings connected with a dwelling-house or within the curtilage. The leading authority for this is Penton v. Browne, which is referred to in every text book of authority, and has been recognized by Lord Mansfield, Lord Campbell, and Lord Blackburn.

I agree that the protection does not extend to buildings not within the curtilage, and I think that the appeal must be dismissed.

KAY, L.J.—This is not the case of a distress by a landlord for rent, but of a sheriff acting under a fieri facias. In Brown v. Glenn, which was an instance of the former, Lord Campbell said that a distinction might reasonably be made between the two cases. The question is, Can the sheriff, in levying a writ of execution, break open the door of a warehouse of the debtor which is not connected with his dwelling-house? In Penton v. Browne, decided in the 16th year of Charles II., it was held that the sheriff might break open a barn or outhouse not within the curtilage of a dwelling-house. And it is admitted that all the text books cite that case as an authority for the proposition that the privilege which was established in Semayne's case only extends to a man's dwelling-house. Lord Campbell so accepted it in Brown v. Glenn, without expressing any disapproval; and so, again, did the Court of Queen's Bench in Hobson v. Thellusson. It is said that Bowen, L.J., disapproved of it in American Concentrated Must Co. v. Hendry. But he only said that Penton v. Browne seemed to him to be a departure from the older law. He did not say that it was not law, nor did he suggest that it should be overruled.

I do not think that we ought to reverse what has been taken to be the law for 232 years; and, inasmuch as the sheriff's officer in this case did nothing more than he was by law entitled to do, I think that the appeal must be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the plaintiff, Nicholson, Graham, & Graham, for Richard Tucker, Bridport.

Solicitors for the defendant, Lovell, Son, & Pitfield, for Symonds & Sons, Dorchester.

From Chan. Div.
(Lord Halsbury, L.C., and A. L. Smith and Rigby, L.JJ.)

Nov. 6.

In re BELL.
JEFFERY v. SAYLES. (a.)

Trustee—Trust fund—Mortgage by cestui que trust—Power to first mortgagee to give receipt for payment of the fund—Puisne incumbrancers—Whether first mortgagee can compel trustees of fund to pay whole fund mortgaged to him.

Where the cestui que trust of a fund in the hands of trustees assigned the trust premises by way of first mortgage with power to the mortgagee to demand payment of, and give receipts for, the same; and afterwards executed further mortgages of the trust premises;

Held, following the settled practice applicable to the case of a fund in court, that the trustees of the fund, having notice of puisne incumbrancers, could not be compelled by the first mortgagee to pay over to him the whole fund, but only what was due to him on his security.

Appeal from a decision of Kekewich, J.

The testator, William Bell, by his will, dated the 8th of June, 1866, after certain specific legacies, bequeathed to his trustees a sum of £8,000, to be held upon trust for his daughter Eliza Morton for life, and after her decease (in the events which happened) as to one moiety of the said legacy of £8,000, and the investments and annual income thereof, to divide the same equally between the four children of his sister Janet Wells, as tenants in common, who should be deemed to have vested interests in their respective shares at the testator's decease.

The testator died on the 11th of August, 1866; the four children of Janet Wells survived the testator, and each of them became thereupon entitled in reversion to one-fourth of a moiety of the said legacy of £8,000—i.e., £1,000.

(a.) Reported by W. SHALLCROSS GODDARD, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Dudley Wells, one of the children of Janet Wells, by deed of the 31st of May, 1879, assigned by way of mortgage his undivided fourth share or interest, to George Garland for £380 and interest, together with full power for George Garland to demand, sue for, recover, and receive and give valid receipts for, all or any part of the premises thereby assigned, in the name or names of Dudley Wells, his heirs, executors, or administrators, or otherwise, to hold the premises unto George Garland, his executors, administrators, and assigns, subject to a proviso for redemption. Such mortgage became ultimately vested in the plaintiff, William Jeffery, by deed of transfer, dated the 22nd of January, 1891.

On the 18th of September, 1880, Dudley Wells further charged his reversionary interest with the payment of £70 and interest, to Messrs. Williams & Graham.

On the 13th of September, 1882, Dudley Wells executed a deed of arrangement with his creditors in bankruptcy, by which his share was assigned to a trustee, Charles Garland, for the benefit of his creditors, subject to the prior mortgages.

The reversionary interest fell into possession in November, 1894, by the death of the tenant for life of the legacy of £8,000. On the 27th of January, 1895, the solicitors of the first mortgagee, William Jeffery, formally requested the trustees of the will of the testator to hand over to William Jeffery the share of Dudley Wells, as the mortgage contained an absolute assignment of the property to the mortgagee, who could give a valid receipt for the money. This the trustees declined to do, but offered to pay to the first mortgagee his principal, interest and costs (if any).

Jeffery then took out an originating summons, asking that the trustees might be ordered to pay the whole fund to him.

Kekewich, J., made an order as prayed, and directed the trustees to pay the costs. The trustees appealed.

Warrington, Q.C., and Johnston Edwards, for the appellants.—If the money were in court no order could or would be made for payment out of the whole fund to the first mortgagee; and no order of a similar nature ought to be made on the trustees. The first mortgagee is entitled to his principal, interest, and costs, and no more, and this has been tendered to him.

Marten, Q.C., and W. G. Lemon, for the respondents.—[RIGBY, L.J.—You must prove that the trustees committed a breach of trust in not handing over the whole of the £1,000 to the first mortgagee—that it was their duty to do so.] Under the Judicature Acts the tendency has been to make the recovery of legal choses in action more easy. The method of recovering debts has been facilitated rather than cut down.

The following cases were referred to: Burlinson v. Hall, 32 W. R. 492, 12 Q. B. D. 347; Tancred v. Delagoa Bay and East Africa Railway Co., 38 W. R. 15, 23 Q. B. D. 239; Foligno's Mortgage, 32 Beav. 131, 12 W. R. Ch. Dig. 107.

Johnston Edwards replied.

Lord HALSBURY, L.C., said that for the reasons which would be stated by the Lords Justices he was of opinion that the appeal should be allowed.

A. L. SMITH, L.J., stated the facts, and said: It is clear that the utmost sum to which William Jeffery is entitled is the £380 and interest and costs. It is most peculiar that a man should come into court saying he is owed £400 only, and yet that the court should make an order for the payment of £1,000 to him. Mr. Marten admitted that if the fund had been in court, the only order possible would have been to pay to Jeffery merely what he was entitled to. If that be so, why should the trustees of a fund not in court act otherwise? It is clear that Kekewich, J., was wrong in making an order that Jeffery should administer £600 over and above what he was entitled to. The trustees were justified in refusing to pay over the whole of the £1,000. The appeal must be allowed.

RIGBY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The trustees were not bound to pay the £1,000 to Jeffery, having had notice of puisne incumbrancers. I am content to rest my decision on the acknowledged practice of the Court of Chancery in such cases; if the money had been in court, it would not have been paid out to the first mortgagee; and if so, why should the trustees be bound to hand it over? It was their duty to distribute the fund to those who were entitled to it in their proper proportions. The originating summons was entirely wrong and misconceived, and must be dismissed with costs, and the order of Kekewich, J., reversed.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitor for the appellants, Edward F. M. Ryan.

Solicitors for the respondent, Hepburn, Son, & Cutcliffe.

From Chan. Div. (Lord Halsbury, L.C., and Lindley and Rigby, L.JJ.) } July 25; Aug. 9, 1895.

In re RUSSELL.
DORRELL v. DORRELL. (a.)

Will—Remoteness—Share settled on granddaughters of tenant for life—Splitting gift.

A testator gave all his real and residuary personal estate upon trust for his wife for life, and after her death for his niece M. D. for life, and after her death for her husband J. D. for life, and after his death in trust for the daughter or daughters of M. D. who should attain twenty-one or marry under that age, with a proviso that the share of any such daughter should be settled upon her for life, with remainder to her daughters.

M. D. had three children—a son, a daughter who died an infant and unmarried, and the plaintiff, C. M. D., who had attained her age of twenty-one years during the testator's lifetime.

Held, that if M. D. had had a daughter born after the testator's death, the settlement over directed by the proviso would, so far as regarded the share of such after-born daughter, have been void for remoteness; yet the proviso was good as to the interest taken by the plaintiff, C. M. D., the proviso in no way mixing up the shares of the daughters, but operating separately upon each share.

Appeal by the plaintiff, Catherine Mary Dorrell, from a decision of Chitty, J., who held that a proviso contained in the will of George Russell, whereby he directed that the share of any daughter of the testator's niece, Mary Dorrell, who should attain twenty-one, should be brought into settlement, was not void for remoteness in respect of the share taken by the plaintiff (a daughter of the testator's niece,

(a.) Reported by W. SHALLCROSS GODDARD, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Mary Dorrell) who had in fact attained twenty-one in the testator's lifetime; and, consequently, that the plaintiff was only entitled to a life interest in such share.

The facts are fully stated in the judgment.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and Upjohn, for the appellant.—We submit there is no distinct gift to the plaintiff as an individual: it is a gift to a class, and there is no indication of intention in favour of any one member of the class, rather than any other member of the class.

They referred to Wilson v. Wilson, 7 W. R. 26; Herbert v. Webster, 15 Ch. D. 610, 28 W. R. Dig. 197; Pearks v. Moseley, 29 W. R. 1, 5 App. Cas. 714, at p. 723; Leake v. Robinson, 2 Mer. 363; Lord Dungannon v. Smith, 12 Cl. & F. 546; Arnold v. Congreve, 1 Rus. & My. 209; Greenwood v. Roberts, 15 Beav. 92; In re Bence, Smith v. Bence, [1891] 3 Ch. 242, 39 W. R. Dig. 263; In re Ridley, Buckton v. Hay, 27 W. R. 527, 11 Ch. D. 645; In re Michael's Trusts, 46 L. J. Ch. 651, 25 W. R. Dig. 318; Proctor v. Bishop of Bath and Wells, 2 Hy. Bl. 358.

Hewitt, for the respondent.—The plaintiff being born at the date of the death of the testator, there is a valid limitation to her and her children.

He referred to Griffith v. Pownall, 13 Sim. 393; Cattlin v. Brown, 11 Hare, 372; Knapping v. Tomlinson, 12 W. R. 784; Jarman on Wills, pp. 234, 235; and Theobald on Wills, 4th ed., p. 483.

Oldham, for the trustees of the will.

Upjohn replied.

Cur. adv. vult.

Aug. 9.—The judgment of the court was read by RIGBY, L.J.—George Russell, the testator in this case, by his will dated the 11th of September, 1877, gave to his trustees therein mentioned all his real and the residue of his personal estate upon trust to permit his wife to receive the rents, interests, and annual produce during the term of her natural life, and after her decease upon trust to pay the legacies therein mentioned. And he directed his trustees to stand possessed of his said real estate and the residue of his personal estate upon trust to pay the income to his niece Mary Dorrell, the wife of James Dorrell, for her natural life as therein mentioned; and after her decease to James Dorrell, her husband, for the term of his natural life; and after his decease upon trust to sell and dispose of his said real estate and to dispose of and convert into money his said residuary personal estate and to stand possessed of the proceeds: "In trust for all and every, the children or child, of the said Mary Dorrell, who being a son or sons, shall live to attain the age of twenty-one years, or being a daughter or daughters shall attain that age or marry under that age, to be divided between them, if more than one, in equal shares and proportions, and if there shall be only one such child in trust for that one and only child." Then followed a proviso for the settlement of the share of any daughter of Mary Dorrell.

By a fourth codicil to his will dated the 2nd of June, 1883, the testator revoked the bequest of any share or interest any son or sons of Mary Dorrell might become entitled to under the trusts of his will arising from the proceeds of sale of his real estate and the conversion of his residuary personal estate after the decease of them the said Mary and James Dorrell. And he directed his trustees should stand possessed of the whole of such proceeds in trust for the daughter or daughters of the said Mary Dorrell as in his will directed. The effect of the codicil was to exclude sons of Mary Dorrell and to make the trustees hold the proceeds of sale and conversion of the real and residuary personal estate, subject to the life interests, in trust for the daughter or daughters of Mary Dorrell who should attain twenty-one or marry under that age.

The testator died in October, 1885, leaving him surviving his wife, the first tenant for life, who died in December of the same year; his niece Mary Dorrell who died in 1894, and her husband James Dorrell who is still living and is the present and last tenant for life. Mary Dorrell, the niece, had three children—viz., a son, a daughter who died an infant and unmarried, and the plaintiff, Catherine Mary Dorrell, who had attained the age of twenty-one years when the testator died.

Under the combined effect of the will and fourth codicil, and subject only to the life interests and the settlement, the plaintiff immediately on the death of the testator became entitled to all the proceeds of the testator's real and residuary personal estate for a vested interest, liable only to be partially divested in the event (which never took place) of any sister or sisters living to attain twenty-one or marrying under that age. After the death of her mother and sister this vested interest became absolute subject only to a life interest in her father and to the proviso on which the question in this case turns.

The plaintiff has taken out an originating summons to have it determined whether she is entitled absolutely or whether she takes a life interest only.

So far as we have gone there can be no question that she takes an absolute interest, but the proviso above referred to, runs: "Provided also and I do hereby expressly declare that the trustees or trustee for the time being of this my will shall stand possessed of the share of my daughter under the provision hereinbefore made, upon trust to invest the same as hereinbefore expressed, and to pay the rents, interest, and dividends arising therefrom unto her for the term of her natural life for her sole and separate use and benefit free from the debts, control, or engagements of any husband with whom she may intermarry, and her receipt alone to be a good discharge for the same; and from and after her decease then upon similar trusts for the benefit of her children as are hereinbefore provided for the children of the said Mary Dorrell."

It is suggested that this proviso is void for remoteness, inasmuch as there might have been a daughter of Mary Dorrell, born after the testator's death, who would live to take a vested interest, and whose children would not necessarily attain twenty-one within the period allowed by law for the postponement of the vesting of a benefit. No doubt in the case of such a daughter the settlement over directed by the proviso would have been void; but it would be perfectly good as to the interest taken by the plaintiff, who was alive at the testator's death, unless the possible operation of the proviso with reference to the share of a daughter not in existence at the testator's death makes the whole proviso void. Looking at the state of things at his death it was then clear that the plaintiff must take either the whole or a share, and other daughters of Mary Dorrell might come in and take shares. Assuming them to do so, yet the share of the plaintiff and the shares of such other daughters would be perfectly separate and distinct and completely ascertained and separated within the limits of time allowed by the law. The proviso in no way mixes them up, but operates separately upon each share. The settlement of the plaintiff's share directed by it is perfectly legal, and would have been so even though there were other shares to which the proviso could not legally apply. If indeed there had been a proviso which could only operate upon all the possible shares, if it operated at all, the case would have been different; but the settlement of the plaintiff's share is to take place whether there are other shares or not, and takes place as from the testator's death in favour of the children of a person then living, and is quite unobjectionable. This is not the case of a gift over, which depends upon events so stated as to involve a possibility of its taking effect outside the permitted limits or in favour of persons who might take interests vesting beyond those limits. No splitting of the clause is necessary since it is so framed as to apply separately to the plaintiff's share. On principle, therefore, the judgment of Chitty, J., ought to be supported.

The supposed conflict of authority when the decisions are looked into is not so great as the appellant's counsel attempted to make out. No case binding on the Court of Appeal has been cited which in any way conflicts with the conclusion above arrived at, and indeed there is no case in which, after argument, any conflicting decision has been arrived at.

On the other side the cases of Griffith v. Pownall, Cattlin v. Brown, Wilson v. Wilson, Knapping v. Tomlinson, decided respectively by Shadwell, Page Wood, and Kindersley, V.CC., and concurred in since, are all authorities in support of the conclusion arrived at; and so the weight of authority is clearly in favour of it.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the appellants, Crowders & Vizard.

Solicitors for the respondent, Kingsford, Dorman, & Co., for Willoughby, Daventry, Northants.

Solicitors for the trustees, Crowders & Vizard, for S. B. Garrard, Worcester.

From Prob. Div. & Adm. Div. (Lindley, Lopes, and Rigby, L.JJ.) — Aug. 8, 1895.

RICHARDSON v. RICHARDSON AND PLOWMAN. (a.)

Divorce—Practice—Costs—Solicitor—Pauper—Petition by husband suing in formâ pauperis—Divorce Act, 1857 (20 & 21 Vict. c. 85), s. 51.

Section 51 of the Divorce Act, 1857, gives the court a discretion as to costs. The best exercise of such discretion, except under special circumstances, is to follow the rule laid down in Carson v. Pickersgill & Sons, 33 W. R. 589, 14 Q. B. D. 859, and to allow a husband suing in formâ pauperis, or his solicitor, only out-of-pocket expenses, including a reasonable sum for office expenses, against the co-respondent.

The adoption of such rule is intended to introduce a new uniform rule into all the divisions of the High Court.

Appeal from a decision of the president of the Probate Division.

The petitioner, the husband, presented a petition in formâ pauperis for a dissolution of his marriage. The suit was undefended, and a decree nisi was granted with damages and costs against the co-respondent. On the taxation of costs the registrar disallowed all costs except out-of-pocket expenses and a sum of six guineas for office expenses. The petitioner applied to the president for an order that the taxation of his costs should be reviewed.

The president upheld the decision of the registrar, on the ground that such had been the practice of the Divorce Division since the decision of the Court of Appeal in Carson v. Pickersgill & Sons, 33 W. R. 589, 14 Q. B. D. 859, and refused the application.

The petitioner appealed.

Tebbutt, for the appellant.—In all the text-books on ecclesiastical law no distinction is drawn between a pauper claimant and a dives claimant in the recovery of costs. [LINDLEY, L.J.—The old ecclesiastical practice never applied to a co-respondent, and your claim for damages is still the common law action.] I submit that the practice of the old Court of Chancery, of allowing a pauper litigant if successful, dives costs should be followed. On the same analogy in a divorce suit, the costs of the wife payable by the husband are not limited to the amount paid into court by the husband for that purpose: Robertson v. Robertson, 29 W. R. 880, 6 P. D. 119.

LINDLEY, L.J.—This case is new to me. The question is whether the president of the Divorce Court was wrong in following in that division the rule about costs which now obtains universally in all the other divisions and in the House of Lords. That rule was carefully considered and laid down in Carson v. Pickersgill. Looking at the matter on principle I was much struck with it. This is a case in which a co-respondent was concerned. Therefore, the practice of the old ecclesiastical courts can have nothing to do with it as that practice did not deal with co-respondents. By the Divorce Act of 1857 a co-respondent can be joined. It is important to observe that there can be no old principle applicable to the case. When you look at old suits for judicial separation, I am by no means satisfied that the practice in the ecclesiastical courts is so well settled as we are asked to assume. I am told the senior registrar, who ought to know better than any man living, is of opinion that the practice never was so settled.

The Divorce Act gives a discretion as to costs, and the president has considered this matter and has come to the conclusion that, having regard to the modern practice, in the best exercise of his discretion, except under special circumstances, the rule in Carson v. Pickersgill should prevail. Now we are asked to say that a different rule should prevail. I am not prepared to say that. I think the old Chancery rule was wrong, and proceeded on a wrong principle. The object of ordering a party to pay costs is to indemnify his successful opponent. Why should the latter recover more than he is liable to pay? I cannot see why he should make a profit. That is the view which has prevailed lately and has led to the abolition of the Chancery rule, and to the introduction of a new rule into all the divisions of the High Court except the Probate Division. I am of opinion that the president was right, and that the appeal must be dismissed.

LOPES, L.J.—I also am of opinion that the president was perfectly right. I think it would be a great mistake to have one rule in the Divorce Division, and and another rule in all the other divisions. To have such a distinction without sufficient grounds would be a very great mistake.

What are costs? Costs are given to indemnify a successful party against expenses to which he has been put by his unsuccessful opponent. A pauper litigant has incurred no expenses; there is nothing against which he should be indemnified. If you allow him dives costs, he might put them into his pocket and thereby make a profit, and thereby take an undue advantage of the great indulgence afforded him of being allowed to sue as a pauper. Stress has been laid on the practice of the old ecclesiastical courts; that has no application here. The ecclesiastical courts had no power to grant a divorce a vinculo. Therefore, so far as any analogy is called in aid, the analogy of the common law courts should be adopted rather than any other.

(a.) Reported by W. SHALLCROSS GODDARD, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

RIGBY, L.J.—I am also of the same opinion. Even if it were made plain that the practice of the ecclesiastical courts had established the rule which has been contended for, I do not see how it can have any application here. Sir James Hannen laid down a rule, and established a practice which does not seem to be unreasonable. It has been adopted by the other branches of the court, and has been accepted by the House of Lords as the better practice. It is a good rule, and we should be taking upon ourselves a great responsibility if we overruled the President on the ground that we are bound by an old practice which is not admitted.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the appellant, Bramall, White, & Sanders.

High Court of Justice.

Chan. Div.
Chitty, J.

Nov. 22.

WAYNES MERTHYR CO. v. D. RADFORD & CO. (a.)

Practice—Particulars, Application by defendants for—Discovery, Application by plaintiffs for—Fraud—Discretion of court to order discovery before particulars.

There is no general rule that delivery of particulars by the plaintiff should precede the making of discovery by the defendant in all cases except those where there is a fiduciary relation between the parties.

The judge must in every case exercise his discretion, having regard to all the circumstances.

Dictum of Kay, L.J., in Zierenberg v. Labouchere, 41 W. R. 675, [1893] 2 Q. B. 183, at p. 189, explained.

Motion.

The plaintiffs were colliery proprietors and the defendants were coal merchants.

The action, which was for an injunction and damages, was in respect of coal alleged to have been fraudulently supplied and sold by the defendants to their customers on divers occasions as coal from the plaintiffs' colliery, being in fact other and inferior coal, and sold at a lower price than the defendants could purchase the plaintiffs' coal for.

It was in particular alleged that the defendants on two stated occasions had sold such coal to the C. Brewery Co. as coal from the plaintiffs' collieries and had produced to the C. Co. false permits or vouchers, the same being two out of six blank forms handed by the plaintiffs to a clerk of the defendants on a representation by him that the defendants desired them as models for their own permits. The defendants admitted the two particular cases made against them, but they alleged that those cases had occurred through the fraud of the clerk and without their knowledge or authority, and they also stated that they were unable to find the four remaining forms of permit.

After delivery of the statement of claim, the defendants, having taken out a summons for particulars of the allegations therein, the plaintiffs took out a summons for discovery. Both summonses were heard together. and an order was made in chambers for the plaintiffs to give particulars without prejudice to any application as to amendment or delivery of further particulars after discovery, and an order was also made for the defendants to give discovery within fourteen days after particulars.

The plaintiffs now moved that such order might be varied by directing discovery by the defendants before delivery by the plaintiffs of particulars.

Byrne, Q.C., and Dare, for the applicants.—Regard being had to the facts here, the order was wrong and should be varied.

Farwell, Q.C., and Younger, for the defendants.—The order was right. The rule is that delivery of particulars by the plaintiff precedes discovery by the defendants except where he stands in a fiduciary relation to the plaintiff: Zierenberg v. Labouchere, 41 W. R. 675, [1893] 2 Q. B. 183, per Kay, L.J.

Byrne, in reply, cited Miller v. Harper, 36 W. R. 454, 38 Ch. D. 110, Sacks v. Speilman, 36 W. R. 498, 37 Ch. D. 295; and Maxim-Nordenfelt, &c., Co. v. Nordenfelt, 42 W. R. 38, [1893] 3 Ch. 122.

The Annual Practice for 1896, p. 613, was also referred to.

CHITTY, J.—The plaintiffs' action is founded on fraudulent misrepresentation. They give two specific instances of fraud, and allege generally divers other instances of similar fraud. The plaintiffs state that they have information tending to support their case, but are not in a position to substantially comply with the order for particulars. They say if they give the best particulars they can they will be useless, and the defendants will then try to be relieved altogether from discovery, on the ground of the insufficiency of the particulars. The defendants, by their counsel, avow that they will make this use of the particulars, if insufficient. Their argument was founded chiefly on the judgment of Kay, L.J., in Zierenberg v. Labouchere, and was to the effect that particulars should precede discovery in all cases except those where there was a fiduciary relation between the parties. I am unable to deduce any such proposition from that judgment. Kay, L.J., did explain the practice in that respect, where the parties are in a fiduciary position to one another, and he put it on the ground, not only of the trustee having exclusive knowledge or superior means of knowledge of any fraud, but also of the cestui que trust or principal being entitled to all the knowledge which his trustee or agent might have. He did not lay down any such proposition as is contended for by the defendants, and in my opinion there is no such rule that particulars, except where there is a fiduciary relation between the parties, should precede discovery. The judge must in every case exercise a reasonable discretion, having regard to all the circumstances. [His lordship, after commenting on the above facts, continued:—] It seems to me that this is a case having regard to the position of the parties, and to the whole circumstances, including the admission of alleged frauds, where discovery should precede the delivery of particulars. I think that, for the purpose of effecting justice, the order should be varied as asked by the plaintiffs, because I see the use which will be made of the order as it stands, and that the plaintiffs may fail to obtain justice by reason of their being ordered to give particulars before discovery. I, therefore, vary the order for particulars, by directing the plaintiffs to deliver particulars within twenty-one days after discovery, and vary the order for discovery, so far as is necessary in consequence of this order.

Application allowed; leave to appeal refused.

Solicitors for the applicants, Heath, Parker, & Brett.

Solicitors for the defendants, Radford & Frankland.

(b.) Reported by J. F. WALEY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Chan. Div. }
Stirling, J. } June 13; July 24, 1895.

RUTTER v. EVERETT. (a.)

Bankruptcy—Order and disposition—Consent of true owner — Assignment of book debts — No notice by assignee to book debtors — Receiver appointed under Conveyancing Act, 1881 — Extent of authority — Bankruptcy Act, 1883, s. 44, sub-section 2 (3).

The general rule is that the assignee of a debt, in order to take it out of the order and disposition of the assignor, must give notice of the assignment to the debtor.

In the absence of such notice, and on the bankruptcy of the assignor, consent on the part of the true owner of the debt to the debt remaining in the order and disposition of the bankrupt is primâ facie to be inferred, but that inference may be rebutted if the true owner takes every possible step to obtain possession of the debt, or if the failure to obtain possession is not attributable to any fault of his own.

The appointment of a receiver under a mortgage deed, although subsequently confirmed by the court, is, however, not sufficient to rebut that inference.

By a deed dated the 31st of December, 1891, the defendant E., who then carried on the business of a tobacconist at No. 289, Oxford-street, demised No. 289 aforesaid to the plaintiffs for the residue of a term of twelve and a-half years, less ten days, by way of mortgage to secure the repayment of a sum of £1,000 and interest thereon, and also assigned by way of further security certain trade-marks, the goodwill of his business, and also "all moneys to be received by or owing to" the mortgagor in respect of his said business. The £1,000 was to be repaid by monthly instalments, and it was provided that if the mortgagor should make default for fourteen days in payment of an instalment, the whole should become payable forthwith. The deed contained no express power to appoint a receiver. In November, 1892, default was made in payment of an instalment in accordance with the terms of the deed. On the 9th of May, 1893, the plaintiffs executed a written instrument, as follows: "We, . . . by virtue of the power conferred on us under the Conveyancing and Law of Property Act, 1881 (as mortgagees of the under-mentioned property) and of every other power enabling us in this behalf, hereby appoint Charles Ford . . . to be receiver of the income of the premises known as 289, Oxford-street, . . . and of trade-marks . . . and the goodwill and connection of the business carried on by E., . . . with all the powers by the said Act conferred on a receiver appointed under the provisions thereof. . . ." Ford thereupon took possession of No. 289 aforesaid, and thenceforward carried on the business of a tobacconist there.

It was a matter of dispute whether he did or did not take possession of the stock-in-trade on the said premises.

On the 16th of May, 1893, E. committed an act of bankruptcy. On the 17th of May, 1893, the present action was commenced by originating summons, in which the plaintiffs claimed relief by way of foreclosure, and the appointment of a receiver. On the 18th of May, 1893, E. excluded Ford from No. 289 aforesaid, and kept the shop closed during that day, for the purpose, as E. alleged, of preventing Ford from selling the stock-in-trade. On the 19th of May, 1893, an order was made in the action, whereby, without prejudice to the power already possessed by him as receiver under the Conveyancing Act, 1881, Ford was appointed receiver of the said premises, of the trade-marks, and of all moneys to be received by or owing to the defendant in respect of the said business, and to manage the said business. On the 16th of June, 1893, a receiving order was made against the defendant, founded on the aforesaid act of bankruptcy committed by him on the 16th of May. The defendant was subsequently made a bankrupt, and on the 24th of October, 1893, the trustee in bankruptcy was made a defendant to the action.

Neither the plaintiffs nor the receiver ever gave the debtors of the bankrupt any notice of the mortgage of the 31st of December, 1891. The receiver carried on the business, and in the ordinary course received book debts due to the bankrupt at the commencement of the bankruptcy to the amount of over £400. Upon the receiver's accounts being taken in chambers, the trustee in bankruptcy claimed such amount as represented book debts in the order and disposition of the bankrupt, with the consent of the true owner at the commencement of the bankruptcy, and the question of the validity of such claims was adjourned into court, and now came on for decision.

The rest of the facts sufficiently appear from the judgment.

H. T. Eve, for the trustee in bankruptcy.—The debtors never received notice of the appointment of a receiver. Hence the book debts belong to the bankrupt's trustee, as the mortgagees did not get possession of them before his title accrued. Section 24 of the Conveyancing Act, 1881, under which the receiver was appointed, only applies to the receivership of income and not of book debts. The trustee in bankruptcy rests his title on the order and disposition clause, section 44, sub-section 2 (3), of the Bankruptcy Act of 1883; "Book debts" are "Goods" within the meaning of that section: Tailby v. The Official Receiver, 37 W. R. 513, 13 App. Cas. 523. Williams on Bankruptcy, p. 204.

E. Cooper Willis, Q.C., and Butcher, for the mortgagees.—The very fact of the appointment of a receiver by the court takes the goods out of the "order and disposition of the bankrupt": Taylor v. Eckersley, 25 W. R. 527, 5 Ch. D. 740, see page 744: "There can be no implication of assent." There is no distinction as to the description of the goods. What the court has to determine is whether the goods were in the order and disposition of the bankrupt with our consent. [STIRLING, J.—But if you do not give notice, you must be taken to be consenting.] The receiver is the officer of the court, and his appointment operates as an injunction to the bankrupt not to receive debts due to him. Assuming that the order was made immediately before or at the time that the act of bankruptcy was committed, the fact of the application for a receiver is sufficient to shew that we no longer consent. Hence on the 19th of May, we had an injunction restraining the bankrupt from receiving the goods, and after that date they could not be in his order or disposition without our consent. Until the 19th of May, the receiver was there to take anything which came in. The bankrupt could take nothing. The official receiver gave no notice, and we continued to receive the money. It was all received before January, 1894, and up to that time the official receiver did nothing and made no claim. Our writ claiming appointment of a receiver was issued on the 17th of May. At that time we had no notice of an act of bankruptcy, so we were within section 49 (d). This was a "dealing" Anything which puts an end to the consent is a "dealing" within the meaning of that section: Brewin v. Short, 3 W. R. 514, 5 E. & B. 227. A notice to the debtor not to pay is not so strong as an injunction of the court to the creditor not to receive. The moment the order is made the goods are not in the disposition of the bankrupt: Ex parte Ward, 21 W. R. 115, L. R. 8 Ch. App. 144. Very little is sufficient to prove dermination of consent: In re Kelsall, Ex parte Beattie, De Gex's Rep. 352. If a demand is made or an order obtained or a writ issued claiming the goods without notice of an act of bankruptcy that is sufficient.

(a.) Reported by ARTHUR MORTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Eve, in reply.—The trustee in bankruptcy took no steps to get in the assets, because he could not get at the books. If the mortgagees had got possession of the goods without notice of the act of bankrupty between the date of the said act and the receiving order, I admit they would have got a good title. But they did not get possession. In the cases cited by counsel for the mortgagees possession had been obtained. Ex parte Ward has nothing to do with this. The effect of the appointment of the official receiver as trustee of choses in action is shown by section 44 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883. It includes debts: see sections 50 (5), and 54. Hence, on the 16th of May, to which date the title of the trustee related back, there was in effect an assignment to the trustee of all choses in action. The mere appointment of a receiver under the Conveyancing Act does not complete the possession of the mortgagees unless they give notice, and hence the title of the trustee in bankruptcy was not rendered inoperative by the appointment of the receiver: Wigram v. Buckley, 43 W. R. 147, [1894] 3 Ch. 483, 491, 494; Edwards v. Martin, 14 W. R. 25, L. R. 1 Eq. 121. In any case, this was only an appointment of receiver of income of property, not of the book debts. Hence the receiver could not receive book debts or give a good receipt. The issue of the writ is not a "dealing" with the bankrupt for valuable consideration. The title of the trustee in bankruptcy to the book debts is paramount.

STIRLING, J.—[His lordship, after stating the facts as above set out, continued:—] It was alleged at the hearing that the plaintiffs had, on the 16th and 17th of May, notice of the act of bankruptcy committed by E., but, in my opinion, such notice has not been established by the evidence. It was admitted by the plaintiffs that, at the commencement of the bankruptcy, the debts were in the order and disposition of the bankrupt, but it was contended (1) that they were not in such order and disposition with the consent of the true owners, the plaintiffs; (2) that at all events they were not in such order or disposition with such consent on or after the 17th of May, at which date, as I have already found, the plaintiffs had no notice of any act of bankruptcy on the part of E.

In support of their first contention the plaintiffs rely on the instrument of the 9th of May, 1893. It is objected by the trustees in bankruptcy that this instrument does not in terms include the book debts, and further that the Conveyancing Act, 1881 (sections 19 and 24), only enables a mortgagee to appoint a receiver of the income of the mortgaged property, and that the book debts are not such income, but constitute the mortgaged property itself. There is certainly weight in these objections, but they do not appear to conclude the case in favour of the trustee in bankruptcy. It may be that the acts of the receiver, although not authorized by the instrument in question, amount to or are evidence of a determination of their consent to the receipt of the debts of the bankrupt, and I pass on to consider how the law on this point stands. As a general rule the assignee of a debt, in order to take it out of the order and disposition of the assignor, is bound to give notice of the assignment to the debtor. This is laid down by Turner, L.J., in Bartlett v. Bartlett, 5 W. R. 541, 1 De G. & J. 127, see pp. 140, 141, where the subject-matter of the assignment was a reversionary interest under a will. It is not, however, to be inferred that it is absolutely necessary as regards goods that they should be in the actual possession of the true owner at the commencement of the bankruptcy, or as regards chattels "in which there is no visible ownership" that notice should be given before that time. In Smith v. Topping, 5 B. & Ad. 674, the true owner of the goods permitted them to remain in the possession of the bankrupt until the day before the commencement of the bankruptcy and then demanded them to be given up but was met by a refusal, and it was held that at the commencement of the bankruptcy the goods were not in the possession of the bankrupt with the consent of the true owner. This decision was acted upon by the Court of Appeal in Ex parte Ward, 21 W. R. 115, L. R. 8 Ch. App. 144, where the goods of which possession had been demanded from the bankrupt were not actually in his hands, but in those of a warehouseman to whom no notice was given. [His lordship here read the judgment of Mellish, L.J., at page 148, and having referred to the case of Belcher v. Bellamy, 2 Exch. 303, and the judgments of the learned judges therein at pages 308, 310, and 311, he continued:—] The conclusion from these authorities appears to be that although from absence of notice consent on the part of the true owner to the debt remaining in the order and disposition of the bankrupt is primâ facie to be inferred, still that inference may be rebutted by other facts, and will be rebutted if, in the language of the judges of the Court of Exchequer, the true owner takes every possible step to obtain possession of the debt, or if, in the language of Mellish, L.J., the failure to obtain possession is not attributable to any fault of his own. I may add that the cases of In re Styan, 2 M. D. & D. 219; Young v. Hope, 2 Exch. 105; and Brewin v. Short appear to me to establish that if the proper steps are taken while the assignee has no notice of any act of bankruptcy, the assignee will be entitled to the benefit of the protection conferred by section 49 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883.

This being my view of the state of the law, I have now to apply it in the present case. If the bankruptcy had occurred within a short time after the 9th or 16th of May, 1893, I should have thought that the doctrines laid down in Smith v. Topping, Ex parte Ward, and Bellamy v. Belcher applied. In point of fact, however, the receiving order in bankruptcy was not made until the 16th of June, 1893, a month later than the receivership order. In the interval there was ample time to give the usual notice to the debtors of the bankrupt.

The question arises, Why was not this notice given? The bankrupt in his affidavit says it was not given because it would injure the business. The receiver who answered that affidavit takes no notice of this statement by the bankrupt, but says that notice was not given because he was advised that his appointment on the 9th of May and his subsequent appointment by the court on the 17th of May took the book debts out of the order and disposition of the bankrupt. In my judgment the receiver's view of the law was not well founded. I think that neither the appointment of the 9th of May nor the subsequent appointment by the court was sufficient to take the debts out of the order and disposition of the bankrupt with the consent and permission of the true owner unless followed within a reasonable time by the appropriate step for obtaining possession of the debts by giving notice to the debtors. This was not done, and the failure appears to me to be attributable to a default on the part of the plaintiffs.

I think, therefore, that the trustee in bankruptcy is entitled to these debts.

Solicitors, Morten Cutler & Co.; West, King, Adams, & Co.

Chan. Div. }
Kekewich, J. } May 2, 3, 1895.

In re SOMERS COCKS.
WEGG PROSSER v. WEGG PROSSER. (a.)

Will—Construction—Marshalling.

A testatrix, to whose will the provisions of the Mortmain and Charitable Uses Act, 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. 73), did not apply, gave to a charity "all the rest and remainder of my personal estate whatsoever and wheresoever situate, save and except such parts thereof as cannot by law be appropriated by will to charitable purposes."

Held, that this did not amount to a direction to marshal, and that the gift, so far as it consisted of things savouring of land, failed, and was divisible among the next of kin.

Edwards v. Hall, 1 W. R. 348, 11 Ha. 1; on appeal, 4 W. R. 111, 6 De G. M. & G. 74, followed.

The testatrix, by her will of the 14th of November, 1876, gave all her personal estate and effects to her executors and trustees upon trust for sale and conversion, and out of the proceeds of sale and conversion, and with such part of her personal estate as should consist of money, to pay her testamentary expenses and debts, with power to postpone the conversion. After payment of the testamentary expenses and debts, the testatrix directed her trustees to pay a sum of £14,000 to her niece, Lady Henry Somerset, for her separate use, subject to a trust to pay certain annuities therein mentioned, and subject thereto her said niece was to stand possessed of the £14,000 for her separate use absolutely. The testatrix then devised trust and mortgage estates, and made the following residuary gift: "All the rest and remainder of my personal estate whatsoever or wheresoever situate, save and except such parts thereof as cannot by law be appropriated by will to charitable purposes, I give and bequeath to the Society of St. Margarets, East Grinstead," with a provision as to the person to give a receipt for the same.

By a codicil, dated the 17th of May, 1879, to the will, the testatrix made other provisions as to the sum of £14,000 and the annuities mentioned in her will, but in all other respects confirmed it.

The testatrix died on the 5th of August, 1879, and her will and codicil were proved on the 20th of August following by the plaintiff.

The estate of the testatrix consisted in part of a mortgage for £10,666 3s. 4d., which was applied in part payment of the £14,000 legacy in exoneration of the pure personal estate. Two sums of £5,000 and £4,000, to which the testatrix was entitled in reversion, fell into possession, and were represented by £4,994 9s. Consols and £880 1s. 9d. Bank Stock, and a sum of £2,000 which was invested on mortgage.

Doubts having arisen whether the residuary gift operated as a direction to marshal, the present summons was taken out by the proving executor, asking (amongst other things) whether the residuary bequest or any other part of the said will operated as a direction to marshal the assets of the testatrix in favour of the society.

(a.) Reported by C. C. HENSLEY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

G. P. C. Lawrence, for the executor.

Marten, Q.C., and G. P. C. Lawrence, for two of the next of kin, cited Edwards v. Hall, 1 W. R. 348, 4 Ibid. 111, 11 Hare, 1, 6 De G. M. & G. 74. [They were stopped.]

Carson, for Lady Somers in the same interest, was not called upon to argue.

Renshaw, Q.C., and Hornell, for the charity.—In Edwards v. Hall the testatrix had declared her desire to die intestate.

They cited Wills v. Bourne, L. R. 16 Eq. 487, 22 W. R. Dig. 273; Miles v. Harrison, 22 W. R. 441, L. R. 9 Ch. App. 316; and In re Arnold, Ravenscroft v. Workman, 36 W. R. 424, 37 Ch. D. 637.

KEKEWICH, J., held that the residuary gift must be read as if it contained an express exception from the gift to the charity of all that could not be given by will for charitable purposes. The learned judge then continued:

But there are some cases which must not be passed over. Mr. Marten relied on Edwards v. Hall, on which Mr. Renshaw has commented. It appears to me that what the Vice-Chancellor said in that case is in point. These are the Vice-Chancellor's words: "She says, 'Let the one go to the charitable bequest, and the other to persons whom I may name.' In truth she did not name them." That seems to me exactly what this lady has done.

The case of Wills v. Bourne, which was decided in favour of the charity, is a decision of Lord Selborne. That case seems to me different from the present and from Edwards v. Hall. The will in Wills v. Bourne seems to me to give fairly clear directions for marshalling, using the word in the sense of an appropriation by a testator of particular assets to a particular gift. The testator declared that only such part or parts of his estate should be comprised in the residue thereof, and be so divided, paid, or transferred as aforesaid as might by law be given or bequeathed for charitable purposes. It is sought to apply that case to the present in reliance upon the interpretation put upon it by Mellish, L.J., in Miles v. Harrison. But the wills in those two cases were entirely different the one from the other, as is clear from Lord Cairns' judgment. Mellish, L.J., says, however, that the will in Miles v. Harrison and in Wills v. Bourne are identical, if you cut out the words, "and which shall be reserved by my trustees or trustee for the time being for that purpose." That, no doubt, strengthens the view that Wills v. Bourne is applicable to the present case. But cut out those words; you still have a direction that certain legacies should be respectively paid and satisfied "out of such parts of my personal estate as can lawfully be applied to the payment thereof." In the present case, however, you have not got those words. Instead of there being a direction to marshal, there is an exception of some part of the residue which is given to charity. The case of In re Arnold, Ravenscroft v. Workman, is open to the same criticism. There is an entire difference of language. The words of the will in In re Arnold perhaps followed common form more closely than either of the wills in the other cases. The testator there directed "that the foregoing charitable legacies shall be paid exclusively out of such part of my pure personal estate as is legally applicable to that purpose." I take it that what the other cases decided was, on this point, that the language of the wills there under consideration was equivalent to the language used in the will adjudicated upon in In re Arnold. What is the effect of these decisions? The court finds words to which effect must be given. The court does not favour the charity, or anybody else, but treats the question as purely one of construction. All that the court says amounts to this: "We cannot give effect to that provision, except by the process of marshalling, therefore you must marshal." It is not because the testatrix has directed marshalling, but because it is only in that way that you can give effect to the direction which the testatrix has given.

Here, I repeat, it seems to me that you can give full effect to what the testatrix has directed without in any way departing from the language of the will. Nay more, as I read the will, you would not be giving effect to the direction if you marshalled. I think you would be doing just what the testatrix says is not to be done. The charity is to take the residue of her estate after payment of her debts and testamentary expenses and a legacy, with an exception which she specifies. That excepted property is undisposed of. I think all the cost ought to come out of the estate.

After some discussion the following minutes were settled:—

Declare that so much of the residue of the personal estate as consists of impure personalty was undisposed of and passed to the next of kin of the testatrix. And it appearing that there has been applied out of the impure personalty a sum at least equal to the rateable proportion which it was liable to bear for the testatrix's debts and testamentary expenses and legacy, declare that the defendants, the legal personal representatives of the next of kin, are entitled to hold the personalty which has fallen into possession.

Solicitors, Witham, Lambert, & Roskell; Hulberts & Hussey; Leefe & Leefe.

Chan. Div.
Vaughan Williams, J. } Nov. 7, 8.

BUILDING ESTATES BRICKFIELDS CO.
PARBURY'S CASE. (a.)

Company—Winding up—Fully paid-up shares—Certificate—Estoppel—Companies Act, 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 131), s. 25.

A person who was entitled to have fully paid-up shares in a limited company allotted to himself or his nominees procured fully paid-up shares to be allotted to another person as his nominee, in consideration of a money payment. The money was not paid to the company, but the company issued certificates to the allottee, stating that the shares were fully paid up. It appeared that the allottee acted on the faith of the certificate, and believed that cash had been paid to the company for the shares. The liquidator in the winding up of the company sought to make the allottee liable, on the ground that section 25 of the Companies Act, 1867, had not been complied with.

Held, that, as against the allottee, the company and the liquidator were estopped from denying that the shares were fully paid up.

This was a summons taken out in the winding up of the above-named company by Mr. A. F. Parbury that the list of contributories and the liquidator's certificate finally settling the same might be reviewed and varied by excluding therefrom the name of the applicant in respect of 80 ordinary £5 shares in the company, or for a declaration that the said 80 ordinary shares standing in the name of the applicant were, at the date of the winding-up order, fully paid up, or were to be deemed fully paid up in favour of the applicant, and that the applicant was under no liability in respect thereof.

The company was incorporated in November, 1879, and in 1878 Mr. Parbury instructed a Mr. Wright, who was entitled under an arrangement with the company to receive a certain number of fully paid-up shares in the company, to apply for 100 shares for him (Parbury) and gave him £500 to pay for them. Wright kept the £500 and procured the company to allot 100 of the shares to which he was entitled under the aforesaid arrangement, to Parbury; and Parbury's name was placed on the register in respect of these shares.

In December, 1879, the company sent a certificate for 100 shares to Parbury, stating that the shares were fully paid up. Parbury sold 20 of the 100 shares, and it was as to the remaining 80 that the present application had reference.

The company was ordered to be wound up by the court, and the official receiver was liquidator. The applicant had been placed on the list of contributories on the ground that cash had not been paid for the shares; and the official receiver and liquidator alleged that as there was no registered contract and the applicant had not paid in cash for his shares the applicant was not entitled to treat the shares as fully paid. The applicant stated that he was not aware until after the announcement of the winding up that Wright had not applied for shares for him and paid the company cash according to his instructions.

There was no evidence that the applicant had any notice that section 25 of the Companies Act, 1867, had not been complied with.

In these circumstances a question was raised whether the applicant was entitled to rely on the certificate as an estoppel as against the company and the official receiver and liquidator.

Upjohn, for the application.—As against a person who takes shares without notice that they have not been paid for in cash, a company and its liquidator are estopped by a certificate stating that the shares are fully paid up from saying that they have not been so paid up: In re British Farmers Pure Linseed Cake Co., 26 W. R. 334, 673, 7 Ch. D. 533. Section 25 does not apply as between the company itself and its shareholders. Blyth's case, 25 W. R. 200, 4 Ch. D. 140. If the company itself has so acted as to preclude itself from denying that section 25 has been complied with, that is conclusive evidence that the section has been complied with. The company may represent and induce persons to act on the faith of the representation that shares have been fully paid up in cash. If such a representation is made and acted on by persons who have no notice that it is untrue, the company cannot afterwards be heard to say that the shares have not been fully paid up. Both the company and the liquidator are estopped: In re London Celluloid Co., 36 W. R. 673, 39 Ch. D. 190.

He also referred to Carling's case, 24 W. R. 165, 1 Ch. D. 115, and In re Macdonald, Sons, & Co., [1894] 1 Ch. 89

E. S. Ford, for the official receiver and liquidator.—The applicant is the original allottee, and estoppel is not valid in the case of the original allottee: see Buckley in the Companies Acts, ed. 6, p. 557, where he says, "The original allottee and every subsequent transferee with notice holds the shares as unpaid": Blyth's case (supra) shows that the issue of the certificate is not necessary to the issue of shares within section 25 of the Act of 1867: In re Vulcan Ironworks Co., W. N., [1885] p. 120.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J.—This is a very curious case. It raises a new point. Mr. Parbury is the allottee of these 80 shares upon which the question in this case turns. He was originally allottee of 100 shares, and he has dealt with 20 of these 100 shares by sale, and there are only 80 left. He has been placed on the list of contributories, because cash has not been paid, and the liquidator says that by virtue of section 25 of the Companies Act, 1867, he is now liable to pay in cash for these shares, there being admittedly no filed contract in existence. Now, so far as I know, there has been no case in which an allottee of shares has been allowed to escape the stringency of the provisions of section 25. [His lordship read section 25, and continued:—] But I have arrived at the conclusion that in this particular case Mr. Parbury is not liable to be placed on the list of contributories except as the holder of fully paid-up shares. Mr. Upjohn has called my attention to Carling's case (suprà) and In re Macdonald, Sons, & Co. (suprà), but I am not going to decide the present case upon the authority of either of these cases. Mr. Parbury paid £500 to Mr. Wright before the incorporation of the company, and asked him to apply for 100 shares and to use the £500 for the purpose of paying the amount necessary to be paid on the shares, if the shares should be allotted to him (Parbury), in pursuance of the application. If Wright had made the application and paid the money Parbury would have been a member of the company and the holder of shares paid for in cash. In truth and fact Wright never did act on the instruction given him by Parbury, and never did apply for the shares in accordance with the instructions. What Wright, in fact, did was—being entitled to receive fully paid-up shares under a contract to issue fully paid-up shares to himself or his nominees—to get the company under that contract to issue fully paid-up shares to his nominees amongst whom was Parbury. Parbury had a certificate of title sent to him which was issued under no contract between himself and the company, but under a contract between Wright and the company. Those facts are not in dispute. Eighty of these shares are now held by Parbury, and he has not repudiated them in any way, they were thus standing in his name at the date of the winding-up, and he says that in respect of these shares there has been, as between himself and the company, payment in cash. It is quite true that there has not been such a payment, but Mr. Parbury says he is entitled to rely on the general law as to estoppel and that the company are estopped by reason of their certificate from denying that the shares are fully paid-up.

(a.) Reported by V. DE S. FOWKE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

As I understand the case of the British Farmers Pure Linseed Cake Co. (suprà), that was a case in which it was sought to make a transferee of shares for which cash had not been paid, liable, and the transferee was allowed to say "I produce the certificate of the company stating that the shares are fully paid up, and the company cannot say that section 25 has not been complied with." Let us look at the case and see if that is so. James, L.J., says: "I think that the section to which we have been so often referred" [i.e., section 25], "and which has been so often before the court, does not in the slightest degree alter the general law of the land as to the effect of the conduct or representation of companies, or of companies acting through their officers and servants. They are still liable, as they always were, to be bound by any representation made by them or by the officers to whom they have intrusted the management of their affairs. . . . A joint-stock company has no statutory immunity from the consequences of its acts and representations." Thesiger, L.J., took the same view, and says: "It seems to me clear that the present case comes within the general law as to estoppel, and that he cannot be made liable."

That being so, let me apply the law of estoppel in the case before me. Has there been a representation by the company? It is not disputed that there has been, and I have only to inquire whether Parbury was a person not aware of the untruth of the representation, and whether, being so unaware, he acted on the faith of the representation. There is no evidence that he was aware of the untruth of the representation, and there is evidence that he acted on the faith of it. Why should not the law of estoppel be acted on here? I am told that it should not, because of the principle cited by Mr. Ford from Buckley on the Companies Acts. I am asked to say that, therefore, the original allottee is to be made liable because he is allottee. If I held that, I should not be applying the "general law of the land" or giving effect to judgment of James, L.J., which I have just referred to. Section 25 does not alter the law of the land as to estoppel. All Mr. Buckley means in the passage cited from his book is that as a general rule the allottee has notice. In the present case Parbury was misled. He believed that shares had been issued under a contract with himself and that cash had been paid for them. In those circumstances is he prevented from relying on the estoppel arising from the certificate? Certainly not. He had no knowledge of the circumstances under which the certificate was issued. If he had been put upon inquiry and had wilfully abstained from inquiring he would not have been in a position to take advantage of this estoppel. But what is meant by saying that a person is put upon inquiry and, therefore, unable to rely on the truth of a representation? That cannot be said unless the person in question consciously abstained from doing that which, as a matter of business, he would naturally do. I see no evidence of that kind here. It is not argued that the general law of the land does not apply. The only reason that can be given for not allowing the applicant to take advantage of the estoppel is that there is something in the mere fact of his being allottee. Generally speaking that may be so, because the allottee is the person to whom the original allotment is made and he is likely to be aware of the facts. That is not so here, and I can see nothing to prevent Mr. Parbury from relying on the truth of the statement in the certificate.

Solicitors, Bonner, Thompson, Burnie, & Co.; Phelps, Sidgwick, & Biddle.

Q. B. Div. (Grantham and Wright, JJ.) May 21; July 25, 1895; Nov. 14.

HULL ROPE CO. (Respondents) v. ADAMS (Appellant). (a.)

Sale of goods—Agreement for hire and purchase—Mercantile agent—Goods passed to mortgagees as part of the appurtenances of ship—Possession of goods with consent of owner—Factors Act, 1889 (52 & 53 Vict. c. 45), ss. 2, 9—Merchant Shipping Act, 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 60), ss. 5, 9, 35.

Under a hire and purchase agreement A. supplied a trawl warp to B., the master of a fishing smack which was at that time mortgaged, together with its equipments. By the terms of the agreement, the hirer B. was to pay £4 a month until the full sum of £15 5s. was made up, when the warp should become the property of

(a.) Reported by ERSKINE REID, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

B., but until then it should remain the absolute property of A.; the agreement contained stipulations enabling A. to put an end to the agreement and retake possession of the warp in certain events; but no stipulation enabling B. to terminate the agreement by delivering up the warp to A. Subsequently, before all the instalments on the warp were paid, the mortgagees took possession of the smack, and claimed the warp as forming part of the appurtenances of the ship, which passed to them under the terms of their mortgage.

Held, that the mortgagees' claim was valid, as B. had "agreed to buy" the warp within the meaning of section 9 of the Factors Act, 1889, and the addition of the warp to the equipment of the mortgaged ship was a sufficient delivery or transfer to the mortgagees by a mercantile agent under a "disposition," within the meaning of the provisions of that section.

Lee v. Butler, 42 W. R. 88, [1893] 2 Q. B. 318, followed.

Helby v. Matthews, 43 W. R. 561, [1895] A. C. 471, discussed.

Appeal by the defendant in the action from the judgment of His Honour Judge Eardley Wilmot sitting at the Lowestoft County Court.

The following are the facts of the case material to the present appeal:—

The trawling smack Maude Green formerly belonged to a Mr. Knowles, who, on the 23rd of May, 1893, disposed of her by bill of sale under the Merchant Shipping Act to George Batty, and on the following day Batty mortgaged the smack to Mr. Knowles for £835 and interest.

In October, 1894, Batty asked Mr. Adams to supply him with a trawl warp, and the latter agreed to do so on the hire-purchase system, but not otherwise. On the 20th of October an agreement was entered into between them, under which the warp was duly supplied by Adams, and placed on board the smack; the conditions of that agreement, so far as they are here material, were as follows:

First, the lessee (Batty) agreed to pay to the owner and lessor (Adams), as and for rent of the trawl warp, £4 per calendar month, to commence on the 1st of November, 1894, which sums so agreed to be paid would amount in the aggregate to £15 5s., and the lessee agreed not in any way to sell, assign, sub-let, or otherwise part with the possession of the trawl warp, or to assume the ownership of it, so long as any of the instalments remained due. Secondly, upon the payment of all the severa sums being made by the lessee, then this agreement should be at an end, and the warp should become the property of the lessee as purchaser for the sum of £15 5s., but until then the warp should remain the sole and absolute property of the owner and lessor, it being thereby expressly agreed that the warp was only let on hire to the lessee until all the sums of money due under the agreement were paid, and in the case of failure in payment, or in case the lessee should become bankrupt or suffer his effects to be taken in execution, or give a bill of sale, or on breach of any of the covenants, then the full balance of £15 5s. required for the purchase of the warp should, at the election of Adams, at once become payable to, and be recoverable by, him, who, however, instead of seeking to recover the balance, might, if he thought fit, seize and resume possession of the warp wherever the same might be, and the several sums which had been paid by Batty should in that case be forfeited.

On the 15th of November Knowles transferred his mortgage to the Hull Rope Co., who, on the 7th of March, took possession of The Maude Green, and placed two men on board in charge of her.

Adams, who, up to that date, had only received £5 10s. on account of the warp, thereupon applied to Batty to hand the warp back, and on the mortgagees refusing to allow Batty to do so, Adams, on the 14th of March, with several men, boarded the smack as she lay in Lowestoft Harbour, and forcibly removed the warp and certain other goods supplied by him.

The mortgagees brought an action against Adams for trespass and for damages arising from the retention of the articles.

The county court judge awarded the plaintiffs £25 damages for the trespass, to be reduced to £10 on the return of the warp within a given time.

From this judgment, so far as it referred to the returning of the warp, Adams appealed.

The Factors Act, 1889, provides as follows:—Section 2, sub-section 1: "Where a mercantile agent is, with the consent of the owner, in possession of goods . . . any sale, pledge, or other disposition of the goods made by him when acting in the ordinary course of business . . . shall, subject to the provisions of this Act be as valid as if he were expressly authorized by the owner of the goods to make the same: Provided that the person taking under the disposition acts in good faith, and has not at the time of the disposition notice that the person making the disposition has not authority to make the same."

Section 9: "Where a person having bought or agreed to buy goods obtains, with the consent of the seller, possession of the goods . . . the delivery or transfer, by that person or by a mercantile agent acting for him, of the goods under any sale or pledge . . . or under any agreement for sale or pledge . . . to a third party in good faith and without notice . . . shall have the same effect as if the person making the delivery or transfer were a mercantile agent in possession of the goods with the consent of the owner."

Scrutton, for the appellant. — The question is whether, under the hire and purchase agreement, the property in the fishing gear passed to the hirer or not. I submit that it did not, and, further, that at any time before the last instalment became due and was paid the hirer had a right to return it. If this construction of the agreement is correct, then the case falls within the class of hire and purchase agreements of which Helby v. Matthews, 43 W. R. 561, [1895] A. C. 471, is the last decision, although Gough v. Wood, 42 W. R. 469, [1894] 1 Q. B. 713, is even stronger in my favour. The fact that there was a physical delivery of the gear to the master of the smack does not make the "agreement to buy" a "sale" within section 9 of the Factors Act, 1889: Kitto v. Bilbie, 72 L. T. N. S. 266, 43 W. R. Dig. 67.

A. H. Poyser, for the respondents.—This was an out and out sale to the purchaser, but the payment was not to be due on delivery, but was, by express agreement in writing, to be spread over a certain period. The fact that the agreement under which these payments were to be made, was in the form of a hire and purchase agreement does not affect the purchaser's title. The case comes within the decision of the Court of Appeal given in Lee v. Butler, 42 W. R. 88, [1893] 2 Q. B. 318. It was, therefore, a valid "agreement to buy" the fishing gear within the meaning of those words in the 9th section of the Factors Act, 1889. It is admitted that this new warp was procured for the smack in substitution for an old one that had been lost, which formed part of the equipment of the smack at the time the vessel, with her appurtenances, was mortgaged to the respondents. They took possession of the smack and her equipment under their mortgage without notice of Adams' rights to these goods, and against him their title to them is valid: Coltman v. Chamberlain, 39 W. R. 12, 25 Q. B. D. 328; The Horlock, 2 P. D. 243, 25 W. R. Dig. 205. I rely also on section 35 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894. Section 5 of that Act says there may not be more than sixty-four shares in a vessel, and section 9 directs those shares to be registered. If part of the equipment of the smack belongs to Adams, then Adams has an interest or share in the vessel, and his 65th (?) share has not been registered.

Scrutton replied.

Cur. adv. vult.

Nov. 14.—The judgment of the court was delivered by GRANTHAM, J.—We reserved judgment in this case because during the arguments it was contended by the appellant that the recent decision of the House of Lords in Helby v. Matthews, which had not then been authoritively reported, would directly effect this case. We have since then seen that judgment, and are of opinion that this case is not governed by that decision, but is within the decision of the Court of Appeal in Lee v. Butler, which case is, in fact, approved by the House of Lords in Helby v. Matthews. The agreement in question is ill-expressed, but it appears to us to contain an irrevocable promise by the hirer to pay £4 a month until the full price of £15 5s. is paid, and when the £15 5s. has been paid, the rope thereupon becomes the property of the hirer. Various contingencies are named in which the owner may put an end to the arrangement for sale, but there is nothing corresponding to the provision on which the decision of the House of Lords in Helby v. Matthews appears to have turned that "the hirer may terminate the hiring by delivering up to the owner the said instrument." We, therefore, think that in the present case the hirer had "agreed to buy" the rope within the meaning of section 9 of the Factors Act, 1889, (52 & 53 Vict., c. 45); and in our opinion the addition of rope to the equipment of the mortgaged ship was a sufficient delivery or transfer to the mortgagee under a "disposition" within the meaning of the Act, or at any rate became so when under and pursuant to the powers of mortgage, possession was taken by the plaintiffs. The judgment, therefore, of the county court judge must be affirmed.

Appeal dismissed, leave to appeal refused.

Solicitors for the appellants, Dubois & Williams, for Chamberlain, Lowestoff.

Solicitors for the respondents, Pritchard & Sons for Wiltshire & Sons, Great Yarmouth.

C. C. R.
(Lord Russell of Killowen, C.J., Mathew, Vaughan Williams, Wright, and Bruce, JJ.) Nov. 23, 1895.

REG. v. JONES AND BOWERBANK. (a)

Criminal law—Act of gross indecency with a male person—Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1885 (48 & 49 Vict. c. 69), s. 11.

Where two male persons are charged in separate counts of the same indictment with the commission of an act of gross indecency the one with the other, the acquittal of the one is not a bar to the conviction of the other.

It is an offence under section 11 of the Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1885, for one male person to procure the commission by another male person of an act of gross indecency with himself, the first of such male persons.

Case stated for the opinion of the court by Wills, J.

Robert Jones and Harry Lewis Bowerbank were tried at Exeter on the 13th of November, 1895, on an indictment containing three counts. The first count charged that Robert Jones, on the 6th of September, 1895, in a certain parish, "being a male person, unlawfully did commit an act of gross indecency with another male person, to wit Harry Lewis Bowerbank, against the form," &c. The second count charged Bowerbank with the commission of a similar act with Jones on the same day and in the same parish. The third count was that Jones on the same day and in the same parish, "being a male person, unlawfully did procure the commission by a male person, to wit the said Harry Lewis Bowerbank, of an act of gross indecency with another male person, to wit with him the said Robert Jones, against the form," &c.

The prosecution offered no evidence against Bowerbank, and a verdict of "not guilty" was returned in respect of the second count. The trial against Jones then proceeded; Bowerbank was called as a witness, and a general verdict of "guilty" was returned against Jones, who was sentenced to a term of imprisonment with hard labour.

The counsel for the prisoner took at the close of the case for the prosecution the following objections:—

That the prisoners being charged and tried on the same indictment, the jury could not, having acquitted Bowerbank on the second count, convict Jones on either the first or third count, the offences charged being joint, and requiring the participation of both prisoners in the act.

That the third count was bad, and should have been quashed or withdrawn from the jury, on the ground that it was not made by the Act an indictable offence for one male person to procure the commission by a second male person of an act of indecency with himself, the first of such male persons.

Wills, J., was of opinion, with regard to the first objection, that the offence charged was not a joint one, and that it was quite possible, in respect of such an indictment, to have evidence which would establish the case against one defendant and not against the other, though the act constituting the crime might involve the participation of both. As to the second objection, he expressed no opinion, but reserved both points.

The question for the court was whether the conviction was to stand upon either the first or third count.

Section 11 of the Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1885, provides that "any male person who, in public or private, commits, or is a party to the commission of, or procures or attempts to procure the commission by any male person of, any act of gross indecency with another male person, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor."

No counsel appeared.

LORD RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN, C.J.—Two questions are raised in this case. As to the conviction upon the first count, the objection taken by the prisoner's counsel was that both the prisoners being charged in the same indictment with a joint offence, and one being acquitted, the jury could not convict the other. But it does not appear that the offence charged in the second count is the same offence as that which is charged in the first; each may be a separate offence; and it is possible for one person to commit an act of indecency with another person without that other person being a party to the commission of the offence. This disposes of the first point.

(a.) Reported by T. R. COLQUHOUN DILL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The second question arises upon the construction of section 11 of the Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1885. The charge here is that Jones procured Bowerbank to commit the offence with another person—namely, with Jones himself—and the point raised is that the offence made punishable by the section is the procuring by one person of the commission of the act by another person with a third person. But it appears to me that the words "with another person" in the section are equivalent to "with himself or with any other person." I think, therefore, that there is nothing in this point.

MATHEW, J.—I am of the same opinion, and for the reasons which my lord has given.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, WRIGHT, and BRUCE, JJ., agreed.

Conviction affirmed.

IN BANKRUPTCY.

Q. B. Div.
(Vaughan Williams, J.) Nov. 19.

In re MARDON.
Ex parte THE BOARD OF TRADE. (a.)

Bankruptcy — Appointment of trustee — Objection by Board of Trade—Notification to High Court—Discretion of High Court—Trustee an accounting party to the estate—Costs—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 21.

When the Board of Trade notify an objection to the appointment of a trustee to the High Court, the court will not exercise any discretion, nor take into consideration the peculiar circumstances of the case, but will merely hear the facts alleged to constitute the objection, and decide as a question of law whether they constitute a valid objection or not.

An objection that the trustee appointed in the bankruptcy has been trustee under a deed of assignment executed by the debtor for the benefit of his creditors within three months of the presentation of the petition is a valid objection.

Notification to the High Court by the Board of Trade, under sub-section 3 of section 21 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, of their objection to the appointment of Mr. Forster, an accountant of Middlesborough, as trustee of the estate of Mardon, a bankrupt.

The petition was presented upon the 3rd of July, 1895, one of the acts of bankruptcy alleged being the execution by the debtor of a deed of assignment for the benefit of his creditors, under which Mr. Forster and a Mr. Brown were co-trustees. The receiving order was made upon the 30th of July, adjudication followed upon the 12th of August, and at the first meetings of creditors held upon the 23rd of August, Mr. Forster was unanimously elected trustee.

The Board of Trade objected to his appointment upon the grounds that his having been a trustee under the deed of assignment made him an accounting party to the estate, and that, therefore, his connection with the bankrupt's estate made it difficult for him to act with impartiality in the interest of the creditors generally. A majority of the creditors required the objection to be notified to the High Court in order that the High Court might decide upon its validity.

Sir R. B. Finlay, S.G., and Muir Mackenzie, for the Board of Trade.—This is an objection by the Board of Trade to the appointment of Mr. Forster as trustee of this estate. [VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J.—The Court of Appeal say in In re Lamb, Ex parte Board of Trade, [1894] 2 Q. B. 805, 43 W. R. Dig. 19, that I have no jurisdiction to do more than decide whether the objection is valid or not. I will not exercise my discretion. In Lamb's case I thought the Board of Trade were exercising a prejudicial discretion and I appointed the trustee nominated by the creditors, but the Court of Appeal held that I had no right to do so, and that the discretion lay with the Board of Trade alone. I am prepared to find as a fact whether the trustee has a pecuniary interest or not in the estate, and if he has I decide that is a valid objection.]

Sir R. B. Finlay, S.G.—I think I ought to state the facts, the Master of the Rolls says in Lamb's case at p. 815, "The judge must go into the facts which are pertinent." [VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J.—I will hear the facts in the report of the Board of Trade if you choose to read them, and will decide on the the question of law, but I will not exercise discretion, that I will leave to the Board of Trade. I am prepared to find any facts necessary to determine whether the objection is valid or not.]

Sir R. B. Finlay, S.G. (after reading the report of the Board of Trade). The objection is that Mr. Forster was co-trustee under the deed of assignment and is, therefore, an accounting party to the estate. He will have to enforce claims due to the estate from himself and his co-trustee Brown, which makes it difficult for him to act with impartiality: In re Martin, 36 W. R. 698, 21 Q. B. D. 29. [VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J.—You may take it that the objection is valid in point of form, and so far as the facts go I am prepared to find that there is a possibly pecuniary interest in the trustee.]

Herbert Reid, Q.C., and A. H. Carrington, for the creditors and the trustee.—The statute intends the High Court to have the controlling voice in deciding on these objections, and in In re Martin it was held that every case must be decided on its own circumstances. Take an extreme case, suppose the trustee owed half-a-crown to the estate, could that be held to be a pecuniary interest which made it difficult for him to act with impartiality? [VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J.—If the Board of Trade were so to find, I should have no discretion to alter their finding. I could only say whether the facts justified it or not.] In this case Mr. Forster has sent in an account showing what is due from him to the estate, and has offered the official receiver his cheque for the whole amount. If his appointment is bad a trustee under a creditor's deed can never be a trustee in bankruptcy? [VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J.—You must not address me on these matters. I have no discretion. In Lamb's case I considered the benefit of the creditors, but I will never do so again. If you can show me that Mr. Forster has no pecuniary interest I will so find as a fact.]

Muir Mackenzie, in reply.—This case falls within In re Martin, the trustee is an accounting party to the estate. [VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J. Do the Board of Trade suggest any grounds for supposing that the account which Mr. Forster has sent in can be impeached?] At present they do not. [VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J.—Then this is a purely academic question, Is he an accounting party or not?] Yes, wholly apart from any suggestion against him, I say that he is in a position which makes it difficult for him to act with impartiality.

(a.) Reported by P. M. FRANCKE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J.—The objection to the trustee in this case is that he acted as trustee under a deed of assignment, made by the debtor for the benefit of his creditors within three months of the presentation of the petition, and is, therefore, an accounting party to the estate. The Board of Trade will not, apparently, approve of trustees under such deeds becoming trustees in the bankruptcies of the makers of the deeds. No doubt there is much to be said from the creditors' point of view in favour of a trustee who has acted under such a deed, a trustee de son tort, I may call him, continuing to act upon the debtor becoming bankrupt.

Here the trustee is a gentleman of position and repute, against whose character and honesty there is no impeachment whatever, and the debtor having become bankrupt, it would seem important that the person who has been dealing with his estate before should continue to do so; the expenses would probably be less, and the estate more.

Against this view it may be said that cases not infrequently occur where the trustee under a deed is in the interest of the debtor, or not in the interest of all the creditors, and in such cases it is not desirable that he should be continued.

However clear it may sometimes be, that it is altogether to the interest of the creditors to appoint the trustee under the deed to be trustee in the bankruptcy, yet the Board of Trade find the balance unfavourable to such appointments. Upon their notifying their objection the court is to decide upon its validity.

In this case I ought, in my judgment, to find in favour of the validity of the objection, that is to say, I find that the trustee, as trustee under the deed, is accountable to himself as trustee in the bankruptcy, and that this position is one which, in fact, is likely to make him other than impartial. I am not finding on the facts that Mr. Forster is likely to be placed in a position which will make him other than impartial, but quite the other way, for the Board of Trade say that they do not impeach his account at present, as it has not been yet examined. This being so, I merely decide that the objection is valid, because the trustee will have to account to himself, and that this makes it difficult for him to act with impartiality.

When I decided Lamb's case I thought I ought to perform the same duty as the Board of Trade has in in the first instance to perform, that is, to decide whether in any particular case the Board of Trade ought to object, considering all the facts of the case, the amount of the trustee's interest, or the benefit to the creditors in getting a particular trustee; and I still think it would have been a good thing for creditors if the law had been as I supposed it to be when I decided that case. The Court of Appeal, however, thought differently, and I have here merely to decide whether the trustee has a personal interest in this estate or not.

Objection upheld.

Muir Mackenzie, asked for costs against the trustee.

Reed, Q.C., admitted that he appeared for the trustee as well as the creditors.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J.—It may be a very hard case, but if the trustee appears as a litigant, and loses, the costs must go against him; unless the Board of Trade consent to waive their rights.

Solicitors, The Solicitor to the Board of Trade; Iliffe, Henley, & Sweet.

Q. B. Div.
(Vaughan Williams and Kennedy, JJ.) Oct. 29.

In re NASH & SONS.
Ex parte CROFTON, CRAVEN, & WORTHINGTON. (a.)

Bankruptcy—Practice—Taxation of costs—Right of official receiver to be present at taxation—Bankruptcy Rules, 1886, rr. 120-124.

The official receiver has no right to be present or to be heard at the taxation of the bill of the solicitors to the trustee, or of any other persons, but the court has power to order him to attend at the taxation, not as a litigant party, but merely to assist the taxing officer, or to enable himself to report efficiently to the Board of Trade, in case they should require the taxation to be reviewed.

Appeal from an order of His Honour Judge Parry, in the county court of Manchester, holding that the official receiver had a right to attend and be heard at the taxation of the bill of Messrs. Crofton, Craven, & Worthington, solicitors to the trustee in the bankruptcy of Nash & Sons.

The facts were as follows:—

Upon the 30th of December, 1894, the solicitors carried in their bill of costs.

The registrar refused to tax the bill until the requirements of rules 120 to 124 of the Bankruptcy Rules, 1886, had been complied with.

The matter was referred to the judge, who directed the official receiver to apply for a copy of the bill.

Under rule 122: "Every person whose bill or charges is or are to be taxed shall, on application either of the official receiver or the trustee, furnish a copy of his bill or charges so to be taxed, on payment of fourpence per folio, which payment may be charged to the estate. The official receiver shall call the attention of the trustee to any items which in his opinion ought to be disallowed or reduced."

The official receiver having obtained a copy of the bill, a fresh appointment to tax was given by the registrar, when the official receiver attended and claimed a right to be present and to be heard in opposition to such items as he thought ought to be disallowed or reduced.

The solicitors objected to his being present, or being heard.

The registrar referred the matter to the judge, who decided in favour of the official receiver.

The solicitors appealed.

Cooper Willis, Q.C., for the appellants.—I contend firstly, that the official receiver has no right to be present; secondly, that if he has any right to be present he has no right to be heard. There is nothing in the statutes or the rules which entitle him to be present. Rule 122 only says that he "shall call the attention of the trustee," not the taxing-master, to the items which he thinks ought to be disallowed or reduced. It should be pointed out that the draftsman of the Winding-up Rules of 1890 evidently thought that rule 122 gave no power to the official receiver to attend, because rule 25 of the Winding-up Rules, which is in other respects identical with rule 122, has at the end these additional words, "and may attend or be represented on the taxation." There is no known instance in bankruptcy practice of such a claim as this ever having been made before.

(a.) Reported by P. M. FRANCKE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

C. A. Russell, for the trustee.—I do not wish to enter into controversy on this matter, and would merely observe that the scheme of the Act and the practice under it indicate that the official receiver should give his assistance to the trustee before taxation.

Muir Mackenzie, for the Board of Trade.—The position taken by the Board of Trade is this, that there is no provision in the Acts or Rules excluding the official receiver from being present, but that he should not be there as a litigant party, nor can he instruct counsel to represent him.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J.—This is a case of some importance because it involves a question likely to arise not infrequently; and I am glad that we have had the advantage of having it argued by Mr. Cooper Willis, who of his own personal experience has been able to give us information as to the practice, which has been confirmed by Mr. Tanner, the taxing-master of the High Court in Bankruptcy.

In my opinion, on the rules, the official receiver has no right to be present and to be heard. This accords with all practice both in London and in the country. No official receiver has ever before put forward a claim to appear and to be heard of right. I not only say this, but I say that no order of any judge could give him that right in his character of official receiver.

As to whether he has a right to be present, I say that in my judgment he has no such right, and the rules do not seem to me to contemplate his attendance. I recognize the expediency of his attendance in some cases. It is clear that the trustee and the solicitor to the trustee are in such a position that the trustee will not be a jealous critic of his own nominee. The taxing officer, however, generally sets matters right, and has done so habitually without the assistance of the official receiver. This does not exclude the right of the court to order that he be at liberty to attend. I have no doubt of the inherent power of the court to order the official receiver to attend, not as a litigant party, but to be consulted by the taxing officer, or in order to enable him to report efficiently to the Board of Trade in cases where they require the taxation reviewed. I think it very desirable in many cases that the official receiver should be present, and am of opinion that the court has power to order him to attend.

KENNEDY, J., concurred.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitors for the appellants, Crofton, Craven, & Worthington.

Solicitors for the trustee, Book & Edgar.

Solicitor to the Board of Trade, The Solicitor to the Board of Trade.

Court of Appeal.

From Q. B. Div. (Lord Esher, M.R., and Lopes and Kay, L.JJ.) — Nov. 25.

BRITISH WAGON CO. v. GRAY. (a.)

Practice—Writ—Service out of the jurisdiction—Defendant domiciled in Scotland—Agreement to give court jurisdiction to order service—Ord. 11, r. 1 (e).

Where the defendant is domiciled or ordinarily resident in Scotland or Ireland, the parties cannot by agreement give the court power to allow the writ to be served out of the jurisdiction under ord. 11, r. 1 (e).

Application ex parte for leave to serve the writ of summons on the defendant out of the jurisdiction.

The action was for the hire of certain coal wagons under an agreement in writing. By the agreement the defendant, who was domiciled and resident in Scotland, agreed to hire from the plaintiffs, who were a company registered and carrying on business in England, a number of coal wagons at a certain rent, the agreement containing the following clause:—"This agreement shall in all respects be construed and carried into effect according to the law of England, and for the purposes thereof the tenant" (the defendant) "hereby submits to the jurisdiction of the High Court of Justice in England." Mathew, J., at chambers, refused to give leave to serve the writ on the defendant out of the jurisdiction.

T. W. Chitty, for the plaintiff, moved for leave as above.—No place of payment being specified in the agreement, the debtor must seek his creditor and pay him in England. There was, therefore, a breach of the contract which ought to have been performed in England, within the first part of ord. 11, r. 1 (e). The second part of that rule does not apply, because the parties have contracted themselves out of it. They have agreed that the court shall have jurisdiction to give leave to serve the writ in Scotland. It is competent for the parties to make such an agreement; per James L.J., in The Moxham, 24 W. R. 650, 1 P. D. 107, at p. 109; Tharsis Sulphur Co. v. Société des Métaux, 38 W. R. 78. The court has, therefore, jurisdiction to give the leave asked notwithstanding that the defendant is domiciled in Scotland.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—This is an application to allow service of the writ of summons out of the jurisdiction on the defendant, who is domiciled and resident in Scotland. It is obvious that the case comes within the very terms of ord. 11, r. 1 (e), which provides that leave may be given to serve a writ out of the jurisdiction where the action is founded on an alleged breach within the jurisdiction of a contract, which according to its terms is to be performed within the jurisdiction, unless the defendant is domiciled or ordinarily resident in Scotland or Ireland. Therefore, the court cannot order service of a writ out of the jurisdiction if the defendant is domiciled or ordinarily resident in Scotland or Ireland. The service of the writ is a question of jurisdiction. Accordingly, the court has no jurisdiction to order service of the writ in such a case. It is urged, however, that the defendant has contracted to give the court jurisdiction to allow service of the writ in Scotland. The first answer to that contention is that the contract has done nothing of the sort. But I shall not act upon that ground. I shall decide this case upon the assumption upon which the learned judge at chambers acted—namely, that the true meaning of the contract is that the court may order service of the writ on the defendant out of the jurisdiction. In my opinion such a contract is of no avail, and the court cannot order service of the writ out of the jurisdiction, no matter what contract the parties may have made, when it is forbidden by the rule to allow such service. The two cases, which were cited in support of this contention do not support it; in The Moxham both parties appeared, and the question was by what law the case was to be decided. In Tharsis Sulphur Co. v. Société des Métaux it was only decided that a foreigner may appoint a person in this country to accept service for him here, and he cannot afterwards say that it is not good service. It did not raise any question of jurisdiction. In the present case the court is forbidden to exercise jurisdiction, and it will take no notice of any contract between the parties purporting to give it jurisdiction. The application must, therefore, be dismissed.

(a.) Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

LOPES, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I do not think that the contract has the effect contended for, but I will assume that it has, and I say that the parties cannot by any contract inter se give the court a jurisdiction which the rule says that it shall not have.

KAY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The case is a very simple one. Ord. 11, r. 1 (e), expressly excludes this case. Apart from some rule the court has no jurisdiction to order service out of the jurisdiction. By the rule it is carefully provided that leave shall not be given to serve the writ on such a defendant as this, out of the jurisdiction, and yet we are asked to allow the service. It is said that the case comes within the first part of the rule, and by the terms of the contract the defendant has submitted to the jurisdiction of the English courts. The contract, however, does not say that the defendant has submitted to be served out of the jurisdiction. I do not think that such a term can be implied. But even if it can, then it is a contract by a person domiciled or ordinarily resident in Scotland to allow himself to be served in Scotland, when the rule says that the court cannot give leave to serve him there. How can such a contract give the court power to do that which the rule says that it cannot do? In my opinion such a contract is entirely ultra vires and void.

Application dismissed.

Solicitors, Bell, Brodrick, & Gray.

From Q. B. Div. (Lord Esher, M.R., and Lopes and Kay, L.JJ.) Nov. 19.

CLUTTON AND OTHERS v. ATTENBOROUGH & SON. (a.)

Bill of exchange—Cheque—Payee a fictitious or non-existing person—Bills of Exchange Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 61), s. 7 (3).

A clerk in the plaintiffs' employment, by means of a fraud, induced the plaintiffs to sign and issue cheques, the name of the payee of which was not the name of any real person, drawn in favour of fictitious or non-existing persons.

Held, that the payee was a fictitious or a non-existing person within the meaning of section 7 (3) of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, and that the plaintiffs were liable on the cheques, notwithstanding the payee was not fictitious to the knowledge of the plaintiffs.

Appeal from the decision of Wills, J.

The action was brought to recover the sum of £3,558 13s. 2d. which, as the plaintiffs alleged, was paid under a mistake of fact.

The plaintiffs were land agents. Among many other estates they managed those of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. Their transactions with respect to those estates alone amounted to £700,000 a year.

In their employment they had a man named John Piper. This man managed to carry on a system of fraud, by which he obtained in the course of eight years cheques, 640 in number, and in value amounting to £18,000.

In the plaintiffs' office any letter containing an account of work done or goods delivered on any of the estates was handed by the secretary to the accounts department. The account was then handed to the management department, where it was examined by the person who had charge of the particular estate, initialed by him if correct, and afterwards handed back to the accounts department. A clerk in that department prepared a certificate of the nature and amount of account together with the name of the estate to which it was charged, and this certificate was initialed by the head of the department. On receiving the certificate, the cashier drew a cheque payable to order, which was subsequently signed by a member of the firm. The cheque was sent back to the accounts department, and from thence it was posted to the payee. The certificate remained on the table of the head of the accounts department pending the arrival of a receipt.

Piper was a clerk in the accounts department, and he took advantage of the fact that no record of an account was made in that department before it was sent to be verified in the management department, to forge certificates supposed to relate to accounts which in fact had never been presented. The names of the persons to whom the money was stated in the forged certificates to be due did not represent any real persons, but were mere inventions of Piper, coming from various non-existent and fictitious persons. After a cheque had been drawn in favour of some one or other of these "persons" and signed by one of the firm, who would not as a rule be familiar with the details of the business of the various estates, Piper would steal the cheque and remove from the table of the head of the accounts department the certificate with which it corresponded.

In order to escape detection at the annual audit he also forged vouchers for the money thus appropriated by himself.

Piper selected, as one of the names of the "persons" by whom the accounts were supposed to be presented, the name of "George Brett," and by the name of "George Brett" Piper was known to the defendants. To them he endorsed 97 of the cheques obtained in this manner, amounting in value to the sum claimed in the action. The cheques were endorsed to the defendants, sometimes in respect of the redemption of pledges, and sometimes for cash or for goods bought.

The learned judge found as a fact that the cheques were received by the defendants for value and in good faith, and gave judgment for the defendants.

Section 7 (3) of the Bills of Exchange Act provides that "where the payee is a fictitious or non-existing person the bill may be treated as payable to bearer."

Tindall Atkinson, Q.C., and W. A. Meek, for the appellants, the plaintiffs.

(a.) Reported by C. G. WILBRAHAM, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Sir Edward Clarke, Q.C., and Macaskie, for the respondents, were not called upon.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—I do not mean any disrespect to Mr. Atkinson's argument when I state that I have not the smallest doubt about this case. He did not produce on my mind any effect at all.

In this case the plaintiff signs a cheque himself. He is induced to sign that cheque by some fraud or trick of his own clerk. But he signs the cheque. He does not put it in a drawer, as Mr. Atkinson meekly tried to suggest, not to be used, but delivers it to this clerk who has tricked him into signing it. He delivers it to him in order that that clerk may pass it on to somebody else. Therefore, he signs the cheque and gives it out as a cheque. Then it comes into the hands of Mr. Attenborough for value. I, myself, have no doubt about the law in such a case, which is that if a man signs with his own hand a negotiable instrument, that is, if he signs a cheque or if he accepts a bill in his own handwriting, that constitutes a liability on his part to anybody who takes for value, the cheque with that signature of his and takes it bonâ fide. That is the short of it. If it is a cheque and goes to his banker, the banker looks at the signature of the cheque, and sees that it is the signature of his customer. He, at all events, has no occasion to look any further. He pays the cheque of his customer, the cheque being signed by his customer. What has he to do with anything else.

Mr. Atkinson says it is not a cheque at all. He signed it as a cheque. He gave it out of his own hands as a cheque. Therefore, in the hands of an innocent holder for value, it is a cheque in the same way as if a man accepts a bill in his own handwriting. Those who take that cheque take it upon the faith that it is the signature of the acceptor, and it is his real signature. A man to whom a bill is handed signed by a Rothchild or any great name in commerce, the signature to which he believes to be Rothchild's signature, would immediately discount the bill. It is said he would look to the drawer. So he would. But that is, if the acceptor did not pay. He looks first at the name of the acceptor, and finding a good signature he relies on the acceptor and pays the money. That was Vagliano's case, [1891] A. C. 107. I say, therefore, in the broadest way that a man who draws a cheque in his own hand or accepts a bill in his own hand is liable upon the signature alone to anybody to whom that negotiable instrument goes, who receives it bonâ fide.

What is it now that makes the law? It is the code; it is the Act of Parliament, which is a code. And that code, as to this point, is in words which Lord Herschell and other noble lords in the House of Lords in Vagliano's case said were perfectly clear. This code was passed when Lord Herschell was a member of the House of Commons, and it has in it those words about "fictitious or non-existing persons." But he does not very clearly explain the difference between those two phrases. Still I have no doubt myself that a "fictitious" person is a person who purports to be the person to whom the instrument is drawn when really it is another person; and "non-existing" refers to where the instrument is drawn in the name of a person who does not exist at all. This case is within those words, and that is all that is wanted according to the House of Lords. I do not understand that the code was intended to make any new law. Therefore you may take it that it is declared in the code that that is the law, and I should say it always was the law.

The appeal must be dismissed, with costs.

LOPES, L.J.—The case of Bank of England v. Vagliano appears to me conclusively to decide this case. Mr. Tindal Atkinson, in the very ingenious argument which he addressed to the court, endeavoured to import a qualification into section 7 (3) of the Bills of Exchange Act, and that qualification was this: that the payee in the case of a cheque must be a non-existing or fictitious person to the knowledge of the drawer in order to bring the case within the enactment. That contention on the part of Mr. Atkinson appears to me to be contrary to the whole effect of the decision in Vagliano's case.

Mr. Tindal Atkinson endeavoured to draw a distinction between the acceptor of a bill of exchange and the drawer of a cheque. Practically I can see no distinction whatever—certainly no distinction so far as this section of the code is concerned. I do not think it necessary to give any definition of "fictitious or non-existing." A definition has been given in the House of Lords and that is a definition by which this court is bound.

I think, therefore, the plaintiffs cannot recover.

KAY, L.J.—I also, notwithstanding the very ingenious argument of Mr. Atkinson, believe this case is decided by the case of Vagliano v. The Bank of England. I understand the facts here to be these. According to the routine of the office a clerk laid before one of the Messrs. Clutton, in this case one of the plaintiffs, a cheque filled up, payable to George Brett or order, for a sum of money which appears on the face of the cheque. He did this a great many times, but I will take one cheque as an instance. Mr. Clutton signed that cheque and handed it back to the clerk for the purpose of the cheque being issued and used. He understood that was what was going to be done with the cheque. The clerk, it seems, had put in the name of George Brett, who was a fictitious person, in the sense that nobody was meant by that name. There may be plenty of George Brett's in the world, but no one was really intended by that name. It was a fictitious name. Then the clerk forged the indorsement on this cheque and took it to Messrs. Attenborough, who gave him value for it. Messrs. Attenborough were perfectly innocent, were quite unaware of the forgery or any irregularity whatever. They paid money on the cheque, and have, I understand, been paid by the bankers. Now Messrs. Clutton are suing Messrs. Attenborough to recover the money which they have paid on these cheques.

Now first of all, what was the cheque. By section 7 (3) of the Bills of Exchange Act it is enacted that "where the payee is a fictitious or non-existing person the bill may be treated as payable to bearer." This payee was a fictitious person, therefore the bill was in fact payable to bearer. Now, it has been argued that this was not so unless Mr. Clutton, when he signed the cheque, knew that George Brett was a fictitious person. That seems to me the very point which was decided in Vagliano's case. The majority of the learned lords who advised the House in that case said distinctly that the act does not impose any condition of knowledge on any person. It is a positive enactment that where the payee is a fictitious person, the cheque is payable to bearer; and to say that that means where he is fictitious to the knowledge of someone or other, is to impose a limitation which the Act does not contain. In saying this, I am paraphrasing in my own words what occurs again and again in the judgments in Vagliano's case. [His lordship, after citing passages from Lord Herschell's judgment in that case, proceeded:—] That is the case with regard to the acceptor of a bill. A cheque differs from other bills of exchange in this respect, that the banker on whom it is drawn does not write across it his acceptance, and, therefore, he does not make himself liable to the payee; and upon a cheque the only person who is liable to the payee, if the banker does not cash it, is the drawer.

Therefore, although the drawer is not in terms the acceptor of the cheque, still for this purpose he is in the position of an acceptor; and every word in the judgments of the learned lords, relating to the meaning of the Act, seems to me to apply as closely to the position of the drawer of a cheque as it does to the position of an acceptor of a bill of exchange. If it is the case that an acceptor is liable, when the bill is in fact drawn in favour of a fictitious person, his knowledge being entirely immaterial, it seems to follow as an irresistible consequence that in the case of a cheque, if in fact a cheque is drawn in favour of a fictitious person, the knowledge of the drawer is just as immaterial as, in the other case, is the knowledge of the acceptor; and, therefore, I think on that point that Vagliano's case decides the contention raised by this case.

But then Mr. Atkinson, with the ingenuity one would expect from him, said, this cheque was never issued—it never was a cheque in favour of anybody, because it was never issued. Upon the facts as I have stated them, I cannot agree with him. Mr. Clutton signed it; he intended it to be a cheque for the amount which appeared on the face of it; and he gave it to his clerk to issue. He never saw the cheque again until it came back to him, after having been paid by his bankers. After that, to allow him to say as against an innocent holder for value, "I never issued this cheque," seems to me quite impossible. One cannot help looking at the enormous danger in which all people who take cheques and give value for them would be, if such a contention were to prevail. Messrs. Attenborough have a right to say, "This was a cheque which was signed, payable to bearer; the man who signed it intended it to be issued, and gave it to his clerk to issue; the clerk in truth forged the indorsement, but the indorsement was not necessary, because it was a cheque to bearer; it was handed to me for value; I am entirely innocent of any fraud connected with the matter, and I have a right to be paid." I see no answer to that claim on their part, and, therefore, I think the appeal fails.

Solicitor for the appellants, H. S. Clutton.

Solicitors for the respondent, Stanley, Attenborough, & Tyer.

From Q. B. Div.
(Lord Esher, M.R., and Lopes, and Kay, L.JJ.) Nov. 7.

Liles v. Terry. (a.)

Solicitor—Client—Gift to solicitor's wife—No independent advice—Presumption of undue influence.

In the case of an irrevocable gift by a client to a solicitor, or to the solicitor's wife, made without independent advice, it is an irrebuttable presumption of law that there was undue influence on the part of the solicitor.

Appeal from the judgment of Charles, J., in favour of the defendants at the trial of the action without a jury.

The plaintiff was an elderly spinster lady, and the defendants were a solicitor and his wife, the latter being the plaintiff's niece. The action was brought to set aside a deed made in October, 1892, whereby the plaintiff had assigned certain leasehold premises to the male defendant in trust for the plaintiff for life, and then to her sister for life (the sister was since deceased), with reversion to the female defendant for her own separate use and benefit absolutely. The defendant had acted as the plaintiff's solicitor in some litigation with regard to the premises in question, and the plaintiff told him that if he would make no charge for acting for her, she would leave the premises to her niece. The plaintiff alleged that she waited on the defendant for the purpose of executing her will. He produced a will which she signed. The will did not refer to the premises in question, and the plaintiff said that after she had signed the will the defendant produced another document, which was the deed now sought to be set aside. The defendant told the plaintiff that it was a separate deed dealing with the premises, and she thereupon executed it, but she stated in her evidence that she was not told, and did not know, that the deed was an irrevocable conveyance. The defendant, having become insane, was not called at the trial, but an independent person who witnessed the plaintiff's signature to both documents was called on behalf of the defence, and he stated that the defendant explained both the will and the deed to the plaintiff before she signed them.

Charles, J., held that there had been no undue influence by the defendants, and that the deed as executed carried out the plaintiff's then wishes. He gave judgment for the defendants.

The plaintiff appealed.

Attenborough, for the plaintiff.

Stephen Lynch, for the defendants.

The following authorities were referred to in the course of the arguments:—Goddard v. Carlisle, 9 Price, 169; Tyars v. Alsop, 37 W. R. 339, 61 L. T. N. S. 8; Morgan v. Minett, 25 W. R. 744, 6 Ch. D. 638; Allcard v. Skinner, 36 W. R. 251, 36 Ch. D. 145; Huguenin v. Baseley, 14 Ves. 273; Hunter v. Atkins, 3 My. & K. 113; Rhodes v. Bate, 14 W. R. 292, L. R. 1 Ch. App. 252; Gibson v. Jeyes, 6 Ves. 266; Wright v. Proud, 13 Ves. 136.

Lord Esher, M.R.—The question in this case is whether, by virtue of a definite rule of equity, the court is bound to set aside the deed of conveyance executed by the plaintiff. I am of opinion that the facts as found by Charles, J., represent the truth—that is to say that the deed carried out the intentions of the plaintiff; that the difference between a will which she could revoke and a deed which was irrevocable was explained to her, and that she understood the effect of what she was doing. Although this deed was not intended to benefit the defendant, and could not do so; although it was only intended to benefit the defendant's wife who was the plaintiff's niece, yet, as I understand the principle which has been established by the courts of equity, the fact that the defendant is a solicitor, and that the plaintiff had no independent advice, renders the gift void, and the defendant's wife must, therefore, lose all the benefits which the plaintiff had intended to confer upon her. The rule of equity is that in cases such as this the presumption of undue influence is a presumption of law, which cannot be met or refuted by any facts whatever. That is the rule which was laid down by Turner, L.J., in Rhodes v. Bate, and that learned judge is one of the best possible guides to follow where there is any question as to what is the principle of equity applicable to a case. I must add, however, that in my opinion the principle is an unfortunate one which may in some cases work injustice, but until the cases establishing the principle have been overruled it must stand. For these reasons the deed of conveyance must be set aside, and the appeal will be allowed.

(a.) Reported by F. O. Robinson, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

LOPES, L.J.—I agree; but with great diffidence I must differ from the opinion of the Master of the Rolls as to this rule being an unfortunate one. Although being a hard and fast rule it may sometimes produce hardships, the rule is nevertheless founded upon public policy, and in the generality of cases is highly beneficial. The authorities establish this principle, that a gift to a solicitor from a client while the relationship of solicitor and client still subsists, or while any influence from that relationship lasts, is invalid, unless the client has the benefit of some independent professional advice. It is no avail that the solicitor himself has thoroughly explained the matter to the client. The client must have independent advice. It is not necessary to go through in detail all the cases in which this principle has been laid down, but I will refer to Rhodes v. Bate as a valuable authority. In that case Turner, L.J., said: "I take it to be a well-established principle of this court, that persons standing in a confidential relation towards others cannot entitle themselves to hold benefits which those others may have conferred upon them, unless they can show to the satisfaction of the court that the persons by whom the benefits have been conferred had competent and independent advice in conferring them." That establishes the principle which governs this case. Under these circumstances, it is not necessary for me to refer to the particular facts of this case, or to say whether I should myself have come to the same conclusion on these facts as Charles, J., has done, for I base my decision upon the inflexible rule of equity.

With regard to the other point, that this was not a gift to the solicitor himself, but to his wife, I do not think any valid distinction can be drawn from that fact. It is clear that, in the case of a gift to a solicitor's wife, the solicitor himself must derive some advantage.

KAY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion; and I entirely dissent from the view that the principle which governs this case is an unfortunate rule. It is, in my opinion, a most important rule of public policy. When one person is under the influence of another by reason of some relationship existing between them, that other person is not allowed to accept any benefit from a gift from the former, unless the donor, before making the gift, had some independent and competent professional advice. In Wright v. Proud, 13 Ves. 136, Lord Erskine said: "Independent of all fraud, an attorney shall not take a gift from his client while the relation subsists, though the transaction may be not only free from fraud, but the most moral in its nature." Then, in Hatch v. Hatch, 9 Ves. 292, Lord Eldon deals with the subject in these words: "This case proves the wisdom of the court in saying that it is almost impossible, in the course of the connection of guardian and ward, attorney and client, trustee and cestui que trust, that a transaction shall stand purporting to be bounty for the execution of an antecedent duty." It is to be observed that there is a slight difference between these two dicta, because Lord Eldon uses the expression that it is "almost impossible" for the transaction to stand. But I think that difference is explained by Turner, L.J., in Rhodes v. Bate, where he says that, in cases of gifts of a very trifling nature, the court will not interfere; but he laid it down distinctly that, where the relationship exists, the gift is invalid. For my part, I cannot conceive a wiser rule, or one more calculated to produce in the long run more justice and equity between the parties, and the rule applies especially to cases of solicitor and client. A solicitor is bound to tell his client that he cannot accept a gift from him unless the client has independent advice. That is all the solicitor has to do, and if he will not do that, the gift cannot be supported.

In this case the gift is not to the solicitor, but to his wife. That fact, however, makes no difference as to the application of the principle. As long ago as 1821, Richards, C.B., laid down, in Goddard v. Carlisle, that "there is no difference in principle between a gift of this sort to a man's wife and a gift immediately to himself, if the gift to the wife be effected by undue means on the part of the husband." The basis of the rule is the impossibility of rebutting undue influence if the transaction does not take place under independent advice; and, looking at the rule and the reason for it, it is obvious that it applies just, or nearly, as strongly, where the gift is not to the party himself, but to his wife.

With regard to the evidence in this case, I do not take the same view as the Master of the Rolls and Charles, J. [His lordship went through the evidence, and said that he came to the conclusion that the plaintiff had not known that she was executing an irrevocable deed.] I do not, however, base my decision in the slightest degree on the particular facts of this case. Even if the plaintiff had known exactly the effect of the deed, the principle of equity still assumes that she was acting under undue influence. For these reasons I am of opinion that this appeal must be allowed.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitor for the plaintiff, J. Attenborough.

Solicitors for the defendant, Wilson & Sons.

From Chan. Div. (A. L. Smith and Rigby, L.JJ.) Nov. 11, 20.

THE ALCOY AND GANDIA RAILWAY AND HARBOUR CO. (LIMITED) v. GREENHILL.

GREENHILL v. THE ALCOY, &c., CO.

THE TRUSTEES, EXECUTORS, AND SECURITIES INSURANCE CORPORATION (LIMITED) v. THE ALCOY &c., CO. (a.)

Practice — Pleadings — Counter-claim — Defendant to counter-claim not party to original action—Right to counter-claim against plaintiff—Judicature Act, 1873 (36 & 37 Vict. c. 66), s. 24, sub-section 3—R. S. C., 1883, ord. 19, r. 3; ord. 21, rr. 11, 14.

A defendant to a counter-claim, not being a party to the original action, but brought in by the original defendant on his counter-claim, is not entitled to counter-claim against the original defendant and plaintiff.

Street v. Gover, 25 W. R. 750, 2 Q. B. D. 498, followed.

Toke v. Andrews, 30 W. R. 659, 8 Q. B. D. 428, distinguished.

The Alcoy Co. was incorporated in August, 1889, under the Companies Act, 1862, for the purpose of acquiring certain concessions of the Spanish Government for the construction and working of a railway from Alcoy to Gandia, in Spain, and of a harbour at Gandia.

In August, 1893, the company commenced an action against Thomas Arthur Greenhill and others, on a contract entered into between the defendants and the company, for the construction of the railway and harbour.

(a.) Reported by W. SHALLCROSS GODDARD, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The defendants delivered their defence, together with a counter-claim against the company, and also against the Trustees, &c., Corporation, in respect of a guarantee, the corporation being added by the defence as parties to the defendants' counter-claim.

The corporation subsequently delivered their defence to the defendants' counter-claim, and also counter-claimed against the plaintiff company.

Ord. 21, r. 14, is as follows:—"Any person named in a defence as a party to a counter-claim thereby made, may deliver a reply within the time within which he might deliver a defence if it were a statement of claim."

On the 22nd of July, 1895, the plaintiff company applied to Stirling, J., in chambers, for an order that the counter-claim of the Trustees, &c., Corporation should be struck out.

Stirling, J., following Street v. Gover, 25 W. R. 750, 2 Q. B. D. 498, made the order asked for.

The Trustees, &c., Corporation appealed.

Macnaghten, for the appellants.—By virtue of the Judicature Act, 1873, s. 24, sub-section 3, the court clearly has power to allow this counter-claim. Further, it is permissible under ord. 21, r. 14, the counter-claim being in the nature of a reply, and for this purpose the two words being interchangeable. I also rely on Toke v. Andrews, 30 W. R. 659, 8 Q. B. D. 428; Beddall v. Maitland, 29 W. R. 484, 17 Ch. D. 174.

Mulligan, for the plaintiff company.—I submit Stirling, J., was quite right in following Street v. Gover. It would be a strong measure now to depart from the practice which has obtained universally in all the divisions of the High Court for many years. No machinery has been provided by the orders or rules to meet such a case as this.

He referred to McGowan v. Middleton, 31 W. R. 835, 11 Q. B. D. 464; Eden v. The Weardale Iron Co., 33 W. R. 241, 28 Ch. D. 333.

R. J. Parker, for the defendants.

Macnaghten replied.

Cur. adv. vult.

Nov. 20.—A. L. SMITH, L.J.—The question is whether a point of practice decided by Mellor and Lush, JJ., in the case of Street v. Gover in the year 1877 upon the orders and rules of 1875 (ord. 22, r. 8), which is identical with ord. 21, r. 14, in the orders and rules of 1883 now in force, is to be followed or not. Stirling, J., followed it, but gave leave to appeal.

It is argued that the decision of Mellor and Lush, JJ., is wrong, and that the practice during the last eighteen years has been wrong, and that this court should now reverse the case decided in 1877 and alter the practice.

I should be extremely loth to do anything of the kind, and unless fully convinced that that decision was wrong I most certainly should refuse to do so, more especially as since that decision the old order and rule of 1875, upon which it was given, have been replaced by the orders and rules of 1883, which have subsequently been often altered and amended, and yet the old order and rule of 1875, with knowledge of that decision upon it, was re-enacted in 1883 and remains still untouched. This shows that no inconvenience has been felt in practice in adopting the construction of the rule as laid down by Mellor and Lush, JJ., in the year 1877. The question is this, whether, when a defendant to an action brings in another person in order to counter-claim against him and the plaintiff, which he can do by virtue of section 24, sub-section 3, of the Judicature Act, 1873, and ord. 21, r. 11, that other person is entitled, under rule 14 of order 21, not only to defend himself against such counter-claim of the defendant, but also to raise a counter-claim against the defendant and the plaintiff. Ord. 21, r. 14, is as follows. [His lordship read the rule, and continued:—] Mellor and Lush, JJ., held that the word "reply" in this rule did not embrace a counter-claim, and so the practice has been since 1877. I would point out the result if the person brought in by a defendant can counter-claim as is now suggested. He was no party to the plaintiff's action. The plaintiff wanted nothing out of him. All the plaintiff wanted was something out of the defendant. But it is the defendant who alleges that he wants something out of the plaintiff and the person brought in, in order that he, the defendant, may obtain relief for himself; and it is argued that the person so brought in, can counter-claim against the original plaintiff so that the plaintiff is driven to a contest with that person, although the plaintiff has no claim whatever against him, and has never litigated and does not desire to enter into litigation with him at all.

It strikes me as odd that the rules should allow this; but it is said that they do, and that Field and Huddleston, JJ., in the case of Toke v. Andrews in the year 1882 in reality so held, and that their judgment is preferable to that of Mellor and Lush, JJ. In my opinion Field and Huddleston, JJ., did not decide what it is now said that they did. In the first place they had not to decide upon the construction of ord. 22, r. 8, of the Rules of 1875. What they decided was that where a plaintiff sued a defendant, and the defendant counter-claimed against the plaintiff, the plaintiff could counter-claim against the counter-claim of the defendant for a cause of action which accrued to the plaintiff after the issue of the writ. That is all those learned judges decided. It will be seen that this is a decision that an original plaintiff can counter-claim against the counter-claim of an original defendant and for a cause of action which accrued after the issue of the writ, but it is no decision that a person brought in by a defendant can counter-claim against an original plaintiff. It is true that Field, J., points out that Lush, J., in Street v. Gover, had doubts as to whether he was placing the correct construction upon the word "reply" in ord. 22, r. 8; but he and Mellor, J., did, nevertheless, expressly hold that the word "reply" did not include a counter-claim, and so it has remained until the present time.

In my judgment, if this construction of the rule is to be altered, such alteration must be brought about by the Rule Committee by adding thereto the word "counter-claim" after the word "reply"; but whether it would think right to do so, I much doubt, seeing, as was pointed out by Mellor and Lush, JJ., that it would produce such a complexity as would render an action untriable.

I should notice that this ord. 21, r. 14, applies to actions both in the Chancery and Common Law Divisions. If it would produce no complexity in the Chancery Division as it is said it would not, well and good; but the same construction must be placed upon the rule whether it is being applied to a Chancery or a common law action—and if, as I have no doubt, in a common law action, the complexity pointed out would arise, I prefer the construction placed upon the rule by Mellor and Lush, JJ., and not the one contended for—viz., that the word "reply" as used in the rule embraces a counter-claim.

In the case of Eden v. The Weardale Iron Co., in which a third party was brought in by a defendant under ord. 16, r. 48, in order that the defendant might obtain indemnity or contribution from him, it was argued that such third party could file a counter-claim against the original plaintiff, but this court held that he could not, and Bowen and Fry, L.JJ., pointed out the inconveniences which would arise if this were allowed, and similar inconveniences would, as it appears to me, arise in the present case if the application were allowed.

For these reasons I am of opinion that the appeal must be dismissed, and with costs in any event.

RIGBY, L.J.—I have arrived at the same conclusion. Whether, if the case of Street v. Gover had come before me in the first instance I should have been impressed by the reasons there given and have arrived at the same conclusion, I very much doubt. But from the first I have been strongly impressed with the great inconvenience of attempting to interfere now with a rule as to procedure laid down so long ago as 1877, and my only hesitation has arisen from a doubt which I entertained for a short time, whether Toke v. Andrews really had not in substance laid down a law not to be reconciled with Street v. Gover. But after looking into the case, and the judgment of the Divisional Court as delivered by Field, J., I see that they did not intend to overrule, and they carefully avoided overruling, Street v. Gover. To a certain extent, seeing that the learned judges in Toke v. Andrews may, like myself, have had some doubt about the original correctness or necessity of the decision in Street v. Gover, and seeing that they would not act upon that doubt, I think we ought not to do so. But in conclusion, without hesitation, now after consideration, I agree with what has been said as to the inconvenience of attempting to interfere with that decision.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the corporation, Slaughter & May.

Solicitors for the plaintiff company, Ashurst, Morris, Crisp, & Co.

Solicitors for the defendants, Batten, Proffitt, & Scott.

From Chan. Div. (Lindley, Lopes, and Rigby, L.JJ.) July 30, 31; Aug. 1, 1895.

In re ENGLAND.

STEWARD v. ENGLAND. (a.)

Limitations, Statute of—Money charged on land—Devise of lands charged to tenant for life of charge under a settlement—Presumption of payment of interest by devisee in fee—Real Property Limitation Act, 1874 (37 & 38 Vict. c. 57), s. 8.

A testator, having covenanted to pay within twelve months of his death to the trustees of his son's marriage settlement a sum of money, and having charged certain real estate with payment of the same and interest, devised the estate, subject to the charge, to his son in fee. The son was tenant for life under the settlement, and entered into possession of the estate on the death of his father, and received the rents and profits for more than twelve years. The money had never been raised, nor had any interest ever been paid in fact.

Held, that there had been no payment of interest so as to prevent the Statute of Limitations running in favour of the personal estate.

Decision of Kekewich, J. (43 W. R. 491), affirmed.

Appeal by the plaintiff (a trustee of a settlement made by the testator W. England on the 20th of September, 1870) from a decision of Kekewich, J. (reported 43 W. R. 491), where the facts are set out, as also in the judgment of Lindley, L.J., so far as they are material.

Kekewich, J., held that the claim—in respect of a sum of £4,000 which the testator by the settlement of 1870 had covenanted to pay to the trustees within twelve months after his decease, and had thereby also charged upon certain real estate—was barred as against the personal estate, by the Statutes of Limitations.

Ingpen and L. S. Bristowe, for the appellant.—The question arises under the statute 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 42, s. 3, and there is a conflict between the two decisions of Roddam v. Morley, 5 W. R. 510, 1 De G. & J. 1, and Coope v. Cresswell, 14 W. R. 568, L. R. 2 Eq. 106, and on appeal, 15 W. R. 242, L. R. 2 Ch. App. 112. The tendency has been to follow Roddam v. Morley. Dickenson v. Teasdale, 1 De G. J. & S. 52, 11 W. R. Ch. Dig. 55, though rather like the present case, was a decision on a different statute, 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 27; the decision really was whether a charge of debts could be created into a trust for the benefit of creditors. The next cases are Peare v. Laing, 19 W. R. 653, L. R. 12 Eq. 41, In re Hollingshead, Hollingshead v. Webster, 36 W. R. 660, 37 Ch. D. 651, In re Frisby, Allison v. Frisby, 38 W. R. 65, 43 Ch. D. 106; the latter case turned on the Act of 1874, which was a re-enactment of 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 27, and decided that although a mortgagor might be statute-barred, the surety was not barred. A payment by a person who is liable to pay, and who can be sued on the covenant, as here, is sufficient to prevent the statute running.

They also referred to Sutton v. Sutton, 31 W. R. 369, 22 Ch. D. 511, and Dibb v. Walker, 41 W. R. 427, [1893] 2 Ch. 429. [LINDLEY, L.J., referred to Forsyth v. Bristowe, 1 W. R. 356, 8 Ex. 716, and Barclay v. Owen, 60 L. T. N. S. 220, 37 W. R. Dig. 111.]

Warmington, Q.C., and Badcock, for the respondents the residuary legatees.—This case is a case under 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 27, and the reason why Sutton v. Sutton was fought in this court was to decide whether twenty years or twelve years was the requisite time. In Fordham v. Wallis, 1 W. R. 118, 10 Hare 217, the principle of the old common law rule of joint contractors is applied by the Vice-Chancellor at p. 226.

They referred to Shelford's Real Property Statutes, 9th ed., p. 176, and followed In re Morley, Morley v. Saunders, 17 W. R. 959, L. R. 8 Eq. 594; Burrell v. Earl of Egremont, 7 Beav. 205; Cockburn v. Edwards, 30 W. R. 446, 18 Ch. D. 449; and Harlock v. Ashberry, 30 W. R. 327, 19 Ch. D. 539.

Ingpen, in reply.—Your lordships must presume payment as a fact, with its natural consequences. If the time has not run out as against Captain England, it cannot have run out as against those who are jointly liable with him. Coope v. Cresswell was an action on covenant against the devisee, and Roddam v. Morley and the other cases which follow it apply equally to the Act of 1874 as to the earlier Acts.

He referred to In re Powers, Lindsell v. Phillips, 30 Ch. D. 291, 34 W. R. Dig. 108; Lord Kensington v. Bouverie, 3 W. R. 469, 7 De G. M. & G. 134, and to Eddis on the Administration of Assets, p. 59.

LINDLEY, L.J.—This case is a little peculiar, and involves a point that, so far as I know, has never actually arisen before, and is not governed by any of the numerous authorities to which our attention has been directed.

(a.) Reported by W. SHALLCROSS GODDARD, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The appeal is against a declaration made by Kekewich, J., by which he declared that "no part of the residuary personal estate of the testator, William England, is liable for the said sum of £4,000 by the said indenture of settlement covenanted to be paid by the said testator or any part thereof, or to make good any deficiency in respect of the said charge of £4,000 in case the said estates are of insufficient security for the same." On the 20th of September, 1870, the testator made a settlement by which he covenanted to pay £4,000 twelve months after his death. The person entitled to sue upon that covenant is a Mr. Steward, who is the trustee of the settlement. By the same settlement certain estates belonging to the settlor and the testator were charged with the payment of that £4,000. Now the settlor died in June, 1871, leaving a will by which he devised the estate so charged with that £4,000 to Captain England in fee, and Captain England was himself the tenant for life, or the beneficiary entitled to the interest on that £4,000 for his life; after that the beneficial interest went to his wife. The residue of the testator's estate was devised to executors, upon trust to sell, and to pay the residue to his daughters and their children. The executors were Captain England and a gentleman of the name of Fraser.

The position of affairs is this. After the testator's death there was clearly a right to sue upon that covenant for the £4,000, a right on behalf of the trustee, as it were, to sue the executors twelve months after the testator's death. When that sum became payable there was a right on the part of the same trustee to take proceedings to have that charge raised out of the real estate — that is obvious. Captain England, the devisee of the estate so charged, was liable not to pay the charge, but was liable, under the statutes, to the amount of the value of the estate, to pay it; the statutes being the Statute of William and Mary, or the Statute of Will. 4 which has replaced that. It is important to observe that under these statutes he is liable to account for the value of the estate, and I do not know if it has been decided whether the value of the estate is to be taken when proceedings are brought or at the death of the testator; but it would seem wrong that the value at the death should be the proper value, if the payment is not enforced for long afterwards. But he is not liable to pay the money, but to account for the assets.

What took place was this. He naturally entered into possession of these estates devised to him in fee, and inasmuch as he was beneficially entitled to the interest of the £4,000 charged on that estate, no payment would be made by him to the trustee of the interest on that £4,000; and of course, if he had paid it, it would have come back to him in the shape of a return to him of the cheque he payed. He is entitled to the money, to the interest; and what is important to bear in mind is this, that by no procedure could he be made to pay the interest on that sum. He was entitled to receive it himself, and neither he nor his executors could ever be compelled to pay one farthing. If anybody else had a beneficial interest in it, of course he would be liable, but there was nobody else with a beneficial interest in the interest, and he was not liable to pay it. As regards the capital, he being only tenant for life, the estate of course was liable, and he was liable under the statute to the value of the estate.

For more than twelve years nothing has been done, and now three summonses have been taken out which have been consolidated, and it has been ascertained, or at all events it is apprehended, that the estate on which this £4,000 is charged is not, or may not be, sufficient to raise that sum, and the question, therefore, arises whether the personal estate of the testator, and settlor, and covenantor, is or is not liable to pay that £4,000. Kekewich, J., has held that it is not, and hence the appeal to us.

In the first place, what is the statute, if any, applicable to the case? We must try it in this way:— Suppose that the action were brought by the trustee, Mr. Steward, against the legal personal representative of the covenantor; he would plead the statute. Now what are the governing statutes? There are two possible statutes—viz., the unrepealed statute of Will. IV. c. 42, and the statute of 1874, 37 & 38 Vict. c, 57, which amended the third and fourth of Will. IV. c. 27, and the point as to which statute is applicable appears to me to be decided by the case of Sutton v. Sutton. That case determines, whatever else it determines, that section 8 of the Act of 1874 applies, which is in these words, "No action, or suit, or other proceeding shall be brought to recover any sum of money secured by any mortgage, judgment or lien, or otherwise charged upon or payable out of any land or rent." The case of Sutton v. Sutton determines that when any action, suit, or other proceeding is brought not only to recover any sum of money out of land, but is brought against the legal personal representative of the covenantor whether the covenant is contained in a deed, or, as in the case before Fry, J., in collateral documents, in such case the governing statute is 37 & 38 Vict. c. 57, s. 8, and to that and that alone we must have recourse.

Now let us read section 8. [His lordship read the section, and continued:—] Now, what we have to ask ourselves is, Has there been any part payment of the principal money or of the interest, or any acknowledgment given in writing "by the person by whom the same shall have been payable or his agent to the person entitled thereto or his agent"? That is a question of fact, and admits of but one answer—"No; there has been no payment in fact and no acknowledgment in fact." As regards the principal sum, it is not contended that there has been; but then it is said that, although there has been no payment of interest in fact, that there has been that which is equivalent to a payment, and it is put in this way. It is said that Captain England, having been devisee of the estate and also tenant for life of the charge upon it, must be treated to have paid himself—that is to say, to have paid the trustee and got the money back again. One must be careful before one substitutes what I would call a fiction for a fact. If an action were brought, I apprehend the statute would be relied upon as a defence, and there having been no payment in fact — no acknowledgment in writing—there would be a complete defence. Now let us see what the suggested answer to that difficulty is, and how it is to be got over. Captain England was never liable to pay one farthing of this interest. That is the cardinal point to keep one's mind on. He was entitled to interest, but was not liable himself. He never was liable, and, therefore, a constructive or fictitious payment of interest to himself is not sufficient, for there was no payment of interest by any person liable. The whole thing is a fiction.

That really seems to me to get rid of the whole of these cases, because, although I quite concede this, that if proceedings had been taken against Captain England to raise this £4,000 out of the land, he could not have set up the statute, because he had been enjoying all the devise and all the charge, yet it does not at all follow that because he is open to that personal objection that the same objection can be made available against other persons, and there is not a single case in the books which goes the length of saying that it can. There are cases which go to show or tend to show this, that, if he had to pay interest, that interest might avail against the legal personal representative. In re Frisby is most important in that respect; but in that case the person who paid interest was a person, in fact, liable to pay interest; and in this case there has been no payment, in fact, of a shilling of interest, and no person liable to pay a shilling; that is the peculiarity of this case.

Now, bearing that in mind, it appears to me we may make a clean sweep of all the cases that have been referred to. There is not one of them applicable, it appears to me, under the circumstances of this case.

I think, therefore, that the appeal ought to be dismissed.

LOPES, L.J.—I do not propose to follow the points that have been taken in the judgment of Lindley, L.J. I am satisfied to say that I found my decision upon this. That there has been no payment of interest in this case by anybody liable to pay. Captain England was not liable to pay a penny. He was tenant for life of this charge, and devisee in fee simple of the lands, and he was entitled to put every halfpenny of this interest into his pocket. That, to my mind, would be a complete answer to the case, and I think the learned judge was perfectly right in the court below when he held that the statute was a bar against the personal estate.

RIGBY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion, and I will add nothing, except as to the liability of Captain England to pay interest. The statute of fraudulent devises places devisees in the same position as the heir-at-law, but under that statute—I do not quite remember whether, by express words or by judicial decision—it has been held that the heir-at-law cannot be made accountable for any interest that is received by him before the issue of the writ. If he takes it and puts it into his pocket, it belongs to him absolutely and entirely, and as devisees are placed on exactly the same footing with the heir-at-law, there is no power to recover from them. That interest would be left out of the account altogether; they would be chargeable only up to the value of the land; and for the interest which they had received before the issuing of the writ, they would not be liable at all. It is plain, therefore, to me, that Captain England never was liable, and, giving full effect to all the decisions, including that in In re Frisby, there has been no payment within the meaning of section 8 of the Act of 1874. Section 8 of the Act of 1874 has been decided by this court to be the section which applies in such a matter. I have not the slightest doubt that that was absolutely in accordance with the plain provisions of the Act, when they are looked into. In any event, of course, we could not consider whether it was right or wrong. We accept it, and for my part I accept it with full conviction that it was absolutely right.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the appellant, Rhodes & Son.

Solicitors for the respondent, S. W. Johnson & Son.

App. Bankruptcy.
(Lord Esher, M.R., and Lopes and Kay, L.JJ.)

Nov. 15.

In re GALLARD.
Ex parte GALLARD. (a.)

Bankruptcy—Costs—Taxation of trustee's costs—Member of committee of inspection employed as solicitor—Profit derived from transaction arising out of the bankruptcy—Sanction of the court—Bankruptcy Rules, 1886, r. 317.

By rule 317 of the Bankruptcy Rules, 1886, it is provided that "no member of a committee of inspection of an estate shall, except under and with the sanction of the court, directly or indirectly, by himself or any employer, partner, clerk, agent, or servant, be entitled to derive any profit from any transaction arising out of the bankruptcy, or to receive out of the estate any payment for services rendered by him in connection with the administration of the estate, or for any goods supplied by him to the trustee for or on account of the estate."

Held, that such "sanction of the court" must be given before the transaction from which the profit is to be derived is undertaken, and cannot be given after the profit is derived.

Held also, that the "profit" derived by a solicitor is the amount of his costs less disbursements out of pocket, and no allowance can be made in respect of office expenses.

Per Lord Esher, M.R.—It is not a proper practice for a solicitor to accept a retainer from a committee of inspection, one of whom is a clerk to his firm, to act as solicitor to the trustee in bankruptcy; and if a solicitor is so retained, the court, on application, ought to set aside such retainer.

This was an appeal by one of the creditors in the bankruptcy of G. Gallard from a decision of Vaughan Williams, J.

In 1887 a receiving order was made against G. Gallard, and on the 6th of October, 1887, James Harris was appointed trustee in the bankruptcy by the creditors, with a committee of inspection. This committee consisted of, among others, H. M. Williams, a member of Williams & Cooper a firm of solicitors in Brighton, and E. F. Hunt, clerk to Ashurst, Morris, Crisp, & Co., solicitors in London.

It then became necessary to appoint a solicitor to the trustee, and, at the request of the committee of inspection, Messrs. Ashurst, Morris, Crisp, & Co. consented to act in that capacity.

In the course of the administration of the bankrupt's estate, it was found necessary to do certain work at Brighton, and thereupon Ashurst, Morris, Crisp, & Co. appointed H. M. Williams to act as their agent in that town and do the necessary work.

Williams carried out the work, and then sent in to Ashurst, Morris, Crisp, & Co. an agency bill of costs for £139, which they paid him. Amongst other items, the trustee claimed to have this sum of £139 reimbursed to him out of the estate.

On the bill coming before the taxing master, he disallowed the whole of it except actual out-of-pocket expenses. Thereupon the trustee appealed to the judge, Vaughan Williams, J., who ordered the certificate of the taxing master to be varied by allowing, in addition to the out-of-pocket expenses, a farther sum of £75 as representing a due proportion of office expenses, and out of the whole bill he only disallowed the sum of £40, which he took to be the actual profits made during the transaction.

(a.) Reported by E. G. STILLWELL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

From this order Harriet Gallard, one of the creditors in the bankruptcy, now appealed.

By rule 317 of the Bankruptcy Rules, 1886, it is provided that "No member of a committee of inspection of an estate shall, except under and with the sanction of the court, directly or indirectly, by himself or any employer, partner, clerk, agent, or servant, be entitled to derive any profit from any transaction arising out of the bankruptcy, or to receive out of the estate any payment for services rendered by him in connection with the administration of the estate, or for any goods supplied by him to the trustee for or on account of the estate. If it appears to the Board of Trade that any profit or payment has been made contrary to the provisions of this rule, they may disallow such payment or recover such profit, as the case may be, on the audit of the trustee's account."

Cooper Willis, Q.C., and Æneas Mackintosh, for the appellant.—The whole of the profits on the bill should be struck out, and no allowance made towards office expenses.

H. Reid, Q.C., and Muir Mackenzie, for the trustee.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—I, think notwithstanding the great experience, knowledge, and talent of the learned judge of the court below, that in this case he has done two things with which I for one cannot agree. The sanction of the court mentioned in rule 317 was not obtained. The learned judge has said when the case came before him after the whole transaction was closed, that he could then give the sanction of the court. I am of opinion that upon the true construction of the rule 317 he could not do it then, but that the sanction must be given before the things are done which are in question. The words of the rule are "except under and with the sanction of the court." Now if these particular moneys in question are profits at all, they are not profits which were earned under the sanction of the court. I think, therefore, that from beginning to end this must be taken to have been done without the sanction of the court, and the learned judge could not give that sanction on the hearing.

Then the second point is this. The rule says that no member of a committee of inspection shall directly or indirectly derive any profit. Now this applies to Mr. Williams. Messrs. Ashurst & Co., in my opinion, made a mistake in employing Mr. Williams.

The learned judge has, and I have not the least doubt perfectly rightly, held that they never intended to do anything wrong, and I will take that as being so. Therefore there is no blemish whatever upon their personal character or honour. But they have made a mistake in employing Mr. Williams to act for them whilst he was a member of the committee of inspection, without having previously obtained the sanction of the court to do so. Now comes the question whether Mr. Williams can be paid by Messrs. Ashurst & Co., or by anybody, more than his disbursements out of pocket. Can he make any profit? The learned judge held, and I think rightly, that he could not make any profit. But Mr. Williams after having been paid all disbursements and also the rest of his charges in his bill of costs, says that those charges are not all profit. It is said he keeps an expensive office with many clerks, and that a proportionate part of such expense must be deducted, and that what remains is the only profit he makes. In my opinion that is a most dangerous view to take. I think that a solicitor's profits are what he gets on his bill of costs beyond his disbursements out of pocket. Those are his profits. Therefore, what ought to have been taken off here, in the case of Mr. Williams, was not the £40, but it was the £40 and the £75. Therefore, what the master did in taxing those costs was right. We think, therefore, that this appeal must be allowed.

I wish to say that this case seems to me to raise even a larger question than that which has been brought before us. Messrs. Ashurst & Co. (I say again, without any wrong intention), did accept a retainer from a committee of inspection, one member of which was their own clerk. In my opinion that is not good practice, and I think they made a mistake in doing so. I think if one of their own clerks was on the committee of inspection they at least ought to have got the sanction of the court before they accepted the retainer at all. In my opinion, if a solicitor accepts a retainer when a member of the committee of inspection is in the same relation to him as one of the committee here was, and an application be made to the Court of Bankruptcy immediately to set aside that retainer and disallow it, the inherent power of the court ought to be exercised in setting it aside.

LOPES, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The true construction of rule 317 is a matter of importance. I understand that rule to mean that the sanction of the court must be obtained before the work in question is done, and that it cannot be obtained afterwards. The sanction of the court is a condition precedent to the right to do the work. In this case Messrs. Ashurst & Co. employed Mr. Williams, an independent solicitor, as their agent, and we are told that he had special knowledge of the matters in respect of which he was engaged. That is where Messrs. Ashurst & Co. made a mistake (I am confident it was only a mistake), for they employed Mr. Williams while he was a member of the committee of inspection without the sanction of the court. Rule 317 would, therefore, apply, and Mr. Williams, under the exigencies of that rule, would not be entitled to derive any profit from any transactions arising out of the bankruptcy. All his out-of-pocket disbursements have been paid.

Then the question arose whether he was entitled to have a further sum of £115, which he claimed. On that point the learned judge came to the conclusion that he was entitled to the whole of that sum except £40. He thought that £40 represented the profit arising out of the transaction, and he attributed the rest, £75, to a proportionate part of the outgoings connected with the office at Brighton. I have very great difficulty in seeing how he arrived at that conclusion. As far as I can see, the outgoings of the office were in noways increased by anything that was done in connection with this bankruptcy, and it cannot possibly be said that he would be entitled to deduct anything for outgoings of the office. All that he really was entitled to was his out-of-pocket expenses. Everything else must be regarded as profit.

In the result, therefore, I come to the conclusion that the learned judge was wrong in only deducting the £40. I think he ought to have deducted the £40, plus the £75. This appeal, therefore, must be allowed.

KAY, L.J.—The duties of a committee of inspection in bankruptcy are obvious. They have to watch the administration of that bankruptcy, and to control, to any extent they think right, what is done by the trustee in bankruptcy, by the solicitor, or anyone else concerned in administering the estate.

Rule 317 provides absolutely that no member of the committee shall, except under and with the sanction of the court, derive any profit from any transaction arising out of the bankruptcy. The words are very clear. He is not to derive any profit "except under and with the sanction of the court." That must mean at the time when the profit is derived or made. To say that the court can, afterwards, when the work has been done, say: "We sanction what has been done, although you did not choose to ask the court for its sanction beforehand," seems to me entirely contrary to both the letter and spirit of the rule. The sanction of the court ought to be obtained before the person who requires that sanction does any work which would, if it were paid for, be profitable to him. Mr. Williams, who is a member of this committee, did not apply for that sanction beforehand. He was a solicitor, and Messrs. Ashurst & Co., being employed as the solicitors for the trustee, arranged with him that he should act as their agent at Brighton, and he has been paid for acting as such agent.

Then comes the other question that arises in this case. That Mr. Williams should receive any profit at all is entirely contrary to the rule. He put himself in a position in which his duty to keep down the expenses of the administration within reasonable limits was entirely in conflict with his interest, which was to raise the expenses so as to make his profits, as agent, as large as he could. That is the very mischief which this rule was intended to prevent.

It is said that what the learned judge has done is not to allow Mr. Williams any profit. Now, how is that? All his disbursements out of pocket, have been allowed, but it is said that the rest of his charges are not all profits, because he has a large office at Brighton and employs many clerks; and in making up his yearly profits he is accustomed to attribute to each piece of work done in the office a certain proportion of those office expenses, and only the remainder is profit. Therefore he asks, in this case, that a proper proportion of those office expenses should be attributed to the sum that he received from the trustee, and that only the balance should be treated as profit. This is the first time I ever heard it argued that the profit cost of a solicitor should be ascertained in that way.

The object of rule 317, as I have already pointed out, is to prevent a member of the committee of inspection being placed in a position in which his interest and his duty would conflict. He would be paying part of his office expenses which would be just the same whether he did this business or not, out of what are ordinarily called profit costs, and to that extent, therefore, his interest would be in direct conflict with his duty, which is to keep down the costs as much as he can.

I think this case comes entirely within the mischief of the rule as regards those costs which the learned judge has allowed. They were "profit," and I think the judge has no discretion under the rule to allow them. The rule is imperative, and ought to be supported in its entirety. The £75 which the learned judge has allowed was, with deference to him, I think, improperly allowed, and ought to be struck out from the allowance made to the trustee in bankruptcy, who has paid that sum to Mr. Williams.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitors, H. Sowton, for J. C. Buckwell, Brighton; Ashurst, Morris, Crisp, & Co.

High Court of Justice.

Chan. Div. }
Chitty, J. } Nov. 29.

VAWDREY v. SIMPSON. (a.)

Partnership—Arbitration clause—Action for dissolution—Application to stay — Jurisdiction — Arbitration Act, 1889 (52 & 53 Vict. c. 49), s. 4.

Where articles of partnership contain an arbitration clause providing in effect for the reference of all matters in difference between the parties, such a clause covers a claim for dissolution of the partnership, and the arbitrators can, if they think fit, award a dissolution.

Where, therefore, in such a case, an action is brought by one of the partners for dissolution of the partnership, the judge may, in the exercise of his judicial discretion, order a stay under section 4 of the Arbitration Act, 1889.

Walmsley v. White, 40 W. R. 675, followed.

Motion.

This was a motion on behalf of the defendant, that all matters in difference in the above action, which was for dissolution of the partnership between the plaintiff and defendant, as surgeons and physicians, might be referred to arbitration, pursuant to the Arbitration Act, 1889, and in accordance with the partnership agreement.

By such agreement the partnership was to run as from July, 1892, during the joint lives of the partners, unless previously determined under the provisions thereof, and it was provided that if any dispute, misconception or misconstruction should arise between the partners touching the terms, stipulations, and conditions of the agreement, or the construction thereof, or any matters in any way connected with the agreement, or the operation thereof, or the rights, duties, or liabilities of either partner in connection therewith, the matters in difference should be referred to arbitration under the provisions of the Arbitration Act, 1889.

It was alleged that the defendant had absented himself from his practice for long periods at a time, had engaged assistants without the plaintiff's assent, and had in divers other ways acted in breach of the partnership articles, and contrary to the proper conduct of the professional business of the partnership.

Butcher, for the applicant.—This is a proper case for the court in the exercise of its discretion to order a stay of proceedings under section 4 of the Arbitration Act, 1889, notwithstanding that the action is for dissolution of the partnership: Walmsley v. White, 40 W. R. 675; Russell v. Russell, 14 Ch. D. 471, 28 W. R. Dig. 154.

Macaskie, for the plaintiff.—Arbitrators have no power to award a dissolution. At any rate the court is the proper tribunal for the purpose: Joplin v. Postlethwaite, 61 L. T. N. S. 629, 38 W. R. Dig. 10; Turnell v. Sanderson, 64 L. T. N. S. 654, 39 W. R. Dig. 145.

Butcher, replied. The case of Belfield v. Bourne, 42 W. R. 189, [1894] 1 Ch. 521, and p. 163 of the Ann. Practice for 1896 were also referred to.

CHITTY, J.—Walmesley v. White has settled the question whether arbitrators can award a dissolution of partnership. In that case, which was an action for dissolution, the judge ordered a stay under section 4 of the Arbitration Act, 1889, and the Court of Appeal declined to alter his order. I, therefore, regard it as unnecessary to travel back over earlier authorities. In Joplin v. Postlethwaite, the judge having a discretion, to be exercised judicially on the ordinary principles, and having exercised his discretion, the Court of Appeal declined to interfere. Kay, J., in that case, did, I think, mainly decide on the circumstance that dissolution was asked for.

(a.) Reported by J. F. WALEY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The language of section 4 is very wide, embracing any legal proceedings between any parties to the submission "in respect of any matter agreed to be referred," and the judge, if satisfied that there is no sufficient reason why the matter should not be referred may make the order to stay. The submission here is large enough to include dissolution. That is not denied at the bar. The burden of showing that the action should go on is, therefore, thrown on the party who sues. There is no charge here of fraud or misappropriation, or any criminal offence that ought to be tried in public. There is nothing in dispute requiring a judge's experience and knowledge of law. I see no reason why an arbitrator should not dispose of the matter with justice, and I, therefore, order a stay of the proceedings.

Application allowed.

Solicitors, Gustavus Thompson & Sons, for Eve & Clinton, Aldershot; T. Blanco White.

Chan. Div. } Nov. 18.
North, J. }

CHOLDITCH v. JONES. (a.)

Solicitor — Costs — Conducting sale — Solicitors' Remuneration Act, 1881.

A solicitor who pays the auctioneer's fees on a sale by auction may be entitled to the scale fee for conducting the sale. Where the auctioneer's fees are paid by the purchaser, the solicitor of the vendor is not entitled to a scale fee.

The conducting fee must be arrived at by adding together the value of the lots sold and the reserve price of the unsold lots, and not by making a minimum charge of £5 in respect of each lot.

Summons to review taxation.

At a sale by auction four lots were put up for sale by order of the mortgagees, and three lots were sold for £12 10s., £80, and £320 respectively, the reserve price of £500 for the other lot not being reached. Messrs. Wintle & Sons, the solicitors of the mortgagees, claimed £11 5s. for deducing title, and £20 scale fees for conducting the sale, being a minimum charge of £5 in respect of each sale made and in respect of the lot unsold. The scale fees for conducting the sale were disallowed by the taxing master, but he allowed a quantum meruit, as he held that Rule 11, Schedule I., Part I., of the rules under the Solicitors' Remuneration Act, applied.

The conditions of sale provided that the respective purchasers should pay the auctioneer's fee of £1 1s. in respect of the first two lots, £5 5s. in respect of the third lot, and £3 3s. in respect of the fourth lot. The taxing master, however, held that the vendor had paid a commission within the meaning of the rule.

Norton, for Messrs. Wintle & Sons—We are entitled to the scale fee, for commission was paid by the purchaser and not by the vendor. And in respect of the unsold lot we must be entitled to be paid for conducting the sale, and can get payment in no other way.

He cited the cases referred to in the judgment.

The respondents did not appear.

NORTH, J., said that the taxing master disallowed the £20 for conducting fees, but allowed £3 3s. to the solicitors as a quantum meruit for what they had done, and it was not disputed that that sum was sufficient, unless the scale fee was payable. But, even if the scale fee applied, the charge of £20 for conducting fees was excessive. The proper mode of ascertaining the conducting fee would have been to add together the purchase-money of the three lots sold, making £412 10s., the scale percentage on which would, having regard to rule 7, have been £4 10s., and to add also the scale percentage of £2 15s. on the reserve price of the unsold lot. That would have brought the conducting fee up to £7 5s. instead of £20, and as that sum was more than £5 no question as to a minimum charge would have arisen. To treat the sale of each lot as a separate sale, and charge a separate minimum fee in each case, was wholly unjustifiable, and not authorized by the rules or in accordance with the decision in In re Onward Building Society, 41 W. R. 107, [1893] 1 Q. B. 16. I do not agree with the taxing master, however, that it was necessary for a solicitor to do all the work. The rule seems to recognize a case where the scale fee was applicable, although commission was paid to an auctioneer, provided that the client did not pay such commission. In re Faulkner, 36 W. R. 59, 36 Ch. D. 566; In re Peace and Ellis, 36 W. R. 61; and Drielsma v. Manifold, 42 W. R. 578, [1894] 3 Ch. 100, show this.

The second ground, however, taken by the taxing-master was that the scale could not be resorted to because the auctioneer's commission was paid by the client. That was a question of fact, and I agree with the taxing master. No doubt the client was not directly charged with such commission, but if the burden ultimately fell upon him it was paid by him within the meaning of the rule. In my opinion a vendor's solicitor at a sale by auction who did not himself do the auctioneer's work, or pay the fees of the person who did it, could not justify the charge of the scale fee for conducting. To justify such a charge the auctioneer's commission must not be paid by the client either in meal or malt, the burden must not fall upon him either directly or indirectly. The taxing master had said that such cases were not uncommon; but they appeared to fall within the letter as well as the spirit of the rule, which could not be evaded by the device of inserting a condition of sale throwing the auctioneer's remuneration upon the purchaser. Where that was done, the scale conducting fee could not be charged.

Summons dismissed without costs, as no one appeared upon the other side. Applicants ordered to pay their own costs, and not to add them to their security.

Solicitors, Field, Roscoe, & Co.

Chan. Div. } July 26.
North, J. }

LORD BATTERSEA v. COMMISSIONERS OF SEWERS FOR THE CITY OF LONDON. (a.) Light—Ancient lights—Prescription Act (2 & 3 Will. 4, c. 71), ss. 3, 4—Interruption.

An action cannot be brought in respect of a prescriptive right to light unless the access and use of the light has, at the time of action brought, been actually enjoyed for the full period of twenty years without interruption; the fact that, by reason of enjoyment of access of light for more than nineteen, but under twenty years, effectual interruption has become impossible before the completion of the full period, does not make any difference.

(a.) Reported by G. B. HAMILTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

(a.) Reported by G. B. HAMILTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

At the beginning of 1875 the plaintiff occupied, for a long term of years, a building known as Weaver's Hall, in Basinghall-street, in the City of London, and the defendants were the owners of the houses, Nos. 72, 73, 74, and 75, Basinghall-street, which were about forty-five feet high, and opposite Weavers' Hall. No. 75 was pulled down in June, and Nos. 72, 73, and 74 in October, 1875.

The plaintiff, hearing that the defendant intended to erect buildings of the height of over sixty feet on the site of the houses pulled down in 1875, brought this action on the 16th of July, 1895, and moved for an interlocutory injunction to restrain the defendant erecting buildings so as to interfere with his ancient lights.

The defendant admitted (apparently) the plaintiff's right of action as to No. 75, and consequently, neither the arguments nor the judgment dealt with that house.

S. Eady, Q.C., and J. G. Wood, for the plaintiff.—As regards Nos. 72, 73, and 74, the plaintiff admits that they have been pulled down only nineteen years and nine months, but the plaintiffs' building is an old building, and has enjoyed access and use of light for the full period within the meaning of the statute—i.e., twenty years less a fraction of a year—which is immaterial. Section 4 of the Prescription Act ought to be read with section 3, and shows that an interruption is immaterial unless it continues for the space of a year. The point did not arise in Flight v. Thomas, 8 Cl. & F. 231, because there twenty years had expired before the action was commenced. [NORTH, J., referred to The Governors of Bridewell Hospital v. Ward, Lock, Bowden & Co., 68 L. T. N. S. 212, 41 W. R. Dig. 118.] The rule laid down in that case is inconvenient; the result of following it would be that the plaintiff would be delayed three months in bringing his action.

S. Hall, Q.C., and J. Henderson, for the defendants.—The right claimed by the plaintiff is only inchoate, and the court will not interfere to protect it by granting an injunction until the full period of twenty years has elapsed.

They cited The Governors of Bridewell Hospital v. Ward, Lock, Bowden, & Co., 68 L. T. N. S. 212, 62 L. J. Ch. 270, 41 W. R. 118, and Glover v. Coleman, 23 W. R. 163, L. R. 10 C. P. 108.

S. Eady, Q.C., replied.

NORTH, J.—The action is to interfere with the interruption of the access of light and air as enjoyed for twenty years past. The question is whether it has been so enjoyed. I think, under the third section of the Act, that an action cannot be brought in respect of a prescriptive right to light unless the access and use of the light has been actually enjoyed therewith for the full period of twenty years without interruption, and in that case the right is to be deemed absolute and indefeasible. The phrase is "without interruption," and the subsequent section, section 4, goes on to say what "interruption" means. That section, to my mind, strongly bears out on this point what section 3 says, because it enacts that the period of twenty years is to be "next before the suit or action wherein the claim to which such period may relate shall be brought into question; and that no act shall be deemed to be an interruption within the meaning of this statute unless the same shall be submitted to or acquiesced in, for one year." What I am asked to do now is to say that it is quite sufficient that the twenty years shall be calculated not twenty years before action, but nineteen years and rather more before, and the rest during the continuance of the action. It seems to me that that is directly contrary to the meaning of the two sections. I think, therefore, that the action can only be brought after the period of twenty years has elapsed. That view has been taken by Kekewich, J. (Bridewell Hospital v. Ward & Co.), and I know of no case which is in any way at variance with it; and although, no doubt, it does not follow that, because he refused to grant an interlocutory injunction I should necessarily do so too, yet the reason he gives seems to me to be the right reason, and, therefore, I must act upon that view. [His lordship then considered the evidence, and said that he came to the conclusion that the defendants ought not to be allowed to carry up the new buildings, on the site of Nos. 72, 73, and 74, to a greater height than that of the buildings existing on those sites in October, 1875, and then pulled down. He accordingly granted an interlocutory injunction to restrain the defendants so building.]

Solicitors, Flower, Nussey, & Fellowes; E. A. Baylis.

Chan. Div.
Kekewich, J. } Aug. 2, 1895.

In re WRIGHT.
KIRKE v. NORTH. (a.)

Practice—Payment into court—Trust money—Admission of misapplication by trustee—Motion by some plaintiffs only—Discretion of court as to order—R. S. C., 1883, ord. 32, r. 6.

An application under R. S. C., 1883, ord. 32, r. 6, for an order on admissions of fact by a defendant in an action cannot be made on behalf of some only of the plaintiffs.

There is a judicial discretion as to the making of an order upon a trustee to pay into court trust money which he admits having received and wrongfully applied.

This was an action brought by Marian Kirke and her children, as beneficiaries under her marriage settlement, against a trustee, and the executor of a deceased trustee of such settlement, to recover from the estates of the trustees the amount of a trust fund which they alleged had been misapplied by the trustees. The executor defendant, in his statement of defence, alleged that the application of the fund complained of had been made with the consent of the plaintiff, Marian Kirke, and her husband, and that the fund was represented by certain property, of which she was in possession. The said defendant had also expressly admitted the liability of the testator's estate to make good the said fund in a statement of claim delivered by him in a pending action, in which he claimed to have the amount of such fund raised out of the property of which Marian Kirke was in possession, as aforesaid, and to have her life interest under the settlement impounded, to make good any payment to be made out of the testator's estate.

This was a motion by the plaintiffs, other than Marian Kirke, that the executor defendant might be ordered to pay into court, to the credit of the present action, the amount of the said fund.

(a.) Reported by C. C. HENSLEY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

A preliminary objection was taken on behalf of the defendant, that the application was not made by all the plaintiffs.

Renshaw, Q.C., and Hadley, for the defendant.—No step in an action can be taken by some of the plaintiffs only: Brown v. Sawer, 3 Beav. 598; Butlin v. Arnold, 12 W. R. 571, 1 H. & M. 715.

Marten, Q.C., and Boome, for the applicants.—The practice has been altered. By R. S. C., 1883, ord. 32, r. 6, "Any party may, at any stage of a cause or matter, where admissions of fact have been made, . . . apply to the court or judge for such judgment or order as, upon such admissions, he may be entitled to. . . ." This is an application on admissions of fact. The plaintiff, Marian Kirke, consents to the application, and if it is necessary to join her as an applicant, we ask for leave to do so.

Kekewich, J.—To my mind there can be no doubt that, by the former practice, an application such as this in an action could only be made with the concurrence of all the plaintiffs or defendants. It is argued, on behalf of the applicants, that by ord. 32, r. 6, an application for an order, on admissions of fact by a defendant, may now be made for some only of the plaintiffs. The expression "any party" in the rule, is alleged to mean any single plaintiff or defendant. That expression, however, must be read along with the context, and taking the rule as a whole, I think the words cannot be so construed, but must be held to signify all the plaintiffs or all the defendants together. I give the applicants leave, however, to amend their notice of motion, by joining Marian Kirke as an applicant.

The notice of motion having been duly amended, the motion then came on to be heard upon its merits.

Marten, Q.C., and Boome, for the applicants.—The defendant, having admitted liability, should be ordered to pay the money into court: Neville v. Matthewman, 42 W. R. 675, [1894] 3 Ch. 345; Collis v. Collis, 2 Sim. 365; Rothwell v. Rothwell, 2 Sim. & St. 217.

Renshaw, Q.C., and Hadley, for the defendant.—Money will not be ordered to be paid into court by trustees unless actually in their hands: Nutter v. Holland, 43 W. R. 18, [1894] 3 Ch. 408.

Kekewich, J.—It is contended on behalf of the applicants that when an executor or trustee admits that he has received trust moneys he may be ordered to pay them into court. As I understand the authorities, however, the order is not a matter of right. There is a judicial discretion, as I think it is only right there should be. The order is so framed that if it is not obeyed an attachment may be moved for. That is a serious consequence which the court ought not to disregard. I am satisfied that the court has a discretion.

It is not alleged that the defendant is not doing his duty. What he says is that, as an executor he prefers to manage his testator's estate in his own way, and not to pay into court a sum which will diminish that estate. I think I should not now order the money to be paid in.

The motion must fail; but the costs will be reserved.

Solicitors for the applicants, Swann & Co., for Tweed & Son, Horncastle.

Solicitors for the defendant, Oldman, Clabburn, & Co., for Willders & Son, Holbeach.

Chan. Div.
Romer, J.

Nov. 19.

Assets Realization Co. (Limited) v. Trustees, Executors, and Securities Insurance Corporation (Limited). (a.)

Trustee—Company undertaking the business of trustee—Remuneration—Increased Remuneration—Credit of company.

When a company which makes it its business to undertake trusts demands, in view of increased responsibilities, increased remuneration, such a demand, especially if not persisted in, is not such a breach of trust as to justify its removal from the position of trustee.

Also the mere fact of the credit of such company being impaired will not justify its removal if it cannot be shown that the interest of the cestui que trust has suffered or is likely to suffer thereby.

Trial of action.

This was an action in which the Assets Realization Co. (Limited), suing on behalf of themselves and all others, the holders of an issue of £400,000 Mortgage Debentures of the Chicago Breweries (Limited) (except such of them as were defendants) were plaintiffs, and the Trustees, Executors, and Securities Corporation (Limited), the Chicago Breweries Co. (Limited), and the Debenture Corporation (Limited) were defendants.

The object of the action was to remove the Trustees, Executors, and Securities Co. from their position of trustees under a certain trust deed.

Only the Trustees, Executors, and Securities Corporation (Limited) appeared as defendants.

The facts of the case were as follows:—

The plaintiff company were the holders of 200 mortgage debentures under the seal of the defendants the Chicago Breweries (Limited), each securing the sum of £100 and forming part of an issue of £400,000 Mortgage Debentures.

By each of these debentures it was declared that the debenture-holders were entitled to the benefits and subject to the provisions of a trust deed dated the 6th of June, 1889, made between the Chicago Breweries (Limited), of the one part, and the Trustees, Executors, and Securities Insurance Corporation (Limited), of the other part.

Under this deed the Chicago Breweries conveyed to the Trustees, Executors, and Securities Insurance Co., who made it a large part of their business to undertake such trusts, all their real and personal property and undertaking, upon trust, to permit the Chicago Breweries to enjoy the premises, until the security created by the trust deed should become enforceable, and thereafter to stand possessed of the same upon trust for sale on the trusts therein declared for the debenture-holders and the Chicago Breweries.

It was provided that the Trustees Co. should receive by way of remuneration £200 per annum. It was also provided that the right of appointing a new trustee should be vested in the debenture-holders in general meeting.

With the exception of a few trifling assets, the property of the Chicago Breweries consisted of the shares of two companies incorporated according to the laws of the United States.

In the year 1893 the Chicago Breweries represented to the Trustees Corporation that it was desirable that the American companies should be amalgamated and a supplemental deed was prepared to effect this purpose. The Trustees Corporation, however, refused to execute this deed except on condition that their remuneration should be increased by £50 a year. A meeting of the debenture-holders was summoned, but before the meeting was held the demand was withdrawn. The meeting in question was, however, held, and resolutions were passed calling upon the Trustees Corporation to retire, and appointing the Debenture Corporation trustees in their place. At the time of the holding of this meeting two petitions were pending for the winding up of the Trustees Corporation, but these petitions were subsequently withdrawn. The plaintiffs, however, affirmed in their statement of claim that the condition and standing of the Trustees Corporation had been seriously affected by the said petitions. Nothing, however, was said by them on this subject until shortly before the commencement of this action, and there was no evidence that the value of the plaintiffs' security had been diminished thereby.

(a.) Reported by J. Arthur Price, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

As the Trustees Corporation refused to retire from the trust, the plaintiffs, who represented a very large majority, but not the whole of the debenture-holders, commenced the present action.

Eve, Q.C., and Clauson, for the plaintiffs.—The conduct of the defendants in demanding an increased remuneration, a demand that was persisted in for some time before it was withdrawn, was a breach of trust. It must also be remembered that at the time when the debenture-holders passed the resolution in question, the defendants, from a financial point of view, were practically in extremis. It is important for the sake of the shares in which the plaintiffs are interested that their trustees' position should be above suspicion.

Swinfen Eady, Q.C., and Macnaghten, for the defendants, the Trustees, &c., Corporation.—The correspondence makes it clear that the objections raised to the defendants for the purpose of removing the defendants from their position of trustees was a mere after-thought on the plaintiffs' part after the dispute had arisen as to the increase in remuneration. The action of the debenture-holders with regard to the defendants was ultrà vires. How could a cestui que trust vote to himself the power to remove his trustee? Even if it could be supposed that the debenture-holders had any such power, such power would have to be exercised by the whole number. A majority is not sufficient. Then as to the position of the defendant company. Whatever may have been the case, its condition is now satisfactory. The petitions have been withdrawn. No ground exists for removing our clients from their position of trustees.

Eve, Q.C., in reply.—Whatever powers the whole body of debenture-holders may possess, the same powers pertain to the majority. The demand for increased remuneration was only withdrawn after some months had elapsed. However good the defendants' position may now be in fact, their credit with the public has been shaken, and if they are allowed to continue in possession as trustees, the value of the plaintiffs' interest may be diminished.

ROMER, J.—The very large majority, but not all, of the debenture-holders in the Chicago Breweries (Limited) ask that the Trustees, Executors, and Securities Insurance Corporation (which I will hereafter call "the corporation") should be removed from its position as trustee for the debenture-holders. It is admitted that this is not in itself sufficient to entitle them to succeed in this action, and that to justify the court in ordering the removal of the corporation some further and sufficient ground must be established. I am bound to say that in my opinion no such sufficient ground has been made out. In the first place, it is to be noted that the corporation has throughout done its duty as trustee efficiently and well, and is, in my opinion, in a position to continue to perform its duties as trustee properly and efficiently. Then on what do the plaintiffs rely as entitling them to ask for the removal of the corporation? In the first place, they say, and this is their chief ground, that when an alteration was made in the trusts, which the corporation thought would throw additional responsibility on it as trustee, it ventured to ask for an increase on the remuneration to which it was already entitled for acting as trustee. But this was only a suggestion, and, under the circumstances, not an unnatural nor an improper one, and it was not insisted on, and I cannot see that it was an act which called for or justified the strong measures taken by the majority of the debenture-holders. Certainly, in my opinion, the court would not be justified in ordering the removal of the corporation on this ground.

The only other ground urged before me was that the commercial position or reputation of the corporation was such as to render it improper or inexpedient that the corporation should be allowed to continue to act as trustee. Now, undoubtedly the corporation was at one time in trouble and petitions to wind it up were presented. But it appears on the evidence that the corporation has surmounted such difficulties as were at one time in its way and is quite solvent and able to carry on its business efficiently. And, further, it appears to me that there never has been and is not now any real ground for supposing the existence from the position of the corporation of any danger or risk to the trust property (such as it is) or of any injury to the debenture-holders. A large part of the business of the corporation consists in carrying out trusts similar to the present, and such trusts have been and are very numerous and are carried out admirably by the corporation. It was suggested on behalf of the plaintiffs that the public or financial reputation of the corporation is not so high as it used to be, and that this in itself is an injury to the debenture-holders and likely to lower the price of the debentures. But seeing what the nature of the trusts to be performed by the corporation is, I do not believe that the price of the debentures has been lowered in the slightest degree by any falling off in the general reputation of the corporation, or so far as one can see is liable to be affected by the continuation of the corporation as trustee. And I cannot forget that the ground originally put forward and which led to proceedings being taken to try and remove the corporation from its position was the request for additional remuneration, and that the ground I am now considering was apparently an afterthought or at any rate not taken or put forward until shortly before this present action was brought. Under these circumstances, I think that the court would not be justified in ordering the removal of the corporation from its position, and I accordingly dismiss the action, with costs. I make no order as to the costs of the co-defendants.

Action dismissed.

Solicitors, Linklater & Co.; Slaughter & May.

Q. B. Div.
Commercial Causes.
(Mathew, J.)

Nov. 14, 18.

CHIPPENDALE AND OTHERS v. HOLT. (a.)

Insurance—Marine insurance—Policy of re-insurance—Construction of policy.

A policy of re-insurance, whereby the plaintiffs re-insured with the defendant, contained a clause that the re-insurance was to be "subject to the same conditions as the original policy, and to pay as may be paid thereon, but against the risk of total or constructive loss only."

Held, that, upon the construction of this clause, the defendant was only bound to pay to the plaintiffs when the plaintiffs were themselves liable to pay in respect of the loss re-insured, and that if the plaintiffs made a bonâ fide payment for a total loss, when there was no total loss, they could not recover from the defendant.

Action tried by Mathew, J., in the Commercial Court.

The facts and arguments are fully set out in the written judgment of the learned judge.

Joseph Walton, Q.C., and Scrutton, for the plaintiffs.

H. F. Boyd, for the defendant.

Cur. adv. vult.

Nov. 18.—MATHEW, J., read the following judgment:—

The action was brought upon a policy of re-insurance on the ship Ajimir. The original underwriters re-insured with the plaintiffs, who, in their turn, re-insured with the defendant by a policy which contained the following clause: "Being a re-insurance subject to the same clauses and conditions as the original policy and/or policies, and to pay as may be paid thereon, but against the risk of total and/or constructive total loss only."

The vessel stranded, and the owners gave notice of abandonment, and claimed that she was a constructive total loss. Their underwriters paid, and called upon the plaintiffs to indemnify them under their policy of re-insurance. The plaintiffs paid, but the defendant refused to admit his liability, on the ground that the vessel was not shown to be a constructive total loss. The plaintiffs insisted that, whether there was a total loss or not, the defendant was bound to pay as the plaintiffs had paid. It was stated to be of importance that the clause should be construed before the question of fact was tried, and it was agreed in chambers that the argument should proceed on the assumption, on the one hand, that there had been no constructive total loss, and on the other, that the payment of a total loss had been made by the plaintiffs in good faith.

Upon the argument the plaintiffs' counsel contended that the clause should be construed literally, and that the sole condition of the defendant's liability was that the plaintiffs had been satisfied that they were liable, and had made the payment in good faith. It was argued for the defendant that he was only bound to indemnify the plaintiffs against a loss for which the plaintiffs were liable on this policy. It was said for the plaintiffs that the possibility that a fraudulent use might be made of the plaintiffs' option to pay would not enter into the contemplation of either party, and that it was not unreasonable that the re-insurers should trust to the honour and sound judgment of those whose liabilities they had taken upon themselves. But the contention of the plaintiffs would involve this result, that the clause must be read as if it ran, "to pay such an amount as the insurers might choose to pay, whether liable or not." This seems to me altogether unreasonable. Such a contract would be a wager, and not re-insurance.

It was said that unless the interpretation contended for were put upon the clause no effect would be given to the final words, "to pay as may be paid thereon"; for the identity of obligation was differently provided for by the words "subject to the same clauses and conditions as the original policy." But those words, standing alone, would not be applicable to a re-insurance policy, and might give rise to difficulties of construction, while the final words show clearly what was meant. Further, it was suggested that the words might be applicable to cases where there was a foreign adjustment or a compromise in respect of an admitted liability. I see no ground for supposing that the form of the clause was meant to create a liability outside the limits of the original policy. The words "to pay as may be paid thereon" would seem to assume the existence of liability, proved or admitted, in respect of the loss re-insured.

I give judgment for the defendant.

Judgment for the defendant.

Solicitors for the plaintiffs, Waltons, Johnson, Bubb, & Whatton.

Solicitor for the defendant, C. E. Harvey.

(a.) Reported by Sir SHERSTON BAKER, Bart., Barrister-at-Law.

Q. B. Div.
(Lord Russell of Killowen, C.J., Grantham and Vaughan Williams, JJ.)

Nov. 12.

REG. v. JENNINGS AND ANOTHER (JUSTICES). Ex parte SYMONS. (a.)

Justices—Jurisdiction—Child charged with larceny—Charge dismissed—Industrial Schools Act, 1866 (29 & 30 Vict. c. 118), ss. 14, 15.

Where a child has been charged before the justices, and they dismissed the charge, but evidence had been given which, in their opinion, justified them sending the child to an industrial school, they have power to make such an order forthwith, and it is not necessary that the child should be brought before the court again on a fresh summons or warrant.

In this case a rule had been obtained for a certiorari to bring up an order of the justices of the Stonehouse Division of Devonshire, upon the ground that it ought to be quashed as having been made without jurisdiction.

The facts were these: A boy, apparently under the age of fourteen, was summoned before the justices, charged with the larceny of a boat.

The magistrates dismissed the charge, but, on the evidence, which was to the effect that the child was unmanageable at home, would not attend school, and was known to associate with reputed thieves and bad characters, they ordered that the child should be sent to an industrial school.

The mother objected, and obtained a rule against the magistrates to show cause why the order complained of should not be quashed on the ground that they had acted ultra vires.

E. U. Bullen, in support of the rule, contended that the magistrates had no jurisdiction to make such an order, which was, in fact, convicting the boy of a different offence from that stated in the information. The charge laid against the boy having been dismissed, a fresh summons or warrant ought to have been issued. By sending the boy to an industrial school, they, in effect, found him guilty of a different criminal offence, with which he was never charged. That had been repeatedly held to be illegal: Martin v. Pridgeon, 7 W. R. 412, 28 L. J. M. C. 179, and Reg. v. Brickhall, 12 W. R. 826, 33 L. J. M. C. 156. The justices ought not on their own initiative to proceed against the boy.

(a.) Reported by ERSKINE REID, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

He cited Stone's Justices of the Peace, 26th ed., p. 44; Reg. v. Moore, 52 J. P. 375; and Blake v. Beech, 1 Ex. D. 320, 25 W. R. Dig. 180.

Lord RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN, C.J.—The main point argued was that the boy, having been brought before the justices charged with larceny, the justices could not proceed to make the order they did unless the boy was brought up again charged with an offence under section 14 of the Industrial Schools Act, 1866, because the charge of larceny—the only charge in the indictment—had been dismissed by them. In my opinion that contention is an erroneous one. The Act was framed, not as a code of criminal procedure, nor ought it, as it has been urged, to be treated as punitive in its character. It is a benevolent Act intended for the protection of juvenile offenders. There are, moreover, alternative provisions in it which give the justices power to deal with any case, as if the child had been convicted of a criminal offence. When, therefore, a child is charged before them, and it is a case which, in their opinion, ought to be dealt with by them under sections 14 and 15 of the Act, and if the circumstances of the case are such as reasonably to bring it within either of those sections, then the justices can deal with the case under those sections, without requiring the child to be brought again before the court, by fresh summons or otherwise.

For these reasons the rule must be discharged.

GRANTHAM, J., and VAUGHAN WILLIAM, J., concurring.

The rule was accordingly discharged.

Solicitors, Law & Worssam, for Bond, Pearce, & Bickle, Plymouth.

Court of Appeal.

From Q. B. Div. (Lord Esher, M.R., and Lopes and Kay, L.JJ.) [and Q. B. Div.] — July 11, 1895; Nov. 7.

CAFFIN v. ALDRIDGE. (a.)

Admiralty—Charter-party—Cargo—Liberty to call at other ports—Deviation—Damage.

The defendant agreed to carry for the plaintiff in the defendant's ship "a cargo or estimated quantity of 470 quarters of wheat" from R. to G. The charter-party was headed, "Dead weight capacity 125 tons," and contained the usual clause excepting sea perils, and a clause giving the ship liberty to call at any ports. The 470 quarters of wheat weighed 102 tons. The defendant shipped other goods besides the wheat for delivery at P. After discharging these goods at P., and while proceeding to G., the plaintiff's wheat was injured.

Held, that the plaintiff had not hired the full carrying capacity of the ship, and that the defendant was at liberty to call at other ports for the purpose of loading and discharging other cargo; that in going to P. he had not deviated from the chartered voyage, and was, therefore, not liable for the injury to the wheat.

Appeal of the plaintiff from the judgment of Lord Russells of Killowen, C.J., at the trial of the action without a jury.

By a charter-party dated the 23rd of June, 1894, the plaintiff chartered the defendant's sailing barge, The Alice Little, to carry wheat from Rotherhithe to Gosport.

The charter-party was headed "Dead weight capacity 125 tons," and provided that the ship should "proceed to Groves & Sons' Platform Wharf, Rotherhithe, . . . and there load . . . a cargo or estimated quantity of 470 quarters wheat in sacks, and/or other lawful merchandise, . . . and being so loaded shall therewith proceed to Gosport (Royal Clarence-yard) . . . and there deliver the same . . . on being paid freight as follows:—1s. per quarter of 496 lbs. delivered. The ship has liberty to call at any ports in any order. . . ." The charter-party contained the usual clause excepting sea perils. The words "full and complete," which came immediately before the word "cargo," in the printed form of the charter-party had been struck out, and the words 470 quarters wheat in sacks" had been added in writing.

The Alice Little loaded at Rotherhithe 467 quarters wheat in sacks. The wheat weighed about 102 tons. The carrying capacity of the vessel was 125 tons. In addition to the wheat she took on board from another shipper about 10 tons of wire torpedo netting, which was to be delivered in Portsmouth Dockyard. The Alice Little, on arriving at Portsmouth, first delivered the wire netting in Portsmouth Dockyard; she was then proceeding to the Royal Clarence-yard, Gosport, when she ran into a pile and sprang a leak, whereby the plaintiff's wheat was damaged.

The plaintiff brought this action to recover damages for the injury sustained by the cargo of wheat, on the ground that the ship deviated from her chartered course, and that the wheat was damaged in the course of such deviation.

The amount of the damages was agreed.

Cohen, Q.C., and Scrutton, for the plaintiff.

Sir Walter Phillimore, Raikes, Q.C., and Butler Aspinall for the defendant.

Lord RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN, C.J., after stating the facts said: The question at issue is, was the proceeding of the vessel to Portsmouth Dockyard, and the delivery there of the wire netting a deviation? If it was, inasmuch as the loss occurred after that deviation had taken place, the authorities are clear that the defendant would be liable. The question depends upon the construction of the charter-party. In my judgment the statement at the top of the charter-party that the dead-weight capacity of the vessel was 125 tons, coupled with the statement that only 470 quarters of wheat, properly described as a cargo, were to be shipped, satisfies me that the true construction of the contract is, that it was not a hiring of the full capacity of the barge to the exclusion of other goods, but that it was really a shipment of the quantity named. I therefore think that it was contemplated that the owner of the barge might take on board other lawful merchandise if the character, destination, or manner of stowing such merchandise would not be inconsistent with the performance of the contract for the carriage of the plaintiff's wheat. Then it was argued that there was a deviation, because the charter-party provides that the wheat is to be carried from Rotherhithe to the Clarence-yard, Gosport, and that, it was said, involved the operation of the going with the cargo direct from Rotherhithe to Gosport. There is, however, a clause in this charter-party giving liberty to call at any ports in any order, and if I am right in saying that the owner of the sailing barge had, subject to the limitations I have mentioned, the right to put on board further cargo, then this clause supplements and gives effect to that right, and entitled the barge to call at any ports to discharge cargo.

(a.) Reported by F. O. ROBINSON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

I hold, therefore, what the defendant did was in accordance with the terms of the charter-party, and that there was no deviation. Judgment for the defendant. . . .

The plaintiff appealed.

Scrutton, in support of the appeal.—In construing this charter-party, the nature of the cargo must be taken into consideration. This was a cargo of wheat, and therefore very likely to suffer damage if other goods were taken on board. From this fact and from the use of the word "cargo" the conclusion to be drawn is that the plaintiff intended to hire the full carrying capacity of the ship: Borrowman v. Drayton, 25 W. R. 194, 2 Ex. D. 15; Glynn v. Margetson [1893] A. C. 381. There was no power to call at other ports for the purpose of loading or discharging cargo, and the defendant is liable for the damage which occurred during the deviation.

Raikes, Q.C., and Kilburn (Butler Aspinall with them), for the defendant, were not called upon.

LORD ESHER, M.R.—I am of opinion that the construction put upon this charter-party by the Lord Chief Justice was obviously right and cannot be questioned. We have been asked to construe it differently because some other charter-party, which was not in the same language, was construed differently in another case. We have to consider the meaning of this charter-party and of this one only. Now, the word "cargo" may mean the entire cargo carried by a ship, or it may mean only that which is to be carried for a particular shipper. In the present case it was agreed that 470 quarters of wheat were to be carried for the plaintiff. That may be called his cargo. But when the charter-party is looked at it is obvious that these 470 quarters of wheat did not constitute a full and complete cargo, particularly when one finds that the words "full and complete" were in the charter-party as printed and were then struck out. Mr. Scrutton argues that by a necessary implication we must put these words in again. I do not agree with that argument. I think that the Lord Chief Justice rightly construed this charter-party and I agree with his decision for the reasons which he has given.

LOPES, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I think the words "full and complete" were erased from the charter-party because it never was the intention of the parties, that the plaintiff's wheat should constitute a full and complete cargo, and it is quite clear that the cargo of wheat did not exhaust the full carrying capacity of the vessel. That is to my mind a very good reason why liberty was given to the vessel to call at other ports.

KAY, L.J.—The only question we have to consider in this case is the meaning of this charter-party. It is headed "Deadweight capacity 125 tons" and is for the carriage of 470 quarters of wheat in sacks from Rotherhithe to Gosport, and "there deliver the same on being paid freight as follows: 1s. per quarter of 496 lbs." A very simple arithmetical calculation shows that the wheat came to about 102 tons and, therefore, on the face of the charter-party it was at least doubtful whether that cargo exhausted the full carrying capacity of the ship. But when the charter-party is further looked at, it is quite plain that it did not do so, because there is a clause giving the ship "liberty to call at any ports." That must mean that the parties knowing that the ship was not full, therefore gave her liberty to call at other ports and obtain more cargo. The ship in proceeding to Portsmouth Dockyard was, in my opinion, only doing that which was within the powers conferred upon her owner by the charter-party. I therefore agree that this appeal must be dismissed.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitors for the plaintiff, J. & H. Farnfield.

Solicitors for the defendant, Farlow & Jackson.

From Q. B. Div.
Lord Esher, M.R., and Lopes and Kay, L.JJ. [and Q. B. D. (Mathew, J.)]

May 29, 1895; Nov. 7, 8.

ASFAR & CO. v. BLUNDELL AND OTHERS. (a.)

Ship—Freight—Damage to goods—Loss of merchantable character—Insurance—Profit on chartered freight—Warranted free from all average—Concealment of material fact.

The plaintiffs, who were merchants, chartered a ship, the freight being a lump sum of £3,900, upon the terms that all freight earned by the ship should be for the plaintiffs. They insured with the defendants, who were underwriters, "profit on charter for £2,000 . . . warranted free from all average." The ship took a cargo on board, in respect of which the bills of lading freights amounted to £4,690. While the ship was proceeding to the port of discharge she was run into by another vessel and sunk. The cargo was subsequently got up, and it was found that one part, consisting of dates, was so damaged as to be unmerchantable as dates. In consequence, no freight was earned on the dates, and the bills of lading freights actually received by the plaintiffs came to less than the chartered freight.

Held, that the subject-matter of the insurance was the anticipated profit on the charter; that there had been a total loss of the profit; and that the plaintiffs were entitled to recover from the defendants the difference between £3,900, the chartered freight, and £4,690, the total amount of the bills of lading freights.

At the time the insurance was effected the defendants were not told whether the chartered freight was a lump freight or a tonnage freight.

Held, that there had been no concealment of material facts by the plaintiffs, for the defendants knew that there was a charter-party in the usual form, and the plaintiffs were not bound to give information as to the freight unless the defendants asked for it.

Action tried without pleadings before Mathew, J., without a jury.

The plaintiffs were merchants at Bussorah, and they were the charterers of a ship called The Govino. The charter was for a lump sum of £3,900, and the ship was to go to ports of loading in the Persian Gulf and there take on board a general cargo and bring that cargo to London. The charterers anticipated in the employment of the vessel a profit upon the lump sum which they had agreed to pay the shipowners, and that profit they insured with the defendants, who were underwriters, in the sum of £2,000. In the slip and in the formal policy the subject-matter of the insurance was described as "£2,000 profit in charter . . . warranted free from all average."

(a.) Reported by F. O. ROBINSON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The total of the bills of lading freights amounted to £4,690, as against £3,900 lump freight payable by the plaintiffs under the charter, showing, in the event of the whole bills of lading freight being earned, a profit to the charterer of £790. When the insurance was effected the defendants did not know whether the chartered freight was a lump freight or a tonnage freight.

The ship took her cargo on board and sailed for the discharging dock in the Thames, but before she reached it, she come into collision with another vessel and was sunk and the cargo remained under water for three days. A large part of the cargo, about 700 tons, consisted of dates. When the vessel had been raised and taken into dock the dates were found to be saturated with sewage, and were in a state of fermentation and putrefaction and were unmerchantable as dates, and were condemned by the officer of health as being unfit for human food, but it was stated by the officer of health who was called as a witness, that a large quantity of the dates still retained the shape and outward appearance of dates.

The dates were sold for the purpose of distillation with spirit, and transhipped and exported.

The rest of the cargo was landed and delivered, and the total of the bills of lading freights realized thereon, amounted to less than the chartered freight of £3,900.

The plaintiffs brought this action as for a total loss of profit on the charter, claiming £2,000, as on a valued policy or in the alternative £790, being the difference between freight payable under the charter-party and the total amount of the bills of lading freights.

Joseph Walton, Q.C., for the plaintiffs.

Carver for the defendants.

Cur. adv. vult.

May 29.—MATHEW, J., after stating the facts, proceeded:—The first important question is one of fact, whether any freight was payable in respect of the dates. If freight was payable there was a profit on the charter-party; if it was not payable there was none; and whether freight was payable or not depends on the condition in which the dates were landed.

I am satisfied, from the evidence, that the goods did not arrive in specie within the true meaning of the expression, or in such a condition as to entitle the carriers to freight. In my opinion the dates were lost. They were not merchantable, or capable of being used as dates. They had become a mass of vegetable matter in a state of decomposition. Their nature had been wholly changed. The suggestion of the defendants that total destruction of the dates was necessary to disentitle the charterers to freight may derive some support from Cocking v. Fraser (reported in Park on Insurance, 8th ed., vol. 1, p. 247), but it is clearly not the law. The destruction of the merchantable character of the goods to the extent disclosed by the evidence is sufficient to take away the right to freight in accordance with the principle of the decisions in Dakin v. Oxley, 12 W. R. 557, 15 C. B. N. S. 646; Roux v. Salvador, 3 Bing. N. C. 266; and Duthie v. Hilton, 17 W. R. 55, L. R. 4 C. P. 138. I am, therefore, of opinion that the plaintiffs were not entitled to receive freight in respect of these dates.

The next point is this; the policy of insurance is described as a policy for "£2,000 on profit on charter" and it contains the clause "warranted free from all average." It was contended on behalf of the defendants that the policy was in reality a policy on freight, and that the subject-matter of the insurance was a part of the freight payable on the bills o lading, and, therefore, if, say, 50 per cent. of the goods were lost and 50 per cent. arrived, then as 50 per cent. of the bills of lading freight would be earned, there would only be a particular average loss on the policy, and the warranty "free from all average" would protect the underwriters. If that contention were correct the policy would be a protection only against the loss of the whole cargo and the whole freight. I do not think that was the intention of the parties. I am satisfied that what was intended to be the subject-matter of the insurance was the charterer's profit on the adventure, that is to say, the excess of the total bill of lading freights over and above the lump freight of £3,900, and the intention was that in the event of a total loss of that profit the assured would be entitled to recover.

Then, as to the amount which the plaintiffs are entitled to recover. It was contended for the plaintiffs that this was a valued policy, and that the interest was valued at £2,000. I am of opinion that this was not a valued policy, and that the plaintiffs are only entitled to recover £790, that being the actual amount of the profit in charter.

Finally it was argued that the policy was rendered void by reason of the concealment of a material fact—viz., that the charter was for a lump sum and was not at a tonnage rate. I am not satisfied that there was any concealment of any material fact. But even if there had been no disclosure, the point would be disposed of by reference to the principle that underwriters need not be given information as to matters concerning which they waive all enquiry. In this case if the defendants had wanted to know the provisions of the charter-party, they should have asked. In accordance with the judgments in Haywood v. Rodgers, 4 East., 590, and Inman Steamship Co. v. Bischoff, 31 W. R. 141, 7 App. Cas. 670, I hold that that contention fails. Judgment for plaintiffs for £790.

The defendants appealed.

Carver, in support of the appeal, contended first, that there had not been a total loss under the policy, because the dates though damaged, had not wholly lost their merchantable quality, and they still retained the shape and substance of dates: Duthie v. Hilton, Roux v. Salvador, Dakin v. Oxley, and Cocking v. Fraser (reported in Park on Insurance, 8th ed., vol. 1, p. 247). Secondly, even if freight was not payable upon the dates, they were protected by the warranty against average: Phillips on Insurance, s. 1,503: Hodgson v. Glover, 6 East. 316. Thirdly, the plaintiffs concealed from the underwriters a material fact—viz., that the charter was not at a tonnage rate but was for a lump sum: The Bedouin, 42 W. R. 299, [1894] P. 1; Haywood v. Rodgers; Tate v. Hyslop, 15 Q. B. D. 368, 34 W. R. Dig. 116; Mercantile Steamship Co. v. Tyser, 29 W. R. 790, 7 Q. B. D. 73.

Joseph Walton, Q.C., for the plaintiffs, was only heard upon the last point. He contended that there had been no concealment of a material fact. The charter-party was in the usual and customary form, and if the underwriters desired to know how the chartered freight was payable it was their duty to make enquiry. The charterer was not bound to volunteer information on such a point as that.

He referred to Inman Steamship Co. v. Bischoff.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—This is an action by an assured against underwriters. The latter have, as they are entitled to do, taken every possible point open to them in order to avoid paying the amount of the policy, and their case has been argued with great ingenuity.

The first point is that there has not been a total loss of the dates. It is said that, although these dates were under water for three days, and were, when brought up, in a state of pulp, fermented, and full of sewage, there has not been a change in their nature, and they are still dates. The test which has been applied in such cases for many years is whether the nature of the thing for the purposes of mercantile dealing has been altered. Damage does not necessarily alter the nature of goods. They may still remain the same thing, although damaged. But if their whole nature is altered, and they become a different article, so that no one would deal in them as an article of their original nature, and if in that state the goods are unmerchantable as between honest men of business, then there is a total loss. Mathew, J., has found as a fact in this case that the nature of these dates was so deteriorated that they had ceased to be dates, and were unmerchantable. That being so, they could not be delivered as dates to the consignee, and no freight became due in respect of them from the consignee to the charterer. Therefore, there was a total loss of the bill of lading freight upon the dates.

Now, what was the subject-matter of the insurance in this case? The plaintiffs had chartered a ship in such way that they were to have the whole carrying capacity of the ship, and for that they agreed to pay to the owners a certain lump sum by way of chartered freight. The plaintiffs intended to collect cargo and to give bills of lading in respect of it, and if they got more from the bills of lading freight than they had to pay for the chartered freight, the plaintiffs would make a profit from their use of the ship. That was their speculation. If, by reason of the perils of the sea, the plaintiffs were prevented from earning bills of lading freights to a greater amount than the chartered freight, then they would lose their profit. The chartered freight was not a tonnage freight but a lump freight, and the subject-matter of this insurance was the difference between that lump freight and the amount to be earned from the bills of lading freights; in other words, the profit which the plaintiffs anticipated from the use of the ship. The bills of lading freights upon the dates were lost, and so no profit was made, and the plaintiffs have, therefore, lost that which was the subject-matter of the insurance. Mr. Carver argued the case as if the subject-matter of the insurance had been the freight itself or the goods, and he contended that as there had not been a total loss of the freight or goods, the defendants were protected by the warranty against average. That was not the case with which he had to deal, and his argument did not apply to this case, which was an insurance of profit or the difference between two freights.

The third point was, that the plaintiffs when effecting the insurance concealed a material fact from the defendants. The rule applicable to concealment is well known, and is one about which I have no doubt whatever. The assured is bound to disclose to the insurer every material fact which is within his knowledge and not within the knowledge of the insurer. If he fails to do so, although there may be no fraud on his part, he is guilty of what in insurance law is called concealment. But it is not necessary for him to disclose minutely every material fact. It is enough if he discloses sufficient to call the attention of the underwriter to the matter, so that he can ask for more information if he requires it. In this case the plaintiffs disclosed the fact that they had entered into a charter-party, and that the subject-matter of the insurance was the difference between the two freights. But the plaintiffs did not say whether the chartered freight was a lump freight or a tonnage freight. As a matter of fact it was almost certain that the chartered freight must have been a lump freight, but the underwriters could have had immediate knowledge on the point by asking for further information. Therefore the plaintiffs made a sufficient disclosure of material facts to satisfy the rule, and I have not the slightest doubt that Mathew, J., was justified in holding that there had been a disclosure sufficient to enable the underwriters to ask for more information if they wanted it. The case does not, to my mind, raise any new points of law; it has to be determined on the well-known rules applicable to marine insurance. The appeal must be dismissed.

LOPES, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. With regard to the first point it is clear that after a submersion for three days the dates had completely lost their merchantable character. Then it was said that although there might have been a total loss of the freight on the dates, there was nevertheless a profit in the other parts of the cargo. In this connection it is important to consider what was the subject-matter of the insurance and I agree with Mathew, J., that it was the anticipated profit—i.e., the difference between the chartered freight and the bills of lading freights. If that is so, can it be said that, the profit having been entirely lost, the assured is not entitled to recover. I think not; I think that the decision of Mathew, J., on this point was right. Thirdly, it is said that the plaintiffs have concealed material facts because they did not tell the underwriters that the freight was a chartered freight and not a tonnage freight. I think the plaintiffs disclosed all that was necessary. No doubt their duty was to disclose every material fact within their knowledge, but it is not immaterial to recollect that it was highly probable that the chartered freight would be a lump sum. It cannot be denied that that is usually so in cases of this kind. The underwriters were distinctly informed as to the subject-matter of the insurance, and if that intimation was not sufficient they could have made any inquiries they deemed necessary.

KAY, L.J., after stating the facts, proceeded: It has been contended that there not a total loss of the dates; because, although the dates were saturated with sewage and were in a state of fermentation, and were unmerchantable as dates, yet the whole substance, the skin, stones, and whatever goes to make up a date, still remained. I agree that there was the substance of the dates still in existence, but I do not think that in order to render an article unmerchantable the law requires so great a change as has been suggested. I think Mathew, J., correctly stated the law on that point when he says that "the distruction of the merchantable character of the goods to the extent disclosed by the evidence is sufficient to take away the right to freight." The result was that the assured made no profit out of the bills of lading freights.

The argument on the second point turned on the clause in the policy "warranted free from all average," and it was said that admitting there was no profit on the dates, still there was a profit on the remainder of the cargo. But that argument omits to notice the subject-matter of the insurance, which was the difference between the lump freight and the total bills of lading freights, and that has been totally lost. On this point I also agree with Mathew, J., when he says that the intention was that in the event of a total loss of the profit, the assured should be entitled to recover.

I have had more difficulty in coming to a conclusion on the third point, which is, that there was a material concealment by the plaintiffs because they did not tell the underwriters that the charter-party was not at a tonnage rate but for a lump sum. It is beyond all question that that was a material fact, because if it was a tonnage rate the underwriters would not be liable in so large a sum. But the question is, was the fact concealed? I agree that concealment is something more than non-disclosure. It is the keeping something back which it is the duty of the assured to bring specifically to the notice of underwriters. Now was that the case with this charter-party? If a charter-party contains unusual clauses it would not be enough simply to state that there was a charter-party. The assured is bound to go further and to state that it was unusual. If he does not, the concealment of that fact will vitiate the policy. The charter-party in this case was of the common kind, there was nothing unusual in it, and the underwriters were told that the policy was in respect of profit on chartered freight. Adopting the principle laid down by Lords Blackburn and Watson in Inman Steamship Co. v. Bischoff and by Barnes, J., in The Bedouin, I come to the conclusion that the assured were not bound under the circumstances to tell the underwriters that the chartered freight was a lump sum. It was for the underwriters to ask for further information if they required it. I therefore think that in this case the underwriters have not brought the case within the particular doctrine; although the fact said to have been concealed was material, I think there was sufficient disclosure on the part of the assured by the reference to the charter-party, there being nothing unusual in its clauses.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the plaintiff, Ince, Colt, & Ince.

Solicitors for the defendants, Waltons, Johnson, Bubb, & Whatton.

From Chan. Div. (Lindley, Lopes, and Rigby, L.JJ.) Aug. 6, 7, 1895.

MIDLAND RAILWAY CO. v. GRIBBLE. (a.)

Railway company—Severed land—Communication by level crossing—Severance of ownership—Easement—Abandonment—Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845 (8 & 9 Vict. c. 20), s. 68.

A railway company in 1855 constructed their line through the lands of R., and made a level crossing between the severed parts. In 1885 R. sold the land on the one side to P., and reserved no right to cross the line himself, and gave P. no right to cross. In 1888 R. sold the land on the other side of the line to T., the predecessor in title of G. The railway company removed the gates and erected fences on their own land where the gates had been. G. claimed the right to use the level crossing, and removed the fences.

Held, that the conveyance of 1885 was a final abandonment by R. of his right to use the level crossing. The obligation on the railway company, by virtue of section 68 of the Railways Clauses Act, 1845, to maintain the accommodation work at all times, ceased when the ownership of the adjoining lands was severed, and was a duty which the company owed to the private individual as owner, and not a public duty.

Appeal from a decision of Wright, J., sitting as an additional judge of the Chancery Division.

The railway company in 1855 constructed their line through lands belonging to one Rainsford, and became bound under the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, to maintain communication between the severed parts.

A level crossing was agreed "to be made and for ever maintained by and at the expense of the company, their successors and assigns."

The accommodation work, in the nature of a level crossing, consisted of a gap in the hedge on either side of the line, with a protecting gate to each gap.

Section 68 of the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, enacts that "the company shall make and at all times thereafter maintain the following works for the accommodation of the owners and occupiers of lands adjoining the railway—that is to say, such convenient gates and passages over the railway as shall be necessary for the purpose of making good any interruption caused by the railway to the use of the lands through which the railway shall be made; and such works shall be made forthwith after the railway passing over such lands shall have been laid out or during the formation thereof."

In 1885 Rainsford put up for sale by auction in lots all his lands, and those on the west side of the railway were sold to one Plowman. No reference was made to the level crossing either in the contract for sale or in the conveyance.

In 1888 the lands on the east side of the railway were sold to one Thompson, through whom the defendant Gribble claimed.

In 1893 Plowman released to the railway company all his right to the use or maintenance of the level crossing in consideration of the company allowing him to make a siding, whereupon the railway company proceeded to remove the gates and erect fences on their own land where the gates had been. The defendant claimed a right to the level crossing, and removed the fences.

The railway company then brought their action to restrain the defendant from removing the fences and from trespassing on their line.

At the trial Wright, J., granted the injunction asked for, and gave nominal damages.

The defendant appealed.

Hopkinson, Q.C., and C. G. O. Bridgman, for the appellant.—There has been no abandonment of the right of way. Abandonment is purely a question of intention. The right is one for all purposes, subject to not interfering with the railway company and the accommodation works.

Birrell, Q.C., and Sargant, for the railway company.

LINDLEY, L.J.—This case has raised a point which is new—it has never arisen before that I know of; but I think it is not difficult, although it is new.

It is an appeal by the defendant from an order made by Wright, J., declaring that the defendant is not entitled now to any right of way over the level crossing in question—that is, over the railway—and has not any right to cause any obstruction; and granting an injunction to restrain the defendant from using that crossing. [His lordship considered the facts, read section 68 of the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, and continued:—] It is obvious that that is to be done for the accommodation of the person through whose lands the railway passes. Let us now consider the stress of the words "shall at all times maintain." That does not mean that they must maintain it at all times if he does not want it. Having asked for this accommodation and got it, he could, if he chose, release it, and if he chose to release it, there would be an end of the statutory obligation about its being at all times thereafter maintained. It is not a public duty; it is a duty to him privately, and, of course, to those claiming under him.

(a.) Reported by W. SHALLCROSS GODDARD, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Now the conveyance in 1885 of the land on one side of the railway to Plowman by Rainsford appears to me to be a clear and distinct abandonment of Rainsford's right of way over that railway. It was of no use to him any longer, and, having severed the land without any reservation of the right, there was an end of the right of way over the railway. It was an abandonment of his easement. It was perfectly competent to him to do so in point of law. It was not an abandonment for a month or a year, but a distinct final abandonment without any intention to reserve this right of way. To my mind, upon the conveyance to Mr. Plowman made at that time and under those circumstances without any express reservation, there was an end of the statutory right.

Now Wright, J., has put into this order words which in my opinion ought to be struck out, and it is our duty under sections 4 and 5 of the Act to make such order as we think the judge in the court below ought to have made. It appears to me he has, by overcaution, put into this judgment words which may perhaps give rise to some expectation or some hope on the part of the defendant, that he has still got, or may get, some right of way. I think in mercy to the defendant, and in justice to both parties, the order appealed from ought to be varied by striking out the word "now" in the declaration, and the whole of the clause stating that the injunction ought to be without prejudice. With that variation in the order, therefore, the appeal will be dismissed, and dismissed with costs.

LOPES, L.J.—I entirely agree. For what reason Mr. Gribble wants to preserve this passage or right of way I cannot understand. If he wants to have the privilege of walking backwards and forwards across the line he will do it at imminent risk from the trains passing by, and if he wants it for the purpose of going across to look over and see how the crops on the other side are growing, I can only say that that was not the object originally contemplated.

Now what is this passage-way? It is an accommodation work. It has its origin in that, and all the incidents of an accommodation work belong to it. It had its existence under the 68th section of the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act of 1845. What is an accommodation work of this kind? An accommodation work like this passage-way is a work necessary for the purpose of making good any interruption of lands by the railway, the lands on either side being in the occupation of the same owner. That accommodation work is made by the railway company for a special purpose, that special purpose being to maintain a communication between the lands of the same owner or occupier which have been intersected by the railway, and, in my judgment, directly that special purpose is at an end, and when, as Mr. Bridgman has admitted, it is practically impossible now to use it for that purpose, the accommodation being no longer required, the obligation to afford it also ceases.

I think the order ought to be varied as the Lord Justice has suggested, and that this appeal fails.

RIGBY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I do not mean to say that there could not be such a right as Mr. Bridgman has been insisting upon—a right to go over another man's piece of land which still exists, although it might be of no possible use to the grantee. Suppose, for instance, I want to get a right of way over two estates to a point on the land to which it is convenient for me to go. I can bargain with the man on one side for the right to go over his land, and he can grant it to me if he chooses free, but that is quite irrespective of the question of right to go over the other estate. If you get a right of way over the one estate, and merely that, and you cannot go any further without bargaining with the other owner, it is of no importance to you that you have that right now.

The question is whether there was a right here, and I am clear there was no longer a right to use this level crossing as an independent right. It was to be used as a crossing or as a passage simply, and it is clear that, if at any time before the severance they had used the passage-way, not for the purpose of crossing, but for the purpose, we will say, of carting goods there without the consent of the railway company, not crossing merely, and passing over the railway, that would have been a trespass. It is only when you go over for the purpose of crossing, in other words, for the purpose of passing over the railway to the land on the other side, that you have a right to go there at all; consequently there is no easement to grant, and no right under the Act to an accommodation work, except for the purpose of passing from one side of the line to the land on the other. When that is made, in point of law, an impossibility, all practical right to use the crossing or the passage at all, is gone.

Now in 1885 there was the conveyance to Mr. Plowman. Whether, because of its absolute uselessness—and, looking at the map, I should be disposed to think it was so, because the land on the other side has a perfectly good access to a good road—or from forgetfulness, I do not care which, at any rate there was then a deliberate act done, by which the whole of the land on the opposite side of the railway was sold without the reservation of any right over it, or the grant of any corresponding right to Mr. Plowman of passing over the railway to come on to this land. Now I consider that an absolute abandonment.

The law does not look to possibilities which have not been bargained for. No doubt the next day the man might have bought that land back again, or might do so at any future time—he has not done so in fact; but that would not have given him a new right of way. He had abandoned in 1885 what he got under the Act, under the award or under the conveyance, whatever it was, from the railway company, and he had no right from that moment to let a cart or horse go on the level crossing at all.

I think it would be impossible to raise from the release of 1893 any contention whatever with regard to that abandonment. Mr. Bridgman argued that this must obviously involve intention. That may be true or not; there may be an intention in a man's mind to do something which is inconsistent with his act, but if he does anything of that kind, his act and not his intention must govern the matter.

I quite agree with the variation in the order as suggested by Lindley, L.J., and the result will be that with that variation, the appeal is dismissed.

Order varied, and appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the appellant, Gosling, Ingleby, Royds, & Rawstorne.

Solicitors for the respondents, Beale & Co.

High Court of Justice.

Chan. Div.
Stirling, J. Aug. 6, 10, 1895.

FARNHAM v. MILWARD. (a.)

Lunatic—Action by committee—Subsequent bankruptcy of lunatic—Trustee in bankruptcy added as defendant—Application by trustee to stay proceedings granted—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 132—Lunacy Act, 1890 (53 Vict. c. 5), ss. 117, 120—R. S. C., 1883, ord. 16, r. 17.

A., the committee of B., a lunatic, commenced an action against C. B. was subsequently adjudicated a bankrupt, whereupon, at the instance of C., the writ was amended by adding B.'s trustee in bankruptcy as a defendant to the action. On an application by the trustee that the action might be stayed as against him on the ground that it was vexatious, Held, that the right of action vested in the trustee on the bankruptcy of the lunatic; that the trustee could not be added as a defendant to the action against his will; and that he was entitled to have the action stayed as against him.

This was a summons taken out by the defendant Norris, the trustee in bankruptcy of the plaintiff William Farnham, asking for a stay of proceedings as against him on the ground that they were vexatious.

The plaintiff W. Farnham was found a lunatic in 1893, and his wife Catherine Farnham was appointed committee of his property.

On the 7th of September, 1893, she commenced this action, in her own name and that of her husband, against the defendants Milward & Co., the confidential solicitors and agents of W. Farnham, for an account of all moneys passing through the hands of Milward & Co. for or on his account. The writ also asked for a receiver, damages, and costs. In due course the account was ordered to be taken, the order being made upon motion in November, 1893.

On the 19th of May, 1894, W. Farnham was adjudicated a bankrupt, and on the 26th of May following the defendant Norris was appointed his trustee in the bankruptcy. Nothing further was done in the action until the 23rd of April, 1895, when an order was made in chambers on a summons taken out by Milward & Co., whereby leave was given to amend the writ by adding Norris as a defendant in the action, and it was ordered that the taking of accounts should be proceeded with.

The writ was not finally amended until the 2nd of May; and on the 15th of June, 1895, Norris took out this summons. In the meantime, however, Norris had attended proceedings in chambers in connection with the taking of the account.

R. J. Parker, for the summons.—Your lordship made the order in chambers on the authority of In re Whatman, W. N., 1889, p. 213. In that case the official receiver allowed his name to be used. A bankrupt cannot proceed with an action when the cause of action has passed to his trustee: Jackson v. North-Eastern Railway Co., 25 W. R. 518, 5 Ch. D. 844; Warder v. Saunders, 10 Q. B. D. 114, 31 W. R. Dig. 154; Selig v. Lion, 39 W. R. 254, [1891] 1 Q. B. 513; Kellaway v. Bury, 66 L. T. N. S. 599, 40 W. R. Dig. 190; Rochfort v. Battersby, 2 H. L. Cas. 388.

Willis Bund, for the defendants.—The trustee was properly made a party to this action.

Hastings, Q.C., and Church, for the plaintiffs.—The trustee has already done so much in the action that he cannot now object, even if he is right on the cases, which, however, do not apply to the case of a lunatic plaintiff. The jurisdiction in lunacy is paramount to that in bankruptcy: In re Farnham, [1895] 2 Ch. 799. [STIRLING, J.—That case is different to the present one, for there the court refused to give up property in the custody of the court, on the ground that it might be required for the maintenance of the lunatic, whilst here, if the bankruptcy is valid, the trustee has a right to bring this action.] Possibly leave ought to be first obtained from the lunacy jurisdiction. The question is whether the inferior jurisdiction in bankruptcy can stay the proceedings already commenced in a paramount jurisdiction.

R. J. Parker, in reply.—There has been no delay sufficient to preclude relief. The case of In re Farnham does not apply here, as the property was in court, and the trustee coming to the judge in lunacy could only get it on terms. Here the trustee is not proceeding in lunacy or interfering with the jurisdiction thereof. He only asks your lordship for a stay of proceedings, and that a plaintiff who is bankrupt be not allowed to carry on an action and make his trustee in bankruptcy a party thereto.

Cur. adv. vult.

August 10.—STIRLING, J. [after stating the facts, continued:—] On the taking of accounts in chambers, Messrs. Millward & Co. raised the objection that they were liable to be sued both in this action and in the bankruptcy, and that, therefore, the trustee in bankruptcy should be made a party to the action. The trustee declined to prosecute the action and the matter came before me in chambers, when, acting on the authority of In re Whatman, I thought myself justified in allowing the amendment of the writ by making Mr. Norris a defendant.

I am perfectly satisfied I was wrong in giving that leave. In truth I misread the account of the case given in the Weekly Notes. I think I ought to have inferred from that report, which, however, is not very clear, that the order made in that case did not authorize proceedings such as I was asked to permit in the present case. Having since seen the registrar's book I am satisfied that, in fact, no such order was made. But for the authority of that case, which I thought I was bound to follow, I should not have allowed the amendment. The trustee being duly added as a defendant, there followed some correspondence between the solicitors of the plaintiffs and the solicitors of Mr. Norris, and I think it is clear from that correspondence that Mr. Norris' solicitors were seeking to discover on what grounds he had been added as a defendant. They pointed out that he ought to be sued as trustee in bankruptcy, and that the writ ought to be amended by showing what relief was asked for as against him. The writ was finally amended on the 2nd of May, and then the correspondence closes. It appears that subsequently the trustee was present at some proceedings in chambers, but ultimately on the 10th of June he took out the present summons, and the question is whether he is entitled to the order for which he asks.

It was admitted by counsel for the plaintiffs that in the case of a sane bankrupt plaintiff the plaintiff would not be entitled to have his trustee in bankruptcy made (against the will of the trustee) a party to the action. That is undoubtedly so, but two objections were raised. First, it is said that the law laid down in Jackson v. North-Eastern Railway Co. as applicable to the case of a sane bankrupt, does not apply in the case of a lunatic; and, secondly, it is said that by reason of delay the trustee is precluded from relief.

(a.) Reported by ARTHUR MORTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

First of all, I must consider the position of a lunatic when he sues in this court. By ord. 16, r. 17, it is prescribed that "where lunatics and persons of unsound mind not so found by inquisition might respectively, before the passing of the principal Act, have sued as plaintiffs, or would have been liable to be sued as defendants, in any action or suit, they may respectively sue as plaintiffs in any action by their committee or next friend according to the practice of the Chancery Division, and may in like manner defend any action by their committees or guardians appointed for that purpose." Therefore the practice now followed in the case of a lunatic plaintiff is the same as used to be followed in the Court of Chancery. The basis of that procedure, so far as it permitted a lunatic to sue by a next friend, is clearly stated by James, L.J., in the well-known case of Beall v. Smith, 9 Ch. D. 85. [His lordship read from the judgment at p. 91, "The law of the Court of Chancery . . . any person as his next friend," and at p. 92, "It is to be borne in mind . . . person himself, if of unsound mind," and continued:—] That is a clear statement of the jurisdiction exercised by the court in a case where a lunatic is plaintiff, and, though in that case the lunatic was suing by a next friend, the remarks are equally applicable to a case where he is suing by a committee. There is a difference in the practice in these two cases, however, for it has long been held that in the case of a lunatic suing by his committee the proper course is to add the committee as a co-plaintiff. That was laid down in Fuller v. Lance, 1 Ch. Cas. 18, in the reign of Charles II. The reason for that is, I think, that a committee, being entrusted by law, under the authority of the Crown, with the care, management, and disposition of the lunatic's effects, is in a position to receive and give a good discharge for all property which may be recovered in an action brought in the name of the lunatic, whereas a next friend, who simply intervenes and invokes the jurisdiction of the court, would not be able to do so. Otherwise, however, I think the principles which govern the procedure in actions by lunatics are the same in both cases. It follows from that that the lunatic having been adjudicated a bankrupt, and that adjudication being binding upon me, the right of action which at the beginning of these proceedings existed in the plaintiff is now vested in his trustee in bankruptcy, and though the committee may sue in the name of the lunatic, and in his own name enforce rights of action which are vested in the lunatic, I cannot find any authority, and it seems to me to be wrong on principle, that he should be allowed to enforce a right of action which, by due process of law, I assume has become vested in someone else, and has ceased to be the right of the lunatic.

In support of the view, urged on behalf of the plaintiffs, the case of In re Farnham was cited. I have read and studied to the best of my ability a shorthand note of the judgment given in that case in the Court of Appeal. The case was a remarkable one. Part of the lunatic's property was some valuable plate which had been deposited in court in the lunacy prior to the application which I am now about to mention. The trustee in bankruptcy sought to have it delivered out of court to him, on the ground that the legal title was vested in him. The question was raised and left open whether a lunatic could be adjudicated a bankrupt, the Lords Justices, though somewhat doubtful on the subject, assuming that he could be so adjudicated. Lindley, L.J., in his judgment, says: "Assuming that, Mr. Swinfen Eady says that everything follows in his favour and that the court ought to direct this plate to be handed over to the trustee, but it has been pointed out, and I think very properly, that inasmuch as this lunatic was adjudicated a bankrupt some time after he was found a lunatic by inquisition, the trustee in bankruptcy must take subject to the powers of the judge in lunacy conferred by the Lunacy Act, 1890; and the Lunacy Act, 1890, in sections 117, 120, vests in or confers upon the judge in lunacy various powers, and, amongst others, the power to apply the estate of the lunatic in discharge of his debts; and, although I believe it is perfectly well settled that a lunatic can be adjudicated a bankrupt under the direction of the committee acting under direction of the judge in lunacy, there is a question whether he can be validly adjudicated apart from that. Now, supposing that the trustee takes subject to the statutory powers, the main point in Mr. Eady's argument is answered, and I think Mr. Warrington was quite right in saying that, whatever may be true of the actual vesting of the property in the trustee, it does not follow that the trustee may take the property which is so vested in him, except subject always to the jurisdiction which has accrued before the bankruptcy to the judge in lunacy under the inquisition. I think that is a good answer to his argument as far as that goes."

The Lords Justices did not dispute that the property, and the legal right thereof, was vested in the trustee in bankruptcy, but they asserted that they had a higher power, and could direct the application of the property. How far that may apply here it is not for me to say; but I have read the sections of the Lunacy Act, 1890, which were referred to in the judgments, and the judgments themselves, with very great care, and they do not, in my opinion, go to this—i.e., that the committee can bring an action to assert a right which is vested in the lunatic's trustee in bankruptcy. Hence it follows, I think, that the defendant Norris is, on principle, entitled to the order that he asks for.

It now remains for me to deal with the question of delay. It must be borne in mind that the amendment was sanctioned by me in chambers, and that the proceedings in the action had been sanctioned by the Master in Lunacy. The question is one of some novelty; but I think that, under the circumstances, the trustee has not come too late to obtain relief, and I do not think that the fact that he attended the proceedings to settle accounts should prejudice him so far as obtaining relief is concerned. It may be that he would be precluded from raising his objection if it did not go directly to the root of the proceedings. These proceedings, however, are, I think, entirely wrong, and can only be set right by making the trustee a co-plaintiff. The trustee will not allow that to be done, and I think that, under the circumstances, he is not too late, and that his application should be acceded to, and the action stayed as against him. At the same time I do not think that this is a case for giving any costs.

Solicitors, Field, Roscoe, & Co., for Deane & Hands, Loughborough; Spencer Whitehead; Prior, Church, & Adams.

Chan. Div. } June 22, 29;
Stirling, J. } July 2, 23, 1895.

In re LONDON AND NEW YORK INVESTMENT CORPORATION. (a.)

Company—Reduction of capital—Founders' shares—Extinguishment—Companies Act, 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 131), s. 9.

The shares in a company were divided into ordinary, preference, and founders' shares. Under the memorandum and articles of association the ordinary and founders' shares ranked equally for dividend, but the founders' shares entitled the holders thereof only to such capital as should be paid up on them, except in the event of the winding up of the company, in which event the holders of founders' shares were to be entitled to one moiety of any surplus assets remaining after discharging all liabilities. The memorandum of association authorized the issue of preference shares upon such terms as the company should by special resolution determine. The directors issued and allotted shares preferred both as to capital and dividend, without any special resolution having been passed; but at general meetings afterwards held of all classes of shareholders resolutions adopting the terms under which the preference shares had been issued were adopted.

A large loss of capital had been sustained by the depreciation of investments, and there was no reasonable prospect of anything going to the holders of founders' shares in respect of dividend or capital. The company presented a petition for the confirmation of resolutions for reduction of capital involving the extinction of the founders' shares and throwing the rest of the loss upon the ordinary shares.

Held (1), that the issue of preference shares without the passing of a special resolution was capable of ratification by the company, and had been ratified.

Held, further, that the loss should, in the first instance, be thrown on the holders of founders' shares.

This was a petition presented by the company with the object of obtaining the sanction of the court to a resolution which had been passed for the reduction of the capital on the ground that paid up capital to the amount of £251,000 had been lost.

The company was registered under the Companies Acts on the 11th of October, 1889. The objects of the company as set out in the memorandum of association were numerous, but the main object was to raise money by issuing share capital and investing it in various securities.

The nominal capital of the company fixed by the memorandum of association was £1,000,000 divided into 100,000 shares of £10 each, of which 200 were to be founders shares, 50,000 preferred shares and the remaining 49,800 ordinary shares. All this capital was issued and fully paid up. The founders shares and ordinary shares were issued at once under a prospectus which stated that "it is proposed hereafter to issue 50,000 preferred shares of £10 each (preferred both as to capital and dividend) carrying such rate of interest not exceeding five per cent. as the directors may determine."

In June, 1890, the directors passed a resolution for the issue of these preferred shares and a second prospectus was circulated with that view stating that "these shares are preferred as to capital and are entitled to a cumulative dividend of five per cent. per annum in advance of the ordinary shares."

These preferred shares were all taken up, but no special resolutions authorising the preference were passed before their allotment.

Subsequently the holders of these preferred shares learned that no special resolutions had actually been passed to give them their promised preference as to capital and they demanded that this should be done. The directors accordingly convened extraordinary general meetings of the company to put the matter right, and by special resolutions passed and confirmed by the requisite statutory majorities it was resolved:

(1) "That the cumulative preferential dividend, not exceeding £5 per cent. per annum, payable under the memorandum of association of the corporation to the holders of the 50,000 preferred shares be at the rate of £5 per cent. per annum.

(2) "That as against both the founders' shares and the ordinary shares of the corporation such preferred shares shall confer a right to priority in the return of capital upon a winding up of the corporation or otherwise, but such preferred shares shall not confer or have any other right or interest in the distribution of the surplus assets of the corporation."

At these meetings, held on the 27th of April and 15th of May, 1893, holders of ordinary, preferred, and founders' shares were present in person or by proxy, and the resolutions were carried unanimously on both occasions.

The rights of shareholders to dividend were as follows: Under the terms of the prospectus relating to the issue of preferred shares, the preferred shares were to carry a cumulative dividend of 5 per cent. per annum on the amount paid up; next after them, the ordinary shares were to carry a dividend of 7 per cent. per annum, and any surplus net profits were to be divided equally between ordinary and founders' shares.

From the commencement of the company down to 1894 dividends had been paid regularly on the preferred shares at 5 per cent. per annum. The ordinary shares received in 1890 8 per cent., in 1891 7 per cent., in 1892 5 per cent., and in the first half of 1893 5 per cent. Since that date the ordinary shares had received no dividend.

On the founders' shares nothing had been paid by way of dividend since the first year, when a sum equal to the amount of dividend at the rate of 1 per cent. upon the ordinary shares was paid as dividend upon the founders' shares.

In October, 1894, the directors caused a general valuation of the securities and investments held by the company to be made. These consisted of two classes: (1) those in North America, and (2) those in this country and elsewhere. The securities were accordingly valued; as to those in North America by two brokers on the New York Stock Exchange, who valued as of the 31st of October, 1894, according to the market price of that day; as to the other securities, by the board of the company in England, who, in the case of securities quoted in the official list of the London Stock Exchange, took the selling quotation on the 31st of October, 1894, and, in the case of securities not so quoted, made inquiries in each case, and fixed what they thought to be the fair value.

The result of this valuation was to bring out a loss of £251,000. Further, it appeared that there had been an actual loss on sales to the amount of £73,397 6s. 4d., which was included in the £251,000.

A second valuation was made as of the 28th of February, 1895; as to the North American securities in the same way as before; as to the others by Messrs. Deloitte, Dever, Griffiths, & Co., who prepared a balance-sheet as of that date.

The result showed no substantial difference in the position of the company.

In consequence of the result of the said first valuation the company duly passed two special resolutions to which the sanction of the court was now sought to be obtained.

(a.) Reported by WM. SCOTT THOMPSON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

By the first of such special resolutions the company took power to reduce its capital.

The second of such special resolutions (passed at meetings held on the 14th of November and the 23rd of December, 1894) to the following effect:—

"That the capital of the London and New York Investment Corporation be, and the same is hereby reduced, from £1,000,000 divided into 100,000 shares of £10 each, of which 200 are founders' shares, 50,000 preferred shares, and the remainder are ordinary shares, to £749,000 divided in 50,000 preferred shares of £10, and 49,800 ordinary shares of £5 each, and that such reduction be effected by cancelling as capital which has been lost or is unrepresented by available assets the following paid-up capital, that is to say (1) the whole of the £10 per share paid-up on the 200 founders' shares; and (2) £5 of the £10 per share paid-up on each of the ordinary shares."

A petition was accordingly presented for the sanction of the court to the reduction of capital in accordance with these resolutions.

The articles which referred to the founders' shares were:

(7) The founders' shares shall entitle the holders thereof to such dividends and other interest in the profits of the company as is defined by the memorandum and articles of association, but except in the case of liquidation, they shall not entitle the holders thereof to any share in the capital of the company, beyond the actual amount paid up, or duly accredited as paid up upon them.

(169) In any winding up of the company the holders of founders' shares shall be entitled (as between themselves and the holders of the preferred and ordinary shares) to one moiety of any assets of the company remaining after the payment and discharge of the debts and liabilities, and the repayment to the holders of preferred and ordinary shares of the amount paid up, or credited as paid-up, on such shares, together with the costs of winding up. Provided always that in the division of any reserve fund under this clause, the founders' shares shall be entitled to one moiety of any portion of such reserve fund arising from the issue of any shares in the company at a premium, but as to any other reserve fund, shall be entitled to one moiety of such reserve fund, up to twenty per cent. of the subscribed capital, and no more.

The following are the material clauses of the memorandum and articles of association with reference to the preferred shares.

(7*b*) There shall first be paid out of the net profits of the company, in each year to the holders of the preferred shares, a cumulative preferential dividend at a rate not exceeding £5 per cent. per annum on the amount paid up thereon for the time being.

(f) Any of the original shares, and any new shares from time to time to be created may (but subject always, and without prejudice to the rights of the holders of the founders's shares, who shall in each and every year receive their interest or dividends as herein expressed), from time to time be issued with any such guarantee or any such right of preference, whether in respect of dividends or repayment of capital, or both, or any such other special privilege or advantage over any shares previously issued, or then about to be issued, or at such a premium, or with such deferred rights as compared with any shares previously issued, or then about to be issued, or subject to any such conditions or provisions, and with any special right, or without any right of voting, and generally on such terms as the company may from time to time, by special resolution, determine. Provided always that any premium to be received from the issue of any shares shall be carried under the provisions of sub-section (d) hereof to the reserve fund.

Article 10. Subject to the memorandum of association, the shares shall be under the control of the directors, who may allot or otherwise dispose of the same to such persons, on such terms and conditions, and at such times as the directors think fit.

Article 107. The business of the company shall be managed by the directors, as herein provided, and all such powers of the company as are not by statute or by these presents required to be exercised by the company in general meeting, are hereby vested in the directors, pursuant to these articles, subject, nevertheless, to such regulations as may be from time to time duly prescribed by the company, but no regulation of the company shall invalidate any prior act of the directors, which would have been valid if such regulation had not been made.

Buckley, Q.C., and Sargant, for the petitioners, cited In re Floating Dock of St. Thomas (Limited), 43 W. R. 344, [1895] 1 Ch. 691.

Graham Hastings, Q.C., and Macnaghten, for a holder of ordinary shares, opposed the application.—They argued that In re Floating Dock of St. Thomas (Limited) did not apply to the present case, that the special resolution was invalid, and that the proposed reduction was unfair and inequitable. That any priority, if given on the creation of new capital, must according to the memorandum of association be conferred by a special resolution duly passed before such new capital was issued.

They cited Ashbury v. Watson, 33 W. R. 882, 30 Ch. D. 376; British and American, &c., v. Couper, 42 W. R. 652, [1894] A. C. 399.

Rowden, for the holder of a founder's share, opposed the application.

G. P. C. Lawrence, for other holders of founders' shares, asked that the founders' shares should not be cancelled.

G. Purcell, for other holders of founders' shares.

Buckley, Q.C., in reply referred to In re Union Plate Glass Co., 37 W. R. 792, 42 Ch. D. 513; In re Gatling Gun Co. (Limited), 38 W. R. 317; 43 Ch. D. 628; Bannatyne v. Direct Spanish Telegraph Co., 35 W. R. 125, 34 Ch. D. 287; and Eichbaum v. City of Chicago Grain Elevators Co., 40 W. R. 153, [1891] 3 Ch. 459.

STIRLING, J., stated the facts, and continued:—The first question to be considered is whether it is established that the alleged loss of capital has actually occurred. I have already stated the effect of the evidence in support of the petition. The detailed valuations have at my request been produced to me. Although several shareholders appear in opposition, not one of them has thought fit to adduce any evidence to the contrary, or even to pledge his own belief that the loss has not occurred; nor have the witnesses in support of the petition been cross-examined. The matter is eminently one for decision by commercial men, who have given their judgment on it, and the shareholders of all classes have by large majorities accepted the views put forward by the directors. I hold, then, that the allegations of the petition are sufficiently proved.

The next question is whether the loss ought (as proposed by the resolutions) to be thrown primarily on the founders' shares (which are proposed to be wiped out altogether) and next on the ordinary shares. The case of British and American Trustee and Finance Co. v. Couper, 42 W. R. 652, [1894] A. C. 399, shows that it is the duty of the court to be satisfied before confirming the resolutions that there is nothing unjust in the proposed reduction. Now it appears from what was laid down by Cotton, L.J., in Bannatyne v. Direct Spanish Telegraph Co., 34 Ch. D. 287, see pp. 299, 300, and by Chitty, J., in In re Floating Dock Co. of St. Thomas (Limited), [1895] 1 Ch. 691, see p. 699, that where there are different classes of shares the loss on a reduction ought to fall on those who would have to bear it if there was a winding up; and taking this to be the rule, I have to see how it is to be applied in the present case.

As regards the founders' shares, 200 in number, they represent a capital of £2,000. The holders take no share of the profits until a dividend of 5 per cent. has been paid on the preference shares, and of 7 per cent. on the ordinary shares. After these dividends are paid, and the directors have been remunerated, the remaining profits are to be paid (according to the memorandum of association) as to one moiety to the holders of the founders' shares and the residue to the holders of the ordinary shares. Upon a winding up the holders of founders' shares are, by article 169, to be entitled to one moiety of any assets of the company remaining after the discharge of the debts and liabilities of the company, and the repayment to the holders of preferred and ordinary shares of the amount paid up on those shares.

Now it appears, from an examination of the balance-sheet prepared by Messrs. Deloitte & Co., that there is required for payment of the above-mentioned dividends to the preference and ordinary shareholders a sum of (in round figures) £56,500, while the present investments after deducting interest on debentures, &c., yield a net annual income of about £16,000, leaving a deficiency of about £40,000 to be made up before any dividend can be received by the holders of founders' shares. Further, if all the existing investments were realized at their par value there would be an existing loss of over £73,000.

In my judgment there is no reasonable prospect of anything ever coming to the holders of founders' shares, either in respect of dividend or capital, and consequently I cannot consider it unfair to throw on them in the first instance the loss which has actually occurred. The case of the ordinary shareholders raises a different and more difficult question. It is contended on their behalf that regard being had to the circumstances under which the preference shares were issued, the latter do not carry with them any preference as regards distribution of capital on a winding up. [His lordship referred to clause 7 (b) (f) of the memorandum of association and to clauses 10 and 107 of the articles, and proceeded:—] Having regard to these provisions I think it was competent to the directors to fix the rate of preferential dividend so long as it did not exceed five per cent., but it was not competent for them without the sanction of a special resolution to confer any other preferential rights.

On the 12th of October, 1889, a prospectus for ordinary shares was issued, which is important with regard to the statement contained on the first page, that "It is proposed hereafter to issue 50,000 preferred shares of £10 each, preferred both as to capital and dividend, carrying such rate of interest not exceeding five per cent. as the directors may determine." It is distinctly stated there that the preference shares to be issued were to be preferred both in capital and interest.

On the 11th of June, 1890, the directors passed a resolution for the issue of preference shares at five per cent., and on the 20th of June, 1890, a prospectus for the preference shares was issued, which stated that "these shares are preferred as to capital, and are entitled to a cumulative dividend of five per cent. per annum, in advance of the ordinary shares." No special resolution sanctioning the issue was passed previously to the allotment of the preference shares. Difficulties subsequently arose as to enforcing calls, and some of the shares were surrendered and cancelled. On the 27th of April and the 15th of May, 1893, special resolutions were passed and confirmed. [His lordship read them, and continued:—]

It is said that the memorandum of association, according to its true construction, requires that the special resolution defining the preference should be passed previously to the issue of the shares, and that a resolution passed subsequently to the issue of the shares cannot set the matter right, because it is passed by a body of shareholders different from that which would be called upon to sanction the preference before the issue. In the present case, for example, the holders of ordinary and founders' shares were the persons by whom the special resolution ought to have been passed, while the resolutions of 1893 were passed by the whole body of shareholders, including the holders of preference shares, as well as ordinary and founders' shares.

On this, two questions seem to arise: (1) Was the issue of preference shares absolutely incapable of ratification by the company? and (2) if not, has it been duly ratified?

As to (1), if the issue was absolutely beyond the powers of the company, as defined by the memorandum, then it was no doubt incapable of ratification. The vice of the transaction lay in this, that the directors took upon themselves to issue the shares without obtaining the sanction of a special resolution. There is nothing, however, in the memorandum to prevent the company from passing a special resolution, to the effect that it should be left to the directors to determine what rights of preference should be given to the preferred shareholders. It is said that the special resolution ought to be passed before the issue of the shares: but the memorandum does not say so, and I do not think it ought to be construed so as to prevent the company ratifying a slip such as has occurred in the present case, if that can be done consistently with justice. This being so, it seems to me that it cannot be said that the acts of the directors, as regards the issue, were incapable of ratification.

How, then, is such rectification to be given? It ought, I think, to proceed from the holders of founders and ordinary shares with whom it lay in the first instance to determine what rights of preference shares should be given.

Now the preference shares were plainly offered on the terms that the holders should have a right of preference as regards distribution of capital as well as dividend, and those who applied for shares on the faith of the prospectus would (supposing there are no special circumstances in the case to which I shall say a word in a moment) be entitled to demand either that shares conferring such right should be given them or that the transaction should be set aside and all payments made in expectation of the issue of such shares should be returned, supposing this attitude to be taken up by the preference shareholders. I conceive that it should be competent to the holder of ordinary and preferred shares to say which alternative should be adopted. It would be right to summon to such a meeting the preference shareholders so that they might express their views, but their votes could not be counted.

At the meetings held on the 27th of April and 15th of May, 1893, holders of preference shares voted as well as holders of ordinary and founders' shares. If the resolutions then passed had been carried by the votes of preference shareholders I should have thought that they could not be relied on, but the meetings were attended by substantial numbers of holders of ordinary and founders' shares, and the resolutions were unanimous.

I cannot see any reason why these resolutions passed by the requisite majority independently of the preference shareholders should not be treated as good, and, in my judgment (subject to what I am about to say), these resolutions constituted a sufficient ratification of the acts of the directors.

It is contended, however, that in April, 1893, it was too late for the preferred shareholders to claim the rights to which originally they might have been entitled. It is said that they must be taken to have had, from the first, notice that the issue of preference shares had not received the sanction of a special resolution, because such resolution, if passed, ought, in accordance with section 53 of the Companies Act, to have been found in the office of the registrar of joint stock companies; and such a view of the legal position appears to be sanctioned by what is laid down in Irvine v. Union Bank of Australia, 25 W. R. 682, 2 App. Cas. 379. It is further pointed out that some of the shares were surrendered, and it is suggested that the surrender was made in consequence of the discovery of the defect in the original issue. Again, it is said that the preference shareholders accepted dividends in the interval between the issue of the shares of the 27th of April, 1893.

Notwithstanding these circumstances, I am not persuaded that the rights of the preference shareholders were affected thereby. Such notice as they had of the absence of a special resolution was constructive only. If in point of fact the preference shareholders were ignorant of it, and such ignorance is attributable (as I think it is) to the frame of the prospectus, I think mere constructive notice could not prejudice their rights against the company, whatever might be the effect of such notice as against third parties. There is no evidence to show that the defect had become known to the preference shareholders before April, 1893. The solitary holder of ordinary shares who opposes the petition has not pledged her own belief that this is the fact, or cross-examined the witnesses who have made affidavits in support of the petition. However this may be I think it lay with the holders of founders' and ordinary shares to determine whether the acts of the directors shall be ratified or not. The prospectus in which the ordinary shares were issued warned the holders of those shares that shares to be preferred both as to capital and dividend were afterwards to be issued. The prospectus of the preferred shares plainly states that those shares were to have a preference as to capital. Under these circumstances it well may have been that the holders of ordinary and founders' shares considered in April and May, 1893, that it was not otherwise than in accordance with honesty and justice that the right of preference as regards capital should be sanctioned by them if this could lawfully be done. In my opinion such sanction was within their legal powers and has been legally given. I come to the conclusion, therefore, that there is nothing in the proposed reduction which is unjust or inequitable or requires the court to abstain from confirming it. I therefore make an order in accordance with the petition.

Solicitors for the petitioners, Pains, Blyth, & Huxtable.

Solicitors for the ordinary shareholder, Cowdell & Son.

Solicitors for holders of founders' shares, W. A. Crump & Son; H. C. Godfray, and Slaughter & May.

Chan. Div.
Kekewich, J. } June 18, 21; July 5, 1895.

In re MORLEY.
MORLEY v. HAIG. (a.)

Will—Tenant for life and remainderman—Policy of insurance—Mortgage—Liability for premiums and mortgage interest—Apportionment of policy moneys.

A testator gave the residue of his estate to trustees on trust for a tenant for life and remaindermen. Such residue consisted in part of a policy of insurance on the life of another person, which policy was subject to a mortgage securing a debt owing by the testator. The trustees paid the premiums and the interest on the mortgage accruing since the death of the testator out of the income of such residue. The person insured having died, and the policy moneys been paid to the trustees,

Held, that, as between the tenant for life and the remaindermen, the former was entitled to be repaid thereout the amount, not only of such premiums, but also of such interest; and that the residue of such moneys should be apportioned according to the rule in In re Chesterfield's (Earl) Trusts, 32 W. R. 361, 24 Ch. D. 643.

Summons.

Robert George Morley, by his will dated the 7th of August, 1885, appointed executors and trustees, and devised and bequeathed to them all his residuary real and personal estate on trust to sell and convert, with power to postpone the sale and conversion, and pending such sale and conversion, to expend out of the income or capital of such estate such moneys as they might think fit for premiums on policies or otherwise in respect of such estate; and he declared that his trustees should stand possessed of the moneys arising from the sale and conversion thereinbefore directed of his residuary real and personal estate or otherwise forming part of his estate, upon trust, after making the payments therein mentioned, to invest the same and pay four equal twelfth parts of the net income thereof to his wife during her widowhood, and subject thereto, and as therein provided, he directed that his trustees should stand possessed of the said trust premises and the net income thereof on trust for all his children in the shares and subject to the conditions therein expressed.

The testator duly made a codicil to his will, dated the 1st of August, 1889, whereby he declared that one moiety of the income of his residuary estate should be payable to his wife during her widowhood in lieu of the proportion mentioned in his will, and that, subject thereto and as therein further provided, the trust premises and the income thereof should be divisible among his children in certain shares and proportions differing from, and in lieu of, those mentioned in his will.

He also made two other codicils, the effect of which it is unnecessary to mention.

The testator died on the 20th of June, 1890, survived by his wife, two sons, and two daughters; and his will and codicils were proved on the 15th of September, 1890.

At his death he was absolutely entitled to three policies of assurance on the life of Henry Ridley Ellington, effected in the Equitable Assurance Office—viz.: two policies for £500, and a third for £2,500, the last-mentioned policy being subject to a mortgage to the said office for securing repayment of a sum of £3,000, with interest thereon, at five per cent. The surrender value of the said policies at the testator's death, less the mortgage debt and interest, amounted to £3,773 1s. 8d.

(a.) Reported by C. C. HENSLEY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

On the testator's death the defendant, who was the sole proving executor and accepting trustee, with the concurrence of the testator's widow and children, retained the policies until the death of the said Henry Ridley Ellington on the 14th of March, 1895. From the death of the testator down to the death of the said Henry Ridley Ellington the premiums on the policies and the interest on the mortgage debt were paid by the said trustee out of the income of the testator's estate.

On the death of the said Henry Ridley Ellington a sum of £9,093 15s. became payable on the said policies, subject to the said mortgage and interest to the date of payment of the policies.

On the 10th of May, 1895, the sum of £6,015 17s. 6d. was paid to the said trustee in respect of the policies, being the above-mentioned sum of £9,093 15s., less the amount of principal and interest on the mortgage.

This was an originating summons by the widow, the two daughters, and one of the sons of the testator to have it determined what were the respective rights and interests of the several persons who, since the death of the testator, had been and were then entitled to the income of the testator's residuary estate, and of the persons entitled to the said residuary estate or any share therein in remainder expectant upon the interest of those entitled as aforesaid to and in the above-mentioned sum of £6,015 17s. 9d.; and in particular whether the respective tenants for life under the said will and codicils were entitled to be recouped out of the said surplus policy moneys the amount applied out of income in payment of the said premiums and mortgage interest; and whether they or any of them were entitled to any and what compensation or equivalent for the income which they would have derived from the proceeds of the sale or conversion of the testator's interest in the said policies had the same been sold or converted immediately after his death.

Renshaw, Q.C., and Dauney, for the plaintiffs.—Since the testator's death the premiums and interest have been paid out of income. The tenants for life should, therefore, have the amount made good out of the policy moneys. There should be an apportionment of the policy-moneys as between the tenants for life and remaindermen according to the following rule. Find the sum which, if put out at interest at the testator's death and accumulated at interest at four per cent., would amount to the policy-moneys, and apply that sum as capital and the remainder as income: In re Chesterfield's (Earl) Trusts, 32 W. R. 361, 24 Ch. D. 643; Beavan v. Beavan, 32 W. R. 363n, 24 Ch. D. 649n; In re Flower, Matheson v. Goodwyn, 62 L. T. N. S. 216, 38 W. R. Dig. 184, 63 L. T. N. S. 201, 39 W. R. Dig. 9; In re Hobson, 34 W. R. 70; Wright v. Lambert, 26 W. R. 206, 6 Ch. D. 649; In re Hengler, Frowde v. Hengler, 41 W. R. 491, [1893] 1 Ch. 586.

Warrington, Q.C., and Lavington, for the defendants. We do not dispute that the amount of the premiums should be made good to the plaintiffs. They are not, however, entitled to the amount of the interest on the mortgage, because, as the mortgage debt was not paid off at the testator's death, when it should have been paid off, they have received an excess of income, precisely equal to the interest they now claim. We admit that the sum which has fallen in should be apportioned according to the principle of In re Chesterfield's (Earl) Trusts.

Cur. adv. vult.

KEKEWICH, J.—It is reasonably clear and was conceded in argument that the relative rights of the tenant for life and remaindermen must be adjusted according to the rule in In re Chesterfield's (Earl) Trusts. If, apart from the decision in In re Hobson, there remained any doubt respecting the applicability of that rule in a case like the present, that decision would wholly remove it. The rule is applicable to circumstances of considerable variety as is illustrated by In re Hengler, Frowde v. Hengler, the real question in each case must be how to make it work justly between the parties interested according to the special facts. Here the special facts are that the reversionary interest in question was a policy subject to a mortgage, and that the interest on that mortgage as well as the premiums on the policy were from time to time paid out of the income to which the tenant for life would otherwise have been entitled. The mortgage itself has now been paid off out of the money received under the policy together with a small amount of interest which may be ignored, and we are dealing with the balance of the policy monies remaining after discharge of the mortgage and no more. But for the necessity of making some special provision in respect of interest and premiums, the application of the rule would be easy. One would calculate what sum, if invested at four per cent. interest at the date of the testator's death, would produce the amount of this balance, and that sum would be capital to be invested for the benefit of the estate, and the rest would belong to the tenant for life.

The tenant for life has, however, in fact, received year by year less than she was entitled to by reason of part of the income having been taken to keep down the interest and premiums. Adjustment must now be made on the footing that these yearly sums ought to be recouped to her out of the money preserved by such expenditure—that is, the policy moneys. Of course, they ought to be recouped with interest, and I think that interest ought to be calculated at 4 per cent. I hesitate about the figure, but it is to be observed that I am here dealing, not with the rate which trustees with restricted powers of investment might have earned, but the rate which an absolute owner, free to deal as she pleased, might have obtained for her money. These sums, therefore, will have to be deducted in her favour from the net policy moneys, and the balance must be apportioned between capital and income on the principle above explained. Except for the necessary subtraction in the first instance of the costs of these proceedings, the arithmetic might all be worked out in a schedule to the order; but, as it is, the order can only direct how the rule shall be applied to the yet unascertained sum which will remain after subtraction of the taxed costs from the existing balance, less the sums—which can easily be calculated—payable to the tenant for life on adjustment of capital and income accounts.

Solicitor, C. W. Dommett.

Chan. Div.
Vaughan Williams, J. } Nov. 6, 7.

THE AMBITION INVESTMENT BUILDING SOCIETY. (a.)

Building society — Investing member — Withdrawal — Priorities—Notice of withdrawal—Surplus funds of society.

In a building society, the rules of which provide that investing members may withdraw their shares upon giving a month's notice to the society, the stopping of the society's business, or the recognition of the necessity of stoppage by the officers of the society, and not the insolvency of the society, is the proper point at which to draw the line in determining the question whether a notice to withdraw operates so as to give the member giving such notice priority over other members.

(a.) Reported by V. DE S. FOWKE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Summons.

The above-named society was incorporated in the year 1882 under the Building Societies Act, 1874, for the purpose of raising a fund for making advances to members upon the security of freehold, leasehold, and copyhold property by way of mortgage, pursuant to 37 & 38 Vict. c. 42.

The rules provided as follows:—

"ANNUAL GENERAL MEETING."

3. "An annual general meeting of the members shall be held in the month of February in every year, at which meeting a balance-sheet of the accounts, regularly audited, together with a report from the directors of the state of the affairs of the society, shall be laid before the members."

"MEMBERS."

"MEMBER DEFINED."

16. "The holder of a share, upon which not less than six months' subscription have been paid, and in respect of which no advance has been made, shall be deemed an investing member as to such share, and shall be entitled to vote in respect of such share, and the holder of any share upon which an advance has been made shall be deemed a borrowing member, and shall be entitled to vote."

"WITHDRAWAL."

21. "Any member may withdraw all or any of his shares upon giving one month's notice in writing to the secretary, when such member shall be entitled to receive back his net monthly subscriptions, with such portion of the profits realized as may have been posted to his credit, together with such interest as the directors, in their opinion, consider the state of the society's business will allow, such interest to be calculated up to the end of the month preceding the date of the notice. If more than one member shall give notice to withdraw, they shall be paid in rotation according to priority of notice: provided always that widows and children of deceased members shall have preference."

Rule 39 provides that the society should be dissolved if the dissolution thereof should be resolved upon by the vote of three-fourths of the members present at a special general meeting of the society, convened for that purpose.

The society commenced to carry on business in April, 1883. After 1890 the society had practically no new business, and there were numerous withdrawals of depositors and shareholders. The accounts of the society were made up and audited yearly up to the 31st of December in each year. The accounts were duly audited up to the 31st of December, 1890, and a balance-sheet for the year ending at that date was prepared, together with a report by the directors, in which they said that during the past year the society had practically had no new business, a state of affairs which "at present shews no sign of improvement; this, in conjunction with the fact that the capital of the society during the same period has been considerably decreased by withdrawals, has caused them [i.e., the directors] to arrive at the conclusion that, in the interests of the shareholders, the society should be dissolved. They have, therefore, called a special general meeting to be held directly after the annual meeting, at which a resolution to that effect will be moved, and the directors will be prepared fully to discuss matters with the members, who will then be in a position to act as they may think best. The directors are of opinion that if the members decide at the present time to dissolve the society, and the same be done in an economical manner, the capital will be returned in full." It appeared that in the year 1890 the society was commercially insolvent. On the 5th of February, 1891, a notice was duly sent to the members, together with the director's report and the balance-sheet, convening a meeting for the 12th of February to be held immediately after the close of the annual meeting, for the consideration of resolutions to dissolve the society, and to appoint liquidadators. On the 12th of February the annual general meeting and the special meeting were held, and a resolution was duly passed that the society should be dissolved, and liquidators were appointed.

Prior to the 12th of February the following letters of withdrawal had been received. One from Miss Amelia Annie Lark, dated and received on the 20th of January, 1891. One from another lady dated and received the 5th of February. There was some others dated the 6th of February and the 10th of February, and received on those dates or on the day after the date of the notices.

The society was in course of liquidation, and had paid its outside creditors and there were surplus assets to be distributed, and questions had arisen as to the priorities of the various persons who had given notices of withdrawal as above stated, and a summons was taken out for directions to determine whether any and which of the shareholders who had so given notices ot withdrawal were entitled to priority over the other holders of investment shares in the society. The summons had been referred to the judge from the registrar for argument.

Fawcus, for the liquidators and the members who had given no notice of withdrawal.

John Henderson, for Miss Lark.—Miss Lark is entitled in priority to all other members to receive back her net monthly subscriptions, and any portion of profits realized and posted to her credit under rule 21. She gave notice of withdrawal before the notice convening the general meeting and of the proposed resolution to wind up were sent out. There was no question of insolvency so far as she knew at the time she gave her notice. To affect the validity of a notice of withdrawal there must be "notorious" insolvency which was not the case here as far as Miss Lark was concerned. Mathew, J., in In re Sunderland 36th Universal Building Society, 38 W. R. 509, 24 Q. B. D. 394, speaks of a rule of withdrawal not being applicable in cases where it has become "notorious" that a building society cannot meet its liabilities. But no such case is made here. [VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J.—It appears from Mathew, J.'s, judgment that he, in drawing the line at which the rule ceases to be operative, considers not the knowledge of the person giving the notice of withdrawal, but the state of the society's affairs.] When the notice was given Miss Lark knew nothing of the state of the society's affairs at all, and is entitled to priority: Carrick v. North British Building Society, 22 Sc. L. Rep. 833.

Chester Jones and Hansell, for the other parties who had given notices of withdrawal.—We do not claim priority but only equality in sharing in the surplus assets. The word "notorious" used by Mathew, J., in In re Sunderland 36th Universal Building Society means notorious to those persons whose duty it is to carry on the business of the society. The rule giving priority ceased to apply when it became notorious to the officers of the society that the society could not meet its liabilities and was commercially insolvent. That was in 1890.

They referred to Carrick v. North British Building Society; Walton v. Edge, 33 W. R. 417, 10 App. Cas. 33; and In re Mutual Society, 24 Ch. D. (n) 425.

Fawcus, in reply, cited Barnard v. Tomson, [1894] 1 Ch. 374.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J.—This is a case which gives rise to questions as to the priorities of non-borrowing members of a building society. The case is one in which the society has been dissolved and has paid its outside creditors in full, and these questions arise as to the priorities of non-borrowing members inter se. The first material date is the 5th of February, 1891, when the report and balance-sheet were sent out. The next material date is the 12th of February, 1891, when the resolution was passed that the society should be dissolved. At that time a number of non-borrowing members had given notices of withdrawal, and they assert that they are entitled under the rules to priority inter se in the distribution of the assets of the society after payment of outside creditors. One of these claimants is Miss Lark. She gave a notice of withdrawal, which matured on the 7th or 10th of February, 1891—i.e., at some time between the date of the notice convening the meeting and the holding of the meeting. In the case of all the other claimants, their notices did not mature until after the 12th of February, and in their case it is immaterial for me to consider the particular dates. It is only in the case of Miss Lark that the particular date of the notice of withdrawal is material in determining the question of priority.

Sometimes it is not an assistance to have a number of cases cited, because it is often difficult to reconcile them. But in the present instance that is not so. It seems to me that the cases which have been cited form a continuous current of authority, and are consistent and do not contradict one another in any way. The last case is the case of Barnard v. Tomson, [1894] 1 Ch. 374. I do not propose to go into the facts of that case at length, because if you only look at the judgment of North, J., you will see that he is simply carrying out and recognizing the principles laid down by Mathew, J., in In re Sunderland, &c., case. When North, J.'s judgment is looked at, it will be seen that the view he takes is that the line ought to be drawn at the time when it is recognized that there has been a stoppage of business, or it has been recognized by those competent to form an opinion that the business must be stopped. [His lordship stated the main facts in Barnard v. Tomson, and went on.] North, J., said in Barnard v. Tomson: "The result is that I can find nothing whatever prior to the instrument of dissolution to indicate such a state of things as could put an end to the operation of the existing rules upon the principles laid down in the cases. I have no materials for drawing a line earlier than the date of the instrument of dissolution. It seems to me, therefore, that all the notices to withdraw are good down to that time." What were the "materials" for which North, J., looked and which he was unable to find? He clearly means that there had not been a stoppage of business in fact or a recognition by the officers of the society that there must be a stoppage of business. He does not ask the question, Aye or No, Was the society solvent or insolvent when the notices to withdraw were given? The question, therefore, is, Has there in fact been a stoppage of business or a recognition by the officers of the society that there must be such a stoppage? North, J., follows the judgment of Mathew, J., in Sunderland, &c., case. Let us see, therefore, what Mathew, J., really says. Mathew, J., says: "The contention on this point" [i.e., of the members giving notices to withdraw] "was that, until the winding-up order had been actually made, they were entitled to withdraw, and so to constitute themselves creditors of the societies. The liquidator insisted that the societies were known to be insolvent on the 17th of February, 1887, and that the right which members would otherwise have had of quitting the societies was then at an end." That is the way Mathew, J., puts the question, and that is the contention he says was raised by the liquidator. His judgment is: "We are of opinion that this rule" [the rule as to withdrawing members] "was not intended to apply where the society was no longer able to carry on its business, and where it had become notorious that the society could not meet its liabilities. It would be altogether unreasonable to suppose that it was intended, in the event of insolvency, to permit one set of members to escape from liability at the expense of others. There would seem to be no adequate consideration or motive for such an arrangement. The rule seems to us not to contemplate any such contingency as a suspension of business, and, therefore, only to provide for a withdrawal from the society while it was, or was believed to be, still solvent." There has been a good deal of argument as to the meaning of Mathew, J.'s judgment. In particular, a question has been raised as to what he meant when he spoke of the society being known to be insolvent, and when it had become "notorious" that the society could not meet its liabilities. Mathew, J., had not the slightest intention of defining the conditions under which the right of withdrawal would be brought to an end, but simply to say that in the case before him there was a society which was insolvent, and could not meet its liabilities. He laid down no such general rule as that the right to withdraw was dependent on the knowledge of the person giving the notice or the officers of the society. He only says these conditions were present in that particular case. That is my understanding of what Mathew, J., means. If I look at the case of Walton v. Edge and Carrick v. North British Building Society, I see that the real question propounded by the judges to themselves was, Has there been a stoppage of business, or anything equivalent to a stoppage of business? The judges there held that where there had been a stoppage of business or anything equivalent to a stoppage of business, the right to withdraw was determined. Lord Shand says, in Carrick v. North British Building Society, "In the case of Tennant v. The City of Glasgow Bank, 6 Court of Sess. Cas., 4th ser., H. L. 69, in which a number of authorities were cited and considered as to the effect of the stoppage of a business on the declared insolvency of the company, it was held that no change could thereafter be made in reference to the rights or status of the members of the company, so that at least the rights of creditors might be preserved." Lord Shand recognized that the condition determining the right to withdraw was the stoppage of business.

When one comes to consider for whom rule 21 was passed, it will appear that stoppage of business is the point at which the line is to be drawn in a case like this, and not insolvency. People have put their money into a concern, and there is a provision for withdrawal. The moment the venture comes to an end, or it is recognized by those competent to judge that the venture must come to an end, every principle of justice requires that those who joined the common venture should bear the losses. That is the moment at which the rule should cease to apply. In the present case that time was arrived at on the 12th of February when the resolution for dissolution was passed. That point had not been arrived at before the 12th. There was no recognition in the directors report of the necessity to stop the business.

There will, therefore, be a declaration that Miss Lark is entitled in priority to all other members, and the liquidator will be directed to pay her in full. The remaining shareholders are entitled pari passu. Costs of all parties to be paid out of the residue of funds.

Solicitors, Philip J Rutland; Lewis & Sons.

Q. B. Div. (Grantham and Lawrance, JJ.) Aug. 6, 1895.

WOOD (Appellant) v. THE LONDON COUNTY COUNCIL (Respondents). (a.)

Local government—Metropolis—Erection of buildings with quadrangle in centre—Quadrangle for use of tenants only—Sanction of London County Council—"Laying out street for carriage traffic"—London Building Act, 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. ccxiii.), s. 7.

The appellant, who was the owner of a site where formerly a brewery business had been carried on by him, resolved to use the ground for building, and he accordingly erected, fronting on the public street, a building with shops on the ground floor and flats above, and with an archway through the middle of the ground floor. He afterwards proposed to build round the other three sides of the quadrangle formed by clearing away the old houses, and when the buildings would be completed there would be forty-two flats with a quadrangle or courtyard in the centre from which there would be two staircases to the flats. There would be no exit or entrance to or from the quadrangle except by the archway, which was closed by an iron gate, and the quadrangle would be for the use only of the tenants of the flats and those visiting them, and the public would be entirely excluded from it.

Held, that this quadrangle was not a "street" within the meaning of section 7 of the London Building Act, 1894, and that the appellant, in commencing to lay out the quadrangle, had not "commenced to form or lay out a street for carriage traffic" within the meaning of that section, and did not, therefore require the previous sanction of the London County Council.

Case stated by Mr. De Rutzen, metropolitan police magistrate, sitting at Westminster Police Court.

A summons was taken out upon complaint made on behalf of the London County Council (the respondents) against the appellant, that the appellant did unlawfully commence to form and lay out a certain street for carriage traffic without having first made an application in writing to the London County Council for and obtained their sanction to the formation and laying out of such street for carriage traffic, contrary to the provisions of section 7 of the London Building Act, 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. ccxiii), which provides that "before any person commences to form or lay out any street, whether intended to be used for carriage traffic or for foot traffic only, such person shall make an application in writing to the Council for their sanction to the formation or laying out of such street either for carriage traffic or for foot traffic (as the case may be) . . . and no person shall commence to form or lay out any street or carriage traffic or for foot traffic without having obtained the sanction of the council"; and section 8 provides that "a person shall be deemed to commence to form or lay out a street if he erect a fence or other boundary or lay down lines of kerbing or level the surface of the ground so as to define the course or direction of a street, or if he form the foundation of a house in such manner and in such a position as that such house will or may become one of three or more houses abutting on or erected beside land on which a street is intended to be or may be thereafter laid out or formed: Provided that no person shall be deemed to commence to form or lay out a street if he do any of the acts in this section mentioned for some purpose other than that of forming or laying out a street."

The site in question in this case, until recently, formed part of the site of an old brewery belonging to the appellant, and of a private house connected therewith.

At the time when the brewery existed there was a covered entrance or footway about six feet wide by the side of the private house from Victoria-street into a square yard on the site, and from the square yard there were two other entrances to other places, but such entrances and footway were not used by the public, and no right of way existed over the same.

About 1891 the appellant sold the brewery business, and the brewery ceased to be used, and in 1894 the appellant resolved to utilize the site for building, and he accordingly erected, fronting or abutting on Victoria-street, a building comprising shops on the ground floor with flats above, and an archway through the middle of the ground floor of the building.

Such buildings were erected in accordance with the statutes applicable thereto prior to the passing of the London Building Act, 1894, and the south-west wall of such building was left unfinished with a view to the subsequent extension of the buildings.

Shortly after the passing of the Act of 1894 the appellant decided to extend the building fronting on Victoria-street by building round the other three sides of the quadrangle formed by clearing away the brewery buildings, and on the 18th of April, 1895, he gave notice to the district surveyor in compliance with the said Act, of his intention so to do, but he made no application to the county council for their sanction to the formation and laying out of a street in connection therewith.

When the buildings would be completed by extending them round the other three sides of the quadrangle there would be in all about forty-two flats, and there would be two entrances and staircases leading from the quadrangle to the flats. There would also be a one-storied building to be used as an estate office.

There would be no exit or entrance to or from the quadrangle, except by the archway in Victoria-street, which was closed by lofty iron gates, and this archway and the quadrangle would be for the use of the tenants of the flats in the proposed new buildings, and of the tradesmen and others visiting them with or without carriages, and the public at large would be entirely excluded from them.

On the 3rd of April, 1895, the appellant's solicitors wrote to the respondents' solicitors, stating that the appellant had done enough to bring himself within section 8 of the Act if his proposed scheme were in contravention of the Act, and requesting the respondents to take the necessary steps to have the question determined, and on the 24th of April the above summons was issued on the application of the county council.

The respondents contended, and the appellants denied, that the appellants had commenced to form and lay out a street for carriage or foot traffic within the meaning of section 7.

The magistrate found, as a fact, that the place in question was a street, and held that the appellant had, under the circumstances, commenced to form and lay out a street for carriage traffic within the meaning of section 7 of the London Building Act, 1894, and he accordingly convicted the appellant, and ordered him to pay a nominal fine, and £5 5s. costs.

(a.) Reported by Sir SHERSTON BAKER, Bart., Barrister-at-Law.

The question now was whether the decision of the magistrate was right.

For the appellant, it was contended that this quadrangle was really only a courtyard belonging to the block of buildings, and was, in fact, part of the curtilage of the buildings; that it was a courtyard laid out solely for the convenience of the tenants, and that the case found that it could not be used by the public at large, and, therefore, did not come within section 7: The London County Council v. Davis, 43 W. R. 574; Pilbrow v. Vestry of St. Leonard, Shoreditch, 43 W. R. 342, [1895] 1 Q. B. 433.

For the county council it was contended that it was a pure question of fact whether this was a street or not within the meaning of the section, and that the magistrate had found as a fact that it was a street, and that his decision was final.

Lawson Walton, Q.C., and E. Morten, for the appellant.

Cripps, Q.C., and Avory, for the respondents.

Grantham, J.—In this case we are asked by the learned magistrate to say whether or not his decision was right in holding that this was a street, and that the appellant had, under the circumstances, commenced to form and lay out a street for carriage traffic within the meaning of section 7 of the London Building Act, 1894. In answer to that question we both think, without any hesitation that he was wrong, and that he decided wrongly. It was contended very strongly for the county council that we ought not to interfere in this case because the learned magistrate had found as a fact that it was a street and that the appellant was commencing to lay it out; and it was said that in a case of this kind it was essentially a question of fact for the magistrate, and although other magistrates had all of them come to a contrary view, yet it was not a question of law in any way, and it must be, as a question of fact, left to the decision of each magistrate hearing the case. If that were so, the result would be that you would have as many different decisions as there were magistrates sitting in London. Therefore, we do not think that each particular magistrate can decide this according to his own particular view; we think he must decide it according to what are the legal definitions of the words used, or at any rate he is not to find as a fact that which the law would not allow to be the fact in the particular case. He has found this as a fact, because the owner of the property proposes to deal with it in a particular view. He says that dealing with it in that way brings it within the section. That is a matter of law, and we hold that it does not bring the owner within that section, which is only intended to apply to a different set of circumstances from those which we have to deal with here. The owner of the property had used it for a great number of years for a particular purpose. It was a large space, and there were ways through it which were used by the owner for his horses, carts, and drays, and they were used, probably, far more than they will be now. The owner proposes to pull down the stables, waggon sheds, brew houses and various places, and build mansions in the place of those buildings which were there before. He proposes to improve the centre of this place, pulling down the brewery, and making a garden round it, leaving a sufficient space for the cabs or the carriages of people who will live in this place, or who are desirous of coming to call upon those who are there. The whole place, from beginning to end, is as private as it can possibly be. It is true that the owner proposes to let it out in flats, but he reserves to himself the absolute right over the whole of this piece of land, and people simply have the rights which he chooses to give them. That being so, can this quadrangle or courtyard of these houses be called a street, or said to be laid out for carriage traffic? The 7th section says that before any person commences to form or lay out any street, whether intended to be used for carriage traffic or for foot traffic, he must make an application to the county council. Now, if the argument for the county council were correct, the footway up to the house seems to me to come within the definition of street, because a portion of the ground which he has for the purpose of building a house on is used for foot traffic. It is used for people going up to the house, and I do not see where one is to draw the line if that were a street. If the owner is not to be allowed to keep private a courtyard, as has been done in this case, I cannot see how he can deal with any portion of his land which is devoted to the passing to and fro of people going to the house, or can reserve to himself the right of making that roadway or footway which he thinks most suitable for communication. In this particular case the claim is made under a section which would make it necessary for the owners to devote 40 feet of this road to a carriage-way, or where there was no roadway, 20 feet of this space to a footway, absolutely useless, and absolutely inconsistent with the rights of private owners. I quite agree that we are not justified in considering ourselves bound by the case of the London County Council v. Davis, because that was the converse of this case, and the magistrate found the other way, and the court held that the magistrate was justified in finding as he did, at any rate that they could not hold that he was wrong. Although we cannot say that that is a direct authority by which we are bound in this case, where the magistrate has found the other way, we are entitled to say this, that not only in that case, but in almost all the cases in which this question has been argued, the learned judges used such an example as this to show that it would not be a street if the owner proposed to deal with it as he proposed to deal with it in this case. Therefore, we are entitled to call in aid the arguments used, and the statements of the judges of what their views would be in a case similar to the case now before us. It is true, as stated for the county council, that the word "street" has never been absolutely defined, but there are many cases in which it has been held that that which has been done here is not a "street." We are not called upon here to lay down a definition of what is a street, but we are entitled to say whether or not this is a street within the meaning of this particular section. We have both come to the conclusion that it is not a street within that section, and that, therefore, the conviction must be quashed.

Lawrance, J., concurred.

Appeal allowed with costs, and conviction quashed.

Solicitors for the appellant, Godden, Son, & Holme.

Solicitor for the respondents, W. A. Blaxland.

Lunacy.

(A. L. Smith and Rigby, L.JJ.) Nov. 27; Dec. 5.

In re CATHERINE SALT. (a.)

Lunatic — Person lawfully detained — Settled land — Tenant for life—Power of leasing—Exercise of power by receiver duly constituted—Settled Land Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 38), ss. 6, 62—Lunacy Act, 1890 (53 Vict. c. 5), s. 116, sub-sections 1 (c), 2; s. 120 (h).

The court has power, under sections 116 and 120 of the Lunacy Act, 1890, to authorize the committee of the estate of a lunatic, lawfully detained but not so found by inquisition, to exercise the powers of leasing given to the lunatic as tenant for life of settled land.

In re Baggs (a note to the case of In re X.), 42 W. R. 657, [1894] 2 Ch. 415, distinguished.

The official solicitor having been duly appointed receiver, under section 116 of the Lunacy Act, 1890, of the estate of Catherine Salt, a lunatic lawfully detained, but not so found by inquisition, applied to the court for an order, under section 120 of the same Act, that he might be at liberty to execute the powers of leasing vested in the lunatic as tenant for life of certain property under the will of her late husband. The receiver desired to execute the lease of a public-house, known as the Forge Inn, Cardiff, to an intending lessee, and the master had found that the proposed lease would be beneficial to the estate of the tenant for life and remainderman.

When the application went before Kay, L.J., in chambers it was supposed to be determined, or at any rate prejudiced, by In re Baggs, a note to the case of In re X., 42 W. R. 657, [1894] 2 Ch. 415.

Kay, L.J., referred the matter to the court.

Ingle Joyce, for the application.—I submit that full power is given to the judge to make the order under section 120 (h) of the Lunacy Act, 1890, and that then the power will fall within section 6 of the Settled Land Act, 1882, and not within section 62 of that Act, which has no application to the present case. If In re Baggs has the effect which it was supposed to have, the result will be that in every case where a power of leasing is required to be exercised, the expense of the inquisition and the appointment of a committee must be incurred, even in small estates.

Cur. adv. vult.

Dec. 5.—A. L. SMITH, L.J., read the following judgment:—This is an application by the official solicitor who has been appointed under section 116 of the Lunacy Act, 1890, to exercise the powers of a committee of the estate of Catherine Salt, a person lawfully detained as a lunatic though not so found by inquisition, for an order under section 120 of that Act, that he may be at liberty to execute the powers of leasing vested in Catherine Salt, as tenant for life in the property in question under the will of her late husband, and in particular to execute a lease of a public house called the Forge Inn, Cardiff, to an intending lessee, and the question is whether such an order can be made.

The proposed lease has been found by the master to be a beneficial lease to the estate of Catherine Salt and the persons entitled in remainder.

It is not a lease within the powers of leasing contained in the will, and the leasing powers in part 4, s. 6, of the Settled Land Act, 1882, will have to be resorted to.

By section 120 of the Lunacy Act, 1890, it is enacted: "The judge may by order authorize and direct the committee of the estate of a lunatic" (in which position the present applicant stands by virtue of section 116 (2)) to (h) "execute any power of leasing vested in a lunatic having a limited estate only in the property over which the power extends."

If the lease proposed to be executed had been a lease within the power contained in the will it would clearly have been within the express terms of this section, for Catherine Salt had a limited estate only in the property in question, she being tenant for life thereof.

By section 6 of the Settled Land Act, 1882, it is enacted that "a tenant for life may lease the settled land or any part thereof," to state it shortly, in the way proposed to be done in the present case.

Rebus hic stantibus (where is the difficulty)? It appears to me that there is no difficulty whatever, for the case falls within the express terms of the two Acts.

But it is suggested that there is a decision in this court of In re Martha Baggs (a widow), reported in the note to In re X., which stands in the way.

In my judgment it does nothing of the kind. In that case an application was made under section 116, sub-section 2 of the Lunacy Act, 1890, not for an order to lease, but for an order to "sell property 'belonging' to the lunatic," she having only a life estate therein, and this court held that the applicant could not bring that case within that sub-section, because the property did not 'belong' to the lunatic, she having only a life interest therein, and that he could not bring the case within the provisions of section 62 of the Settled Land Act, 1882, because that section only applied to a tenant for life, who was a lunatic so found by inquisition, which Martha Baggs was not; and this court therefore held that it was a case not provided for by either the Lunacy Act, 1890, or the Settled Land Act, 1882.

But in my judgment the present case is expressly in terms provided for by section 120 of the Lunacy Act, 1890.

We are not, therefore, fettered by this case, for it does not apply to the present case, and in my judgment an order giving power to execute the proposed lease can be legally made, and we make such order accordingly.

RIGBY, L.J., gave judgment to the same effect.

Application allowed.

Solicitor, The Official Solicitor.

(a.) Reported by W. SHALLCROSS GODDARD, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Court of Appeal.

From Chan. Div. (Lindley, A. L. Smith, and Rigby, L.JJ.) Dec. 4, 5.

In re J. H. JONES. (a.)

Solicitor and client—Costs—Business in magistrates court and court of quarter sessions—Agreement as to costs—Jurisdiction of High Court to set aside—Attorneys and Solicitors Act, 1870 (33 & 34 Vict. c. 28), ss. 4, 8, 10, 15.

A documnt signed by a client alone relating to the payment of costs may be "an agreement in writing" within section 4 of the Attorneys and Solicitors Act, 1870.

(a.) Reported by W. SHALLCROSS GODDARD, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Such an agreement relating to business done by a solicitor in a police-court or in a court of quarter sessions is subject to taxation in the usual way, and may be examined, and, if necessary, set aside by a judge of the High Court.

The expressions "the court" or "a judge" in the Act of 1870 are inapplicable to a police magistrate or a court of quarter sessions, and are only applicable to a court of law or equity having in the ordinary exercise of its jurisdiction power to set aside such agreements.

So held, affirming Stirling, J. (ante, p. 10).

Appeal from a decision of Stirling, J., reported ante, p. 10.

A client took out a summons against his solicitor, J. H. Jones, asking for the delivery and taxation of a bill of costs under the following circumstances:—The client was, in October, 1893, committed for trial to the Cardiff Quarter Sessions on a criminal charge. The solicitor was retained by him to defend him. The client thereupon paid the solicitor £25 on account of costs, and two days later signed a document agreeing to pay a lump sum of £75 in satisfaction of all the costs, the solicitor threatening that unless such agreement were signed he would withdraw from the defence of the client. The client was tried at sessions and acquitted. He subsequently paid the balance of the £75 and took out the summons as above.

At the hearing of the summons a preliminary objection was taken that the document, not being signed by the solicitor, was not an agreement within the Attorneys and Solicitors Act, 1870; that it related to business done, and could not be set aside. A further objection was taken that even if the agreement came within the provisions of the Act, the High Court had no jurisdiction under section 8 of the Act to set aside the agreement, the proper tribunal to deal with the matter being either the magistrates' court or the court of quarter sessions.

Stirling, J., overruled the objections, and ordered delivery of a bill of costs and taxation, and restored the summons to the paper.

The solicitor appealed.

Section 4 of the Attorneys and Solicitors Act, 1870, is as follows:—"An attorney or solicitor may make an agreement in writing with his client respecting the amount and manner of payment for the whole or any part of any past or future services, fees, charges, or disbursements, in respect of business done or to be done by such attorney or solicitor, whether as an attorney or solicitor or as an advocate or conveyancer, either by a gross sum or by commission or percentage, or by a salary or otherwise, and either at the same or at a greater or at a less rate as or than the rate at which he would otherwise be entitled to be remunerated, subject to the provisions and conditions in this part of this Act contained."

Section 8:—"No action or suit shall be brought or instituted upon any such agreement, but every question respecting the validity or effect of any such agreement may be enforced or set aside without suit or action on motion or petition of any person or the representative of any person a party to such agreement, or being or alleged to be liable to pay or being or claiming to be entitled to be paid the costs, fees, charges, or disbursements in respect of which the agreement is made by the court in which the business, or any part thereof, was done, or a judge thereof; or if the business was not done in any court, then where the amount payable under the agreement exceeds £50 by any superior court of law or equity or a judge thereof, and where such amount does not exceed £50, by the judge of the county court which would have jurisdiction in an action upon the agreement."

Section 10:—"When the amount agreed for under any such agreement has been paid by or on behalf of the client, or by any person chargeable with or entitled to pay the same, any court or judge having jurisdiction to examine and enforce such an agreement may, upon application by the person who has paid such amount, within twelve months after the payment thereof, if it appears to such court or judge that the special circumstances of the case require the agreement to be reopened, reopen the same, and order the costs, fees, charges, and disbursements to be taxed, and the whole or any portion of the amount received by the attorney or solicitor to be repaid by him, on such terms and conditions as to the court or judge may seem just."

Section 15:—"Except as in this part of this Act provided, the bill of an attorney or solicitor for the amount due under an agreement made in pursuance of the provisions of this Act shall not be subject to any taxation nor to the provisions of the Act of 6 & 7 Vict. c. 73 and the Acts amending the same respecting the signing and delivery of the bill of an attorney or solicitor."

Dunham, for the appellant.—I submit that the High Court has no jurisdiction on account of the Solicitors Act. Until the passing of that Act there was no power whatever for a client to agree to pay a lump sum for costs; the client, having once agreed to pay a lump sum, cannot reopen the question afterwards.

Ashton-Cross, for the respondent, was not called upon.

LINDLEY, L.J.—This is an appeal from an order of Stirling, J., setting aside an agreement between a solicitor and a client as to the payment of costs. The point raised by Mr. Dunham is that the application to set aside this agreement was made to the wrong court. The costs in question were incurred in relation to defending the client in a criminal proceeding before a magistrate and before the court of quarter sessions. The client was committed for trial by the magistrate, but at the quarter sessions he was acquitted. Mr. Dunham contends that in order to set aside this agreement the proper course is to take it either to the magistrate's court or to the court of quarter sessions. He relies upon the provisions of the Attorneys and Solicitors Act, 1870, and says that, according to the language of that Act these costs have been incurred in a proceeding in a court, and that the court having jurisdiction to set aside the agreement is the court in which the proceeding took place.

Now, that contention strikes an English lawyer as rather startling, because until 1870 nobody ever imagined that either a magistrate or justices at quarter sessions had jurisdiction to set aside an agreement.

It would be strange if the Legislature, in dealing with agreements between solicitors and their clients and in providing machinery for setting aside such agreements, had made such a very large alteration in the law without there being any sign of an intention to alter the law with regard to magistrates and quarter sessions in other respects. It must be admitted that the Act is awkwardly drawn. The material sections are 4, 8, 10, and 15. The Act contains no definition of a "court," and it is an Act to amend the law relating to the remuneration of attorneys and solicitors, not an Act to extend the jurisdiction of magistrates or quarter sessions. Section 4, which in effect enables a solicitor to make an agreement with his client as to his remuneration for work done without the necessity of taxation, says this: [His lordship read the section, and continued:—] That is to say, the section renders lawful that which was previously considered illegal—namely, an agreement by a solicitor with his client for a lump sum. There can be no question that the expression "whole or any part of any past or future services," and so on, includes business done in all courts and everywhere else.

Then follows this proviso: [His lordship read the proviso, and continued:—] That does not look as if any court like a criminal court were intended. Then the section goes on: [His lordship read the remainder of the section, and continued:—] That is the first time that the expression "court or a judge" is used in this Act of Parliament. That must mean a court or a judge qualified to try an action at law or hear a suit in equity.

Then section 8 provides that any such agreement may be enforced or set aside "by the court in which the business or any part thereof was done, or a judge thereof, or if the business was not done in any court, then where the amount payable under the agreement exceeds £50 by any superior court of law or equity or a judge thereof, and where such amount does not exceed £50 by the judge of a county court which would have jurisdiction in an action upon the agreement."

Mr. Dunham says that the work done by the solicitor in this case was work done in a court, and that the court which alone has jurisdiction to set aside this agreement is the court in which the business was done. But it is to be observed that the expression used is "by the court or a judge thereof." That language appears to be inapplicable to a police magistrate and to the court of quarter sessions. Obviously the term "court or a judge" means a court of law or equity which in the exercise of its ordinary jurisdiction has power to set aside agreements of this kind.

The other sections do not throw any light on the matter or carry it any further. No doubt the language of the sections which Mr. Dunham has picked out is, to some extent, in favour of his contention; but when I ask myself, Is this language so plain as to give magistrates or justices sitting at quarter sessions a new jurisdiction? my answer is that it is not. It is also to be observed that under the previous Act these costs would have been taxed by the Court of Queen's Bench, and it is absurd to say that Parliament intended to transfer the jurisdiction from the Court of Queen's Bench to the court of quarter sessions. The appeal must be dismissed.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. This is a proceeding taken by a client who was tried at Cardiff for receiving stolen goods with the knowledge that they were stolen. He retained Mr. Jones as his solicitor first before the magistrate and afterwards before the court of quarter sessions. Jones took £25 for his expenses before the magistrate. I see no objection to that. But after Mordecai had been committed, and when the day of the trial was drawing nigh, Jones said to him, "If you don't agree to pay me £75 for my costs, I withdraw from the case"; and under this pressure Mordecai acceded to his request and gave a charge on his property for the amount, and he afterwards paid the balance of the £75. So that Jones has in his pocket £75 for defending his client before the magistrate and at quarter sessions. Mordecai was acquitted and is at large, and he refuses to be bound by this agreement. In these circumstances the case came on before Stirling, J., for the purpose of having the agreement set aside and getting an order for taxation of these costs. Mr. Dunham took this point. He said: "Stirling, J., had no jurisdiction to set aside this agreement or to make an order to tax because of section 8 of the Attorneys and Solicitors Act, 1870, which gives the court jurisdiction to enforce or set aside agreements for costs. Under that section the proper court to set aside this agreement is not the Court of Chancery, but is either the court of the magistrate or the court of quarter sessions." If it can be made out that these courts have jurisdiction, we must give effect to that argument. But if not, the point is a bad one. I agree that section 8 is not artificially drawn, but looking at it as a whole it is obvious what the Legislature intended. Section 4 enables a solicitor to enter into a bargain with his client for a lump sum. Section 8 commences: "No action or suit shall be brought or instituted upon any such agreement." Now what does that mean? Did anybody ever hear of bringing an action or instituting a suit before justices either at petty sessions or quarter sessions? The section then proceeds:—[His lordship read on, and continued:—] The words "action," "suit," "motion," "petition," are all applicable to proceedings in the superior courts, or possibly also to proceedings in the county courts. Then what is the meaning of the words "the court or a judge thereof"? Who ever heard of a magistrate being described as a judge of a court. They are justices of petty sessions. And the same observation applies to the Court of Quarter Sessions. They are all justices. The language of the section is inapplicable to them. The section then provides a remedy in the case of "business not done in any court"—i.e., any court having jurisdiction to enforce or set aside the agreement. [His lordship read the concluding part of the section, and continued:—] It is suggested that in the present case the effect of this section is to transfer the jurisdiction to set aside the agreement from the courts which have heretofore exercised it to the magistrate or the justices at quarter sessions. In my judgment this contention cannot prevail. Sections 10 and 15 neither add to nor detract from section 8. The technical objection therefore fails, and, there being ample evidence of pressure, I think that this agreement ought to be set aside and an order to tax made.

RIGBY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I agree with the reasons already given, and especially the reasons with respect to the words "the court or a judge thereof." So far as I know it is neither the legal practice nor the common practice to speak of magistrates or justices as judges. No doubt they have important judicial functions to perform, but they have been called justices for centuries, and primâ facie when the Legislature uses the words "a court or a judge thereof" it is intended to exclude courts in which justices sit. Then you find the functions imposed by the statute are functions of a character which never have been imposed upon justices. So there can be no doubt that "business not done in any court" in section 8 means business not done in any court having a judge who has jurisdiction to set aside agreements. As soon as the technical difficulties are out of the way this is clearly a proper case for an order to be made. The appeal must be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the appellant, Riddell, Vaizey, & Smith, for J. H. Jones, Cardiff; Vallance & Vallance, for Hervey E. Murly, Bristol.

From Chan. Div. (Lord Herschell; and A. L. Smith and Rigby, L.JJ.) Nov. 19, 21.

SIMPSON v. MAYOR, &c., OF GODMANCHESTER. (a.)

Easement—Prescription—User—Presumption in law of lost grant.

S. was the owner and occupier of three locks on a certain river, and certain navigation and other rights on the same river. The G. Corporation had for many years exercised the right to open the lock-gates in all times of flood, without opposition from S.'s predecessors in title. S. brought an action to restrain the defendants from exercising any such right. The G. Corporation, as owners of the adjoining lands at this part of the river, claimed an easement to open the gates, or, alternatively, the presumption of a lost grant.

Held, that a valid easement had been created in favour of the G. Corporation, and that such could be supported by the presumption of a lost grant.

Appeal from a decision of Wright, J., sitting as an additional judge of the Chancery Division.

The plaintiff was the owner and occupier of three locks on the river Ouse, known as Godmanchester, Houghton, and Hemingford locks, and also held certain navigation and other rights over that part of the river Ouse where the locks were situate.

The defendants claimed the right to open the lock-gates at all times when the river was in flood, and alleged that they had exercised this right from time immemorial.

In 1689 one moiety of the navigation and all rights under various charters and Acts had become vested in one Henry Ashley. In the same year, by an indenture made between the bailiffs, assistants, and commonalty of Godmanchester of the one part, and Henry Ashley, of the other part, it was agreed (inter alia), that it should be lawful to and for the miller of the said Godmanchester mills for the time being, and in his default or omission for such person or persons, officer or officers, as should be thereupon appointed by the bailiffs of Godmanchester for the time being, for ever thereafter, upon every likelihood and appearance of any flood or outrage of water, to set open, and keep open, or else to take off the gates of the aforesaid sluices, and also all the gates of the sluices in or near Houghton, and also the gates of the sluices in or near the Milnes at or near Hemingford Grey in the said county of Huntingdon, and lay them upon the land by the side of the said sluices until the waters should be fallen and the floods well abated."

The defendants based their right on an easement to cause the waters of the river Ouse to pass through the sluices or locks in time of flood for the benefit of the borough of Godmanchester, and as a protection for the lands and the occupiers thereof. The easement was claimed under 2 & 3 Will. 4, c. 71, and under the deed of 1689, or under some lost grant. The plaintiff denied the existence of any right, said that the sluice gates had only been opened by permission of the lock-owners, and claimed an injunction to restrain the defendants from interfering with the locks. Wright, J., refused the injunction. The plaintiff appealed.

E. R. Simpson, for the appellant.—Nothing short of the grant of an easement would be binding on the plaintiff, and this claim is not an easement; it is too indefinite and uncertain, is destructive of the servient tenement, and differs in important respects from all known easements. [Lord HERSCHELL referred to the definition of an easement in Gale on Easements, and applied it to the present case.] An easement cannot be legally vested in anyone but the owner of the dominant tenement: Gale on Easements, 4th ed., at pp. 8, 9; Bro. Abr. Graunt, pl. 130, cited in Ackroyd v. Smith, 10 C. B. 164, at p. 188. [Crackanthorpe, Q.C., referred to Goodman v. Corporation of Saltash, 31 W. R. 293, 7 App. Cas. 633.] That case has no application to easements, and was a case between trustee and cestui que trust, and not between the corporation and a third party as here. Secondly, a lost grant cannot be presumed, because the user is accounted for by the deed of 1689, on which the defendants rely: Attorney-General v. Horner, 33 W. R. 93, 14 Q. B. D. 245. The defendants have not proved that the exercise of the right claimed is beneficial to any of the alleged dominant tenements, and the plaintiff has proved that it is actually prejudicial to some of them.

Crackanthorpe, Q.C., and T. T. Methold, for the respondents, were stopped by the court.

Lord HERSCHELL.—I am of opinion that the decision of the learned judge ought to be affirmed. So far back as living memory goes—and there is ground for inferring that for a period anterior to living memory—the Corporation of Godmanchester have exercised the right in times of flood of raising certain sluices or locks which now belong to the plaintiff, who has recently become owner of the navigation upon which the locks or sluices are situate. The plaintiff comes into court for an injunction to restrain the corporation from exercising this alleged right, and he asserts that the defendants have no such right. The law on this subject has been laid down in Philipps v. Halliday, [1891] A. C. 228, at p. 231, 39 W. R. Dig. 81, in terms which were concurred in by the House of Lords as follows: "Where there has been a long continued possession in assertion of a right, it is a well-settled principle of English law that the right should be presumed to have had a legal origin, if such a legal origin was possible, and that the courts will presume that those acts were done, and those circumstances existed which were necessary to the creation of a valid title."

The question, therefore, is, Can the corporation have acquired the right to open the sluice gates in any valid, lawful manner? That question admits of only one answer. Mr. Simpson says they can not, because this is not an easement and is not a right which the law can recognize as having a legal origin. But in my opinion it is an easement within the definition contained in the first chapter of "Gale on Easements," which is a perfectly correct definition. Easements are of various characters, and it is a fallacy to suppose that in order to establish the existence of an easement it must be brought within some particular class of easements which have been previously recognized. Where a landowner grants to another the right to do something on his land for the benefit of the land of the grantee, that, primâ facie, is an easement; and the right here claimed by the corporation falls within that general principle. It is said that there is here no evidence to show how the right came into existence, but if the corporation are the owners and occupiers of lands which can be affected by the fact of the sluices being open or shut, then those lands may be regarded as the dominant tenements in respect to which that easement is granted by the owner of the servient tenement, and it will be presumed that the grant was made in respect of such tenements as would be affected by the exercise of the right claimed. Then it is objected that in some cases the corporation are the owners but not the occupiers of the land. But that is not material, as there is no difficulty in supposing that the corporation could exercise the right for the benefit of their tenants; the tenement is benefited by the act done, whether the owner does it or the occupier does it. Therefore, apart from any deed or grant, on the clearest principles of law, this alleged right is capable of a legal origin, and must be presumed to have had a legal origin. But, further, I am not satisfied that the right cannot be rested upon the grant of 1689, coupled with a lost grant which there seems to be every reason for presuming. [His lordship referred to the deed, and continued:—] Upon the true construction of this deed it amounts to the grant of an easement to the corporation as owners of the Godmanchester Mills. There is no difficulty in granting to the owners of the mills the right to open the sluices or locks now in question. But it is said that at the date of the grant Ashley was owner only of an undivided moiety of the two sluices, other than Godmanchester, but, assuming that the right cannot be rested on this deed alone, the owners of the other undivided moiety insist that the purchase of the Godmanchester sluices is to be taken to have been made on their behalf as well as on behalf of Ashley, and the court so holds. Obviously, therefore, they cannot take the benefit of this deed without also submitting to the burdens; and, if a grant is necessary to complete the defendant's title, a grant ought to be presumed, having regard to the lengthened period of the user. Therefore, it is immaterial to consider whether the user is referable to the deed of 1689 or not, since in either case there is a legal foundation upon which the claim can be rested, and to which effect ought to be given in accordance with well-established principles. The appeal ought to be dismissed.

(a.) Reported by W. SHALLCROSS GODDARD, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

A. L. SMITH and RIGBY, L.JJ., concurred.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the appellant, Batten, Proffitt, & Scott.

Solicitors for the respondents, Grubbe & Co., for Hunnybun & Sons, Huntingdon.

High Court of Justice.

Chan. Div. } Nov. 27.
Chitty, J. }

BATES v. KESTERTON. (a.)

Married woman—Separate use—Restraint on anticipation—Settled Land Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 38), s. 2, sub-section (1); s. 61 sub-sections (2).(6); s. 58, sub-section (1) viii.—Settled Land Act, 1884 (47 & 48 Vict. c. 18), s. 8—"Settlement"—"Tenant for life."

A married woman entitled in possession under a will to the equitable fee of a share of realty for her separate use without power of anticipation is not a tenant for life, and has not the powers of a tenant for life under the Settled Land Act, 1882, of the share, there being no "settlement" of such share within the definition in section 2, sub-section (1), of the Act.

Section 8 of the Settled Land Act, 1884, enacting that, for the purposes of the Act of 1882, the estate of a tenant by the curtesy is to be deemed an estate arising under a settlement made by his wife, refers to a tenant by the curtesy in possession only.

Action.

Solomon Hilbert, by his will dated in 1863, directed that his debts, funeral and testamentary expenses should be paid, and after making certain bequests he bequeathed to his sons his leasehold messuages or tenements and premises known as Nos. 1 and 2, Cottage-road, Pimlico, upon trust to pay the net yearly rents and profits of the said premises (after payment of the ground rent and other outgoings) to the testator's daughter, Mary Bates, wife of Joseph Bates, during her life, and after her decease unto and amongst all and every the child or children of the said Mary Bates in equal shares as tenants in common. The testator appointed his said sons executors of his will, and the testator declared that the leasehold premises so bequeathed to each of his said granddaughters should be for her sole and separate use, and free from the debts, control, or engagements of any husband, and that their receipts respectively, notwithstanding coverture, should be a sufficient discharge for any moneys payable to them respectively, and that neither of the testator's said granddaughters should have power to anticipate the same in any manner whatever.

The testator died in 1866, and his daughter Mary Bates died in 1893. In 1890 Nos. 1 and 2, Cottage-road aforesaid were purchased by the receiver for the metropolitan police district under his statutory powers, and the purchase-money was paid into court. The court in 1891 sanctioned the investment of part in the purchase of freehold hereditaments known as No. 87, South End, Croydon, and the same were conveyed to the trustees of the above will in fee simple upon the trusts therein expressed concerning the said leasehold premises so far as the same were applicable to freeholds.

The plaintiffs, who were the four surviving children of Mary Bates, in April, 1895, had agreed to sell to the defendant, and the defendant had agreed to purchase, the fee simple of No. 87, South End, but a difficulty arose in regard to the conveyance of the shares of the plaintiffs Ada Mary, wife of Henry Farthing, and Edith Ann, wife of Nicholas Giles, owing to the restraint on anticipation under the above will. They were both born in the testator's lifetime, and married after 1882, and it was admitted at the bar that they both had issue heritable. The above action was for specific performance by the purchase of the agreement, but now came on upon notice of motion for judgment upon admissions; and the only point that the court had to decide was whether Mrs. Farthing and Mrs. Giles were or had the powers of tenants for life of their shares within the meaning of the Settled Land Act, 1882.

Byrne, Q.C., Macmorran, and Low, for the plaintiffs.—The shares of the two married women being subject to restraint against anticipation, are settled land within the Settled Land Acts, and the married women have the powers of tenants for life under those Acts. The share of each is held in trust for her separate use for life, and afterwards for her husband, if he survives her, for his life as tenant by the curtesy. The wife here cannot (except by will) defeat her husband's curtesy: Cooper v. Macdonald, 26 W. R. 377, 7 Ch. D. 288. [CHITTY, J., referred to Taylor v. Meads, 13 W. R. 394, 4 De G. J. & S. 597.] The land, therefore, is settled on persons in succession within section 2, sub-section (1), of the Settled Land Act, 1882. See also sections 61, 58, sub-section (1) viii. and the note thereon in Wolstenholme's Conveyancing Acts, 7th ed., p. 373, and the Settled Land Act, 1884, s. 8, which support our contention.

Hewitt, for the defendant.—There is no such settlement as is contended for here. The husband has no present estate, only a spes successionis at most, and his curtesy, if it arises, will arise by operation of law, and not under or by virtue of the testator's will. Section 61 does not apply to a case like this, and section 58, sub-section (1) viii., and the 8th section of the Act of 1884 contemplate a tenant by the curtesy in possession.

(a.) Reported by J. F. WALEY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

He also referred to In re Tippetts' and Newbould's Contract, 36 W. R. 597, 37 Ch. D. 444, and In re Currey, 35 W. R. 326.

The two married women can only make a title by getting an order under section 39 of the Conveyancing Act, 1881, removing the restraint on anticipation to which their shares are subject.

Byrne, Q.C., in reply, referred to Co. Litt, 67a, and Hood and Challis on the Conveyancing and Settled Land Acts, 4th ed., p. 300.

CHITTY, J.—This is a question between vendor and purchaser. The vendors contend that the two married women, each of whom is plainly entitled to a share under the will, are or have the powers of tenants for life within the meaning of the Settled Land Act, 1882, by virtue of the Act of 1884. The vendors' argument results in this, that because the married women are restrained from anticipation, therefore they can dispose of their shares in the land under the Settled Land Act. The property is now freehold, and I must treat the property as freehold. [His lordship here read the will and stated the facts as far as material.] The two married women were living at the death of the testator, and the limitations and restrictions of the will as to the granddaughters, though addressed to a class, are, for the reasons stated by me and the Court of Appeal in In re Russell, Dorrell v. Dorrell, ante, p. 100, [1895] 2 Ch. 698, good, and not void for remoteness.

It is said for the vendors that there is a settlement within the meaning of the Settled Land Acts, and the married women have the powers of, or actually are, tenants for life thereunder. It was admitted at the bar that they had issue, and the issue was capable of inheriting; and it is said that the husbands are entitled to an estate by the curtesy, and that, therefore, not by the words but by the effect of the will there was a settlement.

This is plain, there is only one estate created by the will, and that is limited to the married woman. In Taylor v. Meads, where property was vested in trust for a married woman, her heirs and assigns, with a declaration that she should, notwithstanding coverture, stand possessed for her separate use, Lord Westbury said, "The estate given to Elizabeth Meads," the married woman, "is one and entire, being the equitable estate in fee, with a declaration, the effect of which is that her husband shall have no interest in the estate so devised, nor shall the wife be under any disability with respect to such estate by reason of her existing coverture, but shall have the same rights of enjoyment and disposition as if she were a single and not a married woman" (4 De J. & S., at p. 607). There was no restraint on anticipation there. That the estate was one and entire was made a ground of Lord Westbury's decision. In Cooper v. Macdonald, where the married woman was entitled for her separate use, and also restrained from alienation of the rents and profits, she died having by her will devised the estate for her children, but the husband's assignees claimed his curtesy, and the Master of the Rolls held that there was none, because of the will and disposition of the estate by the wife, but the restraint did not prevent the wife barring the entail and acquiring the fee, and the wife, having thereby acquired an equitable fee to her separate use, had power to defeat her husband's right to curtesy by devising the estate. The Master of the Rolls quoted the above passage from Lord Westbury's judgment in Taylor v. Meads with approbation, 7 Ch. D., at p. 293.

I think on the construction of this will that there is separate use annexed to the married women's equitable estate in fee, and they have power, as against their husbands and heirs, of disposition of their shares by will, but not by deed, because of the restraint on anticipation. If their husbands should die, the separate use will be free from the restraint, and they will be able to dispose of their interests. In my opinion there is by this will one estate vested in the married women subject to the restraint against anticipation.

I now come to the Act of 1882. Section 2, sub-section (1), enacts that any instrument under or by virtue of which land stands limited to or in trust for any persons by way of succession creates a settlement. It is said for the vendors that the effect of the restraint is to bring the case within the section, and, therefore, the land now stands limited for persons by way of succession. That argument is incorrect.

It is not under or by virtue of the will that the husband, if he survives his wife and she leaves no will, takes curtesy, but by virtue of the general law as an incident of the wife's estate in fee, just as in the converse case the wife would take dower. But the case does not stand on this section alone. There is section 61 of the Act. There is nothing in the foregoing provisions of the Act which makes a married woman entitled in fee in possession either a tenant for life or a person having the powers of a tenant for life. There was no need for it. There is also nothing which would apply to the case of a married woman in the position of the married woman in Taylor v. Meads, entitled, that is, in possession to the fee simple of lands settled for her separate use with the right of immediate disposition of the fee. Sub-section (1) runs thus: "The foregoing provisions of this Act do not apply to the case of a married woman." Sub-section (2) deals with the case of a married woman entitled for her separate use, who, if she had not been a married woman, would have been a tenant for life or have had the powers of a tenant for life under the Act, and a married woman entitled in fee simple for her separate use is not within it. Sub-sections (3), (4), and (5) are not material. Sub-section (6) says that a restraint on anticipation shall not prevent the exercise by a married woman of any power under the Act, so that where she is or has the powers of a tenant for life a mere restraint is not to prevent the exercise of her powers; and this provision is in conformity with the general scheme of the Act. But the section does not say because a married woman is restrained from anticipation therefore she has the powers of a tenant for life under the Act.

But it is said that as the husband may take curtesy he may be said to be initiate tenant by the curtesy. The Act of 1882 enumerates among the persons having the powers of a tenant for life under the Act a tenant by the curtesy (section 58, sub-section (1) viii.), but the section expressly says when his estate or interest is in possession. The tenant by the curtesy referred to in the section means, therefore, a tenant by the curtesy in possession. Then the Act of 1884, s. 8, enacts that, for the purposes of the Act of 1882, the estate of a tenant by the curtesy is to be deemed an estate arising under a settlement made by his wife. That was passed to remove some difficulty of construction in regard to the estate of a tenant by the curtesy under the Act of 1882, and again means a tenant by the curtesy in possession. These references to the estates by the curtesy do not assist the vendors for the reasons stated by me.

There is, I repeat, but one estate in the wives, and no limitation to the husbands by virtue of any settlement, but the husbands, if they survive their wives, will take by the general equitable doctrine, which, in this respect, follows the common law. Putting the whole case together, I am of opinion that the vendors have not succeeded in establishing that because the married women are restrained from anticipation, therefore they are or have the powers of tenants for life within the meaning of the Settled Land Act, 1882.

The court made an order binding the interest of the married women under section 39 of the Conveyancing and Law of Property Act, 1881.

Solicitors for the plaintiffs, Mead & Sons.

Solicitors for the defendant, Preston, Stow, & Preston.

Chan. Div.
Kekewich, J. } Oct. 26, 31.

In re ANGERSTEIN.
ANGERSTEIN v. ANGESTEIN. (a.)

Will — Heirlooms — Actual possession — Chattels bequeathed in trust for person for time being entitled to "actual possession" of real estate.

Where real estate was limited to a person for life and to his son in tail, and chattels were bequeathed as heirlooms in trust to go along with and to be enjoyed by the person for the time being entitled to "actual possession" of the real estate,

Held, that the tenant in tail, who, having previously barred the entail, died during the lifetime of the tenant for life, had no such right in the heirlooms annexed to the hereditaments as to enable him to transfer them.

Summons.

John Julius Angerstein, by his will dated the 16th of January, 1823, gave his real estates in the counties of Norfolk, Suffolk, Kent, and Lincoln, to his son John Angerstein for life, with remainder to the issue of his said son in such part and shares and in such manner as his said son John Angerstein and his said son's then wife Amelia Angerstein should jointly, or as the survivor of them should, appoint, with remainder over in strict settlement. And the testator gave his leasehold estates, including his house "Woodlands" at Blackheath, on trusts corresponding to the uses of his freehold estate (subject to a certain restriction), and gave and bequeathed the contents of the said house (save and except pictures, plate, and books) upon trust to permit and suffer the same to go along with and be considered as heirlooms in his said house, so far as the rules of law and equity would permit; and as to certain plate, books, and pictures, the testator gave them to his trustees upon trust "to permit his said son to use and enjoy the same during his natural life, and after his said son's decease upon trust to permit and suffer the same to go along with and to be used and enjoyed by the person or persons who should for the time being, by virtue of the limitations thereinbefore contained, be entitled to the actual possession of the said freehold estates in the county of Norfolk, as or in the nature of heirlooms to the same estates, so far as the rules of law and equity will permit."

The testator John Julius Angerstein died on the 29th of January, 1823.

By three indentures of settlement, dated respectively the 5th, 6th, and 7th of August, 1852, executed by John Angerstein under the powers given him by his father's will, the said freehold estates under the events which happened became vested in William Angerstein for life, with remainder to W. J. N. Angerstein in tail.

John Angerstein, by his will dated the 4th of November, 1854, bequeathed certain pictures and jewels and other chattels "to such person or persons and so and in such manner as that the same shall, so long as the rules of law and equity permit, go along with and be held and enjoyed by the person or persons who, under the said indenture of the 5th of August, 1852, and this my will, shall for the time being be entitled in possession to my mansion-house at Westing, . . . but so nevertheless that the same, or any part or parts thereof, shall not for the purpose of transmission vest absolutely in any tenant in tail by purchase of the said mansion-house, who shall not attain the age of twenty-one years," but that the issue inheritable under the limitations of the said indentures to the estate in tail of the person so dying should take the same premises "absolutely according to the order of limitation."

John Angerstein died on the 8th of April, 1858, and the whole of the said real estates became vested in possession in his son William Angerstein for life, with remainder to W. J. N. Angerstein in tail.

W. J. N. Angerstein attained twenty-one years of age on the 19th of September, 1864, and in 1866, with the concurrence of his father William Angerstein, barred his reversionary estate tail, and they shortly afterwards resettled the same real estates, subject to incumbrances, and by such resettlement the life estate of William Angerstein was restored—W. J. N. Angerstein became the next tenant for life, with remainder to his first and other sons successively in tail male.

In 1874 W. J. N. Angerstein became a bankrupt, but his bankruptcy was shortly afterwards annulled and his affairs liquidated by arrangement, the trustee in liquidation selling all the assets to William Angerstein, to whom they were conveyed, and assigned by an indenture dated the 13th of May, 1876.

W. J. N. Angerstein died on the 17th of February, 1892, and his only son J. H. W. Angerstein became tenant in tail male of the estates, subject to the prior life interest of William Angerstein.

This was an originating summons by William Angerstein claiming to be entitled to the said heirlooms under R. S. C., 1883, ord. 55, rr. 3, 4, and ord. 54a, against the said J. H. W. Angerstein (who claimed to be interested in the said heirlooms), the trustees of the will of John Angerstein, and the legal personal representative of the last surviving trustee of the will of John Julius Angerstein.

Vaughan Hawkins, for the plaintiff J. William Angerstein.—By the principle decided in Foley v. Burnell, 1 Bro. C. C. 274, 4 Bro. P. C. 319, and Martelli v. Holloway, L. R. 5 H. L. 532, 21 W. R. Dig. 278, it is clear that the chattels bequeathed in these wills become vested in W. J. N. Angerstein. As to the words "actual possession," there can be no difference between entitled to possession and entitled to actual possession. Lord Scarsdale v. Curzon, 1 J. & H. 40, 8 W. R. Ch. Dig. 73, was decided on the special words used there.

R. Younger, for J. H. W. Angerstein.—W. J. N. Angerstein never came into possession, and consequently W. Angerstein has only a life interest. [KEKEWICH, J.—Foley v. Burnell clearly applies to the gift in the will of J. Angerstein.] Lord Scarsdale v. Curzon establishes the proposition that "where there are clear words referring to 'actual possession' a tenant in tail who dies before coming into possession is excluded."

(a.) Reported by C. C. HENSLEY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

F. E. Farrer and Reginald Hughes, for the trustees.

Vaughan Hawkins in reply.—Even if "actual possession" means physical possession the absolute disentailment put an end to the existing limitations, and the restriction came to an end. In both Foley v. Burnell and Lord Scarsdale v. Curzon there were persons who might have become entitled afterwards by the force of the restriction there. Here the complete disentailment has removed that possibility, and it cannot be that the heirlooms were tied up for a longer period than the real estate.

KEKEWICH, J.—The plaintiff claims to be entitled to the heirlooms through the tenant in tail in remainder of the real estate, and if that tenant in tail in remainder of the real estate was entitled to the heirlooms, so as to be able to transfer them, it is clear that the plaintiff must succeed.

Dealing, first, with the will of John Angerstein, the clause relating to the heirlooms is one familiar to conveyancers, and is within the principle of the code of law as stated in Lord Scarsdale v. Curzon as being established by Foley v. Burnell and other cases, the effect of which is accurately stated by Mr. Theobald at page 592 of the 4th edition of his book on Wills: "A gift of personalty as heirlooms to the persons for the time being entitled to real estate, so far as the rules of law and equity permit, vests absolutely, not in a tenant for life of the real estate, but in the first tenant in tail at birth, whether he comes into possession or not."

I hold, therefore, that the plaintiff is absolutely entitled to the chattels settled by the second will—i.e., the will of John Angerstein. The words of the will of John Julius Angerstein present more difficulty. [His lordship read the clause as to the heirlooms.] The form is somewhat different to the clause in the other will, but the real difference consists in the insertion of the word "actual" before the word "possession." I cannot treat this as a mere elaboration by the person instructed to prepare the will. What I have to do is to say what is the proper legal meaning of the words before me. Here the testator has said that the heirlooms are to go to the person or persons for the time being entitled to the "actual" possession of the testator's freehold estate in Norfolk. Does the introduction of the word "actual" have any effect? If it were not there the first tenant in tail would take in accordance with the principle of Foley v. Burnell and other cases. Everything turns, therefore, on this word "actual," and, reading with the greatest attention the judgment in Lord Scarsdale v. Curzon, where the subject was fully considered, I come to the conclusion that the introduction of this word does make a large and important difference to the substance of this clause. The gift there was to the persons seised of or entitled to the "actual freehold," and not to persons entitled to the "actual possession"; but is there any difference in substance between these phrases? To my mind they really mean the same thing, and I see in the report of the case it is stated that the deed contained several clauses, in which the words "actual freehold" were so used that they could only be construed as meaning "freehold in possession": the argument was conducted on that footing, and the Vice-Chancellor came to that decision. In that case the Vice-Chancellor says (at pp. 65-67): "Heirlooms are given to be enjoyed, so far as the rules of law and equity will permit, by the person who shall be in the actual possession, or in the receipt of the rents and profits, but so as not to vest absolutely in any person thereby made tenant in tail by purchase, unless such person shall attain the age of twenty-one years; but on the death of such tenant in tail by purchase, the same shall go in the same manner as if they had been freeholds of inheritance, and had been thereby devised and settled accordingly," and "that is framed in order to tie up chattels to the person in possession." And later on he says: "In order to determine the construction of these clauses I must first settle the meaning of the phrase, 'The person seised of or entitled to the actual freehold.' In my opinion this can have no other meaning than the person in possession." And again he says, "I think it impossible to give to the words 'the person seized of or entitled to the actual freehold' any other meaning than the person in possession. I am far from saying that the words 'actual freehold' have any such technical sense; nor do I rest my opinion on the phraseology pointed out in some passages of Coke upon Littleton; but on the whole of this settlement I have no doubt about the meaning of these words." And again at p. 67 he says, "'Actual' must, therefore, mean in possession, or the clause would have no meaning." I dwell upon that because I am bound not to construe the words of this will in any manner contradictory to the rule of law laid down in the cases, whatever might be my opinion as to the grammatical meaning of the words themselves. Now I have here a clear authority—the authority of so eminent a judge as Wood, V.C.—that the words "actual freehold" and "actual possession" have the same meaning, and that the expression "actual possession" does take the words out of the rule established by Foley v. Burnell and other cases. The argument of counsel (probably Mr. Rolt) is thus set out in the report of Lord Scarsdale v. Curzon: "If, therefore, it is competent to limit chattels, so that the absolute interest shall go to the first person who shall become entitled to settled estates (within the limits allowed by the rule against perpetuities) in possession in inheritance, so as to exclude intervening remaindermen, this deed does so. It is competent to do so." Those were the two points to which the Vice-Chancellor directed his discussion of the authorities, and he comes to the conclusion that it is competent in law so to do, and was in fact in that case done. That it is possible in law so to do has not been denied in the present case, and that it has been done in this case seems to follow both from the decision of the Vice-Chancellor and also from the grammatical meaning of the words. The rule enunciated in Lord Scarsdale v. Curzon is thus set out by Mr. Theobald at p. 595 of the 4th edition of his book on Wills: "If the gift of chattels is to the person actually seised at the death of tenants for life, or to the person seised of the actual freehold, which is defined as freehold in possession, or there are other clear words referring to actual possession, a tenant in tail who dies before coming into possession is excluded." This seems to me to be perfectly correct, and the result is that W. J. N. Angerstein, a tenant in tail who did not come into actual possession of the hereditaments devised by the will of John Julius Angerstein, had no right to transfer the chattels annexed to those hereditaments. Consequently I must hold that the plaintiff is not entitled to the heirlooms passing under the will of John Julius Angerstein.

Solicitors, Farrer & Co.; Warren, Murton, & Miller; Stuart & Tull.

under contract to purchase, see them. He subsequently received them back, and redelivered them to Thorne. It is said that in this way he did become acquainted with the fact of this second mortgage whilst acting as solicitor in this transaction for the respondents.

Considering that the solicitor knew aliunde of the existence of this mortgage, that it was not necessary in any way to communicate its existence to the first mortgagees in regard to their sale under the powers given by that mortgage, and seeing that all he did was to make use of the knowledge he had previously acquired to ask for the deeds in the way I have described, I think it may be a matter open to question whether that would be knowledge by their solicitor which could be imputed to the respondents so that it must be regarded as their knowledge. It is quite unnecessary to express an opinion upon or to determine that point. I have only made these observations in order that I may not be supposed to assent without further consideration to the proposition contended for on behalf of the appellant.

Now the question arises whether the Statute of Limitations can be pleaded. First, it is said that the right did not arise until 1892 when the fraud was discovered—that there was here a concealed fraud, and that although there was no fraud on the part of the respondents (that is not alleged) nor any concealment on their part, yet that there was fraud on the part of a person acting as their agent (namely Searle) —a concealment by Searle, who was the agent for the respondents, and that consequently it was not until the discovery that any cause of action arose.

I am entirely unable to give any countenance to such an argument. It appears to me perfectly clear that in order to charge any person with a fraud which has not been personally committed by him, the agent who has committed the fraud must have committed it while acting within the scope of his authority, while doing something and purporting to do something on behalf of the principal. If the person is doing something within the scope of his authority, and purporting to do it for his principal, although in doing it he commits a wrong which his principal neither sanctioned nor intended, the principal may be liable. But if the person, although he has been employed as agent, is not in the transaction which is the wrongful act acting for or purporting to be acting for the principal, it seems to me impossible to treat that as the fraud of the principal. Now in this case there is no pretence for saying that in what he did that was fraudulent, or what he improperly concealed, Searle was acting for the respondents. It appears to me that as soon as they had received that £1,000, leaving Searle in possession of the remainder in which they claimed no right or title, to which they believed either Searle or somebody for whom he was acting was entitled, all agency on their behalf by Searle in relation to that surplus was absolutely at an end. From that moment he held it not as their agent at all; it was not intended that he should hold it for them, they did not contemplate that he was holding it for them, nor did he intend to hold it for them. To suppose that, in defiance of the intentions of both the parties to such a transaction, nevertheless there was the relation of agency, would, it seems to me, be a somewhat extravagant conclusion. I therefore can entertain no doubt that in the present case there has been no such fraud or concealed fraud shown as to prevent the statute running, if the statute applies, from the year 1878.

I ought to notice one point which was pressed—or rather two points—that it was the duty of the respondents to find out Mr. Thorne, and to see that he was paid, that that was a continuing duty which they have violated. If such a doctrine as that were to be given assent to in a case such as this, the value of the statute of 1888 would be practically at an end. It is said that here the respondents gave back to Searle the appellant's deeds, and so enabled him to commit the fraud. They only had those deeds in their possession by an accident. There was nothing to call their attention to the fact that they were Thorne's deeds. They received them after the sale was completed, at a time when they did not believe they had any further interest in the transaction at all. They were asked to look in a bundle of deeds to see if they had two deeds described in a particular way. They found those deeds and returned them. There was no obligation upon them to see what the contents were, and there is no reason to suppose that they ever did know the contents. To say that under those circumstances the Act imposes any liability upon them seems to me a hopeless contention.

The only remaining question is, Did the statute apply? It is contended that it did not because of the exception contained in the first sub-section to section 8, "except where the claim is founded upon any fraud or fraudulent breach of trust to which the trustee was party or privy." It seems to me to be impossible seriously to say that the respondents were "party or privy" to the fraud in this case. The fraud was a fraud committed by Searle entirely subsequent to the transaction in which they had any interest or any concern, and they neither knew of it nor assented to it nor received any benefit from it nor took part in it in any sort of way. Under these circumstances I am at a loss to see how it can be said that they were "party or privy" to it.

But then it is said there is another exception. The claim is "to recover trust property or the proceeds thereof still retained by the trustee," "still" of course meaning at the time when the action is brought. In spite of the ingenious argument addressed to us by Mr. Cozens-Hardy upon this point, I remain unconvinced. I have a difficulty in seriously grasping the contention. To say that the leaving of this sum of money with Searle by the respondents under the belief that it was money which Searle was entitled to keep and hold and distribute, in which they had no sort of concern, with which they had nothing to do, was a retaining of the money by them so that it was in their hands at the time when this action was brought, is a proposition I can scarcely treat seriously.

For these reasons I think that the judgment of the court below is right and ought to be affirmed.

Lord ASHBOURNE.—I entirely concur. I think that section 8 of the Trustees Act of 1888 supplies a clear defence; and that is the opinion of all the learned judges before whom this case has come. Romer, J., had no doubt upon that, and the three Lords Justices of Appeal in giving reasoned judgments also came clearly to that conclusion. I really think this section might be nearly torn up if it is not to be held to apply to a case of this kind. It is difficult to imagine what case it would apply to if it does not apply to this.

It has been urged in the lengthened argument which has been addressed to your lordships that the section would not apply because some case of fraud might be imagined or imputed or suggested against the defendants. It has also been urged that it might be imputed that they still have the fund under their control. I am unable to follow either of these contentions. I am unable to see any ground on which it can be suggested that anything like fraud can be imputed to the trustees or on which anything can be suggested bringing them within the exceptions in the clause in regard to their action. That being so, I think the appeal entirely fails.

Therefore I am clearly of opinion that the appeal should be dismissed with costs.

Lord MACNAGHTEN.—I am of the same opinion. By a recent, and I think a very beneficial change of the law, a trustee who has committed a breach of trust is entitled to rely on any statute of limitations as fully as anybody may do who is not a trustee, provided his conduct has been free from any taint of fraud, and provided he has not derived, and is not in a position to derive, any personal benefit from the transaction impeached as a breach of trust. I assume that but for recent legislation the respondents would have been liable to answer the appellant's claim. But I think the Act of 1888 was intended to apply and does apply to such a case as this, and, indeed, I cannot imagine any case to which the Act could more properly or more clearly apply than the case which has been discussed before your lordships to-day.

Lord DAVEY.—I am of the same opinion. It appears to have been assumed, or it is stated in one of the judgments which have been read to us to be not in dispute, that but for the Act of 1888 the defendants would have been liable in the present case. I do not desire to dispute that, or to say that that is not so. I only desire to say that it is not by any means clear to my mind that such a consequence would have followed from the state of facts which is revealed in the evidence.

But, assuming that the constructive notice for which Mr. Phillpotts contended would have brought to the knowledge of Mr. Heard that which certainly he did not in fact know at the date of the sale, that Thorne was an encumbrancer upon this property so as to convert Mr. Heard and his co-trustee into trustees for Thorne, I am of opinion that the statute of 1888 forms a perfect answer to the claim.

Two questions have been argued—first, whether the case is not within one of the exceptions mentioned in the early part of the 8th section; and, secondly, it has also been argued that, independently of the statute, the time began to run only at a period less than six years before the commencement of this action. I do not desire to say anything more than has been already said by your lordships, or more than is contained in the judgments which have been delivered in the courts below upon this point. It appears to me to be impossible to say that the money was "still retained" by the trustees, and it must be remembered that there is no evidence of actual knowledge, or rather, I should say, that the evidence disproves actual knowledge on the part of the respondents of Mr. Thorne's position. But it is sought to say (I am not speaking of constructive notice) that they must have acquired knowledge of it through the receipt which was signed by Mr. Searle, purporting to act as Thorne's agent, and put with the respondents papers.

Now it appears to me that the appellant is in this dilemma—either the respondents read that receipt or they did not. If they did not read it, I see no evidence whatever that they acquired any knowledge of Thorne's existence or of his interest in the property. If they did read that receipt, what did it tell them? It told them that Searle was (I will assume wrongly) purporting to act as Thorne's agent, and that he had given a receipt in discharge of the respondents in that character. If they did read this receipt, why were they not at liberty to believe, erroneously as it turns out, but still to believe, that Searle was acting in that character? If so, it appears to me the case is exactly the same, in fact; the case is that they paid away upon that view the money to Searle erroneously, believing that he was Thorne's agent. If that be the state of facts, it seems to me idle to contend that money which is paid away by a trustee to another person, in the erroneous belief that he fills a particular character which it turns out he does not fill, is still retained by the trustee.

Upon the other point, which was so fully discussed before your lordships, that the statute did not begin to run till within six years of the beginning of this action, I only desire to say this: In my opinion, if fraud, or a non-discovery of fraud, is to be relied on to take a case out of the Statute of Limitations, it must be the fraud of the person who invokes the aid of the Statute of Limitations. Now, the fraud which is imputed to Searle, and apparently justly, is that he put Thorne off his guard by continuing to pay his interest to him as if his security was still a subsisting one. It cannot be pretended for a moment that he was acting as agent for the respondents in doing that. He did not make the payments of interest in his character of agent for the respondents, he made them as agent for the mortgagor; and I see no foundation whatever upon which Searle's fraud can be attributed to the respondents, or can be said to have been committed by him while he was acting in the character of the respondents' agent.

Upon that ground, and the other grounds which have been stated in the judgments delivered in the courts below and by your lordships, I hold that there was no fraud imputable to the defendants which would prevent the running of the Statute of Limitations.

Judgments of the Court of Appeal and of Romer, J., affirmed, and appeal dismissed, with costs.

Solicitors for the appellants, Mear & Fowler, for G. H. Thorne, Nottingham.

Solicitors for the respondents, Yarde & Loader, for Burd, Pearse, & Prickman, Okehampton.

Privy Council.

(From the Supreme Court of Queensland.)

June 29, 1895.

BRABANT v. KING.
KING v. BRABANT. (a.)

Negligence—Public body—Nonfeasance—Liability to an individual under a contract—Deposit of goods for safe custody—Inspection of premises—Risk of injury to goods—Duty of bailee.

The principle of exemption from liabilities afforded to public bodies for mere nonfeasance, as enunciated in Municipality of Pictou v. Geldert, 42 W. R. 114, [1893] A. C. 524, and other cases, has no application to a case in which the parties charged with the nonfeasance are under obligations to an individual member of the public to perform the duty, which they have neglected to his prejudice, in consideration of their being remunerated by him for its performance.

A depositor of goods for safe custody, who by himself or his servants has had an opportunity of observing defects in the storehouse, incurs no obligation from this circumstance, for he is entitled to rely upon the care and skill of his paid bailee.

(a.) Reported by C. H. GRAFTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

This was an appeal from the Supreme Court of Queensland.

The facts and the whole course of the proceedings are set out in their lordships' judgment.

Sir R. Webster, Q.C., Vernon Smith, Q.C., and Bankes, for the appellant.

Finlay, Q.C., and Bray, for the respondents.

The judgment of their lordships (Lord HERSCHELL, L.C., and Lords WATSON, HOBHOUSE, MACNAGHTEN, MORRIS, SHAND, DAVEY, and Sir RICHARD COUCH) was delivered by Lord WATSON.—The Queensland Navigation Act of 1876 (41 Vict. No. 3) requires that the master of every vessel arriving at a port in that colony shall land, at the Government or other authorised store, all gunpowder exceeding twenty pounds in weight, and all other explosive substances which may be on board such vessel whether as cargo or stores. On the passing of the Act, the Government of the colony established magazines at the port of Brisbane for the reception of explosives, and no other magazines have been authorised or erected there. These magazines are under the exclusive charge of Government officials, and storage rent is payable to them for all explosives deposited with them. In the event of such rent not being duly paid within a time limited, the officer in charge is authorised by the Act to sell the explosives, and with the proceeds of sale to satisfy the rent, and all other charges and expenses, accounting for the surplus, if any, to the importer or owner of the goods. Section 103 of the Queensland Customs Act of 1873 (37 Vict. No. 1) provides "that no compensation shall be made by the Government or the collector to any importer, proprietor, or consignee of any goods by reason of any damage or loss occasioned thereto in the warehouse or in any examining shed by fire or inevitable accident, or by felony."

Before the month of January, 1893, the appellant company had, in compliance with the Act of 1876, landed at the port of Brisbane 616 boxes of dynamite, 568 boxes of gelignite, 361 boxes of gelatine dynamite, and 33 cases of detonators. These goods remained in the Government stores until the month of February, 1893, when the events occurred which have given rise to the present litigation. The boxes of dynamite and other explosive substances were all stored in a wooden magazine which had been previously used as a coal shed, at Eagle Farm, below Brisbane, about 20 feet from the bank of the river. The cases of detonators were stored in a paraffin oil shed a little way farther up the river.

On two occasions in the month of February, 1893, the river Brisbane was in heavy flood, and its waters rose to an exceptional height. On the first occasion the flood attained its maximum in the afternoon of Sunday, the 5th of February, when the water rose to a point of 4 ft. 7 in. above the floor of the Eagle Farm magazine. On the second occasion, the flood water, in the morning of Sunday, the 19th of February, rose 9 inches higher or 5 ft. 4 in. above the floor of the magazine. The result was that the whole of the appellant company's goods were rendered valueless by their immersion in water.

The present proceedings were brought by the appellant company in January, 1894, for recovery of the damage which they had sustained, in pursuance of the Claims against Government Act; and the respondent, Thomas Mulhall King, was duly appointed to be nominal defendant on behalf of the Government of the colony. Shortly stated, the case made in their pleadings by the appellant company was that the Government officials had failed to take reasonable precautions against the occurrence of floods, by storing their goods at a higher level, and had also failed, when the floods came, to take reasonable and proper measures for preventing or diminishing damage, by shifting some of the cases and stacking them above the others. The repondent, besides traversing these allegations, maintained that the appellant company had accepted the risk of the condition in which the premises were, and of the locality in which they were situated at the time of storage, and also that the rapid rising of the Brisbane River to an unprecedented height, on the two occasions referred to, was an "inevitable accident," for which the Government were not responsible.

The case was tried before Harding, J., and a jury, whose verdict consisted of separate answers to the following nineteen questions which were submitted to them by the learned judge:

1. Before January, 1893, were the plaintiffs importers into the port of Brisbane of the goods?—Yes.

2. Before said date did plaintiffs deliver goods to Government in, pursuance of statutes, to be taken care of for reward?—Yes.

3. In consideration thereof did Government undertake and agree with plaintiffs to (a) properly store and take care of goods, and (b) to deliver to plaintiffs on request?—(a) (b) Yes.

4. Before said date did Nobel's Co. cause to be delivered by plaintiffs the goods to Government in pursuance of statutes to be stored and taken care of for reward?—Yes.

5. Were plaintiffs the duly constituted agents of company in that behalf?—Yes.

6. In consideration thereof did Government undertake and agree with company to (a) properly store and take care of goods, (b) re-deliver to company on order or bequest?—(a) (b) Yes.

7. Did the Government not regard its duty in that behalf?—They did not.

8. Did it not take proper care of the goods?—They did not.

9. By its negligence in not providing (a) proper storehouses, (b) a proper locality, (c) in not taking proper care, were the goods after that date destroyed?—(a) (b) (c) Yes.

10. Is the indenture of the 6th of November, 1893, proved?—Yes.

11. If loss arose was it caused by inevitable accident through the rapid rising to an unprecedented extent of the flood?—No.

12. Was such rising such that the Government could not by any amount of ability have foreseen or guarded against it?—The rising was not such that the Government could not by any amount of ability have foreseen or guarded against it.

13. Was it known at all times to plaintiffs (a) that such storehouses, (b) that such locality were unfit or improper?—Yes.

14. Did plaintiffs, with full knowledge of question 13, and of the risks attending the storage of explosives in such locality for many years prior and up to grievance continue to deliver explosives to the Government for storage by them in the said storehouse and locality?—Yes.

15. Did plaintiffs undertake and continue to undertake such risks?—Yes.

16. Thereafter and with full knowledge of questions, 13, 14, 15, did plaintiffs deliver the explosives to Government for storage in its storehouse in locality?—Yes.

17. What was the value of goods destroyed?—£7,680 8s. 4d.

18. Was that the market value? If not, what was?—Yes.

19. What damages?—£7,680 8s. 4d.

Upon these findings the learned judge directed judgment to be entered for the plaintiffs for the full amount found by the jury.

Against that judgment the present respondent appealed, and gave notice of motion (1) to have the judgment set aside, and to have judgment entered for him upon the findings as they stood; or (2) to have the judgment set aside and judgment of non-suit entered; or (3) to have the findings of the jury in answer to questions 7, 8, 9, 11, 12, 17, 18, and 19, set aside, and a new trial had; or (4) to have the findings of the jury in answer to questions 17, 18, and 19 set aside, and the amount of damages re-assessed. The appellant company lodged a counter-motion, to have the findings of the jury in answer to questions 13, 14, 15, and 16 set aside.

The appeal and cross-motion were heard before three judges of the Supreme Court who, by a majority, ordered that the judgment entered be set aside; that the findings of the jury in answer to questions 9 (a) (b), 17, 18, and 19 be set aside, and that a new trial be had between the parties to re-assess the damage. The appellant company were ordered to pay to the respondent his costs of the appeal, the payment of costs of the trial and of all other costs being reserved. The effect of that order was in substance to strike out of the verdict one finding of the jury which affirmed that the Government had been negligent in not providing a proper storehouse in a proper locality, and in not taking proper care of the goods, and also the three findings relating to the amount of damages.

Cooper, J., the dissentient judge, thought that judgment ought at once to be entered for the defendant, being of opinion that the Government was under no liability to the appellant company, upon the principle recognized by this board in Sanitary Commissioners of Gibraltar v. Orfila, 15 App. Cas. 400, 39 W. R. Dig. 233, and more recently in Municipality of Pictou v. Geldert, 42 W. R. 114; [1893] A. C. 524, and in the Municipal Council of Sydney v. Bourke, [1895] A. C 433, 43 W. R. Dig. 74. That principle has, in certain instances, been held to afford protection to commissioners or trustees representing public interests from the consequences of mere non-feasance; but it has, in the opinion of their lordships, no application to a case like the present, in which the parties charged with nonfeasance are under obligation to an individual member of the public to perform the duty which they have neglected to his prejudice, in consideration of their being remunerated by him for its performance.

In delivering judgment, the majority of the court, consisting of Chubb and Real, JJ., mainly directed their observations, in the first place, to the answer returned by the jury to question 9 (a) (b) (c), and, in the second place, to the answer given to question 16. They differed from the learned judge who tried the case, as to the proper legal inference to be derived from the findings implied in the answer given to question 16, taken in connection with the answers of the jury to the three preceding questions. They held that these findings necessitated the conclusion in law that the appellant company had accepted the burden of all risks, so far as arising from the condition in which the Government storehouses were at the time when their goods were landed, and from the locality in which these storehouses were situated. It is obvious that, if the appellant company had agreed to undertake such risk, the Government would have been, to that extent, relieved of the duty of taking precautions for the safe custody of the goods. Accordingly when the learned judges of the majority came to deal with the findings of the jury in answer to (a) and (b) of question 9, which affirm respectively the negligence of the Government in not providing proper storehouses, and in not placing these in a proper locality, they held that the findings were in direct conflict with the answer given by the jury to question 16. Both of the learned judges indicated their opinion that the answer to (c), the third branch of question 9, which affirms, in general terms, that the goods perished through neglect of the Government to take proper care of them, might cover the failure of their officials to take proper measures, when the floods came or were imminent, to prevent loss by restacking the boxes. And they held that, while the appellant company were precluded from charging the Government with negligence in respect of any alleged failure to alter the condition or site of the storehouses before the advent of the floods of February, 1893, it was still open to them to show that proper precautions had not thereafter been taken for the purpose of salving part at least of the goods stored, and to recover damages for the goods destroyed through the want of these precautions.

When the judgment of the Supreme Court is read, in the light of the opinions expressed by the majority, it becomes clear that the sole object of the court in remitting the case for new trial was to give the appellant company an opportunity of satisfying a jury that, on the arrival of the floods in question, the Government officials failed to adopt reasonable and proper means to place part, if not the whole of their goods, beyond the reach of flood-water; and, in the event of the jury finding to that effect, to have the amount of damage resulting from such failure assessed by them. Both parties have appealed against the judgment, the original appeal being at the instance of the appellant company, and the cross-appeal, which has been consolidated with it, at the instance of the respondent as representing the Government of the Colony. The arguments addressed to their lordships have been on the same lines with those indicated by the parties in their motions before the Supreme Court, which have already been noticed.

The real issues involved in the pleadings of the parties, and in the evidence which was led by them before the jury, appear to their lordships to be exceedingly simple; although they were complicated, if not obscured, by the pleas of inevitable accident, and of acceptance of risk by the company, which were advanced by the respondent, as well as by the shape in which the case for the appellant company was presented for the consideration of the jury.

Their lordships can see no reason to doubt that the relation in which the Government stood to the appellant company was simply that of bailees for hire. They were, therefore, under a legal obligation to exercise the same degree of care, towards the preservation of the goods entrusted to them from injury, which might reasonably be expected from a skilled store-keeper, acquainted with the risks to be apprehended either from the character of the storehouse itself or of its locality; and that obligation included, not only the duty of taking all reasonable precautions to obviate these risks, but the duty of taking all proper measures for the protection of the goods when such risks were imminent or had actually occurred.

Their lordships think it right to indicate that, in their opinion, the locality of the Government stores to which the present case relates was not a matter of which reasonable complaint could be made, and that it bulked too largely in some of the questions put to the jury. It is not only convenient, but it may be highly expedient that stores for the reception of explosive substances landed from vessels before they enter the harbour should be placed near to the water-edge. But the selection of such a site, however justifiable in itself, imposes upon the storekeeper the plain duty of making arrangements within the store by which the goods are placed at such a level as will, in all probability, ensure their absolute immunity from the incursion of flood-water.

Upon the respondent's plea of inevitable accident, their lordships have only this observation to make, that it does not appear to them to be appropriate to the circumstances of the present case; and that, when stated in the form in which it was submitted to the jury by questions 11 and 12, it does not afford the true test for determining the liability or non-liability of the Government.

It admits of serious doubt, whether questions 13, 14, 15, and 16, upon the answers to which the decision of the Supreme Court is based, ought to have been sent to the jury. The answer returned to question 15 does not deal with fact; it is in reality an inference in law from the facts affirmed by the other replies to these questions; and it was, in their lordships' opinion rightly, disregarded by Harding, J., when he proceeded to apply the verdict. It would be a very dangerous doctrine, for which there is not a vestige of authority, to hold that a depositor of goods for safe custody, who, by himself or his servants, has had an opportunity of observing certain defects in the store-house, must be taken to have agreed that any risk of injury to his goods which might possibly be occasioned by these defects should be borne by him, and not by his paid bailee. The authorities relating to the vexed maxim, volenti non fit injuria, have no bearing whatever upon the point. From the very nature of the transaction, the depositor is entitled to rely upon the care and skill of his bailee. The duty is incumbent upon the latter, in the due fulfilment of his contract, of considering whether his premises can be safely used for the storage of explosives or other goods, and, if they cannot, to take immediate steps for placing the goods in a position of safety. If the defects of these Government magazines were as apparent to the servants of the appellant company as the jury have found they were, they ought to have been equally patent to the official storekeeper with whom the duty of safe custody rested.

Their lordships are accordingly of opinion that the judgment of the Supreme Court must be set aside; and they have come, not without regret, to the conclusion that no course is open to them for terminating the litigation, except sending back the case for new trial. Besides the assessment of damages, if any are found to be due, there are, in their opinion, only two questions which, in some shape or other, ought to be submitted to the jury. The first of these questions is, whether the Government officials failed to exercise due care and skill, in storing the appellant company's goods, seeing that they stored them at so low a level that they were destroyed by the floods of February, 1893; and the second, whether on the advent of the floods, these officials failed to take reasonable and proper measures for saving the whole or any, and if so what part of the goods from destruction. These issues are, in this sense, alternative, that, in the event of the jury affirming the first, it will be unnecessary for them to take the second into consideration.

Seeing that there must be a new trial, it is unfortunate that an opinion should have been expressed by one of the learned judges of the majority of the Supreme Court, tending to the inference that the first of these issues is only susceptible of one answer. Chubb, J., said:—"I see nothing in the evidence to show that the abnormal flood of 1893 could have been or was foreseen by anybody." In the view of the case which was taken by the learned judge those observations might be legitimate, and it is obvious that they were not meant to trench upon the province of the jury at the second trial. Real, J., with commendable caution, observed that he felt "bound to hold that the evidence given entitled the jury to find that a reasonable man ought to have anticipated a flood higher than that of 1890, and as high as that of 1893; ought to have known that goods placed in a magazine or store at a height less than the level of the floods of 1893 were in danger of being injured by flood waters." The evidence, shortly stated, shows that about the year 1886 there was a flood higher than any of its predecessors; that, in 1890, there was another flood still higher; and that, after its occurrence, the platform upon which explosives were stored was raised by about an inch. Whether, in view of the possibility of natural causes, and of the probability of artificial causes tending to raise still higher the level of the river floods, an increase in the elevation of the platform to that limited extent was consistent with either skill or prudence, appears to their lordships to be a substantial question, well fitted for the consideration of a jury.

Their lordships will humbly advise Her Majesty to reverse the judgment of the Supreme Court, except in so far as it directs that the judgment entered for the plaintiffs be set aside; to set aside the findings of the jury in answer to questions 7 to 19 inclusive submitted to them at the trial; to direct that a new trial be had; and to reserve for the decision of the judge who tries the cause all questions of costs incurred in both courts below, until the result of such new trial. The respondent must pay to the appellant firm their costs of these appeals.

Solicitors for the appellants, Bircham & Co.

Solicitors for the respondent, Freshfields & Williams.

Court of Appeal.

App. Bankruptcy.
(Lord Esher, M.R., and Lopes and Kay, L.JJ.)

Nov. 29.

In re CORNISH.
Ex parte BOARD OF TRADE. (a.)

Bankruptcy—Trustee—Liability to render account—Board of Trade—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 162, sub-section 2 (a) (b)—Trustee Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 59), s. 8.

The words "any such trustee or other person" contained in section 162, sub-section 2 (b) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1888, apply to a trustee or any other person empowered to collect, receive, or distribute any funds or dividends under any of the four Acts of Parliament mentioned in the fourth Schedule to that Act.

It is not necessary for the Board of Trade, on an application to enforce under sub-section 2 (b) against a trustee an account of the sums received and paid by him, to show that the trustee has had in his hands, since the passing of the Act of 1883, funds which he has not distributed.

Section 8 of the Trustee Act, 1888, which limits the claims upon trustees, does not apply to a trustee in bankruptcy.

This was an appeal by the trustee of an estate in liquidation from an order of the Divisional Court (Vaughan Williams and Kennedy, JJ.), ordering him to submit to the Board of Trade an account, verified by affidavit, of the sums received and paid by him as trustee.

On the 10th of February, 1875, the debtor filed a petition in the Exeter County Court for the liquidation of his affairs by arrangement, and E. Fewings was appointed trustee in the liquidation.

The debtor, whose principal asset consisted of a life estate, died in 1876. The trustee received in respect of the debtor's estate the sum of £850. In 1895, at the instance of certain creditors, the Board of Trade requested the trustee to fill up and return a form giving an account of the sums received and paid by him as trustee. In reply he furnished the Board of Trade with a summary of his receipts and payments, whereby it appeared that he had received £850 and had expended £905, £250 being in respect of law costs, and £655 in the discharge of certain incumbrances. Subsequently the Board of Trade, not being satisfied with the statement, ordered the trustee, under section 162, sub-section 2 (b) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, to furnish them with an account, verified by affidavit, of the sums received and paid by him in respect of the liquidation. Section 162, sub-section 2, provides as follows:—(a) "Where after the passing of this Act, any unclaimed or undistributed funds or dividends in the hands or under the control of any trustee or other person empowered to collect, receive, or distribute any funds or dividends under any Act of Parliament mentioned in the fourth schedule" (the Bankruptcy Act, 1869, is one of the Acts therein mentioned), "or any petition, resolution, deed, or other proceeding under or in pursuance of any such Act, have remained or remain unclaimed or undistributed for six months after the same became claimable or distributable, or in any other case for two years after the receipt thereof by such trustee or other person, it shall be the duty of such trustee or other person forthwith to pay the same to the bankruptcy estates account at the Bank of England. The Board of Trade shall furnish each trustee or other person with a certificate of receipt of the money so paid, which shall be an effectual discharge to him in respect thereof."

(b) "The Board of Trade may at any time order any such trustee or other person to submit to them an account verified by affidavit of the sums received and paid by him under or in pursuance of any such petition, resolution, deed, or other proceeding as aforesaid, and may direct and enforce an audit of the account."

The trustee failed to comply with the order, whereupon the Board of Trade applied to the county court judge at Exeter for an order to enforce such an account. The learned judge refused to make such order, on the ground that he considered himself bound by the judgment of Cave, J., in In re Chudley, 33 W. R. 708, 14 Q. B. D. 402. Thereupon the Board of Trade appealed to the Divisional Court, which reversed the decision of the county court judge, and held that the order could be made, although the trustee had received no funds since the passing of the Act of 1883; and further, that "any such trustee" in clause (b) means any trustee appointed under any of the Acts mentioned in schedule 4 of the Act.

From this decision the trustee now appealed.

Herbert Reed, Q.C., and Ward Coldridge, for the appellant.—The court has no jurisdiction to make this order, nor does clause (b) of sub-section 2 of section 162 give such power. At any rate, before the Board of Trade are entitled to such an order they must prove to the court that the trustee has had in his hands, since the passing of the Act, some unclaimed or undistributed funds. This they have not done. The appellant is not such a trustee as would come under clause (a)—namely, a trustee in whose hands there have been, after the passing of the Act, unclaimed or undistributed funds or dividends, therefore he is not such a trustee as comes under clause (b): In re Chudley. Further, twelve years had passed since the passing of this Act without any such application as this being made. The lapse of such time bars relief, and the trustee is entitled to the protection of the Trustee Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 59), s. 8: In re Page, 41 W. R. 357, [1893] 1 Ch. 304. The trustee has already rendered a sufficient account.

Sir R. Finlay, S.G., and Muir Mackenzie, for the Board of Trade, were not called upon.

Briscoe appeared for parties interested.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—It seems to me that this case is perfectly clear. The question is whether under section 162, sub-section 2 (b) the Board of Trade had a right to call upon this trustee to render them an account. It was argued before the learned judges that "such trustee or such other person" was confined to a particular kind of trustee, one who had money in his hands. The learned judges, however, held that it applied to a trustee or any other person empowered to collect, receive, or distribute any funds or dividends under any Act of Parliament mentioned in the fourth schedule of this Act, and I entirely agree with them. That being so it applies to this trustee.

Then it is said it only applies to this trustee if the Board of Trade have fulfilled a condition precedent, which condition precedent is that before they can have any right to ask this trustee to give an account they must be able to shew that he has money in his hands which he has not distributed. There is no such condition in sub-section 2 (b). It is as plain as words can be. We are asked to imply such condition.

(a.) Reported by E. G. STILLWELL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

So far from thinking it implies such a condition it seems to me that it would upset the whole of the Act of Parliament, and let accountants who are trustees do just what they like. Therefore on the first point I agree with the learned judge (Vaughan Williams, J.). In his judgment he says, "It was argued that one ought to read the words 'such trustee' as meaning a trustee who, after the passing of the Act, has funds which he has to discharge himself of in his hands within the meaning and the definition of sub-section 2. I do not agree. I think 'such trustee' means a trustee appointed under the scheduled Acts, and I so construe it." I agree with him, and, therefore, that ground of appeal fails.

Then you come to the Trustee Act of 1888. Upon that the learned judge has said, "The object of the Act of Parliament is to make him furnish such an account as would show whether he is an accounting party or not." "When he has done that it may or it may not be that a claim for the balance arising on that account would be barred by the Statute of Limitations." Therefore he leaves that question open. But it has been so pressed upon us that I do not object here, in this Court of Appeal, to give a binding decision which seems to me to be this: That that Trustee Act, speaking of trustees in general, does not apply at all to such a trustee as the present one, that is a trustee in bankruptcy. So that there are two answers to this point. First of all, that the Trustee Act does not apply to such a trustee as the present, and, secondly, if it does, it can only apply when a claim is made upon him to do something, and no claim has yet been made upon him other than to give this account, which is for the purpose of showing whether any further claim can be made upon him.

Therefore on both grounds I think the learned judges in the court below were right, and that this appeal must be dismissed.

LOPES, L.J.—To my mind this is a very clear case, and I can add nothing to that which has been said by the Master of the Rolls. I only desire to say this, that I agree with the Master of the Rolls when he says that in his opinion the Trustee Act does not apply to such a trustee as this. I think the appeal must be dismissed, with costs.

KAY, L.J.—I agree also that this appeal must be dismissed. With regard to the construction of the Act I will only just add this. Sub-section 2 (b) of section 162 of the Act of 1883 provides that "The Board of Trade may at any time order any such trustee or other person to submit to them an account"; "such trustee or other person," these are relative words. Now what do they refer to? They refer to clause (a) of the same sub-section, "any trustee or other person empowered to collect, receive, or distribute any funds or dividends under any Act of Parliament mentioned in the fourth schedule, or any petition, resolution, deed, or other proceedings under or in pursuance of any such Act." That is the description of "such trustee or other person." The words relied on are no part of the description of trustee or person. In sub-section (a) it is provided that where "such trustee or other person" after the passing of the Act has undistributed funds in his hands he is to pay them into the Bank of England, but the fact of his having undistributed funds in his hands is no part of the description of a trustee or other person. It would be the greatest possible nonsense if we were to introduce that as part of the description of a "trustee or other person," and it would be to limit sub-section (b) in the most extraordinary manner. The argument has seriously been this: that the Board of Trade cannot call upon any trustee or other person mentioned in this sub-section (b) unless they first of all show that since the passing of the Act he has had funds in his hands. Well, the trustee may say, "I have not had any funds in my hands since the passing of the Act, and I am therefore not liable to account." The learned judge was perfectly right, I think, in holding that that is not the true construction of sub-section 2 (b). It gives a large power for calling for accounts, and there is no reason to limit it. It is a power to the Board of Trade to call upon a trustee in a bankruptcy or liquidation to account to the Board of Trade, and if he refuses or hesitates they are to obtain an order from the Court of Bankruptcy to enforce that direction of theirs. Therefore the whole thing is the accounting of an officer of the Court of Bankruptcy to the Court of Bankruptcy or to the Board of Trade who have now a certain right to interfere in bankruptcy matters.

Now the other point was that the Trustee Act applied to such a case. It seems to me that there are two or three sufficient answers to that. I do not think the Trustee Act, limiting the claims upon trustees, has anything to do with the case of an officer of the court who is required by the court to account; if it did it would apply to the case of a receiver, and the other cases, where officers of the court have, by the court been put in possession of property, and are required by the court to account to the court. I never heard that the Trustee Act applied to such a case.

There is this further point—that if it did apply, it would not apply to this case, because, if, by the result of the account, it should turn out that the trustee had money which he has not properly applied, then he comes within the exception of the Act of Parliament, and that part of the limitation of the liability of a trustee does not apply to him at all. However, I think that point also fails, and that the appeal must be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the appellant, Collyer & Collyer.

Solicitor for the respondents, Solicitor to the Board of Trade.

From Q. B. Div. (A. L. Smith and Rigby, L.JJ.) Oct. 25; Nov. 11.

CONSTANTINE & Co. v. WARDEN & SONS. (DOBELL & Co. Third Parties). (a.)

Practice—Third-party procedure—Action by shipowners against charterers—Contract of charterers with purchasers of cargo—Indemnity express or implied—R. S. C., 1883, ord. 16, r. 48.

By the terms of a charter-party entered into between the plaintiffs, the shipowners, and the defendants, the charterers, it was provided that the ship should be discharged at port of delivery as customary. The defendants subsequently sold to D. & Co. certain bones to be shipped in one or two vessels, at sellers' option, from the River Plate to Birkenhead as per charter-party; and by the contract it was agreed that the bones were to be weighed in the usual manner, and taken with all faults and defects by D. & Co. from over the ship's side as fast as the captain could deliver, failing which to be resold at the defendants' discretion, D. & Co. being liable for any loss, demurrage, or expenses arising therefrom.

(a.) Reported by ARNOLD GLOVER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The plaintiffs' ship arrived at the port of delivery with the bones on board, and D. & Co. took delivery thereof in fulfilment of their contract with the defendants.

The plaintiffs having brought an action against the defendants for not having discharged the ship pursuant to the terms of the charter-party, the defendants sought to bring in D. & Co. as third parties under ord. 16, r. 48.

Held, reversing the decision of Day, J., that the contract of D. & Co. with the defendants was not a contract of indemnity, either express or implied, and that, therefore, upon the authority of Speller v. Bristol Steam Navigation Co., 32 W. R. 670, 13 Q. B. D. 96, the defendants were not entitled to a third-party notice.

Appeal from an order made by Day, J., in chambers on the 7th of August, 1895.

The plaintiffs were shipowners, and the action was brought against the defendants for not having unloaded the plaintiff's ship at the port of discharge pursuant to the terms of a charter-party dated the 15th of June, 1894, by which it was stipulated that "the ship shall be discharged at port of delivery as customary."

On the 16th of June, 1894, the defendants sold to Dobell & Co., the appellants, 1,500 to 2,000 tons of bones, to be shipped in one or two vessels, at seller's option, during the months of August and (or) September and (or) October, from the River Plate to land at Birkenhead as per charter-party; and by the contract it was agreed that the bones should be weighed in the usual manner and taken, with all faults and defects, by Dobell & Co., from over the ship's side as fast as the captain could deliver, failing which to be resold at the defendant's discretion, they (Dobell & Co.) being liable for any loss, demurrage, or expenses arising therefrom.

The plaintiffs' ship, with the bones on board, arrived at Birkenhead in due course, and the appellants took delivery thereof in fulfilment of their contract with the defendants.

The plaintiffs brought this action against the defendants for not having discharged the ship at port of delivery, as customary.

The defendants sought to bring in Dobell & Co. as third parties to indemnify them against the claim of the plaintiffs.

Day, J., held that the defendants were entitled to have leave to issue a third-party notice under ord. 16, r. 48.

Dobell & Co. appealed.

Bigham, Q.C., and H. F. Boyd, for the appellants.—The respondents must show a direct contract of indemnity: Speller v. Bristol Steam Navigation Co., 32 W. R. 670, 13 Q. B. D., 96. The contract in the present case is not one of indemnity, but merely to do a certain act. Demurrage is specifically dealt with in our contract, and not as in the charter-party.

Joseph Walton, Q.C., and T. G. Carver, for the respondents.—This is in substance a contract of indemnity, for if any default arises under the charter-party, it must be in consequence of the default of the appellant. That is also shown by the use of the word "demurrage." There is no demurrage between buyer and seller, and the demurrage referred to must be that referred to in the charter-party.

Bigham, Q.C., in reply.—The fact that the contract of purchase is more stringent than the charter-party does not prove that it is a contract of indemnity. "Demurrage" in the third parties' contract is not used in its strict legal sense.

Cur. adv. vult.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—This case has been extremely well argued on each side. The question is whether the defendants are entitled to have leave to issue a third-party notice under ord. 16, r. 48. The learned judge at chambers held that they were, and hence the present appeal. [His lordship stated the facts, and continued:—] The case of Speller v. The Bristol Steam Navigation Co. in this court has decided that a defendant is not entitled to a third-party notice under ord. 16, r. 48, unless he can show a contract by the third party, either express or implied, that the defendant shall be indemnified by him, which means a contract by the third party to indemnify the defendant against the causes of action upon which the plaintiff is suing. We have nothing in this case to do with contribution or with any implied contract, and the question is, Do the defendants make out such an express contract by the third parties?

In my judgment the first part of the contract of the 16th of June, 1894, between the defendants and Dobell & Co., down to the words "as per charter-party," deals with the contemplated voyage, and the clause commencing with "the bones to be weighed," and ending with the words "arising therefrom," deals with the unloading of the ship at the termination of that voyage.

It is argued for the defendants that in this document is to be found an express contract by Messrs. Dobell & Co. to indemnify the defendants against demurrage. They do not allege any implied contract.

It is true that in it Messrs. Dobell & Co. contract to pay to the defendants any loss, demurrage, or expenses which may result from their not taking the bones from over ship's side as fast as the captain could deliver; but where is the contract that they will indemnify the defendant against the causes of action the plaintiffs may have, under the charter-party of the 15th of June, 1894, against the defendants? I can find no such contract. Messrs. Dobell & Co. do not undertake to pay any demurrage the plaintiffs may recover against the defendants under the defendants' contract with the plaintiffs to unload as customary, but they undertake to pay any loss, demurrage, or expenses which may arise by reason of their (i.e., Messrs. Dobell & Co.'s) failure to perform their contract with the defendants—viz., in not taking delivery over ship's side as fast as the captain could deliver.

But it is said that the result is the same as if there were a contract to indemnify, for unless the third parties have broken their contract with the defendants, the defendants cannot have broken their contract with the plaintiff, because the greater obligation undertaken by Messrs. Dobell & Co. with the defendants must include the lesser obligation undertaken by the defendants with the plaintiffs, and, therefore, it is said the third parties have, as regards demurrage, in substance undertaken to indemnify the defendants.

But this argument, ingenious though it is, does not show any contract to indemnify, which must be proved to exist before ord. 16, r. 48, can be made available.

If the defendants sued Messrs. Dobell & Co. for not indemnifying them they should be nonsuited, for the only cause of action they could establish against Dobell & Co. is a contract, not to indemnify, but to pay what damages the defendants may have against them for not unloading in accordance with their contract—i.e., from over ship's side as fast as the captain could deliver. It is true that the loss, demurrage, and expenses Messrs. Dobell & Co. might have to pay the defendants might be the same in amount as the damages the defendants might have to pay the under contract to purchase, see them. He subsequently received them back, and redelivered them to Thorne. It is said that in this way he did become acquainted with the fact of this second mortgage whilst acting as solicitor in this transaction for the respondents.

Considering that the solicitor knew aliunde of the existence of this mortgage, that it was not necessary in any way to communicate its existence to the first mortgagees in regard to their sale under the powers given by that mortgage, and seeing that all he did was to make use of the knowledge he had previously acquired to ask for the deeds in the way I have described, I think it may be a matter open to question whether that would be knowledge by their solicitor which could be imputed to the respondents so that it must be regarded as their knowledge. It is quite unnecessary to express an opinion upon or to determine that point. I have only made these observations in order that I may not be supposed to assent without further consideration to the proposition contended for on behalf of the appellant.

Now the question arises whether the Statute of Limitations can be pleaded. First, it is said that the right did not arise until 1892 when the fraud was discovered—that there was here a concealed fraud, and that although there was no fraud on the part of the respondents (that is not alleged) nor any concealment on their part, yet that there was fraud on the part of a person acting as their agent (namely Searle) —a concealment by Searle, who was the agent for the respondents, and that consequently it was not until the discovery that any cause of action arose.

I am entirely unable to give any countenance to such an argument. It appears to me perfectly clear that in order to charge any person with a fraud which has not been personally committed by him, the agent who has committed the fraud must have committed it while acting within the scope of his authority, while doing something and purporting to do something on behalf of the principal. If the person is doing something within the scope of his authority, and purporting to do it for his principal, although in doing it he commits a wrong which his principal neither sanctioned nor intended, the principal may be liable. But if the person, although he has been employed as agent, is not in the transaction which is the wrongful act acting for or purporting to be acting for the principal, it seems to me impossible to treat that as the fraud of the principal. Now in this case there is no pretence for saying that in what he did that was fraudulent, or what he improperly concealed, Searle was acting for the respondents. It appears to me that as soon as they had received that £1,000, leaving Searle in possession of the remainder in which they claimed no right or title, to which they believed either Searle or somebody for whom he was acting was entitled, all agency on their behalf by Searle in relation to that surplus was absolutely at an end. From that moment he held it not as their agent at all; it was not intended that he should hold it for them, they did not contemplate that he was holding it for them, nor did he intend to hold it for them. To suppose that, in defiance of the intentions of both the parties to such a transaction, nevertheless there was the relation of agency, would, it seems to me, be a somewhat extravagant conclusion. I therefore can entertain no doubt that in the present case there has been no such fraud or concealed fraud shown as to prevent the statute running, if the statute applies, from the year 1878.

I ought to notice one point which was pressed—or rather two points—that it was the duty of the respondents to find out Mr. Thorne, and to see that he was paid, that that was a continuing duty which they have violated. If such a doctrine as that were to be given assent to in a case such as this, the value of the statute of 1888 would be practically at an end. It is said that here the respondents gave back to Searle the appellant's deeds, and so enabled him to commit the fraud. They only had those deeds in their possession by an accident. There was nothing to call their attention to the fact that they were Thorne's deeds. They received them after the sale was completed, at a time when they did not believe they had any further interest in the transaction at all. They were asked to look in a bundle of deeds to see if they had two deeds described in a particular way. They found those deeds and returned them. There was no obligation upon them to see what the contents were, and there is no reason to suppose that they ever did know the contents. To say that under those circumstances the Act imposes any liability upon them seems to me a hopeless contention.

The only remaining question is, Did the statute apply? It is contended that it did not because of the exception contained in the first sub-section to section 8, "except where the claim is founded upon any fraud or fraudulent breach of trust to which the trustee was party or privy." It seems to me to be impossible seriously to say that the respondents were "party or privy" to the fraud in this case. The fraud was a fraud committed by Searle entirely subsequent to the transaction in which they had any interest or any concern, and they neither knew of it nor assented to it nor received any benefit from it nor took part in it in any sort of way. Under these circumstances I am at a loss to see how it can be said that they were "party or privy" to it.

But then it is said there is another exception. The claim is "to recover trust property or the proceeds thereof still retained by the trustee," "still" of course meaning at the time when the action is brought. In spite of the ingenious argument addressed to us by Mr. Cozens-Hardy upon this point, I remain unconvinced. I have a difficulty in seriously grasping the contention. To say that the leaving of this sum of money with Searle by the respondents under the belief that it was money which Searle was entitled to keep and hold and distribute, in which they had no sort of concern, with which they had nothing to do, was a retaining of the money by them so that it was in their hands at the time when this action was brought, is a proposition I can scarcely treat seriously.

For these reasons I think that the judgment of the court below is right and ought to be affirmed.

Lord ASHBOURNE.—I entirely concur. I think that section 8 of the Trustees Act of 1888 supplies a clear defence; and that is the opinion of all the learned judges before whom this case has come. Romer, J., had no doubt upon that, and the three Lords Justices of Appeal in giving reasoned judgments also came clearly to that conclusion. I really think this section might be nearly torn up if it is not to be held to apply to a case of this kind. It is difficult to imagine what case it would apply to if it does not apply to this.

It has been urged in the lengthened argument which has been addressed to your lordships that the section would not apply because some case of fraud might be imagined or imputed or suggested against the defendants. It has also been urged that it might be imputed that they still have the fund under their control. I am unable to follow either of these contentions. I am unable to see any ground on which it can be suggested that anything like fraud can be imputed to the trustees or on which anything can be suggested bringing them within the exceptions in the clause in regard to their action. That being so, I think the appeal entirely fails.

Therefore I am clearly of opinion that the appeal should be dismissed with costs.

Lord MACNAGHTEN.—I am of the same opinion. By a recent, and I think a very beneficial change of the law, a trustee who has committed a breach of trust is entitled to rely on any statute of limitations as fully as anybody may do who is not a trustee, provided his conduct has been free from any taint of fraud, and provided he has not derived, and is not in a position to derive, any personal benefit from the transaction impeached as a breach of trust. I assume that but for recent legislation the respondents would have been liable to answer the appellant's claim. But I think the Act of 1888 was intended to apply and does apply to such a case as this, and, indeed, I cannot imagine any case to which the Act could more properly or more clearly apply than the case which has been discussed before your lordships to-day.

Lord DAVEY.—I am of the same opinion. It appears to have been assumed, or it is stated in one of the judgments which have been read to us to be not in dispute, that but for the Act of 1888 the defendants would have been liable in the present case. I do not desire to dispute that, or to say that that is not so. I only desire to say that it is not by any means clear to my mind that such a consequence would have followed from the state of facts which is revealed in the evidence.

But, assuming that the constructive notice for which Mr. Phillpotts contended would have brought to the knowledge of Mr. Heard that which certainly he did not in fact know at the date of the sale, that Thorne was an encumbrancer upon this property so as to convert Mr. Heard and his co-trustee into trustees for Thorne, I am of opinion that the statute of 1888 forms a perfect answer to the claim.

Two questions have been argued—first, whether the case is not within one of the exceptions mentioned in the early part of the 8th section; and, secondly, it has also been argued that, independently of the statute, the time began to run only at a period less than six years before the commencement of this action. I do not desire to say anything more than has been already said by your lordships, or more than is contained in the judgments which have been delivered in the courts below upon this point. It appears to me to be impossible to say that the money was "still retained" by the trustees, and it must be remembered that there is no evidence of actual knowledge, or rather, I should say, that the evidence disproves actual knowledge on the part of the respondents of Mr. Thorne's position. But it is sought to say (I am not speaking of constructive notice) that they must have acquired knowledge of it through the receipt which was signed by Mr. Searle, purporting to act as Thorne's agent, and put with the respondents papers.

Now it appears to me that the appellant is in this dilemma—either the respondents read that receipt or they did not. If they did not read it, I see no evidence whatever that they acquired any knowledge of Thorne's existence or of his interest in the property. If they did read that receipt, what did it tell them? It told them that Searle was (I will assume wrongly) purporting to act as Thorne's agent, and that he had given a receipt in discharge of the respondents in that character. If they did read this receipt, why were they not at liberty to believe, erroneously as it turns out, but still to believe, that Searle was acting in that character? If so, it appears to me the case is exactly the same, in fact; the case is that they paid away upon that view the money to Searle erroneously, believing that he was Thorne's agent. If that be the state of facts, it seems to me idle to contend that money which is paid away by a trustee to another person, in the erroneous belief that he fills a particular character which it turns out he does not fill, is still retained by the trustee.

Upon the other point, which was so fully discussed before your lordships, that the statute did not begin to run till within six years of the beginning of this action, I only desire to say this: In my opinion, if fraud, or a non-discovery of fraud, is to be relied on to take a case out of the Statute of Limitations, it must be the fraud of the person who invokes the aid of the Statute of Limitations. Now, the fraud which is imputed to Searle, and apparently justly, is that he put Thorne off his guard by continuing to pay his interest to him as if his security was still a subsisting one. It cannot be pretended for a moment that he was acting as agent for the respondents in doing that. He did not make the payments of interest in his character of agent for the respondents, he made them as agent for the mortgagor; and I see no foundation whatever upon which Searle's fraud can be attributed to the respondents, or can be said to have been committed by him while he was acting in the character of the respondents' agent.

Upon that ground, and the other grounds which have been stated in the judgments delivered in the courts below and by your lordships, I hold that there was no fraud imputable to the defendants which would prevent the running of the Statute of Limitations.

Judgments of the Court of Appeal and of Romer, J., affirmed, and appeal dismissed, with costs.

Solicitors for the appellants, Mear & Fowler, for G. H. Thorne, Nottingham.

Solicitors for the respondents, Yarde & Loader, for Burd, Pearse, & Prickman, Okehampton.

Privy Council.

(From the Supreme Court of Queensland.)

June 29, 1895.

BRABANT v. KING.
KING v. BRABANT. (a.)

Negligence—Public body—Nonfeasance—Liability to an individual under a contract—Deposit of goods for safe custody—Inspection of premises—Risk of injury to goods—Duty of bailee.

The principle of exemption from liabilities afforded to public bodies for mere nonfeasance, as enunciated in Municipality of Pictou v. Geldert, 42 W. R. 114, [1893] A. C. 524, and other cases, has no application to a case in which the parties charged with the nonfeasance are under obligations to an individual member of the public to perform the duty, which they have neglected to his prejudice, in consideration of their being remunerated by him for its performance.

A depositor of goods for safe custody, who by himself or his servants has had an opportunity of observing defects in the storehouse, incurs no obligation from this will and the codicil together as admitting, of such a conclusion.

(a.) Reported by C. H. GRAFTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

I think, therefore, there is a revocation or substitution by the codicil of the smaller annuities for the larger all through; and, bearing in mind the rule which was impressed upon us very properly by the learned counsel for the appellants, which is laid down in Doe v. Hicks and Randfield v. Randfield, that you are not to guess at the revocation or to extend it further than the clear language of the thing requires you to do; it does appear to me, I confess, that we should be missing the real intention of this testator if we were to adopt the construction contended for by the appellants. I think the error consists in not seeing that that which is revoked is the thing given, and not the interest of the takers.

I think, therefore, that both appeals ought to be dismissed.

LOPES, L.J.—I am clearly of the same opinion. The rule which we have to regard in this case, I take it, is this—that to cut down a previous gift it must be reasonably clear that it was intended to be cut down. The words "cutting it down" must not be equivocal, but they must show with a reasonable certainty that a revocation was intended. I take it that that is the rule beyond all question upon which we have to act in this case.

Now, the object in construing all wills is to ascertain the intention of the testator or testatrix, so far as it is expressed by the words used. I do not propose to read the will and the codicil, which have been already read by my brother Lindley, but I do say that this passage in the will seems very strongly to show that the view which we take is the correct one. I mean these words: "I give and devise unto my granddaughter Ellen Elizabeth, the wife of Graham Lloyd, a like annuity of £300, to be a charge upon the said property in John-street aforesaid." Then come these words: "and to be paid to her and her children in the same manner in all respects as the annuity hereinbefore given to my granddaughter Anna Helena." That makes me think that the testator, in the will, was dealing with the entire annuity. The result that I arrive at is this, that it is reasonably certain that an entire revocation of the devise was intended by the codicil, and a substitution of an annuity of £150 payable to the granddaughter's appointees and children, instead of an annuity of £300 given by the will.

Now, unless that is the correct view, it appears to me that it would be difficult to attach the power of appointment given in the will to the codicil. I cannot construe the will and the codicil together unless I adopt the view which I have expressed with regard to the effect of that codicil upon the will.

I come, therefore, to the conclusion that Kekewich, J., was right in the interpretation that he put upon this will and codicil.

RIGBY, L.J.—I have considered the will and the codicil carefully, and I am unable to arrive at the same conclusion as the Lords Justices. The testator by his will gives in quite plain and unambiguous language to Mrs. Hall, one of his granddaughters, an annuity of £300 a year. [His lordship read the gift, and continued:—] He then gave to his granddaughter Mrs. Lloyd a like annuity of £300 to be a charge upon the same property, and to be paid to her and her children in the same manner in all respects as the annuity before given to Mrs. Hall. The two latter gifts refer to the gift to Mrs. Hall in an inaccurate manner, but the inaccuracies appear to be mere slips of the draftsman, and from neither of these taken separately, nor from both taken together, is there raised the slightest difficulty as to what is really given to the granddaughter. The granddaughters take under the will annuities for their respective lives, and nothing more; and it is with this broad fact in view that we must approach the codicil.

Now, the codicil is a much better drawn instrument than the will, and there is not a word in it which could raise any suspicion that the express revocation of the annuities to the granddaughters was intended to revoke the annuities to their children.

Direct revocation of the latter annuity there is none, and the only way in which a revocation can be brought about is by supposing that the language of the codicil means something different from what would be the result of the plain interpretation of words in themselves clear. The supposition must be that the draftsman used the plain words of reference and revocation in an inaccurate manner because there were inaccuracies in the will; and I do not think, having regard to the recognized canon of construction—viz., that a disposition in a codicil must be a plain revocation of a gift in a will in order to take effect as a revocation, that such a conjecture (for it seems to me little more) can be founded upon it. In order to make the codicil a revocation of the gifts to children of grandchildren it has to be altered, for everything in it shows careful drafting. The supposed improbability of the testator meaning to give a larger annuity amongst the children of a grandchild than is given to the grandchild herself weighs little or nothing in my judgment against the plain language of the codicil. We can no more tell the motives operating upon the testator in this case than we can in his treating differently the family of one granddaughter and the family of another. There may have been reasons personal to the grandchildren whose annuities are dealt with by the codicil.

With regard to the power of appointment I find no difficulty. The power of appointment arises under the will, and, according to my view, is not interfered with; and I cannot see the slightest difficulty in supposing that the testator meant to give this power of appointment among the children, whatever the annuity might happen to be, whether it was a larger or only the same amount as that which was given to the donee of the power.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors, Rowcliffes, Rawle, & Co., for Holland & Rigby, Ashbourne; Patersons, Snow, Bloxam, & Kinder, for Peele & Peele, Shrewsbury; Field, Roscoe, & Co., for Gibbons & Arkle, Liverpool.

From Chan. Div. (Lindley, Lopes, and Rigby, L.JJ.) June 28.

THE GOVERNMENTS STOCK INVESTMENT AND OTHER SECURITIES CO. (LIMITED) v. THE MANILA RAILWAY CO. (a.)

Company — Debentures — Floating security—Condition allowing company to carry on business until default for certain period — Subsequent issue of bonds — Priority.

A company issued debentures "by way of floating security," and subject to certain conditions, one of which was that, notwithstanding the charge, the company should be at liberty, for the purpose of its business, to deal with any part of its property until default should be made in payment of any interest thereby secured for a period of three months, or until the company should be compulsorily or voluntarily wound up. The company made default in payment of interest. More than three months after such default, but before the debenture-holders had taken any active steps to enforce their security, the company issued bonds covered by a trust deed, which recited the issue of the debentures and the fact that default had been made in the payment of interest.

(a.) Reported by ARNOLD GLOVER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Held, reversing the decision of North, J., that the bonds had priority over the debentures.

This was an appeal from a decision of North, J.

The Manila Railway Co. was formed in 1888, and in the same year issued debentures to the extent of £730,000 as a floating security.

The words of charge were as follow: "And the company hereby charges by way of floating security all its property whatsoever and wheresoever, both present and future, including its uncalled capital for the time being."

The debentures were issued subject to conditions indorsed thereon, of which the second was as follows: "Nothwithstanding the said charge, the company shall be at liberty in the course and for the purpose or its business to use, employ, sell, lease, exchange, or otherwise deal with any part of its property until default shall be made in payment of any interest hereby secured for the period of three calendar months after the same shall have become due, or until an order of some court of competent jurisdiction shall have been made or a special or extraordinary resolution shall have been duly passed for the winding up of the company."

In 1891, before any default had been made in the payment of interest on the debentures, the company issued bonds to the amount of £229,250, known as "A" bonds.

On the 1st of January, 1892, the company made default in paying interest on the debentures. The company then proposed to raise money by the issue of further bonds, and on the 1st of March, 1892, a covering deed was executed which recited that debentures had been issued, and recited the second condition subject to which they were issued, and recited that default had been made in the payment of the interest on such debentures. Subsequently "B" bonds were issued for £300,000. There was some dispute as to when these bonds were issued, but for the purpose of the present case it was assumed that the issue took place after the 1st of April, 1892—i.e., more than three months after default was made in paying the interest on the debentures. At the time when the bonds were issued the debenture-holders had taken no active steps to enforce their security.

The question was raised as to whether the debenture-holders or the "B" bondholders had priority. No question was raised at to the priority of the "A" bondholders.

The debenture-holders moved for an injunction to restrain the defendant company from paying dividends to the "B" bondholders which would become due on the 1st of July.

North, J., on the 27th of June, held that the plaintiffs' security ceased to be a floating security on the expiration of three months after default had been made in the payment of interest on the debentures, and that the plaintiffs were entitled to priority. He therefore granted an injunction.

The defendant company appealed.

Levett, Q.C., and P. B. Abraham, for the appellant company.—This is a question of the construction of the debenture. No doubt if the debenture-holders had appointed a receiver they would have gained priority, but having taken no steps they have not gained it. This is on the face of it a floating security and can only be "crystallized" by (a) the appointment of a receiver, (b) a compulsory winding up, or (c) a voluntary winding up. The decision of North, J., is inconsistent with the idea of this being a floating security.

Whitehorne, Q.C., and W. E. Vernon, for one of the "B" bondholders.

C. E. E. Jenkins, for the trustees for the "B" bondholders.

Farwell, Q.C., and Disturnal, for the plaintiffs.—A floating security is none the less a chaage because it is a floating one: Driver v. Broad, 41 W. R. 483, [1893] 1 Q. B. 744. It is a charge with a contract attached that the charge shall be a floating one until default has been made for three months. The "B" bondholders advanced their money with their eyes open, for their trust deed recites the default in payment of interest. The appellants are obliged to contend that, in spite of default for three months and the pendency of a motion for a receiver, the company might swamp the debentures by issuing any number of new bonds. We rely on In re Horne and Hellard, 29 Ch. D. 736, 33 W. R. Dig. 234, where Pearson, J., held that the fact of a charge on land being a floating charge did not make it any the less an interest in land. [LINDLEY, L.J.—If your are right, may not the debenture-holders allow the company to go on contracting debts, and then prevent the company from paying them?]

Byrne, Q.C., and E. Beaumont, for other debenture-holders.

Latham, Q.C., and Kirby, for "A" bondholders.

Levett, Q.C., replied.

LINDLEY, L.J.—This is an appeal from an order made by North, J., granting an injunction in the terms of the first paragraph of the notice of motion. The debenture-holders ask for an injunction to restrain the defendants from parting with any moneys for the purpose of paying the interest due on or about the 1st of July next from the railway company upon what are called "B" bonds. That is the substance of it, and the question is, whether that is right. It is a pressing matter, because the 1st of July is close at hand, and the case has been advanced to be disposed of out of its order in consequence of the pressing nature of it; and, so far as I can judge, I do not think we shall gain anything by thinking it over further.

I confess at first I thought the language was such as to render the interpretation put upon it by North, J., the correct one; but when I thought that I did not see how it would work, and now that I do see how it would work I have come clearly to the opinion that it cannot be supported, and is wrong.

The case turns upon the true construction of this debenture. The debenture is issued by this railway company, and it is a charge. There is a covenant to pay at certain dates, and to pay interest at 6 per cent. on certain other dates. Then comes the clause in the debenture which gives the debenture-holder a charge on the assets of the company. That clause runs thus: [His lordship read the clause and the second condition, and continued:—] Now, what is the effect of that? In the first place, a charge by way of floating security means, I suppose, what it says; that is to say, it is a charge. It is an equitable charge, not a legal mortgage. It is an equitable charge upon all the assets of the company present and future; and "by way of floating security" means this, that the company is to go on notwithstanding the charge, and to carry on its business. Now, if it were not for the second condition, what would be the position of affairs? The position of affairs would be this, that the moment there was default in payment of interest the going on of the company could be stopped immediately. That is to say, a debenture-holder could immediately bring an action for a receiver, and so stop the business of the company. To prevent that the second condition is inserted for the benefit of the company, to give them, as Lopes, L.J., expressed it, "three months law." "Notwithstanding the said charge." What does that mean? That means the charge which is created by the debenture, whatever it is—call it what you like, call it by any name. It is notwithstanding that charge, and no other, that this company shall be at liberty to carry on its business. For how long? Until default shall have been made in payment of interest for three months.

Now we come to the real crux. What is to happen at the end of that three months? The condition does not say that. It says nothing about it. The rest of the condition "or until an order" applies to the event of an order of the court being made within the three months. They could stop the concern before the three months, whether the debenture-holders liked it or not. But the important point, the point upon which everything turns here, is that nothing is said as to what is to happen at the end of the three months. Now, what does that mean? What is the legal effect of that? From the absence of expression as to what is to happen are we to draw an inference which will work and make the whole machinery produce the end for which it is designed; or are we to draw an inference, equally consistent with the words, which will scarcely work at all as a matter of business, and will produce the grossest injustice? It appears to me, when the court is in that position, it has not to grapple with words, it has to grapple with the absence of words, and to draw that inference which is reasonable, having regard to the language which is used and the objects of the document in which that language is found.

Now, according to the construction put upon this by the learned judge this consequence would happen, that the debenture-holders could, if they chose, allow this company to go on after the three months, allow debts to be contracted and then say that none of them should be paid. That would be the legal consequence of that inference. Well, I call that a monstrous inference. The other inference is this: "It depends upon you, the debenture-holders, what is to be done. The clause does not say it. If you like to let the company go on, your charge shall remain a floating security. If you don't like it, and like to stop it, you can, at the end of three months, get a receiver and manager, or whatever redress you like." That appears to me to be the true inference; and I am not prepared to go to the length of holding that it is right to say to the debenture-holders: "You can get a receiver and stop payment of the debt, and yet let the company go on and contract more debts." The right thing to say is: "If you want to interfere, you must stop the company going on and realize your security; if you do not choose to do that, you are not entitled to an injunction." I think, therefore, the appeal ought to succeed. The appeal, therefore, will be allowed, and the order made by North, J., will be discharged. The costs of all parties here and below will, I understand, by consent be costs in the action.

LOPES, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I had considerable doubt on the language, but on the whole, after careful consideration, I think the construction put upon it by my brother Lindley is th right one. I think this clause is inserted in th interests of the company in order to give them the benefit of the three months which they would not have had except for this condition.

RIGBY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. This debenture and the condition attached to it are not expressed in the clearest possible language, but for this purpose I think they are quite sufficient. In the body of the debenture a charge is created upon all the property of the company. But it is a charge by way of floating security. Now, whenever that charge is referred to again it is a charge by way of floating security. Mr. Farwell ingeniously attempted to say that the creation of a charge was one thing, and the making of it a floating security was a different one, and that you could refer to the charge, leaving out of view the floating security. I do not think that is sound.

I will only say a few words about the way in which this matter grew up. We know there were charges upon the undertaking. Now, if you charge all your property, you charge each individual item of it. But the courts at once saw that if you charge an nndertaking, it is not intended that that undertaking should be immediately stopped and wound up; but it is charged with this common object in view, that until events happen which amount to default, the business shall be carried on; and if the business is carried on, it follows as a matter of necessity that the company must withdraw some part of its assets, though charged, from the general charge, substituting, of course, the assets which are acquired in place of those which are released. I do not mean merely those that cover the purchase-money, but those which, in the course of business, are added to the company's property. So we get a very adequate idea, for the purpose of this case at any rate, of what is meant by floating security, the object being that the business of the company shall be carried on for the benefit of both parties until some default is made.

Then we come to the second condition, and I think we are bound to construe the charge as if the words were "the said charge is a charge by way of floating security, and the company is to be at liberty notwithstanding the charge." That points to something which, to a certain extent, contradicts the idea of floating security. Notwithstanding the floating charge, the company shall be at liberty to do something which, but for this clause, they would not be entitled to do—that is, to carry on for a certain period. Now, what is the point? As I read the clause, I think the fair way to put it is, for a period hereafter to be defined, that is to say, three calendar months after the interest has become due, or (this will lessen the period) until an order of some court or an extraordinary resolution. It is not a fixed period of three months, but it is a period whose maximum is three months, and the minimum may be determined by an order of the court or by an extraordinary resolution to wind up. Now, so construed, I do not think I am travelling out of it in the least, but I am giving the literal interpretation of the words. It is a relaxation in favour of the company, during the period defined, of the right of the debenture-holders—saying nothing at all as to what is to take place at the expiration of the period. Of course, if that period were brought to an end by a winding up, nothing requires to be said at all. The winding-up stops the business of the company, and makes the debenture charge a charge upon the existing assets without power to the company to carry on. But if it stops by the effluxion of the three months the charge is to be as though this had not been contained in the condition. The charge is then a simple ordinary floating security. The debenture-holders are under no obligation to come in and get a receiver appointed, and thereby put an end to the business. They may do so—any of them may do so if they think it to their advantage. On the other hand, if they do not think it to their advantage, they may permit the floating security to go on as a floating security, with the necessary consequence that the company in the course of its business may mortgage that security and give a good title to the mortgagees. I think that is all that is necessary for the determination of this case. I do not think we are going contrary to the case that was cited before Pearson, J. (In re Horne and Hellard), at all. There was a totally different charge there, and it was a vendor and purchaser's case. I do not think it is necessary to say more about that case except that I am not in the least satisfied that we are saying anything that would infringe upon its authority.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitors, Bompas, Bischoff, Dodgson, Coxe, & Bompas; Ashurst, Morris, Crisp, & Co.; Murray, Hutchins, Stirling, & Murray; Davidson & Morriss; Beaumont & Son; Bircham & Co.

High Court of Justice.

Chan. Div.)
Chitty, J.) Nov. 27.

VINE v. RALEIGH. (a.)

Settled land—Act of Parliament—Settlement—Tenant for life—Thellusson Act (39 & 40 Geo. 3, c. 98), s. 1—Will—Next of kin—Executor of deceased next of kin—Settled Land Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 38), s. 2, sub-sections 1, 5; s. 58, sub-section (1) V.

The survivor of two next of kin and the executors of the deceased next of kin were, under the joint operation of a will and the Thellusson Act, entitled during the life of another to receive the rents of the property subject to the trusts of the will in equal moieties.

Held, that, inasmuch as the definition of a settlement in section 2, sub-section (1), of the Settled Land Act, 1882, included a will and an Act of Parliament, the will and the Thellusson Act together created a settlement within the meaning of the Act.

Held, also, that the survivor of the next of kin and the executors of the deceased next of kin together either constituted the tenant for life for purposes of the Act, by virtue of section 2, sub-section (5) of the Act, or had the powers of a tenant for life under the Act by virtue of section 58, sub-section (1) V., of the Act.

Summons.

This was an application on the part of the trustees of the will of Edward Ward Walter Raleigh that they and the receiver in the action might be at liberty to present to the court a petition under the Settled Estates Act, 1877, for power to grant to the Commissioners for executing the office of Lord High Admiral a lease of part of a certain estate called the Mount Boone Estate.

The testator, by his will dated in 1864, after appointing Sir Edward C. Dering and Charles Vine his executors, and directing that all property which he might leave in trust was to be in their confidence and custody, directed that all the residue of his invested or moneyed property should eventually, together with accumulations, be invested in landed estate, and out of the interest derived on his property invested in funds or on rental of land he directed that the sum of £500 should be paid yearly to his nephew, the plaintiff Edward Walter Raleigh, for his life, and that the surplus should from time to time during the lifetime of his nephew be expended in the purchase of additional land, or in the improvement of the landed estate and the property, and that should his nephew marry, and at his death leave a son, such son should inherit a life interest in the whole of the landed property, subject to certain conditions, and that the property under similar engagements should pass on to the lawful male heir of his nephew in succession for ever, with remainder over to another nephew, and to his male heirs after him, in the event of his nephew Edward Walter Raleigh dying without male issue. The will contained no powers of leasing.

The testator died on the 22nd of January, 1865, and shortly afterwards this suit was instituted for the administration of his estate, and a receiver was appointed.

In 1874 the then trustees of the will purchased, with the approval of the judge, the Mount Boone Estate. Edward Walter Raleigh was at that time married, and the defendant W. F. C. Raleigh, who was then an infant, was his eldest son, and the annuity of £500 a year was being paid out of the income of the estate, and the residue of the income was being accumulated.

In July, 1883, it was ordered that the applicants should be at liberty to present such petition under the Settled Estates Act, 1877, for obtaining the leasing powers thereby conferred as they might be advised (31 W. R. 855, 24 Ch. D. 238).

A petition was accordingly presented, and by the order made thereon, dated the 12th of July, 1884, general powers of granting occupation leases of a portion of the Mount Boone Estate were vested in the trustees of the will and the survivor of them, or other the trustees or trustee for the time being of the will.

In March, 1886, it was ordered that the receiver should, after keeping down the annuity of £500 per annum, and after maintaining in good habitable repair the houses and tenements on the property, subject to the trusts of the will, divide the residue of the balances which should from time to time be certified to be due from him, as from the 22nd of January, 1886 (being twenty-one years from the death of the testator), and during the life of the plaintiff Edward Walter Raleigh, or until further order, into two equal moieties, and should pay one moiety to the said plaintiff as one of the next of kin of the testator, and another moiety to the defendants O. A. and J. D. Curtis, as executrixes of the other next of kin of the testator.

Part of the property referred to in the summons not being included in the order of the 12th of July, 1884, further powers of leasing became necessary, and the question was whether, having regard to the order of March, 1886, the trustees and the receiver were the proper persons to present a petition under the Settled Estates Act, 1877, or whether the plaintiff Edward Walter Raleigh, and the defendants O. A. and J. D. Curtis, as executrixes, were not the proper persons as constituting the tenant for life under the settlement within the meaning of the Settled Land Act, 1882.

Byrne, Q.C., and Wace, for the applicants.—The will and the Thellusson Act, by the combined operation of which the land is now settled, constitute a settlement; but the plaintiff, the surviving next of kin of the testator, and the executrixes of the deceased next of kin have not the powers of a tenant for life within the meaning of the Act.

(a.) Reported by J. F. WALEY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Levett, Q.C., and S. Dickinson, for the plaintiff, the surviving next of kin and his eldest son.—The executrixes of the deceased next of kin are persons beneficially entitled within the meaning of the Act, s. 2, sub-section (5).

Farwell, Q.C., and Yate Lee, for the executrixes of the deceased next of kin.—We are clearly within section 58, sub-section (1), of the Act.

CHITTY, J.—Under the will the personal estate has been laid out in the purchase of real estate. The real estate purchased was settled by the will. The will, however, directed that the rents should be accumulated for a period which, in the result, has exceeded the twenty-one years allowed by the Thellusson Act. That Act avoids the accumulations after the lapse of that time, and directs that the rents shall, so long as the same shall be directed to be accumulated contrary to the provisions of the Act, go to and be received by such person or persons as would have been entitled thereto if such accumulations had not been directed. The period of twenty-one years elapsed in January, 1886, and but for the Act the accumulations would still be going on. The persons entitled under the statute are the testator's next of kin, consisting of two persons, one of whom is alive and the other is dead. The surviving next of kin is before the court, and the executrixes of the deceased next of kin.

The first question is whether there is a settlement affecting the rents in the present circumstances of the case within the meaning of section 2, sub-section (1) of the Settled Land Act, 1882, and in my opinion there is. Without reading the whole of the definition, it is enough to say it includes a will and an Act of Parliament, and in my opinion, putting the will and the Act together, there is a settlement. It is not necessary to consider what would have been the result if the Thellusson Act had merely avoided the direction to accumulate, but the Act goes beyond that, and directs to whom the rents directed to be accumulated contrary to the Act are to go. I hold, therefore, that the case falls within the Settled Land Act, 1882.

Then it is said that the next of kin, that is, the survivor and the executrixes of the deceased one, are tenants for life within the meaning of the Settled Land Act, 1882, either by virtue of section 2, sub-section (5), or section 58, sub-section (1) V. In my opinion it is not necessary to say whether the case falls under one section or the other. It is plainly within section 58, sub-section (1) V. It is quite possible there may be a question with regard to the executrixes under section 2, sub-section (5), whether they are beneficially entitled to possession. My present opinion is that for this purpose they are persons beneficially entitled to possession. I hold accordingly that the surviving next of kin and the executrixes of the deceased next of kin have the powers of a tenant for life under the Settled Land Act, 1882.

Solicitors, Paterson, Snow, Bloxam, & Kinder; Petch & Smurthwaite; Peacock & Goddard.

IN BANKRUPTCY.

Q. B. Div. (Vaughan Williams, J.) July 22; Aug. 12, 1895.

In re DENNIS.
Ex parte DENNIS. (a.)

Bankruptcy—Rescission of receiving order—Money paid into court to meet claims of creditors who cannot be found—Statute of Limitations (21 Jac. 1, c. 16), s. 3 —Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), ss. 35, 36.

When a debtor has paid money into court to meet the claims of creditors who cannot be found, the Statute of Limitations does not run against such claims, and the debtor is not entitled of right to have such money paid out to him after the expiration of six years during which no claim has been made to it.

The court may, however, as a matter of grace, allow the debtor to have the money paid out to him, upon his giving reasonable security to repay the same in the event of any creditors appearing to claim it.

Application for the payment of a sum of money out of court under the following circumstances:

A receiving order was made against the debtor in November, 1888, and upon the 12th of March, 1889, he applied to have it rescinded upon the grounds that he had paid all but two of his creditors in full.

These two creditors he was unable to discover, and he was willing to lodge the amount of their claims in court.

The receiving order was rescinded upon his paying the money into court.

In April, 1895, the official receiver wrote to inform the debtor that there was a sum of £51 19s. 7d. lying to the credit of his estate, but refused to pay it over to him without an order of the court, whereupon this application was made.

J. F. P. Rawlinson, for the debtor.—The debtor is entitled to have this money repaid to him, because the Statute of Limitations has now run against the creditors. [VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J.—The Statute of Limitations does not run against the creditors, for they could not have brought an action to recover the money.] I submit that after the rescission of the receiving order they could have brought an action, and it is now more than six years since the date of of the rescission, and no claim has been made. [VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J.—I think this money is the creditors' money, and that you cannot ask to have it paid out to you.] I submit that it was paid in for security, and that the object for which it was paid in has failed.

Muir Mackenzie, for the official receiver, left the matter in the discretion of the court.

Cur. adv. vult.

Aug. 12.—VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J.—This is an application by the debtor against whom a receiving order was made in 1888. That receiving order was rescinded in 1889, and the order rescinding it recites that the debtor has paid into court the whole amount of the debts for which he could not produce a receipt. Six years having elapsed, the debtor now wants to have those moneys paid out to him. I ought to deal with the rescission of a receiving order in the same way as I should deal with an order of adjudication, adopting the provisions of sections 35 and 36 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883. Now section 35 provides for the annulment of adjudication when all debts have been paid in full, and section 36 provides, firstly, that "any debt disputed by a debtor shall be considered as paid in full, if the debtor enters into a bond in such sum and with such sureties as the court approves, to pay the amount to be recovered in any proceeding for the recovery of or concerning the debt with costs"; secondly, that "any debt due to a creditor who cannot be found or cannot be identified shall be considered as paid in full if paid into court."

(a.) Reported by P. M. FRANCKE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

With regard to the first part of this section, referring to disputed debts, I think that if the creditor made no claim for six years the Statute of Limitations might run against him; but with regard to the second part, referring to admitted debts due to creditors who cannot be found, I think that the Statute of Limitations does not apply, and that the applicant in this case is not entitled to have the money paid out to him, although six years have elapsed without the creditors appearing to claim it.

I am, however, anxious to help the applicant, for if no one is really going to claim this money, it seems hard that he cannot get it back. All that I can do is this, I will not make any order to the official receiver to pay this money out to the applicant, but I think I may say that if the official receiver is really satisfied that these creditors or their personal representatives cannot be found, and reports to me to that effect, I will allow the applicant to have the money, subject to his giving reasonable security to repay the same should the creditors appear to claim it.

Solicitors for the applicant, Morse & Simpson.

Solicitor for the official receiver, Solicitor to the Board of Trade.

Q. B. Div.
(Vaughan Williams and Wright, JJ.) Aug. 5, 6.

In re PURRETT.
Ex parte PURRETT. (a.)

Bankruptcy—Practice—Hearing of petition — Attendance of petitioning creditor—Right of debtor to cross-examine—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 7—Bankruptcy Rules, 1886, rr. 162, 164.

Upon the hearing of a petition the registrar refused to allow the petitioning creditor to be cross-examined, upon the grounds that, the debt being based upon a judgment and verified by affidavit, no right to cross-examine arose until evidence had been given to displace the judgment.

Held by the court, that the grounds of the registrar's decision were wrong.

By Vaughan Williams, J., that unless the petitioning creditor's attendance is dispensed with by the court under rule 164, he must be present at the hearing, whether he is a witness to any matter or not, and that the reason for such practice is that questions may be put to him.

By Wright, J., that it does not follow from the statute or the rules that the petitioning creditor need be present unless required as a witness, or that there is any right to cross-examine him unless he gives evidence.

Appeal from a receiving order made by the registrar of the County Court at Luton.

The debtor was a tenant of Madame de Falbe, who obtained a judgment against him for £300 arrears of rent, upon which she issued a bankruptcy notice, and upon the debtor's failure to comply therewith presented the petition upon which the order appealed against was made.

Upon the hearing of the petition, no application to dispense with the personal attendance of the petitioning creditor being made, the debtor's counsel desired to cross-examine her; but, although she was within the precincts of the court, the registrar refused to allow her to be cross-examined, upon the grounds that her debt being founded on a judgment and verified by her affidavit her presence was not necessary until some evidence was given to displace the judgment.

The debtor appealed.

G. M. Cohen, for the appellant.—The petition was disputed, and notice had been given to the petitioning creditor to attend for cross-examination. The debtor was therefore entitled to insist that she should appear and submit to cross-examination: Ex parte Dodd, In re Ormston, 25 W. R. 185, 3 Ch. D. 452.

Reed, Q.C., and Shearman, for the respondent.—There was no improper use of the process of the court; the debt was proved to have been unpaid down to within four days of the date of the hearing by the affidavit. A debtor is not invariably entitled to assist on the presence of the petitioning creditor: Ex parte Barrow, In re Irving, 23 W. R. 432, L. R. 10 Ch. App. 269.

G. M. Cohen replied.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J.—This case itself is one of no great importance, but, having to sit here and administer the law in bankruptcy, I feel very strongly the importance of the rules of procedure being properly adhered to, and I cannot bring myself to hold that the rules were adhered to in this case.

The attendance of the petitioning creditor upon the hearing of the petition has been the uniform practice ever since the practice in bankruptcy took an established form at all. In my judgment that practice was right and well founded. The consequences of bankruptcy are serious, and under those circumstances one finds that in bankruptcy practice the courts have always insisted on the strongest proof of the good faith of the petitioning creditor—for instance, where the subject-matter of the petition is a legal debt vested in trustees, the court will not adjudicate without the presence of the cestui que trust. One knows, too, that cases do occur where petitions are presented for improper purposes; for instance, to stop a prosecution or get rid of a partner. Rule 164 provides that "the personal attendance of the petitioning creditor and of the witnesses to prove the debt and act of bankruptcy or other material statements, upon the hearing of the petition, may, if the court shall think fit, be dispensed with"; and those provisions carry out this practice well, for it seems to me that they contemplate the attendance of the petitioning creditor, whether he is a witness to prove the debt or the act of bankruptcy or not, and I think that the reason for requiring the petitioning creditor's presence is that questions may be put to him.

It is, however, within the discretion of the court to dispense with the attendance of the petitioning creditor, and I think that the registrar might have dispensed with her appearance in this case upon the ground that no useful purpose would be served by putting questions to her; but it appears from his note that he dispensed with her attendance because the debt was based on a judgment. That reason I think wholly wrong, and I am not sure that the registrar applied his mind as to whether he was satisfied that no useful purpose could be served by putting questions to her.

(a.) Reported by P. M. FRANCKE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

It is of the greatest importance to the practice that it should not be thought that in the case of a debt founded on a judgment the right of cross-examination is lost until evidence is given to displace the judgment. The petition must go back to the registrar to be reheard.

WRIGHT, J.—I am not prepared to dissent from my brother upon a question of practice, but I do not think that it follows from rule 164 that the petitioning creditor is bound to be present, whether he is a witness to prove the debt or other material fact or not. It seems to me that the rights of the parties are settled by section 7 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, where in sub-section 1 it provides that "a creditor's petition shall be verified by affidavit of the creditor or of some person on his behalf having knowledge of the matter." If the creditor gives fresh evidence at the hearing, of course he must be liable to cross-examination; but I do not see how the debtor can have the right to cross-examine a person who is not put in the witness-box.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitor for the appellant, J. L. Calcott.

Solicitors for the respondent, Rowcliffes & Rawle.

House of Lords.

From C. A. England. } May 10.

DAVIS & SONS v. TAFF VALE RAILWAY CO. (a)

Railway company—Customer—Special Act—Competing railways—Excessive rates.

By a special Act, promoted by one railway company and opposed by another, running powers were given to the promoters over the line of their opponents, but these were to remain in abeyance so long as they should afford all reasonable facilities for goods and mineral traffic . . . . "at rates per mile not greater than the lowest rate" charged by the opponents for like traffic to or from three distinct places.

Held (Lord Halsbury, L.C., Lords Watson, Ashbourne, Macnaghten; Lord Morris dissenting), that the Act was for the advantage of the public; that the railway company were under a legal obligation to the appellants as customers who could insist on its provisions; and that the appellants, therefore, were entitled to ascertain the mileage rate to each of the three different places, and to take the lowest of the three as the basis of the rate to be charged.

By Lord Watson.—The provisions of a Railway Act, even when they impose mutual obligations, differ from private stipulations in this essential respect, that they derive their existence and their force, not from the agreement of parties, but from the will of the Legislature. And when provisions of that kind are not limited to the interests of the parties mutually obliged, but impose upon one or other or both of them an obligation in favour of third parties, who are sufficiently designated, I am of opinion that the obligation so imposed must operate as a direct enactment of the Legislature in favour of these parties, and cannot be regarded as a mere stipulation inter alios in which they may have an interest, but have no title to enforce.

Decision of the Court of Appeal reversed.

This was an appeal from the Court of Appeal (Brett, M.R., and Lopes and Kay, L.JJ.) reported 42 W. R. 215, [1894] 1 Q. B. 43, where the facts are set out at length.

The action was brought by the respondents against the appellants to recover the amount of rates and tolls alleged to be due in respect of the carriage of coals for the appellants upon the respondents' railway.

The appellants alleged that the rates claimed were in excess of the lowest rates for the time being charged by the respondents for like traffic to or from the docks at Cardiff, Penarth, or Barry, in contravention of the terms of section 23 of the Barry Dock and Railways Act, 1888, by which the respondent company were to afford "facilities for goods and mineral traffic destined for or coming from the undertaking of . . . the Barry Docks and Railway Co. . . . at rates per mile not greater than the lowest rate which shall for the time being be charged by the Taff Vale Railway Co. for like traffic to or from the docks at Cardiff, Penarth, or Barry."

The appellants paid into court so much as they admitted to be due to the respondents, and contended that the respondents were not entitled to claim from them rates in excess of those permitted by the section.

Day, J., decided in favour of the respondents. The Court of Appeal affirmed the judgment of Day, J.

Sir R. E. Webster, Q.C., and J. Fletcher Moulton, Q.C., (Joseph Shaw with them), for the appellants.—The Barry Dock and Railway Act, 1888, is not confined in its operation to the two railway companies. The fact that, as in Barry Railway Co. v. Taff Vale Railway Co., 43 W. R. 372, [1895] 1 Ch. 128, a special remedy is given for breach of statutory obligation to one company as against the others, does not take away that of the individual trader. The 23rd section is an express enactment in favour of the public.

They cited Pryce v. Monmouthshire Canal and Railway Companies, 27 W. R. 666, 4 App. Cas. 197; Saunders v. Holborn District Board of Works, 43 W. R. 26, [1895] 1 Q. B. 64; Herron v. Rathmines and Rathgar Improvement Commissioners, [1892] A. C. 498, 41 W. R. Dig. 246.

Balfour Browne, Q.C., and W. J. Noble, for the respondents.—It is not a question of rates paid by the public. The same question was decided in the Court of Appeal in Barry Railway Co. v. Taff Vale Railway Co. The act is simply a contract between the two companies. In Countess of Rothes v. Kirkcaldy Waterworks Commissioners, 7 App. Cas., at p. 707, Lord Watson stated that provisions in a local and personal Act must be considered a legislative contract.

Sir R. E. Webster replied.

The House took time for consideration.

Lord HALSBURY, L.C.—This was an action in which the Taff Vale Railway Co. sued the consignors of coal for the carriage of coal, and there was no dispute that the amount of coal carried was accurately claimed to have been carried, but it was contended on two separate grounds that the rates at which the coals were charged were excessive.

The Taff Vale Railway Co. had charged the rates within their maximum tolls as originally permitted by the Legislature, but beyond what was permitted by a later statute, to be presently stated. That statute limited the power of the Taff Vale Railway Co. to charge, provided that statute could be insisted on by the consignors of the coals.

The action was tried before Day, J., who decided in favour of the Taff Vale Railway Co. upon two grounds.

(a.) Reported by C. H. GRAFTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

First, that upon the true construction of the Acts to be presently referred to, the terminus ad quem was not to be ascertained by measuring the distance; in short, not by a mileage rate; but that Cardiff, Penarth, and Barry were to be treated as one terminus as being a grouped district, and that therefore there was no excess in the rate charged.

Secondly, the learned judge held that the Act relied upon by the consignors was only intended to give legislative sanction to a contract between the two companies to which the traders, the consignors of the coals, were no parties, and that therefore they could not insist upon its provisions; and that if it did give the traders any ground of complaint, it must be insisted upon before the Railway Commissioners, and could not be made the ground of defence in a court of law against the right of the Taff Vale Railway Co. to charge their full tolls.

The Court of Appeal did not deal with the first point at all, but they affirmed the judgment of Day, J. This is an appeal to your lordships from that judgment, and the question now in debate seems to me to resolve itself into two somewhat simple propositions.

While I certainly do not question what the Master of the Rolls so emphatically declares, that we are entitled to look at the circumstances (a proposition which Mr. Moulton declares he never questioned), I do not see that we gain very much light here if we do look at the circumstances, beyond this, that two possibly competing railways were before Parliament, and Parliament enacted certain provisions, which it is now our task to construe.

The first question which seems to be involved in the judgment of Day, J., though the last treated, is that, even supposing the rate charged to be excessive, the proper jurisdiction to apply to is that of the Railway Commissioners, and that the excess cannot properly be made the subject of debate in an ordinary court of law.

I notice this ground to clear my way for dealing with the questions I have enumerated, since I think it is covered by authority which I think your lordships would be reluctant to shake. Very similar words come under review in The Great Western Railway Co. v. The Railway Commissioners, in 29 W. R. 901, 7 Q. B. D., at p. 193. There Lord Bramwell, when Lord Justice of Appeal, pointed out that where the complaint is that too much had been charged by the carrier the ordinary courts are the proper tribunal to decide such a question, and in that case Field, J., and Manisty, J., Lord Bramwell, the present Master of the Rolls, and Cotton, L.J., actually restrained by prohibition the Railway Commissioners from entertaining the matter where it only raised the question of an excessive rate being charged, since that was a matter which might and ought to be determined in an ordinary court of law.

"I think," says Lord Bramwell, "there is a sort of presumption against the Railway Commissioners having jurisdiction in this matter, since it is quite certain that if there have been overcharges the moneys paid in excess can be recovered back by the person overcharged by the company."

It is obvious here to remark that the company is suing for an amount in a court of law which, if the objection insisted on by the trader is a good one, is not due, and therefore it would be impossible to contend that, upon the hypothesis that the charge is excessive, the court had not jurisdiction to determine that question.

That brings me to the question, first, with reference to the excess in part of the charge. One obligation of the Taff Vale Railway Co. is in respect of the rates. "They are to afford facilities at rates per mile not greater," &c. What can be the meaning of rates per mile? The words are inconsistent with a group charge which shall be the same to any distance within a group. The two things are absolutely, to my mind, inconsistent with each other. Of course, it is a totally different proposition to say that when the Legislature has fixed a terminus ad quem the mileage rate is only supposed to extend to that one place, at whatever point of that one place the goods may be delivered. But to me it seems impossible to contend that when the Legislature speaks of Cardiff, Penarth, or Barry, it means to treat all of these places as if they constituted but one place. They are three different places; they are at various distances from the point from which traffic is to be carried, and, independently of the objection that you must strike the disjunctive "or" out of the statute, and read "and" instead, it seems an absurd incongruity to be applying a mileage rate to places differing in distance. Assuming there is to be no group charge, what part of Cardiff, what part of Penarth, what part of Barry is to be taken as the point of arrival and delivery is not now before us, and I do not express any opinion.

That brings me to the question whether the two Acts do in truth constitute a contract between the two companies giving no right except to each other, and therefore not justifying the trader in refusing to pay the amount demanded. Now it seems to me that there is a very obvious answer to the argument that the 23rd section of the Act constitutes merely a contract between the companies. It is not a contract; it is not to my mind even like a contract; it bears no analogy to a contract. It is an express enactment which imposes an obligation on the Taff Vale Railway Co. to charge certain rates; it is immaterial what the terms are upon which those rates are to be charged; we are now construing the statutory obligation, and if the Taff Vale Railway Co. have done the thing which the Legislature has contemplated they might do, and which, if I am right in what I have said before, they have done, then their right to charge more than the lowest rate which for the time being they have charged for like traffic to or from the Docks at Cardiff, Penarth, or Barry has ceased, and the Legislature has prohibited them from doing it. It would be strange indeed if this be true, that a trader sued for the higher charge should not be able to set up the unlawful character of the excess.

The words seem to me to be plain, the obligation is to "charge the rates." This is a matter not between the two companies, though, of course, when you are dealing with two competent companies it affects the two companies very much; but the obligation is to charge the prescribed rates and no more, and rates must be charged to traders and not to the other company.

It is said that these are private Acts. So they are; they are Acts which give great powers, and in giving which the Legislature has generally been careful to look to the rights of the public. It would be a very singular course of legislation to commit the interests of the traders of the district to be dealt with by two railway companies, so that if they agreed the private trader should have no remedy.

Conveyance of goods by a railway company established by Act of Parliament is a public right, and the obvious meaning, to my mind, of the whole of these arrangements is that unless the Taff Vale Railway Co. carry at the rates which I have described as the prescribed rates, they shall have a competing line permitted; but this does not in the least degree interfere, in my mind, with the remedy of the trader himself, who when he has been overcharged should refuse to pay, or recover back when he has paid, an overcharge prohibited by the Act of Parliament.

For these reasons I move that this appeal be allowed, that the amount should be properly ascertained in the Queen's Bench Division, and that the respondents should pay all the costs both here and in the courts below.

Lord WATSON.—Section 23 of the Barry Docks and Railways Act, 1888, enacts, inter alia, that the Taff Vale Co., the respondents in this appeal, "shall punctually and regularly forward and afford all reasonable facilities for goods and mineral traffic destined for or coming from the undertaking of the company from or to Treforest, or any place northward thereof, at rates per mile not greater than the lowest rate which shall for the time being be charged by the Taff Vale Railway Co. for like traffic to or from the docks at Cardiff, Penarth, or Barry, and shall deliver all such traffic into and take the same from the company's sidings as regards all traffic coming from or destined for Hafod, or any place westward thereof, at Hafod." It also provides that the Taff Vale Co. shall receive from the Barry Co. a bonus, to be fixed by agreement or arbitration, in respect of the traffic interchanged at Hafod.

The same clause enacts that, in the event of its being decided by the Railway Commissioners that the Taff Vale Co. have failed to give proper facilities, and have not within reasonable time after notice remedied such failure, the Barry Co. shall have the right to exercise running powers over certain portions of the Taff Vale system. During the exercise of these powers the obligations of the Taff Vale Co. with respect to interchange of traffic at Hafod are suspended.

The appellant firm have two collieries at Ferndale, on the Rhondda Fach branch of the respondents' railway. They are sued by the respondents for a balance alleged to be due upon an account for carriages of coal and other articles from or to their collieries, and exchanged at Hafod. There is no controversy between the parties except as to the amount of the rates charged. The appellants plead that the charges made by the respondents are in excess of the maximum rate sanctioned by section 23 of the Barry Docks and Railways Act in the terms just quoted. The respondent company do not dispute that the traffic charged for is traffic falling within the description given in section 23; but they maintain, in the first place, that its enactments are only imperative as between them and the Barry Railway Co., and cannot be enforced by the appellants; and, in the second place, that, upon a sound construction of the statute, the rate charged is not excessive. Day, J., who tried the cause, decided both points in favour of the respondents; and his judgment on the first point was unanimously affirmed in the Court of Appeal by the Master of the Rolls, sitting with Lopes and Kay, L.JJ. Upon the second their lordships did not find it necessary to express any opinion.

If the provisions of section 23 had not been statutory, but had simply been matter of private stipulation between the two railway companies, I should have been of opinion that the decision of the courts below upon the first of these points was right. The result might have been very different according to Scotch law, which, in ordinary circumstances, enables one who is not a party to the contract, and who gives no consideration, to enforce any condition which is made in his favour by the parties contracting; see Finnie v. Glasgow and South-Western Railway Co., 3 Macq. 75, 6 W. R. H. L. Dig. 26. But in England, where consideration is necessary to the validity of a mutual contract, the doctrine of jus quæsitum tertio, if admitted, at least is not recognised to the same extent.

In cases where the provisions of a local and personal Act directly impose mutual obligations upon two persons or companies, such provisions may, in my opinion, be fairly considered as having this analogy to contract, that they must, as between those parties, be construed in precisely the same way as if they had been matter, not of enactment, but of private agreement. It was in that sense that in Countess of Rothes v. Kirkcaldy Waterworks Commissioners, 7 App. Cas. 707, I ventured to observe that "such statutory provisions as those of section 43, occurring in a local and personal Act, must be regarded as a contract between the parties, whether made by their mutual agreement or forced upon them by the Legislature." For all purposes of construction, I thought that the provisions which the House had to interpret might be legitimately viewed in that light. But it did not occur to me then, nor am I now of opinion, that the analogy of contract, for it is nothing more, could, in an English case especially, be carried farther.

The provisions of a railway Act, even when they impose mutual obligations, differ from private stipulations in this essential respect, that they derive their existence and their force, not from the agreement of parties, but from the will of the Legislature. And when provisions of that kind are not limited to the interests of the parties mutually obliged, but impose upon one or other or both of them an obligation in favour of third parties, who are sufficiently designated, I am of opinion that the obligation so imposed must operate as a direct enactment of the Legislature in favour of these parties, and cannot be regarded as a mere stipulation inter alios, which they may have an interest but have no title to enforce. These observations are not meant to apply to any case where a private contract made between two companies is scheduled to and confirmed by the Act; because, in such a case, the very form of the enactment indicates that it is to operate as a contract, and not otherwise.

In this case, imbedded in a series of obligations laid upon the Taff Vale Co., there is a positive enactment to the effect that, for the carriage of such traffic as the appellants', the company shall not charge more than a certain rate. I am of opinion that, so long as the Barry Co. do not obtain running powers, and these obligations continue to be incumbent on the respondent company, the appellants have a good title to insist upon their traffic being carried at the rate specified in section 23 of the Act of 1888.

Having arrived at that conclusion, I find it necessary to consider the second point upon which the respondents rely.

The clause in question requires that for the carriage of their traffic from Ferndale to Hafod, on its way to Barry Docks, viâ the Barry line, the appellants shall pay to the respondent company a rate per mile "not greater than the lowest rate which shall for the time being be charged by the Taff Vale Railway Co. for like traffic to or from the docks at Cardiff, Penarth or Barry." From Ferndale or Hafod to Penarth, the distance is about a mile longer than to the common point to which the mean length of the transit to the Cardiff Docks is calculated. Under the provisions of various Acts, passed prior to 1888, Cardiff and Penarth Docks were grouped, or, in other words, the same rate was made chargeable between these termini and other points on the Taff Railway. Notwithstanding the uniformity of the gross rate thus established, it is obvious that, if the actual distances between the Cardiff Docks and the Penarth Docks be taken into account, the mileage rate to Penarth Docks will be the less of the two. The respondent company maintained successfully before Day, J., that, as a legal consequence of the grouping together of Cardiff and Penarth Docks, the mileage rate to Penarth must be ascertained by assuming the distance to Penarth to be the same with the distance to that which is regarded as the common terminus of the Cardiff Docks.

The question thus raised upon the construction of section 23 was subsequently considered by the Court of Appeal, consisting of the Lord Chancellor, with Lindley and A. L. Smith, L.JJ., in an action at the instance of the Barry Railway Co. against the present respondents. Their lordships unanimously dissented from the view which had been taken by Day, J., in this case. The Lord Chancellor said: "The Legislature seems to me to have provided that you may ascertain either the rate being charged to the docks at Cardiff, or the rate being charged to the docks at Penarth, or the rate being charged to the docks at Barry. Whichever of those is the lowest mileage rate is the lowest mileage rate to the docks at Cardiff, Penarth, or Barry, within the meaning of this section; and, of course, that would be ascertained by taking the charge from any given colliery to Penarth, finding the mileage and the rate charged, and then ascertaining by a comparison of the mileage and the rate charged what was the mileage rate." I fully concur in these observations, which appear to me to contain the true interpretation of the clause before us.

At your lordships' bar the respondent company raised another question, which is not noticed by the learned judges who decided Barry Railway Co. v. The Taff Vale Railway Co. The company maintained that they had power to group, and had in point of fact grouped, the docks at Cardiff and Penarth, in virtue of the powers conferred upon them by section 29 of the Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 25). It appears to me to be open to doubt whether they have really done so, because the 3rd sub-section of the clause provides that, where any group rate is proposed, the railway company must, after giving notice in the prescribed manner, apply to the Commissioners, and, in the event of opposition, the rate is not effectual until it has been approved by the Commissioners. There is no evidence before us that these conditions have been observed.

But, assuming that a group rate has been duly fixed in terms of section 29, that circumstance cannot, in my opinion, aid the argument of the respondents. The clause, no doubt, declares that such rate may be fixed, "notwithstanding any provision in any general or special Act"; but I do not think that declaration can affect any mileage rate which is not converted into a gross rate by the grouping. The object of the clause is to enable railway companies to relieve themselves of complaints and claims, in respect of unequal mileage rating, from traders at different termini, by grouping these termini together, abolishing mileage rates, and substituting a uniform gross rate. That procedure can, in my opinion, have no practical effect upon the rate chargeable, under express statutory provisions, for the conveyance of traffic to any terminus which is not included in the group. In this case the rate chargeable by the respondent company for the carriage of the appellants' mineral traffic from Ferndale to Hafod is determined by section 23 of the Barry Docks and Railway Act, 1888. And, in my opinion, that clause must receive the same interpretation, whether Cardiff and Penarth Docks were grouped before the passing of that Act, or have been grouped since that date, under the powers conferred by the Railway and Canal Traffic Act of 1888.

For these reasons I concur in the judgment which has been moved by the noble and learned lord on the woolsack.

Lord ASHBOURNE.—This case depends upon the construction of section 23 of the Barry Docks and Railways Act, 1888, the terms of which I need not repeat. The respondent company contends that that section cannot be enforced by the appellants, and is only binding between them and the Barry Railway Co.; and, secondly, that, from the true point of view, the rate demanded cannot be regarded as excessive.

The respondents' contention on the first point presents a somewhat narrow, restricted, and illiberal view of railway Acts. The public have a deep concern in all such legislation, and their interests require to be regarded and protected. Railway promoters and companies know that their Bills have to pass through a stringent Parliamentary ordeal, and that the committees of both Houses will scan the proposals submitted jealously, in order to see that the rights and interests of the public are duly safeguarded. The railway companies, when they ask for powers and concessions, know that they must show some public advantages, and that if they seek to ignore them Parliament will demand an account.

In this section there is a clear enactment that for traffic like that in question the company shall not charge more than a certain rate. Why should the appellants be debarred from the right of relying upon plain words contained in an Act of Parliament? It is their goods which are forwarded, it is their money which pays the rates; why should they be excluded from the benefit of the statutory provision? It is the natural construction of the words of the section. It violates no principle of justice or fairness or convenience. It is too narrow a view to seek to dwarf the enactment into a rigid contract between the companies. The rights and protection of the public compelled the companies to come to Parliament, and then the obligations of the companies became statutory, and cannot be regarded as merely contractual.

I do not deem it necessary to add anything on the second point.

I concur in the opinion that the appeal should be allowed.

Lord MACNAGHTEN.—It seems that before the year 1884 the Taff Vale Railway Co. had established a railway system serving the mineral districts of Merthyr Tydfil, Aberdare, and the Rhondda Valley, and bringing the collieries there into communication with docks at Cardiff and Penarth. In 1884 the Barry Dock and Railways Co. were incorporated for the purpose of constructing a dock at Barry, with railways to connect it with the Taff Vale system at Treforest and at Hafod, which is about two miles to the north of Treforest. The Taff Vale Co. had themselves a communication with Barry by a more circuitous route by means of the Cardiff, Penarth, and Barry Railway. In 1888 the Barry Co. applied to Parliament for further powers. Amongst other things, they sought for running powers over the Taff Vale system northward of Treforest—an interference with the rights of the Taff Vale Co. only to be justified by considerations of public interest. The Bill promoted by the Barry Co. passed into law, and became the Barry Dock and Railways Act, 1888. The Act recites that it is expedient that running powers over the Taff Vale Railway should be conferred upon the Barry Co. in certain events. Accordingly, in certain events these running powers are given. They are not to be exercised immediately or at any fixed and definite time. They were to remain in abeyance so long as the Taff Vale Co. chose to observe certain terms and conditions which are to be found in section 23 of the Act. For the purposes of this appeal it will be sufficient to quote the opening words of the section: "23 (1.) The Taff Vale Railway Co. shall punctually and regularly forward and afford all reasonable facilities for goods and mineral traffic destined for or coming from the undertaking of the company" (that is the Barry Dock and Railways Co.) "from or to Treforest or any place northward thereof, at rates per mile not greater than the lowest rate which shall, for the time being, be charged by the Taff Vale Railway Co. for the traffic to or from the docks at Cardiff, Penarth, or Barry."

The appellants, D. Davis & Sons (Limited), are proprietors or lessees of collieries in connection with the Taff Vale Railway to the north of Treforest. They have been in the habit of sending their coal to Barry by Hafod Junction and the Barry Railway. The Taff Vale Co. brought this action to recover a sum alleged to be due from the appellants for the carriage of their traffic on the Taff Vale Railway. Part of the claim is disputed on the ground that the rates charged are in excess of the mileage rate authorized by section 23 of the Act of 1888. The respondents' reply is twofold. They say that if section 23 is rightly understood it will be found that their rates are not excessive. And, further, they contend that the appellants are not in a position to complain, even assuming the prescribed limit to have been exceeded. Day, J., decided both points in the respondents' favour. The Court of Appeal dealt only with the second. On that point, agreeing with Day, J., they dismissed the appeal.

Now, it cannot be disputed that there has been an overcharge if the rate per mile for the appellants' traffic to and from Hafod is to be ascertained by taking the gross rate to Penarth, and dividing it by the number of miles in the distance. But the respondents insist that that mode of calculation is wrong. They are entitled, they say, to charge, and do in fact charge, a group rate to and from Cardiff, Penarth, and Barry, and therefore they contend that the appellants are not at liberty to select one of those three places, and calculate the rate on the actual distance in miles. Why not? The respondents may be right in grouping Cardiff, Penarth, and Barry for the purpose of fixing the rates to be charged between those places and any particular point of destination or departure on their line. They may even be bound, as they allege they are, by statute for some purposes to group Cardiff and Penarth. But grouping is beside the question here. The thing to be ascertained is the limit of charge from or to the appellants' collieries to or from Hafod. The limit is to be the lowest rate per mile for the time being "charged for like traffic to or from the docks at Cardiff, Penarth, or Barry"; that is, to or from the docks at Cardiff, or to or from the docks at Penarth, or to or from the dock at Barry. You have to ascertain the mileage rate to each of those different places, and take the lowest. Given the gross rate and the number of miles, the calculation is easy enough. The conditions of the problem are not altered, the task is not rendered more difficult, because the dividend—the gross rate to each of the three places—is the same. It seems to me that there is no substance in the respondents' argument on the first point.

The second point, like the first, depends on the scope and language of section 23.

Speaking for myself, I am quite at a loss to follow the reasoning upon which it has been held that the appellants are not at liberty to defend themselves under the provisions of that enactment. At first sight one would suppose that those whose goods are forwarded under statutory provisions must have the right to rely on those provisions so far as they make in their favour. They are the persons liable to pay. It seems only reasonable that they should be heard when they complain that they are charged too much. The construction for which the appellants contend does no violence to the language of the section. It leads to no injustice. It creates no inconvenience. The charge is a simple matter of arithmetic. The persons to be charged are ascertained when the goods in respect of which the charge is made are delivered to the railway company. There can be nothing unfair in holding a railway company to terms which they themselves offered, or to which they profess to be willing to submit, as the price of escape from conditions more onerous or more unpalatable.

It was contended, on behalf of the respondents, that the only duty or obligation imposed by the section was a duty or obligation as between the two railway companies. The public, it was said, were not concerned in the matter at all. Nobody thought of them. Their interests were not regarded either by the promoters of the Bill or by Parliament. I rather protest against that view of railway legislation. Ever since it has become the practice for promoters of undertakings of a public nature to apply to Parliament for exceptional powers and privileges, the Acts of Parliament by which those powers and privileges are granted have been regarded as Parliamentary contracts, as bargains between the promoters on the one hand and Parliament on the other, Parliament acting on behalf of the public as well as on behalf of the persons specially affected. Those powers and privileges are only conceded on the footing that the concession is for the benefit of the public who are likely to use the railway, as well as for the benefit of the promoters. As a general proposition this was not disputed by the learned counsel for the respondents, but they pointed out that the obligation in section 23 to forward goods at certain rates was an obligation imposed, not on the Barry Co., who promoted the Bill, but on the Taff Vale Co., who opposed it. Can that make any difference? The clause was accepted by Parliament. In accepting a particular clause in a railway Act the governing consideration with Parliament must be the same, whether the proposal comes from one side of the table or from the other, from the promoters of the Bill or its opponents. In the present case there can be no room for doubt. The Act declares that it is expedient—expedient, that is, in the interests of the public—that running powers over the Taff Valley Railway system should be conferred on the Barry Co. in certain events. For the present those running powers are held in suspense. Why? Because an alternative arrangement was proposed by the Taff Vale Co., and accepted provisionally by Parliament. Is it not reasonable to suppose that in considering the propriety of accepting the alternative Parliament kept in view the interests of the public, and that the alternative arrangement was accepted because the Legislature considered that the interests of the public would not suffer by the alteration?

It was urged that section 23 was to be treated as a contract between the two companies, and thence it was argued that no one could enforce the obligation imposed by it but the parties to the arrangement.

No doubt it is perfectly true that, as a general rule, no one can enforce a contract who is not a party to it. A third person, though intended to be benefited by a contract, cannot enforce it, because no consideration moves from him. But the simple answer to the argument is that the obligations in section 23 are statutory, and not contractual. They are not expressed in the form of a contract, nor are they founded on contract between the two companies. There is no reason why the peculiar doctrine of English law applicable to contracts should be applied to an enactment which speaks plainly and directly in the language of command. The argument, if I may say so with all deference, seems to be founded on an erroneous assumption in point of fact, and an imperfect analogy in point of law.

Then it was said that the statutory right of the Taff Vale Railway Co., as between themselves and the public, was to charge for the conveyance of traffic such tolls as they might think fit within the maximum allowed by their Acts, and it was argued that it would be a strong thing to hold that that power is interfered with or altered by a section in an Act of another railway company. But the truth is that the section in question does not interfere with the power of the Taff Vale Co. to charge tolls up to the maximum allowed. There is nothing in this section inconsistent with that power. The Taff Vale Co. may charge what tolls they please within the limits prescribed by their own Acts. The provision in section 23 only comes to this, that when they have exercised the power, when they have fixed the charges, they are not to charge higher rates per mile for traffic destined for or coming from the undertaking of the Barry Co.

The suggestion that it really cannot matter to traders who use both lines whether they are overcharged or not by the Taff Vale Co., because the Barry Co. will have to make up the loss if they want to keep their business, hardly seems to call for a serious reply.

For these reasons I am of opinion that the appeal ought to be allowed.

Lord MORRIS.—The respondents, the Taff Vale Railway Co., sued the appellants, colliery owners, for the carriage of goods over their railway. By the Taff Vale Railway Act the company are entitled to charge rates and levy tolls for the carriage of goods. There is no allegation that the respondents' claim is at any higher rate than that authorised by their Act, as the toll charged the appellants is within the maximum rate empowered to be charged. How, then, does the rate become altered? The appellants say by the operation of section 23 of the Barry Dock and Railway Act, 1888.

The history of that Act, so far as material to this case, is that the Barry Dock Co. promoted a Bill in Parliament, and sought for certain running powers over the Taff Vale Railway. This was granted by the House of Commons, but in the House of Lords, in substitution, and as matter of agreement between the two railway companies, section 23 was inserted, as follows:—"(1) The Taff Vale Railway Co. shall punctually and regularly forward and afford all reasonable facilities for goods and mineral traffic destined for or coming from the undertaking of the company, from or to Treforest or any place northward thereof, at rates per mile not greater than the lowest rate which shall for the time being be charged by the Taff Vale Railway Co. for like traffic to or from the docks at Cardiff, Penarth, or Barry, and shall deliver all such traffic into and take the same from the company's sidings, as regards all traffic coming from or destined for Hafod or any place westward thereof at Hafod, and as regards other traffic at Treforest, without any terminal or other charge in respect thereof, but with such bonus (if any) in respect of traffic exchanged at Hafod as, in default of agreement between the Taff Vale Railway Co. and the company, shall be from time to time determined, on the application of either of them, by the Railway Commissioners sitting as arbitrators, having regard to all the circumstances of the case." On the construction of this section a question arises which disposes of the case in the view I entertain.. In my opinion the section is only a legislative sanction given to the agreement entered into between the two companies, and neither the appellants nor any other person has any right conferred upon them thereby. The object of the section was to benefit the Barry Dock Co. by the substitution of section 23 for running powers. No third party had any interest in the granting of running powers to the Barry Dock Co., who might or might not have sought for them, as it suited their interests.

It is now sought on the part of the appellants practically to repeal the Act settling the rates and tolls which the respondents were entitled to claim. There is no such express enactment in section 23. The portion of the section relied on by the appellants is part of a sentence, the whole sentence referring to the "forwarding and affording facilities" by the respondents' company to the Barry Dock Co., one incident of which is the rate per mile relied upon by the appellants. Facilities for exchanging traffic appears to be the object as enacted, and the marginal note, whatever value may be attached to it, bears out this view. There is no right or privilege conferred on traders over the respondents' line, nor is any duty imposed on the respondents in relation to the public or to any third party. In my opinion there never was any such intention, nor in my opinion can the section be read as if it simply and expressly enacted that the rates for carrying traffic from Treforest or any other place north of it should be at rates per mile not greater than the lowest rate charged by the respondents from the points named. If such were enacted, it would be the enactment of a new rate of tolls within certain limits, and would necessarily be a repeal to that extent of the old rates. But I find no such express and simple enactment, and it would be strange if it could be found. Here is an Act promoted by the Barry Dock Co. for their own objects and interests. It would be a curious place to find an enactment regulating the tolls of another railway company as between that railway company and the general public, when section 23 is merely an alternative for the running powers sought for by the Barry Dock Co.

The obligation of the Taff Vale Co. is no doubt statutory, but that only leads to what does the statute say; in my opinion, it only says that, as between the Barry Dock Co. and the respondents, the respondents shall not charge rates per mile greater than the lowest rate charged by the respondents between the points referred to. It is said this enactment of section 23 is not a matter solely between the two companies. I am unable to concur in that proposition; it just is, for they are the parties contracting, and whose contract is made statutory. I am also unable to follow the supposed principles on which Parliament grants powers to railway companies. Whatever they are, I presume they are to be collected from the statute itself, and that the interest, or alleged interest, of the public, if it is intended to be safeguarded in any special way, must be found in the statute; if there was any intention to safeguard colliery traders, or any trader, and give them benefits of lowering of rates, why does the statute not say so? I decline to torture a facility as between two companies, wrapped up with other facilities, into an enactment altering the rights previously existing by statute as between one of the companies and the general public.

With all respect for your lordships' opinion to the contrary, I am clearly of opinion the judgment of Day, J., on the question is right, and that the judgment of the Court of Appeal affirming it should stand.

Order of Court of Appeal and decision of Day, J., reversed, with costs here and below. Case remitted to Queen's Bench Division.

Solicitors for the appellants, Downing, Holman, & Co., for Downing & Hancock, Cardiff.

Solicitors for the respondents, Ince, Colt, & Ince, for Ingledew & Sons, Cardiff.

Court of Appeal.

From Q. B. Div. (Lindley, Lopes, and Rigby, L.JJ.) — July 18, 19, 1895.

THE MANCHESTER TRUST (LIMITED) v. FURNESS, WITHY, & CO. (LIMITED). (a.)

Admiralty—Ship—Charter-party—Bill of lading—Charter-party making the master the agent of the charterers for certain purposes—Liability of owner of chartered ship on bills of lading signed by master—Constructive notice.

A charter-party expressly stipulated that the captain and crew, although paid by the owners of the ship, should be "the agents and servants of the charterers for all purposes," and that in signing bills of lading the captain should "only do so as agent for the charterers," who thereby agreed to indemnify the owners from all consequences or liabilities that might arise from the captain signing bills of lading. Goods were shipped under a bill of lading which made no specific mention of this stipulation, but provided for delivery at the port of discharge, under certain conditions, "and all other conditions as per charter."

Held, (1) that such a stipulation, though valid as between the charterers and the owners, did not protect the owners from a claim by the holders for value of the bill of lading, founded on the negligence of the master in delivering the goods to the wrong persons; and (2) that the words "all other conditions as per charter" did not incorporate into the bill of lading the above-mentioned stipulation in the charter-party so as to make it binding by way of constructive notice upon a holder for value of the bill of lading who had no actual notice of such stipulation.

Observations on the undesirability of extending the equitable doctrines of constructive notice to commercial transactions.

Decision of Mathew, J., affirmed.

This was an appeal from the decision of Mathew, J. The action was brought against the owners of the steamship The Boston City to recover damages for the non-delivery of 2,200 tons of coal, shipped at Cardiff and deliverable at Rio under bills of lading signed by the master of the ship.

The owners denied liability, on the ground that the bills of lading had not been signed by the master as their agent, but as agent for the charterers of the ship, Messrs. Beuchimol & Sobrinho.

On the completion of the loading of the ship the master, on the 27th of April, 1893, signed bills of lading in the following form: "Shipped in good order and well conditioned by Cory Brothers & Co. (Limited) for account of Messrs. Beuchimol & Sobrinho in and upon the good steamship Boston City, whereof —— is master for this present voyage, and bound for Rio de Janeiro, —— tons of Cory's Merthyr steam coal, which are to be delivered in the like good condition at the aforesaid port of Rio de Janeiro (all and every the dangers and accidents of the seas and of navigation of what nature and kind soever excepted) unto order or to assigns, he or they paying freight for the same, and all other conditions as per charter-party." After the bills of lading had been delivered to the charterers, who were also the shippers, the master, at their request, sailed for Buenos Ayres instead of Rio, he accepting their assurance that the coals belonged to them and that the bills of lading would be forwarded to that port. Messrs. Beuchimol & Sobrinho then endorsed the bills to the plaintiffs for an advance of £3,217 10s. Upon the ship's arrival at Buenos Ayres the master was told by the agent of Messrs. Beuchimol & Sobrinho there that the bills of lading were in his possession, and he thereupon, without demanding their production, delivered the coals. The coals were sold and the proceeds received by Messrs. Beuchimol & Sobrinho, who subsequently stopped payment. The plaintiffs then applied to the defendants for payment of the money they had lost by the coals having been delivered by the master of their ship without the production of the bills of lading. The defendants denied their liability, on the gound that under the charter-party the master of the ship was the agent of the charterers, and not of the owners.

The charter-party, which was dated the 7th of April, 1893, was for the most part in the ordinary form of a time charter, where possession of the ship is retained by the owners. The owners were to let the ship with full complement of officers, seamen, engineers, and firemen, and were to provide and pay for all the provisions and wages of the captain, officers, engineers, firemen, and crew. The freight was to be paid monthly, and the charterers were to provide cash for disbursements as required by the master. The cargo was to be laden and (or) discharged in any dock, or at any wharf or place, that the charterers should direct, where the vessel could always safely lie afloat, and the whole reach of the ship was to be at the charterers' disposal, reserving proper space for ship's officers. The owners were not to be responsible for the excepted perils mentioned, and were to have a lien upon all cargoes for the charter money due under the charter. And the charter-party contained the following further provision, upon which the defendants relied: "The captain and crew, although paid by the owners, shall be the agents and servants of the charterers for all purposes, whether of navigation or otherwise, under this charter. In signing bills of lading it is expressly agreed that the captain shall only do so as agent for the charterers, and the charterers hereby agree to indemnify the owners from all consequences or liabilities, if any, that may arise from the captain signing bills of lading or in otherwise complying with the same." At the time the charter-party was signed the master of the ship was admittedly the servant of the owners, and he did not at any time enter into any express contract with the charterers. Nothing was done to alter his position as master of the ship or to exonerate him from his obligations as the owners' agent and representative, but a copy of the charter-party was handed to him by the owners with directions to carry it out.

(a.) Reported by W. SHALLCROSS GODDARD, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Mathew, J., held that the special agreement in the charter-party, which provided that the captain should only sign bills of lading as agent for the charterers, did not exonerate the owners from liability to the plaintiffs; but that the true meaning of the clause was that the charterers undertook, as between themselves and the owners, to underwrite, as it were, the risks of each voyage under the charter, and that the undertaking did not affect the rights of those who might become holders of the bills of lading in the belief that the captain in signing was exercising his ordinary authority. He accordingly gave judgment for the plaintiffs with costs on the 27th of May, 1895.

The defendants appealed.

Sir W. Phillimore and Holman, for the appellants.—The special clause in the charter-party, whereby it was agreed that the captain should be the agent and servant of the charterers for all purposes, and that in signing bills of lading he should only do so as agent for the charterers, showed that the master had ceased to be the servant of the owner and had become the servant of the charterers. The reference in the bill of lading to the charter-party gave notice to the respondents of all the provisions of the charter-party, including the clause in question.

They referred to the following cases—viz., The Baumwoll Manufactur von Carl Scheibler v. Furness, [1893] A. C. 8, 41 W. R. Dig. 222; Colvin v. Newberry, 8 B. & C. 166, 7 Bing. 190, 1 Cl. & F. 283; Frazer v. Marsh, 13 East. 238, 2 Camp. 517.

Joseph Walton, Q.C., and Carver, for the respondents.—Before the decision in The Baumwoll Manufactur v. Furness there was a difficulty in saying whether the master was the servant of the charterer or of the owner, but the difficulty was cleared away by that case. It is clear that, if the special clause had not been inserted, there could have been no question but that the master was the servant of the owner. The condition incorporated in the special clause may be binding as between the owner and the charterer, but cannot affect any liability to third parties which the owner, as employer of the master, would have been under had the clause not been inserted in the charter-party. The words "all other conditions as per charter-party" could not incorporate the special clause into the bill of lading so as to affect the respondents with notice of it: Serraino v. Campbell, 39 W. R. 356, [1891] 1 Q. B. 283. Even if the respondents had notice of the special clause, the appellants would still be liable in tort, as the claim is in respect of the conduct of the master as manager of the ship, and clearly, in that respect, the master was the servant of the owner.

They referred also to Fry v. Chartered Mercantile Bank of India, 14 W. R. 920, L. R. 1 C. P. 689.

LINDLEY, L.J.—This is an appeal by the defendants from a decision of Mathew, J., which is in favour of the plaintiffs.

The plaintiffs brought their action for non-delivery of a cargo, and being holders for value of the bill of lading they based their action partly on the non-delivery according to contract, and partly in trover, taking their chance of whichever is the best in the long run. I do not think myself that it matters from which point of view you look at their rights. Now, the bill of lading under which the plaintiffs claim is in the ordinary form, so far as I know. It is signed by Mr. Thomas Clark, master, his principal not being disclosed; it may be the shipowners, or it may be someone else, and the bill of lading is to the effect that the goods shipped are to be delivered to the holder of the bill of lading, "he or they paying freight for the same and other conditions as per charter-party." So there is a distinct reference in the bill of lading to the charter-party to that extent. In the margin there is this—Perils on the sea and so on: "Ship not answerable for losses through explosion, bursting of boilers, breakage of shafts, or any latent defect in the machinery or hull not resulting from want of due diligence by the owners of the ship or any of them or by the ship's husband or manager."

The charter-party, which was dated on the 7th of April, 1893, is a time charter, and by it the defendants, who are the owners of the ship Boston City, agree to let, and the charterers, who are a Spanish firm of Beuchimol & Sobrinho, of Manchester, agree to hire, the steamship for the term of six months, and so on; the vessel to be delivered or placed at the disposal of the charterers at Victoria Dock, London, where she then was. Then the ports to which she is to go are specified—nothing turns upon that—"as the charterers or their agents shall direct." Then there is a clause (I will allude shortly to the more important ones) that the owners are to provide and pay for the provisions and wages of the captain, officers, engineers, and so on; that is to say—they are to appoint them and they are to pay them. The owners are to do that much, and they are to maintain the ship in a thoroughly efficient state. Then the charterers are to pay for coals, and so on. The charterers are to pay for the use of the ship 8s. per ton per calendar month. Then cash for disbursement as required by the master free of charge. The whole of the ship is to be at the charterers' disposal, reserving only a proper space for ship's officers, and so on, and for provisions and stores. There is this clause in it, which I suppose is a common form: "The captain shall prosecute his voyage with the utmost dispatch, and shall render all customary assistance with ship's crew and boats. All salvages and derelicts for owners and charterers' mutual benefit."

Then comes a clause which is unusual, and which I confess I never saw before, and which I am told has given rise to this controversy. The real question we have to determine is, What is the effect of the clause I am going to read, as between the holder of such a bill of lading as I have read and the shipowner? The clause is a very unusual one. It is this: "The captain and crew, although paid by the owners, shall be the agents and servants of the charterers for all purposes, whether of navigation or otherwise, under the charter. In signing bills of lading it is expressly agreed that the captain shall only do so as agent for the charterers; and the charterers hereby agree to indemnify the owners from all consequences or liabilities, if any, that may arise from the captain signing bills of lading, or in otherwise complying with the same." I do not pause to comment upon that for the moment; I will pass on. Then: "That if the charterers shall have reason to be dissatisfied with the conduct of the captain, officers, or engineers, the owners shall, on receiving particulars of the complaint, investigate the same, and if necessary make a change in the appointment." Then the master is to be furnished from time to time with the requisite instructions, and so on, and to keep a log which is to be patent to the charterers. Then there is a clause in the event of loss of time from deficiency of men or stores, and so on, the payment of hire shall cease until she be again in an efficient state to resume her service. That is relied upon, and that is not unimportant. Then there are some exceptions, so far as the same can apply—the act of God, perils of the sea, and so on, and "not answerable for any loss or damage arising from improper stowage, explosions, bursting of boilers, and so on." Then there is a clause of lien, which is a common one: "The owners shall have a lien upon all cargoes, and all sub-freights, for freight or charter-money due under this charter; and charterers to have a lien on the ship for moneys paid in advance and not earned."

Now upon the true construction of that document, and having regard to the circumstances to which I have alluded, the question arises whether the shipowners are liable for the non-delivery of this cargo by the captain. The story of the trick played upon the captain, and how he fell into the trap which was laid for him, was stated at the bar, and I need not go through it; but the long and the short of it is that, having signed bills of lading for delivery of the coal at Rio, he was deceived and misled, and he took the coals to Buenos Ayres, and there they were stolen; that is what it comes to, and the question is now, Who is to bear the loss?

The plaintiffs, who are holders of the bills of lading, rely upon the general rule of law that, primâ facie at all events, a bill of lading signed by the master is signed by the master as the servant or agent of the shipowner. Of course, in the ordinary course of business that is so; but it may not be always so; it may turn out that the master is not the servant or agent of the shipowner, and in the case to which we were referred, of The Baumwoll Manufactur von Carl Scheibler v. Furness, the charter was such that the master was not the servant of the shipowner, but was the servant of the charterer. The peculiarity of that case was this—that, although the charter-party there contained a great many clauses similar to those which we find in the charter-party in this case, the hiring of the master was by the charterer and not by the shipowner. The charterer employed him, paid him, dismissed him, and upon the strength of that clause the House of Lords held, affirming the decision of this court, that the master was in fact the servant of the charterer, and was not in fact the servant of the shipowner. Of course, when you have got to that all the rest follows.

Now, it is said that, notwithstanding that case, the peculiar clause to which I have alluded shows that in truth the master here had ceased to be or was not the servant of the owner, but had become the servant of the charterer, and the real question we have to consider is what is the effect of that clause as between the holder of the bill of lading and the shipowner. Let us look first of all at the true construction of the clause as between the shipowner and the charterer. They are the persons who make that bargain, and as between them the captain and crew, although paid by the owners, are to be the agents and servants of the charterer. Then the clause is very significant, because it does not stop there by any means, but it contains an indemnity clause, which, to my mind, is extremely significant. It seems as if these parties felt that, notwithstanding this clause, the owners might be held liable for the acts of the master, and they stipulated in that event, notwithstanding the previous bargain, that the captain is to be the agent and servant of the charterer; that the charterer shall indemnify the shipowner. The view taken by Mathew, J., is that that is a stipulation which is valid enough as between the charterers and the owners, but which does not affect the true position of the captain and the crew, and has no effect at all upon the holder of the bill of lading, although the bill of lading refers in terms to this charter-party. Upon reflection, I am of opinion that that is the true and correct view. I cannot regard all these clauses taken together without coming to the conclusion that the true view is that the master was and continued to be in fact the servant of the owner, subject to a stipulation that as between the owner and the charterer the charterer should treat the master as his servant and indemnify the owners from the consequences of what the master might do as regards signing bills of lading, and so on.

Now, if that is the true view to take, that ends the question; but then we are pressed with the fact that in this case the bill of lading referred to the charter-party, and it is said that the holder of the bill of lading took it with notice, at all events of the charter-party, and with notice, therefore, of this contract, and with notice that the master was the servant of the charterer.

That argument appears to me to be pushing the doctrine of constructive notice a great deal too far. It is quite true that the bill of lading refers to the charter-party to the extent which I have mentioned. The effect of that reference has been considered more than once; it has been considered in Serraino v. Campbell, and also in Fry v. The Mercantile Bank, and the effect of it is to incorporate so much of the charter-party as relates to the payment of freight and other conditions to be performed on the delivery of the cargo. But there is no authority whatever for carrying that doctrine to the extent necessary in this case. What is wanted in this case is to say that by reason of that reference to the charter-party the holder of the bill of lading, and the person who takes it in the ordinary course of business, is to be treated as having notice of all the contents of the charter-party. There is no doctrine that goes to anything like that extent, and as regards the extension of the equitable doctrines of constructive notice to commercial transactions the courts have always set their faces resolutely against it. The equitable doctrines of constructive notice are common enough in dealings with land and estate, but there have been protests over and over again against the introduction into commercial transactions of anything like an extension of those doctrines, and the protest is founded on perfect good sense. In dealing with legal estate, title is everything; in commercial transactions, possession is everything, and title is comparatively nothing; and if we were to extend the doctrine of constructive notice to commercial transactions, we should be doing infinite mischief by paralysing the trade of the country. That I am not going too far in making these observations will be found by turning to what was said by the Appeal Court about constructive notice in the case of English, Scottish, & Mercantile Investment Co. v. Brunton, 41 W. R. 133, [1892] 2 Q. B 701. That case had reference to a notice in respect of debentures, but whether commercial documents are negotiable instruments, or whether they are only more or less like them, is a matter to my mind of very little importance as regards the question of constructive notice. Again, Lord Herschell said in the case of the London Joint Stock Bank v. Simmons, 41 W. R. 108, 113, [1892] A. C. 201, "I should be very sorry to see the doctrine of constructive notice introduced into the law of negotiable instruments." As regards debentures, therefore, and everything of that kind, and other commercial documents, the protest which I have been making has been made before, and I do not think it is likely to be made in vain.

Now, having got that far, we come back to the question, Whose servant was the master in signing the bill of lading? Sir Walter Phillimore and Mr. Holman have exerted themselves very ingeniously to persuade us, on the strength of the case of Colvin v. Newberry, that we ought to hold he is the servant of the charterer. I do not think we ought. In the first place, the facts of the two cases are totally different.

The case of Colvin v. Newberry was a very curious case. The master there, so far as I understand it, had no principal at all. He was himself the charterer, and he was doing everything on his own account, subject to some payment to the shipowner. But the true view to take is, I think, this—that, although there is a great difficulty in reconciling all the earlier cases about demises of ships and so on, the test in each case is that which was applied by the House of Lords in the case of The Baumwoll Manufactur v. Furness, "Whose servant is the master?" Who is his undisclosed principal when he signs the bill of lading? My answer to that question is that upon the true construction of these documents he was the servant of the shipowner.

The appeal will be dismissed, with costs.

LOPES, L.J.—On consideration, I am clearly of opinion that the learned judge in the court below was right. The question which we have to decide and which determines everything is this: Whose servant was the master when he signed the bill of lading? Was he the servant of the charterers or of the owners? I have no doubt that, as regards third parties, the master was the servant of the owners. They had hired him, they paid him, they alone could dismiss him. I will illustrate it by a case of this kind. Suppose The Boston City had come into collision with another ship through the negligence of the master, could it be said that the owners would not be liable? In my opinion such a contention would be impossible. It is conceded that if there were no such clause as that novel and unusual one to which my brother Lindley has referred, there would be no difficulty in this case. Therefore the important matter to consider is, What is the true meaning of that clause? Now, in my opinion the meaning of that clause is this, that it protected the owners so far as the charterers are concerned, but it did not protect them against third parties. But then it is said in this case a notice was conveyed to the indorsees for value of the bill of lading, of what was contained in the charter-party by means of a reference to the charter-party contained in the bill of lading. The words relied on in the bill of lading are these, "other conditions as per charter-party," and that is all. Now these words, in my judgment, are not sufficient to give notice to the indorsees of a bill of lading for value of any such special provision as the one relied upon in the charter-party. It would require very clear and very explicit words contained in the bill of lading to exonerate the owners from liability to third parties, such as the holders of a bill of lading—to exonerate the owners from the liability attaching to them by the acts of their master. The holders of the bill of lading, in the absence of any such explicit words as I have mentioned, would naturally believe and imagine that the master, when he signed the bill of lading, was exercising the ordinary authority which attaches to him in his capacity of master.

Now, I think that disposes of the case. I would only wish to add this, that I entirely agree with every word that has been said by my brother Lindley with regard to constructive notice. If I am correct in the view I have taken, it is perfectly clear that the judgment of the court below was right; that the master was the servant of the owners, so far as regards the plaintiffs in this action, and that there was nothing in the clause above referred to which relieved them from the liability which, in ordinary circumstances, would attach to them owing to the act of their master.

RIGBY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion, and I have very little to add. I think the real question here may be said to be—Have the shipowners, by which, of course, I mean the permanent owners—the absolute owners—given up altogether the possession and control of the ship to the charterer? I think it is impossible to read the charter without seeing that they had, in many cases at any rate, reserved to themselves the possession and control through the master. I will not go through the matters in particular, but, with the exception of the two lines, "the captain and crew, although paid by the owners, shall be the agents and servants of the charterers for all purposes, whether of navigation or otherwise under this charter," I do not think there is anything at all in substance that could lead to the conclusion that the possession and control were given up substantially and entirely to the charterers. I quite agree that the clauses that we find here are not to be taken to be conclusive in a case where the master is actually and de facto and for all purposes the agent of the charterer—that was decided in the Baumwoll case, in the House of Lords—but it is important to remember them. Then we have to consider a clause which undoubtedly is an important one. "The captain and crew, although paid by the owners, shall be the agents and servants of the charterers for all purposes, whether of navigation or otherwise, under this charter." Can that mean that for all errors of navigation the shipowners, as between themselves and third parties, shall be free from responsibility? It cannot mean that. I think the fair meaning is: A captain and crew are placed at your disposal, to be under your orders for all purposes where there is not a reservation of the right of the master, acting on behalf of the shipowners; and that comes to this, that as regards the liability between the shipowners and the charterers, that shall be the state of things. The acts of the officers, the master, and others, shall be the acts of the charterers, as between the shipowners and charterers themselves. Then it is a very strong thing to say that that went the entire distance of giving up entire possession and control, especially when we find that clause about indemnity from all consequences and liabilities, if any. No doubt the words were cautiously put in because it could not be supposed that there would ordinarily be any such consequences. But still it contradicts the idea to a certain extent—I do not say absolutely—but it goes a long way to contradict the idea that the shipowners had no responsibility as between themselves and third parties for the acts of the master.

I will say nothing about the question of constructive notice, because Lindley, L.J., has already expressed, in language which I will not weaken by any repetition, my entire feeling upon the matter, and my judgment on the matter, as regards the introduction into commercial transactions of the doctrine of constructive notice. I will say so much for the doctrine—that I am satisfied that this would be the extreme doctrine of equity as regards constructive notice.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the appellants, Downing, Holman, & Co.

Solicitor for the respondents, George Trenam, for Addleshaw & Warburton, Manchester.

From Chan. Div. (Lindley, Lopes, and Rigby, L.JJ.) June 13, 14, 1895.

BETJEMANN v. BETJEMANN. (a.)

Partnership — Accounts — New partnership — Concealed fraud—Statute of Limitations.

A father carried on business in partnership with his two sons A. and B. from 1856 until the father's death in 1886, without articles of partnership. On the father's death the partnership accounts were signed by A. and B. for probate, and they continued the partnership, sharing profits equally, on the same terms as before. A. died in 1893, and his executrix brought an action against the surviving partner B. to wind up the affairs of the partnership, and for an account since 1886, the date of the death of the father. B., by way of defence, alleged concealed fraud on the part of A., and counter-claimed for an account from 1870, the date of A.'s marriage, when a fresh arrangement was made by the partners as to their shares, and if necessary from 1856, the commencement of the partnership; the Statute of Limitations was thereupon relied on by the plaintiff by way of defence to the counter-claim.

Held (reversing the decision of Wright, J.) that, the concealed fraud having been proved, the Statute of Limitations commenced to run only from the time when the concealed fraud had been in fact discovered, and could not be set up as a defence to the counter-claim.

It is the duty of a partner to trust his co-partner without examining the partnership books to ascertain if any fraud is being committed.

Rawlins v. Wickham, 7 W. R. 145, 3 De G. & J. 304, followed.

Appeal from a decision of Wright, J., sitting as an additional judge of the Chancery Division.

George Betjemann carried on the business of a dressing-case manufacturer in partnership with his two sons, John and George William, from 1856 until his death in 1886.

In 1870 John married, and the business was continued under a fresh arrangement as to the shares, but without any articles of partnership.

In 1886 George, the father, died, and the partnership accounts were signed by the two sons, the surviving partners, for the purposes of probate.

The business was continued by the two sons as before, each sharing the profits equally.

In 1893 John died, and the present action was brought by his legal personal representative against the surviving partner, who was also an executor of his father, for the usual partnership account as from 1886, the date of the death of the father.

In his defence the defendant alleged that John had fraudulently drawn out large sums of money from the partnership during his father's lifetime, and counter-claimed the return of those sums to the partnership, and asked that the account should be taken as from 1870, or even if necessary from 1856.

The plaintiff, in reply, set up the Statute of Limitations as a defence to any claim for partnership accounts before the father's death.

Wright, J., at the trial, ordered the accounts to be taken as from 1886, and dismissed the counter-claim, but without costs, holding that by reasonable care the fraud could have been discovered, and therefore the Statute of Limitations would run as against the defendant.

The defendant appealed.

Sir Henry James, Q.C., Hopkinson, Q.C., and Edward Ford, for the appellant.—Partners in a business should have implicit trust in each other, and it is not the duty of one partner to search the books in order to discover the concealed fraud of the other partner: Rawlin v. Wickham, 7 W. R. 145, 3 De G. & J. 304. The claim is brought within two years of the discovery of the fraud, and is, therefore, not statute-barred.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and Fooks, for the respondent. — The moment the new partnership came into existence the partners had rights which came into existence then, and against which the Statute of Limitations would run.

They referred to Gibbs v. Guild, 30 W. R. 407, 8 Q. B. D. 296, 30 W. R. 591, 9 Q. B. D. 59; Lawrance v. Lord Norreys, 38 W. R. 753, 15 App. Cas. 210; Maund v. Allies, 5 Jur. 860; Knox v. Gye, L. R. 5 H. L. 656.

Hopkinson, Q.C., in reply.—The Statute of Limitations does not apply in the case of an agent who has money in his hands to invest for his principal.

He referred to Burdick v. Garrick, 18 W. R. 387, L. R. 5 Ch. App. 233; Lindley on Partnerships, p. 511; and Moore v. Knight, 39 W. R. 312, [1891] 1 Ch. 547.

LINDLEY, L.J.—The question raised on this appeal is as to the time from which a partnership account is to be taken. The material facts are very short. It appears that there was a father and two sons who commenced business and carried on business in partnership in 1856. In 1870 one of the sons, John, married, and we are told there was some new arrangement come to at that time. In 1886 George, the father, died, and in 1893 one of the sons, John, died. An action has been brought by John's legal personal representative against the surviving son, who is also an executor of the father George, for a partnership account, and the plaintiff has, of course, obtained the usual decree for an account of the partnership as from 1886, when the father died. The defendant does not resist that, of course, but he says the account ought to be taken from 1870, and if necessary even from 1856. The plaintiff objects to that, and the question really is from what time this partnership account ought to be taken—whether it ought to be taken from 1886, when the father died, or from some earlier time—from 1870, or even 1856 if desired.

Now, the learned judge has directed the account from 1886, and he has dismissed, without costs, the counter-claim of the surviving partner for the account from an earlier time; and the question on the appeal is whether the learned judge is right upon that. In my opinion he is wrong. There is no doubt that in 1886, when the father died, there was a partnership of the three which determined.

One died, and, to use the expression of one of the witnesses, the other two sons went on as before, minus one. That is quite true; and there is no doubt now, after the decision of the House of Lords in Knox v. Gye, that the executors of the father George who had died could set up the Statute of Limitations to an action for an account which was brought more than six years after his death. They do not do anything of the sort. The Statute of Limitations is set up by the plaintiff. But what is the plaintiff? The plaintiff is the executor of John; and John and William, the two sons, although, of course, they continued the partnership business, it was in point of law a different partnership—namely, a partnership between two. They continued the partnership account as one account, and never broke it and never wound it up; they brought in all the balances and carried on the balances at the bankers, carried on the ledgers, and carried on the account without a break.

(a.) Reported by W. SHALLCROSS GODDARD, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Now, as between persons who deal with each other upon that footing, I fail to see that the Statute of Limitations has any application whatever. Notwithstanding, therefore, that the partnership was determined between the three, and that there was a new partnership between the two, there was no break in the account, and the account was never brought to an end.

My view is that the learned judge misapplied the doctrine of Knox v. Gye in holding, as between these two brothers, who went on without a break, that the account could be continued as severed in 1886, and that there was a new cause of action arising then.

Now, even if I am wrong in that, it appears to me I confess, that the learned judge is wrong upon the other point. The surviving partner then says: "Well, if the statute is an answer, this is a case of concealed fraud," and he proves that John unfortunately did commit frauds in the way which was explained yesterday, and which is not now disputed. The plaintiff's answer to that is: "Although John committed these frauds, you, the surviving partner, had every opportunity of discovering them, and under these circumstances this statute applies and the doctrine of concealed fraud is excluded." That appears to me, I confess, to be erroneous, and contrary to all the principles which the court of equity has been in the habit of applying as between partners—I say nothing as between trustees and cestuis que trust, although I daresay that would be found to be based on similar principles. This doctrine of means of knowledge, which is incorporated in terms in the Statute of Limitations, 3 & 4 Wm. 4, c. 27, s. 26, is perfectly reasonable and applicable to cases of ejectment. If a man brings an action of ejectment to recover property after twenty years' lapse of time, it is only reasonable to say, even in the case of concealed fraud, the statute shall apply, if he has means of knowledge and has not used them. That is intelligible enough, but Field, J., in Gibbs v. Guild went a little too far when he said the 26th section expressed the whole doctrine of equity applicable to concealed fraud. As between such persons as vendor and purchaser, where the maxim of caveat emptor applies, the observations of the learned judge were not open to criticism. I am not aware that there is any difference between law and equity in a case of that kind, but the learned judge was not correct in applying it to partners. What right has a partner to say: "You had no right to trust me. You are bound to look at the books and see that I am not cheating you." Such a doctrine as that is unfounded. I am not expressing a view of the law for the first time, for the doctrine will be found very well put in the leading case of Rawlins v. Wickham. There a partner had been induced to enter into a firm by a fraudulent misrepresentation. He continued a partner for four years, he had access to the books, and he had means of knowledge and means of finding out that he had been induced by those fraudulent representations to become a partner; and that circumstance was strongly relied upon as an answer to the bill, or suit in equity, brought by him to have the contract for partnership rescinded, and to be indemnified against the liabilities of the firm. How did Knight Bruce and Turner, L.JJ., deal with that? I will read the marginal note shortly before I read the passage in the judgment: "Where a person has been induced to enter into a contract by a material misrepresentation of the other party he is entitled to have the contract set aside, and not merely to have the representation made good. Held that the lapse of time was no bar to the plaintiff; for that, although he had means of ascertaining the representation to be untrue, he was entitled as between him and the persons who made it to believe it to be true, and was not bound to make inquiry until there was something to raise suspicion." Then Knight Bruce, L.J., who goes into this matter with great care, as does Turner, L.J., says on p. 313 (3 De G. & J.): [His lordship read the passage, and continued:—] and Turner, L.J., makes remarks to the same effect. It appears to me that that is the principle which is applicable to a case of this kind of means of knowledge; unless suspicion is proved, and unless the person complaining, not only has means of knowledge but does not choose to avail himself of that means when his suspicion is aroused, it is not ad rem.

On that ground it appears to me that the defendant is right in his counterclaim. The result, therefore, is that the appeal must be allowed. Instead of the counterclaim being dismissed, without costs, an account must be directed as from 1870, or logically, if the parties wish it, from 1856—I leave them to settle that—and as to the costs I take it that the costs of the counterclaim are rather material, and they ought to be the defendant's in any event, because the counterclaim included the case of fraud. That has cost a great deal of money, and the defendant is right, in that he has proved the fraud; and he is entitled, I think, to the costs occasioned by the denial of that fraud. He is also entitled to the costs of the appeal. The costs of the partnership suit will be dealt with in the ordinary way, but the costs of the counterclaim and of the appeal ought to be the defendant's in any event.

LOPES, L.J.—I am of the same opinion, and I will not add anything further.

RIGBY, L.J.—I am also of the same opinion, and I should not think it necessary to add anything at all, but for the respect I have for the judgment of the learned judge, and I will only say shortly the grounds, which are substantially those expressed by Lindley, L.J., on which I think that this appeal should be allowed.

First of all, there has been a continuous account from 1856, through 1870, down to 1886. There has been nothing approaching to a settled account. The account has been kept on from day to day. When the two formed their new partnership, for it is a new partnership, of course, they did it on the terms that they would not interfere with the accounts in the least. Each of the accounts with each of the customers, all the accounts of the old firm, were continued by the two who formed the new partnership. Under those circumstances, I do not see that there is any ground whatever for applying the Statute of Limitations to this case; but if you do apply the Statute of Limitations, it is a matter of essential importance to call to mind the doctrine of the court of equity in cases of concealed fraud. That there was concealed fraud here is abundantly plain. Apparently, if this gentleman had drawn out all these moneys in his own name, it might have been discovered; in fact, when he did that on anything like a large scale it was discovered, because in that case there was no concealment. The device adopted was such that on examining the banker's passbook with the cheques that were actually in their possession I suppose they found them to correspond altogether, and the very reason for drawing a cheque as if it were for a payment to a customer was to conceal the thing from the partners. That concealment was effective, and it continued to be effective upon the evidence until a time well within the Statute of Limitations. Now that there are means of discovering the fraud there can be no doubt at all. I am not at all sure that that would have been done by anything like a cursory inspection of the books; but clearly if there had been anything like an audit the fraud must have been discovered.

Then the question is whether it is involved in the decision of the case of Gibbs v. Guild, or whether it is shown to be the doctrine of the court of equity before the Judicature Act, that concealed fraud only postpones the running of the statute in cases where there was no sufficient means of discovering it, and upon that point I can entertain no doubt. First of all, in Gibbs v. Guild the cases are gone very carefully through, and I will not attempt to repeat them, because I adopt all that is said by the Court of Appeal in that case, and as it appears that there are other cases, such as Booth v. Earl of Warrington, 4 Bro. P. C. 163, to the same effect. The equitable doctrine came to this, that the statute did not run, or the law which the court of equity applied in these cases did not attribute laches or negligence until the discovery of the fraud, and in none of them, so far as I recollect, was it part of the defence that there were no reasonable means of knowledge. What is the duty of a man to inquire? To whom does he owe that duty? Certainly not to the person who has committed the concealed fraud. For a man in that position to come and say, "You ought to have inquired, and if you had inquired you would have found me out," is utterly opposed to every principle of equity. I consider that we ought to take the law, so far as it is applicable to this case, from the judgment of the Court of Appeal in Gibbs v. Guild, and not from the judgment of Field, J., in that case in the court below, and there they place it entirely on what I have always understood to be the old law, that the time runs against you in the court of equity from the time when the concealed fraud has been discovered. I agree with what Lindley, L.J., has said about Rawlins v. Wickham. It is a different case entirely, but it contains the principle on which I believe the court has always acted, and I think it ought to act.

I agree that here, with care—with the usual care, I may say—this ought to have been discovered long before; but as regards the person on whose behalf the claim is set up it does not lie in his mouth to say, "I was fraudulent, but you ought to have found me out, and I will take advantage of the fact that you did not find me out." I agree with what Lindley, L.J., said about the costs.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitor for the appellant, E. H. Goddard.

Solicitors for the respondent, Beyfus & Beyfus.

High Court of Justice.

Chan. Div. }
Romer, J. } Nov. 15.

HINDSON v. ASHBY. (a.)

Water—River—Bed of river—Riparian owner—Change of bed—Accretion.

The bed of a river is to be ascertained by ascertaining when the presence and action of water are so common usual and continued as to mark upon the soil of the bed a character distinct from that of the banks, in respect to vegetation as well as in respect to the nature of the soil itself.

(a.) Reported by J. ARTHUR PRICE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Trial of action.

This was an action brought by the trustees of the church lands of Wyradisbury in the county of Bucks, for an injunction to restrain the defendant, Mr. John Ashby, from trespassing on the plaintiffs' lands.

The facts of the case were as follows: The plaintiffs and defendant were both owners of adjoining lands on the same bank of the river Thames, and it was admitted for the purposes of the action that the defendant and his predecessors in title were entitled to the bed, or original bed of the river at the point at which the alleged trespass was committed.

The course of the river had, however, shifted and left bare (except during one or two winter months) a strip of land opposite to the plaintiffs' land which had originally formed part of the old bed.

In 1866 a small ditch, seven inches in depth, had been formed by the defendant's predecessor in title on this strip, which was from time to time cleaned out. The ditch was not, however, noticeable from the plaintiffs' land. Trees had also been planted here and trimmed by the defendant.

In 1893 the defendant made a concrete path along the length of the ditch, which enabled his tenants to pass from his own land on the bank to an eyot in the river.

The plaintiffs thereupon commenced the present action.

Fletcher Moulton, Q.C., A. d'Beckett Terrell, and Baden Fuller, for the plaintiffs.—Assuming the defendant to be entitled as he says to the bed even on this statement of facts, there is practically no defence. The plaintiffs' land unquestionably reaches the river. If the river moves, the plaintiffs as riparian owners have a right to follow it by the law of accretion.

Bucknell, Q.C., and Stuart Moore, for the defendant.—The argument of the plaintiffs comes to this, that because the river has shifted they are entitled to claim its boundary as their property. The general rule that the owner of land adjoining the river may claim the land usque ad medium may be rebutted if it can be shown that another person is owner of the bed. To whom does the land in dispute belong during those winter months in which it is still actually covered by water? In Hale's De Jure Maris, p. 371, it is stated that "special usage may alter the common presumption; for one man may have the river and others the soil adjacent, or one man may have the river and soil thereof and another the free or several fishing in that river": Duke of Devonshire v. Pattinson, 20 Q. B. D. 263, 36 W. R. Dig. 217; Smith v. Andrews, [1891] 2 Ch. 678, 40 W. R. Dig. 90. Whether this is part of the bed of the river, or whether it is accreted land is a question of fact, and the evidence shows that it is still part of the bed. Further, we have had possession for thirty years as is shown by our having made the ditch and planted the trees.

Fletcher Moulton, Q.C., in reply.—The very fact that a path has been made shows that whatever may have been the case in the past this land is no longer part of the bed of the river. There must be a time when land is disputatious land, when it is difficult to say whether it is or is not part of the bed of the river. The argument from possession is itself inconsistent with the rest of the defendant's case. If the acts done by him were done when the land was overflowed there was no call on us to interfere. All the time that these acts were being done the plaintiffs were in possession of a field on the bank, and this fact will entitled them to claim to the accretions.

The following were also referred to: Attorney-General v. Chambers, 2 W. R. 636, 4 De G. M. & G.

206; Duke of Somerset v. Fogwell, 5 B. & C. 875; Attorney-General v. Emerson, [1891] A. C. 649, 40 W. R. Dig. 90; Gould on Waters, 2 ed. p. 190. A considerable amount of evidence was offered, the effect of which will be found summarized in the judgment.

ROMER, J.—The plaintiffs' case is shortly this. They admit for the purposes of this action that the defendant is entitled to the bed of the river in the immediate neighbourhood of the land in dispute, and that at one time the bed of the river included this land. But they say that by a gradual process the river has receded, and that this land was added by insensible degrees to the adjacent land, and ultimately ceased to be part of the bed of the river, and became part of the land of the plaintiffs as the riparian owners at that part of the river. They say that this was the condition of matters when the defendant did that which gave immediate rise to this action—namely, put down that concrete path to afford his tenants of a neighbouring eyot a convenient path and access to that eyot, and they further say that this condition has continued to the present time.

Now, if the plaintiffs establish this, then, subject to any special defence the defendant may raise, they would be entitled to judgment in this case; for it is clearly settled that in the ordinary case where two different persons own the opposite banks of a non-tidal river, and each is entitled to the bed of the river adjacent to him up to the centre, then, if the river, not by any sudden action or by leaps, but by a gradual and almost insensible process, changes its beds and adds land to one side or takes land away from it, then the centre of the new bed becomes the boundary of the two properties, and each owner is entitled to enjoy the gain or has to bear the loss occasioned to his land by the shifting of the river: Foster v. Wright, 4 C. P. D. 438, where all the earlier authorities are cited and examined. And I can see no distinction in principle between the ordinary cases to which I have referred and the somewhat unusual case before me, where the river bed belongs to a separate proprietor, and not to the riparian owners.

I proceed to consider the defences raised by the defendant. The main defence is that the land in dispute has never ceased to be, and still is, part of the bed of the river.

Now in considering this question there has been considerable discussion as to how the bed of the river is to be ascertained. Of course, if a river preserves a tolerably even flow and does not fluctuate in volume much, except on extraordinary occasions, there is no difficulty in determining its bed. But when the river is one like the Thames—that is to say, one which, apart from extraordinary floods and draughts, changes considerably in volume in the course of each year, being, as a rule, much higher in some months of the year than in others, the question how its bed is to be determined is not so very easy. Among others, the following suggestions, which have been put forward, may be considered: (1) That any land which is covered by the river in the course of its flow at any time during an average or ordinary year, is of necessity to be considered part of the river; (2) that no land is to be considered as part of the bed which is not always covered by the river throughout any ordinary or average year; and (3) that by some sort of analogy to the method of fixing the margin of the bed of the ocean on the seashore, the margin of the river is to be ascertained by taking a line midway between the margin of the bed covered by the average highest flow, and of that covered by the average lowest flow of the river. But, in my opinion none of these suggestions are well founded. I think that the question whether any particular piece of land is or is not to be held part of the bed of a river at any particular spot, at any particular time, is one of fact, often of considerable difficulty, not to be determined by any hard and fast rule; but by regarding all the material circumstances. I know of no authority in English law that has expressly decided this, but on principle I think it ought to be so decided. In the United States the question has been judicially considered, and a view expressed substantially in accordance with that found by me. I find that in the case of Howard v. Ingersoll, before the Supreme Court, Curtis, J. (13 Howard's Rep. 427) states what (although his decision in no way binds our courts) is, I believe, in substance in accordance with English law. He says, "that the banks of the river are those elevations of land which confine the waters when they rise out of the bed; and the bed is that soil so usually covered by water as to be distinguishable from the banks by the character of the soil or vegetation or both, produced by the common action and presence of the flowing water. But neither the line of ordinary high-water mark, nor of ordinary low-water mark, nor of a middle stage of water, can be assumed as the line dividing the bed from the banks. This line is to be found by examining the bed and the banks, and ascertaining when the presence and action of water are so common and usual and so long continued in all ordinary years as to mark upon the soil of the bed a character distinct from that of the banks in respect to vegetation, as well as in respect to the nature of the soil itself. Whether this line between the bed and the banks will be found above or below or at a middle stage of the water must depend upon the character of the stream. The height of a stream during much the larger part of the year may be above or below a middle point between its highest and its lowest flow. Something must depend also upon the rapidity of the stream and other circumstances. But in all cases the bed of a river is a natural object and is to be sought for, not merely by the application of any abstract rules; but as other natural objects are sought for and found by the distinctive appearances they present; the banks being fast land on which vegetation appropriate to such land in this particular locality grows. Wherever the bank is not too steep to permit such growth, and the bed being soil of a different character and having no vegetation, or only such as exists when commonly submerged in water." On this footing I have now to decide the question of fact, as to the piece of land now in dispute; and on the evidence I find that at the date when the defendant made the concrete path, and thenceforth to the present the land formed no part of the bed of the river; and, further, I find that it ceased to be part of the bed of the river and became an accretion to the adjacent land belonging to the plaintiffs, not by leaps and bounds, but by a gradual and insensible process. It appears to me impossible for the defendant to contend, looking at the present condition of the land and his own act in putting down the concrete path, and his attempted uses of it as a way for his tenants, that this land still forms part of the bed of the river. It is true that at times when the river is full, and particularly in the winter months, this land is under water; but so is much land near the river, which, without doubt, forms no part of the bed of the river; and but for the fact that this land did formerly form part of the bed of the river, I doubt whether anyone would have had the boldness to contend that on its present state, and under its present conditions it did form part. On the above findings of fact the plaintiffs are clearly entitled to this land, subject only to a consideration of the remaining defence raised on behalf of the defendant.

That defence is in fact inconsistent with the first and main defence which I have alone to deal with. For by it the defendant takes up this position. He says that the land had ceased to be part of the bed of the river for more than twelve years before action brought, and that during all that period he alone has been in possession of it, and has thereby acquired a title to it under the Statute of Limitations. In my opinion the defendant has failed in substantiating the case. It is difficult, if not impossible, to say exactly when this land ceased to be bed of the river and became part of the adjacent bank, but the defendant has utterly failed in establishing before me that he has been as against the plaintiffs for twelve years in possession of this land, since it ceased to be part of the river bed. Conceding as he does that the plaintiffs have a right of access over this land to the river, he has rendered it almost impossible for him to contend that he has been in possession as against the plaintiffs. The fact is that there has been nothing done since the land ceased to be river bed which would enable the defendants to say that the plaintiffs have lost possession of their property down to the verge of the river. The first act of the defendant which might, if unchallenged, have amounted to the taking possession of this land as dry land forming part of the bank was the putting down of the concrete path, and this was immediately complained of by the plaintiffs and led in fact to the present action. As to the other facts relied on by the defendant in support of his claim to possession, it is no doubt true that he did dig a small ditch in the land on the site of which he subsequently put the concrete and from time to time he cleaned this ditch out. But this ditch was not noticeable from the plaintiffs' land, and when it was first made and for some time afterwards, the land was in its transition state, and I think it would be extremely hard on riparian owners like the plaintiffs if they were to be held excluded from their position and no longer entitled to the land down to the margin of the river by reason of acts of the kind that I am now considering done on the margin of the river in its transition state.

The only other fact I need refer to is the planting of trees on this land by the defendant or his predecessor in title, and the occasional trimming of these trees. But these trees were planted at a time when, in my opinion, the land did form part of the river bed, and the fact that some trimming of the trees was done by the defendant or on his behalf down to the time that I have called the transition period, and possibly, even for a short time, even after the land passed into its present condition, is not sufficient to support the defendant's claim.

As I have already said, the defendant has failed to prove before me his plea of possession for the statutory period of this land as land not part of the bed of the river, and, this being so, his second defence also fails.

It follows that the plaintiffs are entitled to succeed, and I make the following declaration in their favour: "Declare that the land in dispute was at the time when the defendant put down the concrete complained of, and has since continued to be, and now is, land belonging to the plaintiff, and not part of the bed of the river." Then there will be liberty given to apply to enforce the declaration if necessary, and liberty to apply generally. And I order the defendant to pay the costs of this action.

Solicitors, S. Vigers & Richardson; Soames, Edward, & Sons, for Rowell & Lomas, Rickmansworth.

Chan. Div.
Vaughan Williams, J. } Nov. 13.

BRABOURNE v. THE ANGLO-AUSTRIAN PRINTING AND PUBLISHING CO. (a.)

Company — Winding up — Debentures — Misfeasance — Property of company—Costs of petition to wind up—Companies (Winding up) Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 63), s. 10.

In the winding up of a company ordered to be wound up by the court, misfeasance proceedings were taken by the official receiver and liquidator which resulted in an order that contribution should be made by certain persons, officers of the company, to the assets of the company, and the liquidator thereby, and also by proceedings to enforce calls against shareholders, realized certain moneys.

The company had issued debentures charying the undertaking and property, whatsoever and wheresoever, both present and future, of the company, including its uncalled capital for the time being. The assets of the company were insufficient to pay the debenture-holders in full. The winding-up order directed the petitioner's costs to be paid out of the assets of the company, and a claim was made that the costs of the petitioner were payable out of the fund recovered by the liquidator as aforesaid. It was not disputed that the fund in question was included in the debenture-holders' security.

Held, that the petitioner's costs were not payable out of the fund.

On the 2nd of May, 1891, an order was made for the compulsory winding up of The Anglo-Austrian Printing & Publishing Co. (Limited), which directed that the costs of the petitions should be taxed and paid out of the assets of the company. The company had issued debentures covering the undertaking and property of the company, whatsoever and wheresoever, both present and future, including the uncalled capital for the time being. The debenture-holders had commenced two actions in February and March, 1891, and the official receiver (who was also liquidator in the winding up) had been appointed receiver in the debenture-holders' actions. In June, 1892, an order was made in the winding up that the official receiver and liquidator should be at liberty to institute misfeasance proceedings under section 10 of the Companies (Winding up) Act, 1890, and that he should be indemnified against costs out of the assets of the company. The official receiver had recovered by means of these misfeasance proceedings and of compromises, and in respect of unpaid calls, a sum amounting, after deducting the expenses of realisation, to about £8,780. This sum was in court to the credit of the official receiver as receiver in the actions.

The solicitor who acted for the petitioners in the winding up, and for certain parties who supported the petition had assigned the costs under the winding-up order to a Mr. Mason by way of mortgage.

The assets were insufficient to pay the debenture-holders in full, and the question was raised whether the costs assigned to Mason were payable out of the fund in court.

Martelli, for the official receiver and liquidator, stated the facts to the court.

Muir Mackenzie, for Mason.—The sums in question were produced by means of proceedings under section 10 of the Act of 1890 against directors and contributories, and would not have been recovered unless the winding up had taken place. The case is analogous to a case of salvage. These funds could not have been obtained without the petition for winding up, and the costs of obtaining them ought to be paid to the person who caused them to be obtained. [VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J.—When the costs of the petition were first incurred, it could not have been argued that I could have made any order charging these assets for those costs in priority to the debenture-holders. Therefore, at one time these costs had been incurred, but no order could have been made that they should be paid out of these assets.] There is a distinction to be drawn after the winding up. With regard to sums recovered from the contributories in respect of calls, these sums could not have been recovered except by reason of the winding up. When the winding up occurs the power of the directors to make calls comes to an end, and calls can only be made by the liquidator who is brought into existence by the execution of the petitioner in taking proceedings for winding up: Fowler v. Broad's Patent Night Light Co., 41 W. R. 247, [1893] 1 Ch. 724. The sums received for calls are assets produced entirely by the winding up. As to the assets recovered under section 10 of the Act of 1890 for misfeasance, section 10 shows what the real nature of these assets is. They are assets which come into existence in consequence of the proceedings taken under the section, and are no part of the property originally charged in favour of the debenture-holders. The fund in court has been produced by the winding up alone, by means of an officer of the court acting under the court's order and in the courts procedure.

(a.) Reported by V. DE S. FOWKE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Eustace Smith, for the debenture-holders, was not called upon.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J.—I have no doubt that the view taken by Mr. Mason, the mortgagee of the solicitors who acted for the petitioning creditor in the matter of the petition, is wrong. I am asked in this case to say that, because certain misfeasance proceedings have been taken which resulted in an order that contribution should be made by certain persons to the assets of the company, and because the liquidator has realized some unpaid calls, therefore, the debenture-holders are not to be entitled to enforce their rights against these funds, which are admittedly included in their security, without paying the costs of the petitioning creditor. It is said that the case is based on some principle of salvage, because section 10 could not have been resorted to unless there had been a winding-up order, and there could not have been a winding-up order unless there had been a petition. That is quite true, but it does not bring these costs within any such doctrine as to salvage as that contended for. If the application had been that there should be deducted from this fund the costs of recovering it, I could have understood the application; but I am not asked to deduct any such costs. What I am asked to deduct are the costs of the petition, and I cannot do that. I wish to say this:—It was not contended before me that the money which has been contributed to the assets, owing to the proceedings under section 10, is not covered by debentures such as these. I can only say that, speaking for myself, I am very sorry that such should be the state of the law at the present time. I cannot help thinking that when the question was first raised a different conclusion might have been arrived at, and it might very well have been held that such sums were outside the security. However, the contrary view has been adopted. It is only to be hoped that the Legislature may think fit to interfere. It seems to me to be an unwholesome state of things that the debenture-holders should have the control of money which has to be recovered from officers of the company by proceedings for misfeasance. It continually happens that the debenture-holders and the persons mentioned in section 10 are intimately associated with each other, and then a winding up comes and there is not sufficient money to pay the debenture-holders in full, and in all probability the debenture-holders have acquired their debentures under such circumstances that they only expect to receive a percentage of their investment, and frequently, they are satisfied, as they are making a large profit. In this state of things a claim often arises against officers and promoters of the company in respect of what is a fraud not only on the company, but on the unsecured creditors of the company, and the debenture-holders are so intimately connected with the officers or promoters that they often, when proceedings are threatened, step in and say, "We are entitled to this security—i.e., to the claims against these wrongdoers, and we do not think it worth while to enforce these claims." This is a very unwholesome state of things. I hope the Legislature will prevent funds arising from proceedings for misfeasance being chargeable in favour of debenture-holders, but will leave them free from the debentures and available for the benefit of the unsecured creditors. But that is not the present state of the law, and there is no ground for making the order I am now asked to make.

Solicitors, Gush, Phillips, Walters, & Williams; Harold A. Farman.

Q. B. Div.
Commercial Causes.
(Mathew J.)

Dec. 4, 9.

WOODSIDE & Co. v. THE GLOBE MARINE INSURANCE Co. (a.)

Insurance—Marine insurance—Valued policy—Insurance against fire—Depreciation by stranding—Repairs not done when a subsequent total loss occurred by fire—Right of assured to recover under fire policy.

The steamship B. was insured with certain underwriters against the perils of the sea, and with the defendant company against loss by fire and explosion only. The vessel, through stress of weather, was driven ashore and became a constructive total loss. While stranded she was totally destroyed by fire.

Held, that the insured were entitled to recover from the defendant company upon the ground that the loss by stranding would only become a total loss if due notice of abandonment of the ship were given; if no such notice were given the loss would be a particular average only, and that a partial loss, however serious, would not impair the right of the assured to recover for a subsequent total loss upon the basis of the valuation by which, in case of loss by fire, the parties agreed the indemnity was to be calculated.

Commercial cause.

The plaintiffs, Messrs. W. J. Woodside & Co., of Belfast, were the owners of the iron steamship Bawnmore, and this action was brought on a policy granted by the defendants dated the 10th of May, 1895, for £1,000 against risk of loss, or damage by fire, or explosion only. The vessel was valued at £20,000, and was insured for about half her value under ordinary policies in addition to this one, with other underwriters. Within the period covered by these policies the ship was stranded through stress of weather, and became a constructive total loss. Thirty-six hours after stranding her cargo of lime ignited and burned for fourteen days, until the Bawnmore was completely gutted.

(a.) Reported by ERSKINE REID, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The question was whether the plaintiffs were entitled to recover under their policy with the defendant company as to loss by fire.

Bigham, Q.C., with him D. C. Leck, for the plaintiffs.—The two policies are separate and independent contracts made by different firms of underwriters, and it is not competent for the defendants to evade their liability under their policy to indemnify the plaintiffs in case of loss by fire by alleging that by reason of the happening of some other perils by which the ship became a total constructive loss their liability ceased. The fact that to repair the vessel would have cost more than she would have been worth when repaired does not prevent the ship from being in existence quâ ship after she had gone on the beach. After the fire she was sold to a salvage company for £34.

He cited Barker v. Janson, 16 W. R. 399, L. R. 3 3 C. P. 303; Lidgett v. Secretan, 19 W. R. 1088, L. R. 6 C. P. 616; Ionides v. The Universal Marine Insurance Co., 11 W. R. 858, 14 C. B. N. S. 259.

Joseph Walton, Q.C., with him J. A. Hamilton, for the defendant company.—By the perils of the sea the vessel was stranded and became a constructive total loss. It is legally impossible that where a total loss has happened to a particular "thing" that another total loss can subsequently happen of the same "thing." The ship having once become a total loss the defendants cannot be called upon in law to make good any subsequent total loss by fire at all. In the alternative, the defendants contend that they are liable only for a particular average loss. The constructive total loss occurred while the defendants' policy attached, and, therefore, the case is distinguished from Barker v. Janson and Lidgett v. Secretan.

He cited Livie v. Janson, 12 East. 648.

Bigham, replied.

Cur. adv. vult.

MATHEW, J.—This is an action brought by certain shipowners to recover £1,000 in respect of a total loss under a time policy against loss or damage by fire and explosion only. The vessel was, by perils of the sea, driven ashore on the coast of Oregon, and while stranded was totally destroyed by fire. The defendant company denied liability, on the ground that at the time of the fire the ship was already a constructive total loss. The plaintiffs, on the other hand, contended that even upon the assumption that there had been a constructive total loss of the ship by reason of the stranding (which was not admitted) the assured, as a matter of law, were entitled to recover.

An order was made at chambers that the question should be argued as a preliminary point of law on the assumption that the vessel when stranded was still a "ship" capable of being floated and repaired, though at an expense exceeding her repaired value; and that the case should be argued as if the owners were their own underwriters against the perils of the sea which caused the stranding. The defendants said that the ship being, at the time of the fire, a constructive total loss a subsequent total loss was a legal impossibility. And, further, that it was not equitable that the plaintiffs should be permitted to recover twice for what was one loss.

The loss by stranding can only become total if the assured gave timely notice of abandonment. If none were given the loss would be a particular average only; and it is clear that a particular average loss, however serious, does not impair the right of the assured to recover for a subsequent total loss upon the terms of the valuation.

Whether the subject-matter of insurance is ship or goods, the valuation is the amount fixed by agreement at which, in the case of loss, the indemnity is to be calculated. Where goods are assured the valuation may be low when the policy attached, but the value to the owner may be enhanced when the goods have nearly reached their destination by the expenses of transit—and the line; nevertheless the valuation is binding. And again, if the valuation is high, but the goods are depreciated in value from causes for which the underwriters are not liable in case of loss, the valuation cannot be reopened. In the case of a ship, in the same way, it may from many causes be worth much less at the time of loss than the agreed value; but the valuation determines the amount of the underwriters' liability. That has clearly been the law since the case of Shawe v. Felton, 2 East. 109. I fail to distinguish the loss in the present case from a loss where the subject-matter of insurance is still existing, and there being no suggestion of fraud, a diminution in its value is not relied upon to exonerate the underwriters from the whole or part of their liability. I agree with Lord Kenyon that it is impossible to draw the line between a greater or less diminution of value. My judgment, therefore, must be for the plaintiffs with costs.

Solicitors for the plaintiffs, Lowless & Co.

Solicitors for the defendants, Waltons, Johnson, Bubb & Whatton.

Q. B. Div.
Commercial Causes.
(Mathew, J.)

Nov. 14.

HAY v. THE CORPORATION OF TRINITY HOUSE. (a.)

Admiralty—Ship—Light dues—Exemption—Order in Council of 16th May, 1893.

The mere fact that the master of a ship lands at a port a few persons whom he had previously taken on board, who paid no passage money, but who paid a sum of money each to the master for food provided by him, does not deprive the owner of the ship of the exemption from light dues which he would be entitled to under the Order in Council of the 16th May, 1893, when the ship touches at that port merely for the purpose of obtaining bunker coals.

Action tried by Mathew, J., in the Commercial Court, upon an agreed statement of facts.

The facts were as follow: The Chelona was a British steamship belonging to the port of Sunderland. The plaintiff, Hay, was managing owner, and he sued on behalf of himself and others, the owners of the vessel.

The defendants were the general lighthouse authority for (inter alia) the port of Portland.

In July, 1894, The Chelona, in the course of a voyage from Eupatoria to Aarhuus, laden with a cargo of barley, called at Malta for the purpose of obtaining bunker coals. While there—namely, on the 22nd of July, 1894—the master of the ship, at the request of a friend, took on board three persons who wished to return to England. The ship then proceeded on her voyage. The said three persons were charged no passage money, and did not in fact pay any passage money, or render any services on board the vessel.

(a.) Reported by Sir SHERSTON BAKER, Bart., Barrister-at-Law.

The master of the vessel provided and paid for the food consumed by the said three persons on the voyage in question, and charged the said three persons £4 a head for the same, which sum was received by the master, and was not accounted for by him to the plaintiff.

On the 2nd of August, 1894, The Chelona, in accordance with instructions received at Malta, touched at Portland for the purpose of obtaining bunker coals. While at that port the master landed the said three persons.

The defendants thereon demanded the sum of £16 18s. 4d. from the plaintiff for light dues alleged to have been incurred by the owners of the vessel, in consequence of her calling at Portland and landing the three persons there. This sum the plaintiffs refused to pay, contending that The Chelona was exempted from paying light dues by the terms of an Order in Council, dated the 16th of May, 1893, made in pursuance of section 398 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854 (now section 646 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894). The plaintiff, in order to avoid a distress or the arrest of The Chelona, paid the sum of £16 18s. 4d. to the defendants under protest, and now sought to recover the same in this action.

The question for the decision of the court was whether the plaintiff was liable in the circumstances to pay to the defendants the said sum for light dues.

The Order in Council of the 16th of May, 1893, is as follows: "All steamships which shall put into or touch at any port in the United Kingdom or in the Isle of Man for the purpose of filling up with coal their permanent bunkers, in which cargo is never carried, shall be exempted by the said general lighthouse authorities from the payment of the light dues receivable at such port, notwithstanding that such steamships shall also take on board at the port aforesaid provisions to be consumed on board, or stores required for the proper navigation or equipment of the vessel during the voyage in which she is engaged; provided, nevertheless, that the said exemption shall be subject to the terms or conditions following—that is to say, that the said exemption shall not apply to any such steamship as aforesaid, unless the person or persons liable to pay light dues in respect thereof shall satisfy the person appointed to collect the same that such steamship has not taken on board at the port aforesaid a larger quantity of coal than was sufficient with the coal already on board the same to fill up her said permanent bunkers in which cargo is never carried, and that such coal has been placed in such permanent bunkers, . . . and that such steamship has not called for or received orders, or broken bulk, or taken on board mails, cargo, or passengers at the port aforesaid."

B. Aspinall, for the plaintiff, was stopped.

H. F. Boyd, for the defendants.—Under the Order in Council, if a ship touches at a port merely to obtain bunker coals it is exempted from light dues, and the exemption remains if provisions or stores are taken on board. The plaintiff does not come within the exemption unless he can show that the only object in going into the port was to obtain bunker coals. He cannot show that here, as the ship really went into the port to land passengers. It is said that there were only three persons; but if he is exempted on landing three, the exemption would obtain for any number. It is said in the proviso the ship must not "break bulk." Here the ship has broken bulk, as that expression would cover the landing of passengers or goods. The landing of these persons prevents the case coming within the exemption, so that the plaintiff was liable to these light dues, and he cannot recover his money back.

Aspinall, in reply, referred to the case of The Neptune Steam Navigation Co. v. The Corporation of Trinity House, 3 Times L. R. 615.

MATHEW, J.—Judgment in this case must be given for the plaintiff, as I think this case is within the exemption referred to in the order. Under a previous order ships which put into a port for the purpose of obtaining bunker coals were exempt from light dues, but many ships took advantage of being in port for that purpose to obtain stores, and light dues were claimed against them. A new order expressly provided for this, and gave an exemption in such a case, but that order is subject to the conditions at the end of the order.

Here by agreement the master took on board three persons; the ship was to touch at an English port to take on board bunker coals, and the three persons were landed at that port. The defendants say they are entitled to light dues by reason of the landing of these three persons, and they contend that the plaintiff is bound by the master's act in so landing them. They also contended that if the plaintiff could land three persons without being liable, he could land a hundred persons equally without being liable. But in the latter case it might well be said that the object in calling at the port was not to obtain coals, but to land passengers. The present case, however, is similar to the captain taking a friend on board and landing him at some particular place, in which case it is perfectly clear he would come within the exemption. Here the three persons, so far as the plaintiff is concerned, were really taken on board as the friends of the master, and this does not bring upon the plaintiff the liability to these light dues. He is within the exemption, and judgment must be given for him.

Judgment for the plaintiff.

Solicitors for the plaintiff, Botterell & Roche.

Solicitors for the defendants, Sandilands & Co.

Q. B. Div.
(Lord Russell of Killowen, C.J., and Cave, J.) Oct. 25.

BISCHOP v. TOLER (a.)

Margarine—"Le Dansk"—False trade description—Place of manufacture—Merchandise Marks Act, 1887 (50 & 51 Vict. c. 28), s. 2, subsection (2); s. 3, subsection 1 (e) (d).

At a factory in Paris margarine was manufactured, which was sent to a branch factory at Southampton. There the margarine went through a process in which 10 per cent. of Danish butter and milk were added. This compound was then sent to London, to a shop on the outside of which appeared the words "French Factory. Le Dansk," and was retailed to customers under the name of "Le Dansk."

Held, that the substance was of English manufacture, and that the selling of the compound in cardboard boxes on which the words "French Factory. Le Dansk" were printed was a false trade description calculated to deceive the public as to the place or country where the substance was manufactured.

Special case stated by Mr. Newton, a metropolitan police magistrate, sitting at Marlborough-street Police Court.

(a.) Reported by ERSKINE REID, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

In this case Samuel Bischop was summoned in January for selling margarine to which a false description was applied, contrary to the provisions of the Merchandise Marks Acts, 1887.

On March 30 Bischop was convicted and fined, subject to the decision of this court upon a case stated.

From the special case it appeared that the appellant was manager of a shop, No. 59, Oxford-street, for M. Auguste Pellerin, of Paris, which is used exclusively for the sale of a class of margarine to which the name of "Le Dansk" is applied. "Le Dansk" is a material of which the foundation is made in France, and is known by the name of "Oleomargarine." This is sent over to Southampton, and there it goes through a process in which 10 per cent. of Danish butter and milk is added, and it is then consigned to the London shop, where it is retailed to customers in cardboard boxes on which appear the words "French Factory. Le Dansk." Before a box is handed to a customer the word "Margarine" is stamped on it. The window of the shop was filled with a pile of these boxes on which the word "Margarine" was not printed, and outside the shop appeared the words "Le Dansk. French Factory."

The conviction was based on two grounds—first, that the words "Le Dansk" were a false trade description as to the material of which the goods were composed within the meaning of section 2 (2) and section 3 (i) (e) and (d) of the Merchandise Marks Act, 1887, the substance called "Le Dansk" being, in fact, margarine; and secondly, that the words "Le Dansk. French Factory" on the outside and inside of the shop and on the cardboard boxes were a false trade description as to the place or country in which the margarine was produced within section 3 (i) (b) of the Act.

H. D. Bonsey, for the appellant.—I submit that the words "Le Dansk," with or without the words "French Factory," are not a trade description within the meaning of the Act. "Le Dansk" is a mere fancy name, and there is no evidence that it is a trade-mark, nor is there evidence that if that name is recognized as a trade-mark that the description would be a false one. It is wrong to contend that the words "Le Dansk" and "French Factory" necessarily mean that the article is solely of French manufacture. Moreover, no evidence has been given to show that, in fact, the public have been defrauded by the words and bought the article as one wholly of foreign make. Before 1887 the name was lawfully and generally applied to this particular kind of margarine.

Moulton, Q.C., and Morton Smith, for the respondent.—The words "Le Dansk" are a false description within the meaning of section 2 (2) (e) and (d) of the Act, the substance being margarine. There are only two classes of "butter" recognized in the trade. Pure butter is one, and margarine, sold under any name you like to call it, the other. The words "French Factory" used on the boxes, &c., are a false trade description as to the place of manufacture within the meaning of section 3 (i.) (b), as this margarine is, in fact, manufactured at Southampton.

Bonsey replied.

The COURT affirmed the conviction.

Lord RUSSELL, C.J.—I do not think that the first ground of complaint alone would have been sufficient to support the conviction, because the words "Le Dansk" do not sufficiently by themselves convey the idea of what was meant to mislead people into buying this material as something different and better than ordinary margarine. But on the second ground—namely, that the article is represented as being of foreign make—the conviction must be affirmed. The fact is that the margarine manufactured in Paris is mixed up with fresh ingredients at Southampton. The new product is a compound substance which then becomes a finished product, and receives as such the name of "Le Dansk." The false description consists in this, that by the words printed on the boxes and painted on the shop it is suggested to the customer that this article was made as a finished article in France, which is not the case.

CAVE, J.—I concur.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the appellant, Neve & Beck.

Solicitor for the respondent, C. Urquhart Fisher.

House of Lords.

From C. A. (England). July 29, 1895.

THE MAYOR, &c., OF BRADFORD v. PICKLES. (a.)

Water—Watercourse—Water percolating underground—Malicious intention—Bradford Waterworks Act (17 & 18 Vict. c. cxxiv.), s. 49.

The legal right of a landowner to divert or take water which percolates underground in undefined channels into adjoining land is not affected by his motive for doing so.

The Bradford Waterworks Act, 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. cxxiv.), s. 49, held to preserve these rights of the respondent.

Decision of the Court of Appeal, 43 W. R. 189, [1895] 1 Ch. 145, affirmed.

This was an appeal by the plaintiffs from a decision of the Court of Appeal (Lord HERSCHELL, L.C., LINDLEY and A. L. SMITH, L.JJ.), reported 43 W. R. 189, [1895] 1 Ch. 145.

The statement of the facts as given by Lord WATSON is as follows:—

The appellants have purchased under statutory powers, and are now vested with the whole undertaking of, the Bradford Waterworks Co., incorporated by an Act passed in 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 124), which transferred to that company the undertaking of a corporation, having the same name, created by statute in 1842 (5 Vict. Sess. 2, c. 6), together with all rights and privileges thereto belonging. The older of these companies acquired for the purposes of their undertaking a parcel of land known as Trooper Farm, and also certain springs and streams arising in or flowing through the farm. From these springs and streams the appellants and their predecessors have hitherto obtained a valuable supply of water for the domestic use of the inhabitants of Bradford.

Trooper Farm is bounded on the west and north by lands belonging to the respondent, which are about 140 acres in extent. The first of these boundaries, on the west, which is alone of importance in the present case, is a public highway called Dolls-lane. The respondent's land to the west of that boundary is on a higher level than Trooper Farm, and has a steep slope downwards to the lane. Its substrata are intersected by two faults running from east and west, one from each end of the boundary, which prevent the escape of percolating water either to the north or south; and the nature and the inclination of the strata is such that the subterranean water which they contain must, by the natural force of gravitation, eventually find its way to Trooper Farm.

(a.) Reported by CHARLES H. GRAFTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The sources from which the appellants derive a supply of water near to the western boundary of Trooper Farm are two in number. The first of these is a large spring, known as Many Wells, which issues from their ground twenty or thirty yards to the east of Dolls-lane. The second is a stream to the south of Many Wells, which has its origin in a smaller spring on the respondent's land, close to Dolls-lane, at a point known as the Watering Spot, from which the water runs in a definite channel into Trooper Farm.

It is an admitted fact that neither the appellants nor either of the companies whose undertaking is now vested in them ever acquired from the respondent or his predecessors in title any part of their legal right to or interest in the water in their land, whether above or below the ground; and also that the statutes, to the benefit of whose provisions the appellants are now entitled, make no provision for compensating the respondent in the event of such right or interest being prejudicially affected by the appellants' undertaking.

In the year 1892 the respondent began to sink a shaft on the other side of the lane, and to the west of the Many Wells Spring, and also to drive a level through his land adjoining the lane for the professed purpose of draining the strata, with a view to the working of his minerals. These operations had the effect of occasionally discolouring the water in the Many Wells Spring, and also of diminishing to some extent the amount of water in that spring, and in the stream coming from the Watering Spot; and it became apparent that, if persevered in, they would result in a considerable and permanent diminution of the water supply obtainable from these sources. The appellants then brought the present suit, in which they crave an injunction to restrain the respondent from continuing to sink the shaft or drive the level, and from doing anything whereby the waters of the spring and stream might be drawn off or diminished in quantity, or polluted, or injuriously affected.

The appellants alleged in their statement of claim that the respondent had not a bonâ fide intention to work his minerals, and that his intention was to injure the appellants, and so to endeavour to induce them either to purchase his land or to give him some other compensation.

North, J., was of opinion that the respondent's acts were forbidden by statute, and granted an injunction: 42 W. R. 697, [1894] 3 Ch. 53. The Court of Appeal reversed this decision.

The Bradford Waterworks Act of 1854 incorporated the Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847.

Section 49 of the Act of 1854, which was identical in terms with section 234 of the Bradford Waterworks Act of 1842, was as follows:—

"It shall not be lawful for any person other than the company to divert, alter, or appropriate, in any other manner than by law they may be legally entitled, any of the waters supplying or flowing from certain streams and springs called 'Many Wells,' arising or flowing in and through a certain farm called 'Trooper' or Many Wells Farm in the township of Wilsden, in the parish of Bradford, or to sink any well or pit, or do any act, matter, or thing whereby the waters of the said springs might be drawn off or diminished in quantity; and if any person shall illegally divert, alter, or appropriate the said waters or any part thereof, or sink any such well or pit, or shall do any such act, matter, or thing, whereby the said waters may be drawn off or diminished in quantity, and shall not, immediately on being required so to do by the company, repair the injury done by him, so as to restore the said springs and the waters thereof to the state in which they were before such illegal act as aforesaid, he shall forfeit to the company any sum not exceeding five pounds for every day during which the said supply of water shall be diverted or diminished by reason of any work done or act performed by, or by the authority of, such person, in addition to the damage which the company may sustain by reason of their supply of water being diminished."

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and B. Eyre, for the appellants.—The respondent, in diverting the water, is acting maliciously, the object being to injure another, which is unlawful: Keeble v. Hickeringill, 11 East. 574. In Acton v. Blundell, 12 M. & W. 324, Tindal, C.J., at p. 353, quotes Marcellus: "Si non animo vicini nocendi, sed suum agrum meliorem faciendi"; and the same is quoted by Lord Wensleydale in Chasemore v. Richards, 7 W. R. 685, 7 H. L. Cas. 349, 387.

Smith v. Kenrick, 7 C. B. 515, 559, and Mogul Steamship Co. v. Macgregor, Gow, & Co., 37 W. R. 756, 23 Q. B. D. 598, were also referred to.

Everitt, Q.C., Tindal Atkinson, Q.C., Butcher, and A. P. Longstaffe, for the respondents, were not heard.

The House took time for consideration.

Lord HALSBURY, L.C.—In this action the plaintiffs seek to restrain the defendant from doing certain acts which they allege will interfere with the supply of water which they want, and which they are incorporated to collect for the purpose of better supplying the town of Bradford. North, J., ordered the injunction to issue; but the Court of Appeal, consisting of Lord Herschell, L.C., Lindley and A. L. Smith, L.JJ., reversed his judgment.

The facts that are material to the decision of this question seem to me to lie in a very narrow compass. The acts done, or sought to be done, by the defendant were all done upon his own land, and the interference, whatever it is, with the flow of water is an interference with water which is underground, and not shewn to be water flowing in any defined stream, but is percolating water, which but for such interference would undoubtedly reach the plaintiffs' works, and in that sense does deprive them of the water which they would otherwise get. But, although it does deprive them of water which they would otherwise get, it is necessary for the plaintiffs to establish that they have a right to the flow of water, and that the defendant has no right to do what he is doing.

I am of opinion that neither of those propositions can be established. Apart from the consideration of the particular Act of Parliament incorporating the plaintiffs, which requires separate treatment, the question whether the plaintiffs have a right to the flow of such water appears to me to be covered by authority. In the case of Chasemore v. Richards it became necessary for this House to decide whether an owner of land had a right to sink a well upon his own premises, and thereby abstract the subterranean water percolating through his own soil, which would otherwise, by the natural force of gravity, have found its way into springs which fed the river Wandle, the flow of which the plaintiff in that action had enjoyed for upwards of sixty years.

The very question was then determined by this House, and it was held that the landowner had a right to do what he had done, whatever his object or purpose might be, and although the purpose might be wholly unconnected with the enjoyment of his own estate.

It therefore appears to me that, treating this question apart from the particular Act and, indeed, apart from the 49th section of the Bradford Waterworks Act, 1854, upon which the whole question turns, it would be absolutely hopeless to contend that this case is not governed by the authority of Chasemore v. Richards.

This brings me to the 49th section of the Act of 1854, 17 & 18 Vict. c. 124, upon which reliance has been placed. [His lordship read it.]

Whatever may be said of the drafting of this section, two things are clear; first, that the section in its terms contemplates that persons other than the company may be legally entitled to divert, alter, or appropriate the waters supplying or flowing from the streams and springs; and, secondly, that the acts against which the section is directed must be illegal diversion, alteration, or appropriation of the said waters.

The natural interpretation of such language seems to me to be this: that where the generality of the language of the section might apply to any alteration or appropriation of waters supplying or flowing from the streams and springs called "Many Wells," the section only intended to protect such streams and springs and supplies as the company should have acquired a right to by purchase, compensation, or otherwise; but in suchwise as should vest in them the proprietorship of the waters, streams, springs, &c. And, lest the generality of the language should give them more than that to which they had acquired the proprietary right, the legal rights of all other persons were expressly saved; and upon this assumption the latter part of the section makes penal the illegal diversion, alteration, or appropriation of any streams, &c., of which, by the hypothesis, the company had become the proprietor.

I do not think that North, J., does justice to the language of the section when he says that "the section enacts that a man is not to do certain specified things except so far as he may lawfully do them." The fallacy of that observation (with all respect to North, J.) resides in the phrase "certain specified things." If my reading of the section be correct, the thing that is prohibited is taking or diverting water which has been appropriated and paid for by the company; but the thing which is not prohibited is taking water which has not reached the company's premises, to the property in which no title is given by the section, and which, by the very act complained of, never can reach the company's premises at all. To use popular language, therefore, what is prohibited is taking what belongs to the company, and what is not prohibited is taking what does not belong to the company.

I have used popular language because I have no doubt that the draftsman who drew the section was encountered with the proposition in his own mind that you could not absolutely assert property of percolating water at all. You may have a right to the flow of water—you may have a property in the water when it is collected and appropriated and reduced into possession; but, in view of the particular subject-matter with which the draftsman was dealing, it seems to me intelligible enough why he adopted the phraseology now under construction.

It appears to me that this is the true construction of the section from the language itself. But I confess I can entertain no doubt that the mere fact that the section, as construed by the plaintiffs, affords no right to compensation to those whose rights might be affected, is conclusive against the construction contended for by the plaintiffs.

The only remaining point is the question of fact alleged by the plaintiffs, that the acts done by the defendant are done, not with any view which deals with the use of his own land or the percolating water through it, but is done, in the language of the pleader, "maliciously." I am not certain that I can understand or give any intelligible construction to the word so used. Upon the supposition on which I am now arguing, it comes to an allegation that the defendant did maliciously something that he had a right to do. If this question were to have been tried in old times as an injury to the right of the plaintiff in an action on the case, the plaintiff would have had to allege, and to prove, if traversed, that he was entitled to the flow of the water, which, as I have already said, was an allegation he would have failed to establish.

This is not a case in which the state of mind of the person doing the act can affect the right to do it. If it was a lawful act, however ill the motive might be, he had a right to do it. If it was an unlawful act, however good his motive might be, he would have no right to do it. Motives and intentions in such a question as is now before your lordships seem to me to be absolutely irrelevant. But I am not prepared to adopt Lindley, L.J.'s view of the moral obliquity of the person insisting on his right when that right is challenged. It is not an uncommon thing to stop up a path which may be a convenience to everybody else, and the use of which may be no inconvenience to the owner of the land over which the path goes. But when the use of it is insisted upon as a right, it is a familiar mode of testing that right to stop the permissive use, which the owner of the land would contend it to be, although the use may form no inconvenience to the owner.

So, here, if the owner of the adjoining land is in a situation in which an act of his, lawfully done on his own land, may divert the water which would otherwise go into the possession of this trading company, I see no reason why he should not insist on their purchasing his interest from which this trading company desires to make profit.

For these reasons I am of opinion that this appeal ought to be dismissed, with costs, and that the plaintiffs should pay to the defendant the costs both here and below.

Lord WATSON [after stating the facts:—] It is clear that, apart from any privilege which may have been conferred upon them by statute, the respondent, as in a question with the appellants, has a legal right to divert or impound the water percolating beneath the surface of his land, so as to prevent its reaching Trooper Farm, and feeding or assisting to feed the Many Wells Spring or the stream flowing from the Watering Spot. Upon that point there can be no doubt since Chasemore v. Richards was decided by this House in the year 1859. But the appellants pleaded at your lordships' bar, as they did in both courts below, that the principle of Chasemore v. Richards is inapplicable to the present case, because, in the first place, the operations contemplated and commenced by the respondent are by statute expressly prohibited; and, in the second place, these operations were designed and partly carried out by the respondent, not with the honest intention of improving the value of his land or minerals, but with the sole object of doing injury to their undertaking.

The statutory provisions upon which the appellants rely as supporting the first of these pleas are to be found in section 234 of the Act of 1842, and in section 49 of the Act of 1854, which is a mere repetition of the previous enactment. The cause relates to the Many Wells Springs, an expression which, as the context shows, includes the stream coming from the Watering Spot. It contains two separate enactments, the one of them prohibitory and the other penal. First of all, it declares that it shall not be lawful "for any person other than the said company to divert, alter, or appropriate, in any manner other than by law they may be legally entitled," any of the waters "supplying or flowing from" these springs, or to sink any well or pit, or to do any act, matter, or thing whereby "the waters of the said springs" may be drawn off or diminished in quantity. That declaration is followed by the provision that "if any person shall illegally divert, alter, or appropriate the said water, or any part thereof, or sink any such well or pit, or shall do any such act, matter, or thing whereby the said waters shall be drawn off or diminished in quantity," and shall not, on being required to do so by the company, immediately restore the springs and waters to the same condition in which they were before the illegal act, they shall be liable to pay five pounds to the company for each day until restoration is made, besides compensating the company for any damage sustained through their illegal act.

The appellants endeavoured to construe the prohibitory clause as effecting a virtual confiscation in their favour of all water rights in or connected with the respondent's land lying to the west of Trooper Farm. It appears to me to be exceedingly improbable that the Legislature should have intended to deprive a landowner of part of his property for the benefit of a commercial company without any provision for compensating him for his loss. But it is not necessary to rely upon probabilities, because, in my opinion, the language of the clause is incapable of bearing such an interpretation. I think the plain object of the statutory prohibition, which has two distinct branches, was to give protection to the supply of water which had been acquired by or belonged to the company for the time being; and that it was not meant to forbid, and does not prevent, any legitimate use made by a neighbouring proprietor of water running upon or percolating below his land before it reached the company's supply and became part of their undertaking.

The first branch makes it unlawful for any person other than the company to divert, alter, or appropriate any of the "waters now supplying" the Many Wells Springs, which appear to include sources of supply existing upon lands adjacent to Trooper Farm. Had the prohibition been absolute, it would have struck against the operations of the respondent; but it is subject to the qualification that the respondent, or any landowner similarly situated, may lawfully divert those waters which ultimately feed the Many Wells Springs, so long as he does so in any manner which is not in excess of his common law rights. The respondent's operations, of which the appellants complain, are within his proprietary right, and are therefore not obnoxious to that part of the prohibition.

The second branch, which prohibits the sinking of wells and other operations, has no reference to outside waters more or less distant which might ultimately find their way to the Many Wells Springs. It relates to "the waters of the said springs"—an expression which, in my opinion, can only denote the waters which have actually reached the Many Wells Springs, or some channel or reservoir which has been prepared for their reception upon their issuing from these springs. The prohibition gives effective protection against the withdrawal or diminution, either by an adjacent proprietor or any other person, of waters which have come within the dominion of the appellants. But it does not prevent the diversion or impounding by an adjacent proprietor of water in his own land which has never reached that point, so long as his operations are such as the law permits. For these reasons, in so far as concerns the first plea urged for the appellants, I concur in the judgment of the Court of Appeal.

The second plea urged by the appellants, which was rejected by both courts below, was founded upon the text of the Roman law (Dig. lib. 39, tit. 3, art. 1, s. 12), and also, somewhat to my surprise, upon the law of Scotland. I venture to doubt whether the doctrine of Marcellus would assist the appellants' contention in this case; but it is unnecessary to consider the point, because the noble and learned lords who took part in the decision of Chasemore v. Richards held that the doctrine had no place in the law of England.

I desire, however, to say that I cannot assent to the view as to the law of Scotland laid down by Lord Wensleydale in Chasemore v. Richards. The noble and learned lord appears to have accepted a passage in Mr. Bell's Principles (section 966), which is expressed in very general terms, and is calculated to mislead unless it is read in the light of the decisions upon which it is founded. I am aware that the phrase in æmulationem vicini was at one time frequently, and is even now occasionally, very loosely used by Scottish lawyers. But I know of no case in which the act of a proprietor has been found to be illegal, or restrained as being in æmulationem, where it was not attended with offence or injury to his neighbour. In cases of nuisance a degree of indulgence has been extended to certain operations, such as burning limestone, which in law are regarded as necessary evils. If a landowner proceeded to burn limestone close to his march so as to cause annoyance to his neighbour, there being other places on his property where he could conduct the operation with equal or greater convenience to himself and without giving cause of offence, the court would probably grant an interdict. But the principle of æmulatio has never been carried further. The law of Scotland, if it differs in that, is in all other respects the same with the law of England. No use of property which would be legal if due to a proper motive can become illegal because it is prompted by a motive which is improper or even malicious.

I therefore concur in the judgment which has been moved by the Lord Chancellor.

Lord ASHBOURNE.—I concur. To my mind the case is clear, and turns upon considerations sufficiently simple and far from obscure.

The plaintiffs have no case unless they can show that they are entitled to the flow of the water in question, and that the defendant has no right to do what he is doing. Putting aside the statutes, the defendant's rights cannot be seriously contested. The law stated by this House in Chasemore v. Richards cannot be questioned. Mr. Pickles has acted within his legal rights throughout; and is he to forfeit those legal rights and be punished for their legal exercise because certain motives are imputed to him? If his motives were the most generous and philanthropic in the world, they would not avail him when his actions were illegal. If his motives are selfish and mercenary, that is no reason why his rights should be confiscated when his actions are legal.

It is to be noted that the defendant or his predecessors in title never parted with any of their legal rights; it is not suggested that the plaintiffs, by agreement or otherwise, ever acquired them; and no indication is given that there is any intention to compensate the defendant for his legal rights sought to be appropriated or injuriously affected by the plaintiffs.

The appellants' contention on the construction of the statutes would practically confiscate the defendant's water rights. I see nothing in the statutes to interfere with or prejudice his legal rights. Very clear words would be required to support the contention that legal rights have been swept away without compensation. Waters that have come under the control of the appellants are fully protected; but there is not a word to hinder or cramp the action of Mr. Pickles, unless he acts "illegally," or proceeds "in any manner other than by law he may be legally entitled."

I therefore concur in the order proposed.

Lord MACNAGHTEN.—For fifty years the Corporation of Bradford have supplied their town with water. They were empowered to do so by an Act of Parliament passed in 1854, which authorized and required them to purchase the undertaking of a then existing company called "The Bradford Waterworks Co."

The chief source of their water supply was taken over from the company. It comes from a cluster of springs known as "The Many Wells." These springs issue from the lower slope of a hillside some distance from the town. Above them, in the immediate neighbourhood, there is a tract of land belonging to Mr. Pickles, the respondent. Owing to the fall of the ground and the nature and lie of the strata beneath the surface, Mr. Pickles' land forms a sort of gathering-room or reservoir for subterranean water. Two faults, nearly parallel to each other, run downwards through it, and there is a bottom of impermeable clay. At present there is no way of escape for the imprisoned waters except by the Many Wells Springs. Within the ambit of his own land Mr. Pickles has set about making a tunnel or drift which, apparently, is intended to pierce one of the two faults that keep the underground water within bounds. If this is done, the result, it is said, will be to allow the water to run off in some other direction.

The Corporation claim an injunction to restrain Mr. Pickles from going on with the proposed work. They put their case in two ways. They say that under the circumstances the operation which Mr. Pickles threatens to carry out is something in excess of his rights as a landowner. Failing that ground, they maintain that his proceedings are in contravention of the express terms of their special Act.

As regards the first point, the position of the appellants is one which it is not very easy to understand. They cannot dispute the law laid down by this House in Chasemore v. Richards. They do not suggest that the underground water with which Mr. Pickles proposes to deal flows in any defined channel. But they say that Mr. Pickles' action in the matter is malicious, and that, because his motive is a bad one, he is not at liberty to do a thing which every landowner in the country may do with impunity if his motives are good. Mr. Pickles, it seems, was so alarmed at this view of the case that he tried to persuade the court that all he wanted was to unwater some beds of stone which he thought he could work at a profit. In his innocent enterprise the court found a sinister design. And it may be taken that his real object was to shew that he was master of the situation, and to force the Corporation to buy him out at a price satisfactory to himself. Well, he has something to sell, or, at any rate, he has something which he can prevent other people enjoying unless he is paid for it. Why should he, he may think, without fee or reward, keep his land as a store-room for a commodity which the corporation dispense, probably not gratuitously, to the inhabitants of Bradford? He prefers his own interests to the public good. He may be churlish, selfish, and grasping. His conduct may seem shocking to a moral philosopher. But where is the malice? Mr. Pickles has no spite against the people of Bradford. He bears no ill will to the corporation. They are welcome to the water, and to his land too, if they will pay the price for it. So much, perhaps, might be said in defence or in palliation of Mr. Pickles' conduct. But the real answer to the claim of the Corporation is that in such a case motives are immaterial. It is the act, not the motive for the act, that must be regarded. If the act, apart from motive, gives rise merely to damage without legal injury, the motive, however reprehensible it may be, will not supply that element.

On this point, both North, J., and the Court of Appeal decided against the Corporation. And the decision, as it seems to me, is plainly right.

On the second point on which North, J., was in favour of the Corporation and the Court of Appeal against them, there is certainly more to be said. I quite agree with the Court of Appeal in the result at which they have arrived. But, speaking for myself, I rather take leave to doubt whether the section of the special Act on which the question turns is so unsatisfactory, so ill-drawn, and so difficult to construe as it seemed to be to the Court of Appeal.

The old waterworks company was incorporated by an Act passed in 1842. It was dissolved and reincorporated in 1854 in view of the immediate transfer of the undertaking to the Corporation.

In the Act of 1854, the provisions of which were kept in force for the benefit of the Corporation, the section in question is the 49th. But that section is merely a reproduction of section 234 in the Act of 1842. And it will be more convenient to deal with the earlier Act.

The Act of 1842 scheduled certain lands which the company were empowered to take. Among them was part of a farm belonging to one Seth Wright, which was known as Trooper or Many Wells Farm. By section 233 the company were authorized to divert or alter the course of a certain beck called Hewenden Beck, which is a tributary of the River Aire, "and also to divert and take the water from" the Many Wells Springs, described as "the springs and streams of water called Many Wells, arising or flowing in and through . . . Trooper or Many Wells Farm."

At the date of the passing of the Act the waters issuing from the Many Wells Springs in Trooper Farm, and a stream which rose in the adjoining land, flowed in several defined channels through Trooper Farm into Hewenden Beck, which forms one of the boundaries of the farm. The scheduled portion of the farm comprised apparently some, but not all, of those channels. However, after the Act was passed, the company purchased the whole of Trooper Farm; and, as required by the Act, they made compensation to the millowners on Hewenden Beck for the loss of the waters of the Many Wells Springs.

Section 234 is a protective clause corresponding in the main with section 14 in the Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847. It was to come into operation after the purchase of the Many Wells Springs.

According to the ordinary course of legislation in this country, a clause of that sort is intended to protect property, rights, and interests which have been acquired by purchase, not to transfer arbitrarily from one person to another property and rights for which nothing has been paid, and for which no compensation is provided.

Section 234 prohibits in terms two classes of Acts, and it imposes a penalty not exceeding £5 per day on any person infringing its provisions so long as the injury lasts. One of these classes is treated as legal or illegal according to circumstances; the other is treated as illegal under all circumstances.

In the first place, the section says that "after the Many Wells Springs have been purchased by the company, it shall not be lawful for any person other than the said company to divert, alter, or appropriate in any other manner than by law they may be legally entitled any of the waters now supplying or flowing from the same." Both as regards the underground sources of the springs and as regards the streams flowing from them in their natural course, it forbids any act by any person in excess of his legal rights. At that time it must be remembered that the rights of landowners in regard to underground water had not been finally determined. If the view which commended itself to the Court of Exchequer in Dickinson v. Grand Junction Canal Co., 7 Ex. 282, had been established, the proposed action of Mr. Pickles would, no doubt, have been illegal. As it is, there is nothing in the first part of the prohibition to restrict or curtail his rights as a landowner in dealing with underground water percolating through his land in unknown channels.

In the second place, the section declares that no person but the company is "to sink any well or pit, or do any act, matter, or thing whereby the waters of the said springs may be drawn off or diminished in quantity." What is the meaning of the expression "the water of the said springs"? The natural and obvious meaning seems to me to be the waters issuing from the springs, such as they happen to be in quantity and volume, at the point of issue, or in one case at the point of entry, into Trooper Farm. The expression cannot include the underground sources which serve to feed the springs. Otherwise you would have this singular result, that things which by reason of the saving of existing rights are treated as legal and permissible in one part of the clause are treated as illegal and prohibited by another. It must mean the water which the company were authorized to "divert and take from" those springs which the section at its commencement assumes the company to have purchased—not the waters which supply the springs, but the waters which the springs supply. A comparison of other sections in the Act will confirm this view, if any confirmation is required. The expression, "the waters of the said 'Many Wells'" occurs in section 275, and then it is evidently synonymous with the following words in a parallel passage in section 238: "The water issuing from the springs of water before mentioned called 'Many Wells,' and which is hereby authorized to be taken and diverted for the purposes of this Act."

After the company had compensated the millowners on Hewenden Beck and purchased Trooper Farm, the waters of the Many Wells Springs at and from the point of issue in Trooper Farm, and the water of the stream which rose in the adjoining land at and from the point of its entry into Trooper Farm, became the absolute property of the company, and it was the duty of the company to carry those waters to Bradford. No one was to interfere with them. Any such interference is characterized, in a later part of the section, as an illegal act. And, indeed, it seems to me very difficult to conceive how such an act could in any case be legal, unless the company constructed their works in a perverse and foolish manner. No one from whom the company acquired land or even an easement for the purposes of their works could lawfully let down those works. No one else, it may be assumed, would be in a position to do so. No one could lawfully tap their aqueducts or conduits.

I am of opinion that the act which Mr. Pickles proposes to do is not within either of the two classes of prohibited acts mentioned in section 234. It is not within the first class, because at the time of the passing of the Act his predecessor was legally entitled, and he is now legally entitled, to do the thing which is complained of. It is not within the second class, because Mr. Pickles does not propose to do anything which can have the effect of drawing off or diminishing in quantity the waters of the Many Wells Springs, such as they may be at the point of issue in Trooper Farm, or as regards the stream which does not rise in Trooper Farm at the point of its entry into that farm.

It was argued somewhat faintly that section 49 of the Act of 1854 must have a wider meaning than that which I think ought to be attributed to section 234 of the Act of 1842, because the Act of 1854 incorporates the Waterworks Clauses Act of 1847, and section 14 of that Act covers, it is said, everything which is covered by section 234 of the Act of 1842, if it be construed as it seems to me it ought to be construed. There would be very little in such an argument under any circumstances, because it is only natural that the promoters of the legislation of 1854 would, on the reconstruction of the company, desire to retain or re-enact every clause in the former Act which could make for their protection. But the truth is that the section of the Waterworks Clauses Act of 1847, which corresponds with section 49 of the Act of 1854, does not apply to the Many Wells Springs, which were purchased under the Act of 1842. The Act of 1854, which incorporates the Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847, declares that in construing that Act the expression "the special Act" shall mean the Act of 1854. It does not mean or include the Act of 1842.

I am, therefore, of opinion that this appeal should be dismissed with costs.

Order appealed from affirmed, and appeal dismissed with costs; action dismissed with costs.

Solicitors for the appellants, Cann & Son, agents for W. T. McGowen, Bradford.

Solicitors for the respondent, Ullithorne, Currey, & Currey, agents for W. & G. Burr & Co., Keighley.

Court of Appeal.

From Chan. Div. (Lindley, A. L. Smith, and Rigby, L.JJ.) — Dec. 5.

In re LORD AND FULLERTON'S CONTRACT. (a.)

Trustee—Disclaimer—Partial disclaimer—Vendor and purchaser—Will—Trust for sale.

A person resident abroad, who has been nominated as trustee, cannot refuse to act as trustee for any part of the trust property situate without the bounds of the country where he is resident, and at the same time intermeddle in the trusts of that part of the trust property situate in that country. A document containing such a refusal is a partial disclaimer only, of the office of trustee, and is nugatory. The disclaimer, in order to be valid, must be of the whole of the trusts.

(a.) Reported by W. SHALLCROSS GODDARD, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Appeal from the Vice-Chancellor of the County Palatine Court of Lancaster.

By his will, dated the 26th of September, 1888, Samuel Lord appointed five gentlemen as executors and trustees of his will, and devised the whole of his estate to them upon trust to sell. The testator died on the 23rd of May, 1889, and his will was proved on the 15th of July, 1889, by three out of the five named executors, power being reserved for the other two, Samuel Lord (the son) and John S. Lyle, to come in and prove. Lyle, by deed, subsequently renounced probate and disclaimed all the trusts of the will. Lord, by deed poll, dated the 18th of February, 1890, declared that he had refused to act as trustee for any property situate without the bounds of the United States of America, he being then resident in the United States.

The three trustees who had proved the will contracted to sell part of the property to Hugh Fullerton on the 22nd of March, 1895. Objection was taken on the purchaser's part that a good title was not disclosed in the vendors, and that the concurrence of Samuel Lord, junior, was necessary.

After correspondence, a summons was taken out, by arrangement, under the Vendor and Purchaser Act, 1874 (37 & 38 Vict. c. 78), for the opinion of the court on the title. The Vice-Chancellor found, on the construction of Lord's disclaimer, that it amounted to a general disclaimer of the office of trustee; and that therefore a good title was disclosed in the vendors.

The purchaser appealed.

Farwell, Q.C., and Norris, for the appellant.—There is no distinction in law between property in one part of the world and property in another part. There is a clear statement on the disclaimer of Lord that he has intermeddled both as trustee and as executor as to the property situate in America. On the authorities this so-called disclaimer is absolutely nugatory. See Ward v. Butler, 2 Moll. 533; Mucklow v. Fuller, Jac. 198; In re Gordon, Roberts v. Gordon, 6 Ch. D. 531, 26 W. R. Dig. 281; Cummins v. Cummins, 3 J. & Lat. 64, at p. 92; Urch v. Walker, 3 M. & Cr. 702. There is a clear intention to disclaim the English estates, and to act in the trusts of the American estates. A trustee cannot get rid of part of his estate; he must disclaim the whole or none.

Warmington, Q.C., and W. H. Cochrane, for the respondents.—There is no evidence that this trustee has intermeddled. The exclusion of immovable real estate situate abroad will not help one way or the other; presumably it follows the law of the place where it is situate. The trustee does not claim administration to any property included in the probate. In form the disclaimer is a complete renunciation of the offices of trustee and executor, and the true construction of the deed is that Lord was in doubt as to the trust property situate in America, but had made up his mind not to intermeddle in the English estate. See In re Birchall, Birchall v. Ashton, 37 W. R. 387, 40 Ch. D. 436.

Farwell, Q.C., in reply, referred to Upperton v. Nickolson, 19 W. R. 733, L. R. 6 Ch. App. 436; In re Hargreaves and Thompson's Contract, 34 W. R. 708, 32 Ch. D. 454.

LINDLEY, L.J.—The point raised by this appeal is a short one, but it is important. [His lordship stated the facts, and referred to the deed of disclaimer of the 18th of February, 1890, and continued:—] The purchaser's position is this. He says: "Here is a devise of real estate to five persons. The property has been put up for sale by three of them. I require that all the five shall either concur, or that you three who are acting in this country shall produce, instead of the concurrence of the other two, such deeds of disclaimer as show that you three alone can deal with the property properly according to the trusts of the will." As to one of the absentees the purchaser is satisfied; but as to the other, Mr. Lord, the son, he is not satisfied, because he says this disclaimer of the 18th of February, 1890, is inoperative, and he puts the case in this way. First of all he says: "Upon the true construction of this document it cannot be regarded as a disclaimer of the office of trustee and executor generally, but must be read as a disclaimer of that office limited to such property as is without the bounds of the United States." Now, if this document could be fairly read as an absolute disclaimer of the office of trustee and executor, I think that the purchaser's objection would be untenable; and, as I understand the learned judge in the court below, he read this document as a general disclaimer of the office of trustee. But I think that that is not in accordance with the true construction of the language. It is obvious to me that when this gentleman says that he has refused to act as a trustee or executor of the will so far as the same relates to property real and personal without the bounds of the United States, and then goes on to disclaim and renounce the said office of trustee and executor and all interest in and power over the real and personal estate without the bounds of the United States, it is impossible to take the words "disclaim and renounce the office of trustee and executor" without the limiting words which confine it to the real and personal estate without the bounds of America. Therefore I do not think that the view of the construction taken by the learned judge is in accordance with the language.

Treating this therefore as a partial disclaimer—as a disclaimer of the office of trustee and executor so far as the property in this country is concerned—the point is reduced to this: Will that enable the three trustees who are the vendors to make a good title? Now, although the point so far as I know is new in species, I think the purchaser is right; that is to say, that, according to our law it is not competent for a trustee to execute or to rely on a partial disclaimer of the office, either of executor or of trustee. Let us consider what his condition is in this case. It is remarkable, because he is executor as well as trustee. What would be his position under the document if he remitted personal estate from America to this country? Would not he be responsible for it? Would this disclaimer by him affect him in any way? I should say obviously not. He would be clearly responsible for it as regards the duties of the office, if he accepts the office at all; in other words, from a purchaser's point of view, if he is not proved to have disclaimed he must be deemed to have accepted the office of the trust, and then the ordinary principle applies that it is not competent for a man to do that partially; he must either do it altogether or not at all. The cases which have been referred to by counsel for the appellant bear that out, so far as property within the jurisdiction is concerned.

But it is said that if a trustee disclaims his trusteeship of all the property in this country, that disclaimer will be operative, although he may still retain the administration of other property out of the country, and be responsible here for the rents of that property if he comes here. I do not think that can be so when the trusts of the real estate are so mixed up with the trusts of the personal estate as they are in this particular case. I do not see how it is possible to give effect to that argument, seeing that it would be absolutely clear according to our law that this disclaimer would not shield this gentleman from a suit here to make him liable as executor.

But, even if there were no mixing up of the personal estate and the real estate, I do not think that counsel for the respondent have given any sufficient answer to this objection. I do not think that anybody could say that a trustee, even of land, in this country could get rid of his duty as regards other lands vested in him as a trustee if he remained a trustee at all. A testator intends when he makes such a will as this that his cestuis que trust shall have the joint judgment of all the trustees upon all the property subject to the trusts of the will, whether it is in this country or abroad; and I think that it is not competent for a trustee to say, "I will attend to some of the trusts, and I will not attend to others." It is competent for him to say that he will have nothing to do with the trusts at all; otherwise, a testator would be able to saddle people with duties of an onerous description without their having any opportunity of getting rid of them.

But unless he protects himself to that extent I do not think it is competent for an executor or trustee to say, "I will accept the office as to some part of the estate, and not accept it as to the rest." I think that that principle applies here. It is said that that is rather hard and inconvenient, and leads to complication; and so it does, but the answer to that is that a testator who has property in the colonies or abroad and property here will, if he is a wise man, have two sets of trustees, and devise his colonial property to persons in the colony, and devise his English property to persons in this country. But if he says, as the testator in this case has said, "I intend to have five trustees, and I intend that they shall protect my cestuis que trust," I do not think it is competent for one of those trustees to say, "I will accept the office as to foreign or as to colonial property, and I will have nothing to do with it as regards English property." It appears to me, therefore, that the appeal must be allowed, that the purchaser's objection is a good one, and that the proper order to make is an order in the form of the order in In re Hargreaves and Thompson's Contract, that is to say, that the purchaser is to receive back his deposit and the costs of investigating title, and so on. [His lordship then dealt with a point raised by the vendor's counsel that the purchaser's objection was out of time, but this part of the case does not call for a report, the point being completely covered by Upperton v. Nickolson, 19 W. R. 733, L. R. 6 Ch. App. 436.]

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. [His lordship stated the facts, and referred to the disclaimer of the 18th of February, 1890, and continued:—] The question arises whether this is such a disclaimer as would render it unnecessary that Mr. Samuel Lord should be made a party to the purchase. A great deal has been said about the construction of this disclaimer. I have not the slightest doubt upon the construction. Putting it as shortly as I can, the effect is this. Mr. Samuel Lord says: "With regard to the real and personal estate in England I disclaim, but I do nothing of the sort as regards the real and personal estate in America." That is the true reading of that document, and it shows that it was his intention, if he had not done so already, to intermeddle as trustee with the American affairs, but that it was not his intention to intermeddle with the matters which are in England.

The point remains: Can a trustee do that? The authorities that have been cited are all on one side. There are no authorities except those cited by the counsel for the appellant. A trustee cannot accept a portion of a trust, and disclaim the other portion. He must disclaim in toto, or he remains trustee as to all. The authorities are clear upon that. Putting this construction on the disclaimer of Mr. Lord, the younger, I think that he did not disclaim the whole of the trust which was committed to him in conjunction with the four other trustees. Therefore the purchaser is right in saying: "You have not shown me a good title, because you have not shown me that Mr. Samuel Lord, the younger, is out of the trust, and therefore he ought to be a party to the conveyance." It is said that this was a most important point to the public and to gentlemen living in Lancashire, many of whom have estates in Lancashire and also estates in America. I wish to point out that I do not think there is much in that observation, for the simple reason that a testator in the happy position of having real and personal estate both in Lancashire and America could, if he were so minded, obviate the difficulty which has arisen in this case by creating two sets of trustees, English trustees and American trustees. [His lordship then dealt with the objection as to time, and held that the appeal ought to be allowed.]

RIGBY, L.J.—I entirely agree with the reasons already given, and I will say nothing about those parts of the case which appear to be settled by authority, the authority being that you cannot disclaim in part. But it is said that there is a special circumstance here which comes within no decisions that have yet been arrived at by the court, and that is that there is a disclaimer of everything within the jurisdiction of this court—in fact of everything that is outside the bounds of the United States of America. It is said that that makes a broad distinction. I cannot see it. It is no doubt true that we have no jurisdiction over land in America, in the sense that we cannot make orders which of their own force will affect that land; but we have jurisdiction over the trustees in this country, and by service out of the jurisdiction we should be able to act upon a trustee out of the jurisdiction if the case were otherwise proper in respect of that land. Similarly the Court of Probate cannot of its own authority enable the executors who get probate here to get in the assets in America. Nevertheless the jurisdiction over the person of the executors remains, and the trustees and executors in this double capacity are responsible here equally in relation to the real estate and to the personal estate in America as in relation to real estate and personal estate within our own jurisdiction.

The argument of inconvenience really comes to nothing. I have known of many cases where that has been easily met; cases, for instance, where a testator is domiciled in France and has property in England. He may easily, if he chooses, have one will with regard to the French property, and one will with regard to the English property; or even, without having two wills, he might have one set of trustees as regards one property, and a separate set of trustees as regards the other. Then the difficulty which is supposed to exist is at once got over. I am not sure that in every case it would not be better to adopt that course—in some cases certainly it would be. I see no hardship, and I see no real difference between the ordinary cases of partial disclaimer and the case of trying to disclaim a part, and a part only, of the trust on the ground that the part disclaimed extends to everything within the jurisdiction of the court.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitors for the appellant, Ford & Ford, agents for Richard Higham, Manchester.

Solicitors for the respondents, Field, Roscoe, & Co., agents for Yates, Johnson, & Leach, Liverpool.

From Chan. Div. (Lindley, Lopes, and Rigby, L.JJ.) June 12, 1895.

SHELFER v. CITY OF LONDON ELECTRIC LIGHTING CO. MEUX'S BREWERY CO. v. THE SAME. (a.)

Practice—Injunction—Suspension of injunction by Court of Appeal — Further suspension — Court to which application should be made.

In an action commenced in the Chancery Division an injunction which was asked for was refused, and an inquiry as to damages was ordered. On appeal the Court of Appeal varied such order and granted an injunction, but suspended its operation for six months.

An application to further suspend the operation of the injunction was made to the court of first instance:

Held, that such application had been properly made to the court of first instance.

The trial of these actions was heard by Kekewich, J., in April, 1894 (42 W. R. 644), when he refused an injunction, but granted an inquiry as to damages. The Court of Appeal in December, 1894, granted an injunction (see 43 W. R. 238), but suspended its operation for six months so as to allow the defendants time to consider the advisability of an appeal to the House of Lords.

The appeal to the House of Lords having been abandoned, the defendants applied to Kekewich, J., for a suspension of the operation of the injunction for a further period, so as to enable them in the meantime to replace the engines which created the nuisance by others which, it was alleged, would cause no vibration. Kekewich, J., refused the application, on the ground that, as the Court of Appeal had granted the injunction, that court was the proper tribunal to grant a further stay.

The defendants appealed.

Moulton, Q.C., Renshaw, Q.C., and W. C. Braithwaite, for the appellants.

Warmington, Q.C., and Waggett, for the plaintiffs in the first action; Warmington, Q.C., and Badcock, for the plaintiffs in the second action.

THE COURT (LINDLEY, LOPES, and RIGBY, L.JJ.) granted a further stay, and expressed the opinion that the application for an extension of time had been properly made to the judge of first instance, and might have been disposed of by him.

Solicitors for the appellants, Ashurst, Morris, Crisp, & Co.

Solicitors for the first respondents, Parry & Gibson.

Solicitors for the second respondents, Hunters & Haynes.

High Court of Justice.

Chan. Div. Chitty, J. Nov. 20, 21.

MURGATROYD v. OLD SILKSTONE, &c., COAL AND IRON CO.

Ex parte CHARLESWORTH. (b.)

Landlord and tenant—Agreement for lease of colliery—Action for specific performance—Tenant in possession—Order to give up possession—Entry under order—Right to distrain.

In an action by C. for specific performance of an agreement for a lease of a colliery the defendant company, who were in possession and actually working the colliery, were ordered to pay certain arrears of rent, and in default to give up possession to C. Default being afterwards made, the defendant company accordingly gave up possession to C. The question was raised whether C. was entitled to distrain on goods upon the colliery which were admitted to be the property of the debenture-holders of the defendant company, and in the possession of the debenture-holders' receiver.

Held, that C., by taking the above-mentioned order and insisting on his right of taking possession under it, had elected to treat the defendant company as purchasers, and had obtained an equitable remedy inconsistent with the continuance of the relation of landlord and tenant; that C. was now in possession as vendor, and not as landlord; and consequently that the principle of Walsh v. Lonsdale, 31 W. R. 109, 21 Ch. D. 9, did not apply to the case, and C. was not entitled to distrain on the goods.

Summons.

This was an application by the Messrs. Charlesworth, as intending landlords, and the defendant company, as intending tenants, under an agreement of the 5th of April, 1892, for a lease of a colliery.

At the time of this agreement the defendant company were in possession and working the colliery as sub-lessees under the original lessees from the applicants.

The substance of the agreement was that the defendant company were to have a lease for fifteen years from the 3rd of May, 1892, at certain annual rents, with a minimum rent of £1,200, and the original lessees were to be released from their obligations under their leases.

The original lessees were released on the 28th of May, 1892.

In March, 1893, the defendant company ceased working, and in June, 1893, went into liquidation. In the same month a receiver was appointed in the above action, which was a debenture-holder's action, and took possession of the mines and the defendant company's effects on behalf of the debenture-holders; working was resumed by him in November, 1893.

The applicants having brought an action for specific performance of the above agreement, an order was made in January, 1894, for the company to pay certain sums for arrears of rent, and, in default of such payment, for delivery of possession to the applicants (see 38 SOLICITORS' JOURNAL, 216). A portion of the arrears was paid, but, default having been made as to the remainder, the receiver, in October, 1894, duly gave up possession of the mines to the applicants in compliance with the order aforesaid.

A summons was afterwards taken out by the applicants for payment of the arrears or leave to distrain. The summons stood over from time to time, and proceedings in the specific performance action were also suspended, negotiations for transfer of the agreement of lease being stated to be pending. The summons now coming on for hearing, the application for payment of arrears of rent was treated as abandoned, and the question for the decision of the court was whether, under these circumstances, the applicants were entitled to distrain on the premises in respect of these arrears.

Farwell, Q.C., and MacSwinney, for the applicants. —The fact of our being in possession is immaterial.

(a.) Reported by W. SHALLCROSS GODDARD, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

(b.) Reported by J. F. WALEY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

We are not in as on a re-entry under a lease, but under the order of the court, and we hold by way of security only under our equity as unpaid vendors. The relation of landlord and tenant between us and the company or its nominees is still subsisting. We have therefore the right to distrain as landlords. Walsh v. Lonsdale, 31 W. R. 109, 21 Ch. D. 9, shows that since the Judicature Act our right is the same as if a lease had been actually granted. What the right of distress depends on is privity of estate and continuance of the term, and it does not matter who is in possession.

They also referred to Bullen on Distress, ed. 1842, pp. 1, 33, 79; Woodfall's Landlord and Tenant, 13th ed., p. 420, and the cases of Lowther v. Heaver, 37 W. R. 465, 41 Ch. D. 248, p. 254, and Allhusen v. Brooking, 32 W. R. 657, 26 Ch. D. 559, p. 565.

Levett, Q.C., and O. Leigh Clare, for the debenture-holders.—There is no tenant in possession here, nor anyone claiming possession under the agreement. The applicants could have come forward as vendors or landlords originally, but having elected to act as vendors, and to insist on their rights as vendors, they will not now be allowed to exercise a right as landlords to distrain. After invoking their equity to turn us out, they now want to treat us in equity as tenants in possession. Walsh v. Lonsdale only applies where there is a tenant holding under an agreement for a lease, and here there is none.

Farwell, in reply.—The term remains. The order only interferes with the possession. [CHITTY, J., referred to Dart on Vendors and Purchasers, 6th ed., pp. 1217-19.]

CHITTY, J., after stating the above facts, and pointing out that the agreement was capable of specific performance, continued as follows:—The question, which I am now asked to decide is whether, under these circumstances, the applicants have a right to distrain. The argument for them is founded on the decision of the Court of Appeal in Walsh v. Lonsdale, Jessel, M.R., during the argument there stated that "a tenant holding under an agreement for a lease of which specific performance would be decreed stands in the same position as to liability as if the lease had been executed. He is not, since the Judicature Act, a tenant from year to year; he holds under the agreement, and every branch of the court must now give him the same rights" (21 Ch. D. at p. 14), and those propositions were expanded by him in his judgment. Mr. McSwinney said that there was a right to distrain apart from Walsh v. Lonsdale, on the ground of there being a tenancy from year to year at law, but that is inconsistent with the main argument for the applicants, and I need notice it no further than to say that, in my opinion, it cannot be supported consistently with Walsh v. Lonsdale. [His lordship then read the judgment of Jessel, M.R., down to the words "signed or sealed" (21 Ch. D. pp. 14, 15)]. The Master of the Rolls was expressly dealing with a case where possession was held under the agreement. In the circumstances there he treated the person in possession under an agreement capable of specific performance as lessee in equity for the term specified in and on the conditions of the agreement. Cotton, L.J., in Lowther v. Heaver, approved of the judgment of the Master of the Rolls in Walsh v. Lonsdale, and I am bound by that case.

The main argument for the applicants is that the relation of landlord and tenant subsists between the applicants and the company, and that the company are still to be treated as lessees in possession or entitled to possession by virtue of the agreement, and it is said that it is immaterial who is in actual possession, that under the old law the landlord can take the goods of strangers, and that therefore the applicants are entitled to distrain on goods which are admitted (and in my opinion rightly admitted) for the purpose of this application to be the property of the debenture-holders, and in the virtual possession of their receiver.

If a common law lawyer before—or, I think, since—the Judicature Act had been asked if a landlord in possession of demised premises could distrain on the goods of strangers there, he would not have known what to say. No authority has been discovered, in spite of full research by the applicants' counsel. The common law lawyer would have been at least as puzzled as was the Bruges professor who issued a challenge to dispute with any person in omni scibili et de quolibet ente, when Sir Thomas More, then a student on his travels, sent up this question referring to the law of distress, Utrum averia carucæ capta in vetito namio sint irreplegibilia, whether beasts of the plough taken in withernam (by way of reprisal) are incapable of being replevied: see 1 Steph. Comm., 1st ed., p. 523. It was needless to say that no answer was given to that question. So, too, if the question above referred to had been asked of a common law lawyer, he would have been at a loss to understand how the landlord could be in possession of demised premises with the tenancy still subsisting.

I think there is a necessary inconsistency in the question itself, by the fact of his possession being destructive of the relationship of landlord and tenant.

The real question is to be determined by thoroughly understanding the effect of the court's order in the specific performance action. By taking the order and asking and obtaining under it possession the applicants have asserted an equitable right founded on the relation of vendor and purchaser, the agreement for the lease being regarded in specific performance as an agreement for sale and purchase.

They have got a remedy inconsistent with the relation of landlord and tenant. Lawful entry by the landlord puts an end to the term. The order is not final, but is made by way of equitable relief to secure to the vendor the benefit of his contract, to enable him to get his money and prevent the purchaser from remaining in possession and wasting the inheritance in a case like this without paying the purchase-money. The effect of the order is to suspend the relations of landlord and tenant, and the vendor landlords are now in possession as vendors and not as landlords, and the representatives of the company or of those claiming under them have been turned out not as tenants but as purchasers. It may be that hereafter the vendors will have to restore possession to the purchasers, or the vendors may (as seems more likely at present) elect to rescind the contract. Having insisted on this right to which they were entitled as vendors, and that deliberately, by taking an order on motion, as described, they have elected for the present to treat the company as purchasers, and it would be inconsistent with their possession and the benefit which they have obtained from the order to allow them to apply Walsh v. Lonsdale to a case not within the purview of the Court of Appeal there.

For these reasons I think the application cannot be sustained.

Application dismissed.

Solicitors, Prior, Church, & Adams, for Bury & Walker, Barnsley; Grundy, Kershaw, & Co.

Chan. Div. North, J. Dec. 13.

HUDSON v. CRIPPS. (a.)

Landlord and tenant—Residential flats—Common scheme—Implied contract—Injunction.

A general scheme for the management of a set of residential flats conducive to the benefit and convenience of the tenants, and contained in the tenancy agreements, implies a contract on the part of the lessor not to alter the private residential character of the building, and a breach of such implied contract may be restrained by injunction.

Spicer v. Martin, 37 W. R. 689, 14 App. Cas. 12, applied.

Motion.

The plaintiff was lessee of a flat in a set of mansions.

The whole of the building, with the exception of a few business offices on the ground floor, had been originally let out in residential flats.

The defendant was the landlord of the mansions, and from time to time had entered into agreements with the various tenants. These agreements were in a printed form, and had been used for all the tenants alike. They contained a clause providing that the tenant should not use his flat for business or trade purposes or otherwise than as a dwelling-house or so as to cause a nuisance to the landlord or his tenants. Annexed to the agreements were certain regulations and conditions relative to the general management of the mansions, the user of the lift, the provision of latchkeys, &c., and the agreements provided that the tenant should observe and perform these conditions and rules. The agreements also contained a covenant on the part of the landlord for quiet enjoyment.

The mansions were built in the shape of a quadrangle, with only one entrance, but by means of a verandah staircase access to the top stories could be gained without the necessity of entering the intermediate floors. The defendant had begun recently to roof over the quadrangle up to the first floor and alter the unoccupied lower part of the building with the object of constructing smoking, billiard, and other rooms for the use of a club, and the evidence showed that he intended further alterations on the second and third floors for the purpose of providing the club with one hundred bedrooms. The plaintiff's flat was on the fourth floor, and her tenancy had several years to run. It was not proved that the entrance to her flat would be materially affected by the contemplated alterations. The plaintiff moved for an injunction against the continuance of the noise and vibration caused by the execution of the structural alterations and also to restrain the defendant from altering the character of the building.

Swinfen Eady, Q.C., and Job Bradford, for the plaintiff.—We say that the defendant's acts are a breach of his covenant for quiet enjoyment. We also contend that the terms of the tenants' agreements constitute a general scheme for the management of the mansions, and such scheme implies a contract on the part of both the landlord and tenants not to alter the character of the building.

They referred to Spicer v. Martin, 37 W. R. 689, 14 App. Cas. 12; Davis v. Corporation of Leicester, 42 W. R. 362 and 610, [1894] 2 Ch. 208; and Ryan v. Mutual Tontine Westminster Chambers Association, 41 W. R. 146, [1893] 1 Ch. 116.

Buckmaster, for the defendant.—Unless the defendant is committing a common law nuisance, or doing some act which affects the stability of the building, no action will lie on the covenant: Jenkins v. Jackson, 37 W. R. 253, 40 Ch. D. 71; Grosvenor Hotel Co. v. Hamilton, 42 W. R. 626, [1894] 2 Q. B. 836; and Tucker v. Vowles, 41 W. R. 156, [1893] 1 Ch. 195. The cases of Spicer v. Martin and Davis v. Corporation of Leicester do not apply, because in those cases there was an estate plan and a building scheme, and the property was subject to the covenants of the vendor.

Swinfen Eady, Q.C., replied.

NORTH, J.—In this case I will grant an injunction in the form hereafter expressed. The covenant for quiet enjoyment is not a covenant against noise, but a covenant for title. I think, however, that the plaintiff is entitled to relief, on the ground of an implied covenant on the part of the defendant not to alter the character of the building. I think the agreement is an agreement which shows on its face that it was made in respect of a certain part of a large set of flats which were all subject to similar agreements. [His lordship here read the form of agreement, and continued:—] This agreement contains a general scheme for the management of the buildings for the benefit and convenience of all persons who are tenants, and whether these flats were built originally with such a scheme as this seems to me to be immaterial. I think this is a case to which the principle in Spicer v. Martin applies. Now, what has the defendant done in this case that is inconsistent with such a scheme? He is converting the ground floor and roofing over the quadrangle, and it is evident that he intends to devote the upper floors to club purposes. What he proposes to do is, in reality, to convert the building into a large club to be occupied by members by day and night, and the plaintiff's flat, instead of being a private residence, is to be in the middle of what is to be a fashionable club. I will therefore grant an injunction restraining the defendant from using the premises, or permitting them to be used, as a club, or otherwise than as residential flats, or from making, or permitting to be made, any alteration of the same with a view to using the same for any of the purposes herein restrained; such injunction, however, is not to prevent the use of the offices on the ground floor as heretofore, nor to continue after the plaintiff's tenancy has determined.

Solicitors for the plaintiff, Walter Webb & Co.

Solicitor for the defendant, A. Toovey.

(a.) Reported by R. SILLEM, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Chan. Div. North, J. Nov. 5.

In re PITCAIRN.
BRANDRETH v. COLVIN. (a.)

Will—Conversion—Reversionary interest—Discretion of trustees—Intention—Rule in Howe v. Lord Dartmouth.

Where a testator by his will has given his trustees power, if and when they consider it expedient, to sell all or any part of his estate, he has shown an intention that a conversion of his estate (which included a reversionary interest) shall take place at some time which need not be that at which the rule of the court, as laid down in Howe v. Lord Dartmouth, 7 Ves. 137, would make conversion necessary, and the rule of the court has accordingly no application.

(a.) Reported by R. SILLEM, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

In re Sewell, 19 W. R. 220, L. R. 11 Eq. 80, followed.

Originating summons taken out by the executor of the will of Mrs. Pitcairn, to which the executors and trustees of the will of C. C. Pitcairn (her son), were defendants, to have it determined whether the plaintiff was entitled to a payment out of the estate of C. C. Pitcairn in respect of income which Mrs. Pitcairn would have received had certain reversionary interests been sold immediately after the death of C. C. Pitcairn, and whether the amount of such payment was to be ascertained according to the rule laid down in Chesterfields Trusts, 32 W. R. 361, 24 Ch. D. 643.

C. C. Pitcairn by his will, dated the 3rd of November, 1876 (which is more fully set out in the judgment), gave the whole of his property to trustees upon trust to pay his debts, funeral expenses, and the expenses of the trust, and then to pay over to or allow his mother, Mrs. Walker Pitcairn, to receive the income during her life, and after her death to pay certain legacies, and to pay over the residue to charity.

The testator died on the 3rd of February, 1880. His estate consisted of a reversionary interest, expectant on his mother's death, in settled funds to the amount of about £30,000, of which his mother was tenant for life, and of a sum of about £13,000.

The mother died on the 17th of October, 1894.

Everitt, Q.C., and Howard Wright, for plaintiff.

Haldane, Q.C., and R. Campbell, for defendant.

Besides the cases noticed in the judgment the following were cited for the plaintiff: Johnson v. Routh, 6 W. R. 6, 27 L. J. Ch. 305; Harrington v. Atherton, 13 W. R. 62, 2 De G. J. & Sm. 352; and for the defendant: Wright v. Lambert, 26 W. R. 206, 6 Ch. D. 649; Daniel v. Warren, 2 Y. & C. Ch. 290; Skirving v. Williams, 24 Beav. 275, 6 W. R. Ch. Dig. 114; Collins v. Collins, 2 Myl. & K. 703; Pickering v. Pickering, 4 Myl. & Cr. 289.

NORTH, J.—The point in this case is a short one and interesting, and not free from difficulty. [His lordship stated the facts, and continued:—] The mother has recently died, and her representatives maintain, now that the reversion has fallen in, that they are entitled to so much of the proceeds of keeping the reversion, that is to say, so much of the proceeds of the settled fund as represents the income that would have been received if the reversion had been realized under the son's will, the proceeds of realization invested, and the income paid to the mother for life.

The question is whether her estate is entitled to have out of the settled fund something to represent the income of the reversion during the fourteen years which she survived her son.

The rule of the court is, I think, very clearly settled, and it will be sufficient if I refer, at first, at any rate, to the well-known case of Howe v. Dartmouth, where Lord Eldon says (7 Ves., at p. 148), speaking of the will: "It is given as all his personal estate; and the mode in which he says it is to be enjoyed is to one for life, and to the other afterwards. Then the court says it is to be construed as to the perishable part so that one shall take for life, and the others afterwards; and, unless the testator directs the mode so that it is to continue as it was, the court understands that it shall be put in such a state that the others may enjoy it after the decease of the first; and the thing is quite equal, for it might consist of a vast number of particulars—for instance, a personal annuity, not to commence in enjoyment till the expiration of twenty years from the death of the testator, payable upon a contingency perhaps." He might have taken the case of a policy on a life in being, or a reversion pure and simple, as it was here. The judgment proceeds: "If in this case it is equitable that long or short annuities should be sold, to give every one an equal chance, the court acts equally in the other case; for those future interests are for the sake of the tenant for life to be converted into a present interest, being sold immediately in order to yield an immediate interest to the tenant for life. As in the one case that in which the tenant for life has too great an interest is melted for the benefit of the rest, in the other that of which, if it remained in specie, he might never receive anything is brought in, and he has immediately the interest of its present worth." That deals shortly with a case in which there is a wasting security in which the tenant for life enjoying it in specie would receive more than his share, or a reversionary interest when the tenant for life would receive less than his share, if he received any income from it, while the reversion was still a reversion.

Then in the case of Morgan v. Morgan, 14 Beav. 72, Sir J. Romilly, M.R., says on page 81: "Now the rule of law as applicable to these cases is not, I think, open to doubt, although the application of the rule to particular cases may be, and frequently is, a matter of very considerable difficulty." Then he refers to the rule laid down in Howe v. Dartmouth. He then proceeds: "This rule has been since affirmed as often as it has been referred to, and is unquestionably the law. But the testator may take the case of any particular bequest out of the rule, and the effect of the latter cases has been to allow small indications of intention to prevent the application of the rule. The question here, as in similar cases, is one of construction, whether the testator has in this will expressed his intention that this rule shall not apply to this particular case. It is urged by the petitioners that the burden of proof does not lie upon them more than on the respondents, and that being a question of construction it is for the court to look into the will and discover the testator's real meaning. In one sense, this is certainly true; but still, in my opinion, the rule of law is that, unless there can be gathered from the will some expression of intention that the property is to be enjoyed in specie, the rule in Howe v. The Earl of Dartmouth is to prevail. It is therefore incumbent upon the persons contesting the application of that rule, and on the court which forbids the application, to point out the words in the will which exclude it, and if this cannot be done the rule must apply. The reported decisions on the subject are useful, as they form a guide to enable the court to ascertain what directions contained in a will are properly considered to be an expression by the testator of his intention that this rule is not to apply. In no case that I have been able to find has the mere absence of any direction to convert his property been construed to mean that it should be enjoyed in specie by the legatees in succession; and the contrary must have been decided, though not expressly so stated, in Johnson v. Johnson, 2 Coll. 441. There are several cases in which the court held that the rule was excluded where the testator has fixed the period of conversion; as, for instance, where he has given the property to one for life, and, after the death of that person, has directed the property to be sold and divided." And then, after referring to one or two cases, Sir J. Romilly, M.R., says (14 Beav., at p. 84): "I think, therefore, that the absence of this direction"—that is, a direction to convert—"cannot be treated as an expression of intention on the part of the testator that his property was not ever to be converted; it would, I think, be unreasonable if it were so held. By law the property must be converted; a testator may not unreasonably be supposed to be cognizant of that law, and to have given no direction on the subject, because he may have supposed that it would be mere surplusage so to do."

Then there are two cases laying down the general rule. One of them is Hinves v. Hinves, 3 Hare 609. The judgment of Wigram, V.C., in that case refers to the rule of the court in the absence of any expression of intention; and then comes this passage (3 Ha., at p. 611), which seems to me very much in point: "But if the will expresses an intention that the property as it existed at the death of the testator shall be enjoyed in specie, although the property be not in a technical sense specifically bequeathed, to such a case the rule does not apply. The rule is settled with sufficient clearness; the difficulty arises only in its application to particular cases, where the intention of the testator is expressed with more or less distinctness."

Then in Pickup v. Atkinson, 4 Hare 624, the same learned judge puts it very shortly. He says on p. 628: "Cases calling for a decision on this question have arisen in each branch of the court within the last few years, and in each branch of the court the rule seems to have been stated in the same way. If the will manifests an intention that the general residue of the estate shall be enjoyed by different persons in succession, and there is nothing to qualify that simple intention, the court, in order to effectuate it, converts so much of the testator's estate as is of a perishable nature (under which head leasehold property falls) into investments of a permanent kind"; and, of course, although he does not state the alternative, it converts reversionary property on similar principles. Then he says: "But if the intention of the testator appears to be that the first taker shall enjoy the property in that state in which it exists at his death, the court is bound to give effect to that intention."

I take it, therefore, that it is clear from those and numerous other cases that the question is what the testator intends, and his intention must be gathered from his will. He has a right to say what is to be done, and his intention as expressed or to be deduced from the terms of his will must be followed.

Now, looking at the present will, the testator first of all devises to certain trustees whom he names "all and sundry my whole means and estate, heritable and movable, real and personal, wherever situated or addebted, presently belonging or which shall belong or be addebted to me at the time of my death. Together with the whole titles, writs, evidents, vouchers, and instructions of my estate and effects hereby generally conveyed. And I nominate and appoint my trustees to be my sole executors, but declaring always that these presents are granted by me in trust only, and for the uses and purposes aftermentioned." Then the testator proceeds to declare the trusts. It is apparent that this will was prepared by some one who was more familiar with Scotch forms than English, but there is no difficulty in following it. Then the testator directs, first, that "my trustees shall, from the produce of my means and estate, pay all my just and lawful debts and funeral expenses and the expenses of executing the trust." His "means and estate" there, of course, denote everything of which he died possessed—everything that came to the trustees under the will. Then it was argued that that direction was to be carried out at once. Of course, the debts and funeral expenses must be paid at once, and certain expenses of executing the trusts; although, of course, those expenses could not all be disposed of in the first instance. They would continue until the estate was wound up and distributed among the persons ultimately entitled. Then the next direction is this: "Second, that my trustees shall pay over to Mrs. Walker Pitcairn, my mother, in the event of her surviving me, during all the days of her life after my decease the whole interests, dividends, and other annual produce and profits of the trust estate under their management for her alimentary use; and that, half-yearly or as the same shall accrue and be received by them or otherwise, my trustees shall permit, or suffer or legally authorize and empower, my said mother to uplift and receive the said interests, dividends, and other annual produce and profits of the said trust estate during all the days of her life after my decease, in the event of her surviving me." [His lordship, after referring to various other directions in the will, which are not material, proceeded:—] The testator continues: "I hereby confer on my trustees the following powers and privileges, viz., . . . to enter into the possession and management of my said estate and effects." He is dealing with a trust to be exercised and executed by the trustees during the continuance of the trust, and here he uses this phrase, "of my said estate and effects," which is the same phrase used in the beginning of the will with reference to what his debts and funeral expenses were to be paid out of. There he calls it "my means and estate," here he calls it "my estate and effects." Then he gives power to the trustees "to enter into the possession and management of my said estate and effects, and to call, sue for, uplift, receive, and discharge the rents, maills and duties, interest, dividends, and annual profits arising from the same," and to make titles, and so on, and to employ factors, agents, or cashiers "for managing my said means and estate." That is referring to what is to take place during the continuance of the trust. Therefore they are to manage here what was clearly an unconverted estate. Then, further on, there is this power: "with full power to sell and dispose of all or any part of my said estate and effects hereby conveyed, and that either by public roup or private bargain, and at such price or prices as they may think proper." Then there is a direction as to the securities in which funds may be invested.

That clause which I read last seems to me to be the clue to the meaning of the will; and I think that this power given by the testator to his trustees to sell and dispose if and when they think it expedient means that they are to have the power of selling and disposing of it if they think it expedient, or when they think it expedient. If they have the power to do it if they think fit and when they think fit, there is necessarily the power not to do it unless they think fit; and that, in my opinion, is only an express power given to the trustees to convert the estate or not, as they think fit.

It seems to me, upon the authorities, that there are several cases which show that where a testator has intended that a conversion is to take place at some time other than that at which the rule of the court would make conversion necessary, he has dealt with the question of conversion, and the rule of the court has no application. I read the passage just now in Morgan v. Morgan in which that was pointed out. Now, in the present case the testator has not fixed the period in the sense of that passage, but he has given the option to some other person of saying when the conversion is to take place, which seems to me to be equally effective in negativing what is called the rule of the court, requiring conversion to take place immediately or as soon as possible after the death of the testator. No doubt, in the illustration given in that case, a time is fixed at the death of a particular person, but there are two or three cases in which the same rule has been applied where a particular time is not fixed. One of those was Alcock v. Sloper, 2 Myl. & K. 699, where the testator gave the residue of his estate to executors upon trust for his wife "to receive the rents, profits dividends, and annual proceeds thereof," and after her death "then upon trust to sell my freehold house in Oxford-street, and also my leasehold house, by auction, and it is my desire that Mr. Edward Abbott be employed as auctioneer to convert the whole of my estate and effects into money, and to distribute the same in equal shares and proportions." Then, in the judgment, Sir John Leach, M.R., says (2 Myl. & K., at p. 702), after referring to Howe v. The Earl of Dartmouth: "It is with a view to this principle that the present will is to be examined. The testator gives the residuary estate to trustees 'upon trust to permit his wife to receive the rents, profits, dividends, and annual proceeds thereof, to and for her own sole use and benefit, during her life.' There is here no intimation of an intention that any part of the property should be immediately converted by the trustees; but the inference rather is that the trustees during the life of the wife were to be merely passive; and the term 'dividends' has reference to the long annuities. After the death of his wife he directs his trustees to sell his freehold house in Oxford-street, and also his leasehold houses, by auction. The leasehold houses, like the long annuities, were a wasting property; and he has plainly expressed his intention that they should not be sold during the life of his wife; and that is manifestly inconsistent with the general notion on his part that the wasting portion of his residuary estate was immediately to be converted into permanent property." Then he quotes a passage relating to the employment of Mr. Abbott, and says: "The testator could not have meant that Mr. Abbott should convert the whole of his property after the death of his wife, if he had intended that any part of it should be converted during the life of his wife. The widow is therefore entitled to enjoy for her life the income of the long annuities."

Then, in Burton v. Mount, 2 De G. & Sm. 383, there was a general gift of the testator's real and personal estate to trustees upon trust to pay the income to his son for life and after his death for his children, and the testator empowered his trustees, notwithstanding the devise and bequest of his freehold and leasehold estates respectively, at any time or times, or from time to time, at their discretion to make sale and dispose of the freehold and leasehold estates, or any of them, or any part or parts thereof (other than and except the dwelling-house in Newington-place during his wife's estate and interest therein) by public auction or private contract, and so on. There Knight Bruce, V.C., came to the conclusion that, as there was this discretion given to the trustees as to the time at which they were to sell, it was inconsistent with any intention of the testator that the property should be sold immediately under the rule of the court, and he decided the point both as to the leaseholds and the long annuities in favour of the tenant for life.

The case of In re Sewell seems to me to be exactly in point as to this: that when the time of sale is fixed either by reference to a given number of years after the testator's death, or by reason of the falling in of a life, or anything of that kind, or when it is left to the discretion of somebody else to say when the sale is to take place, the testator has by his will provided for that sale, and therefore there is no rule of the court requiring the sale in a different way, or under different circumstances than those indicated by the testator's will.

I find here a direction that the trustees are to have full power if and when they consider it expedient to sell or dispose of all or any part of the estate and effects; and it seems to me that that gives them a discretion, in the exercise of that power, to regulate the time of sale, which is inconsistent with and negatives any intention that the court should realize the reversion in the way in which it would do if there had been no such direction.

In my opinion, therefore, the trustees did in fact allow the reversion to remain unsold, and the tenant for life is not entitled to any part of the proceeds of sale.

Solicitors, Freshfields & Williams; Nicholl, Manisty, & Co.

Chan. Div. } Dec. 5, 6, 7, 8, 11, 12, 1894;
North, J. } Aug. 9, 1895.

CRICHTON v. CRICHTON (a.)

Satisfaction—Advancement—Breach of trust.

A father obtained the control of a trust fund in which his sons had an interest in remainder, and made considerable advances to his sons.

Held, that such advances were no satisfaction of the father's liability to account for the trust funds.

Where the proceeds of securities, part of the trust fund, were traced to the hand of one of the sons, it was held that he could not claim that sum over again, but must be treated as having received that amount.

There is no resulting trust in favour of a father, of land purchased by him in his son's name to qualify the son to act as a justice of the peace, because beneficial occupation is necessary for such qualification.

Action.

By a settlement dated the 8th of February, 1832, on the marriage of W. J. Crichton and Ann Clutterbuck, £10,857 13s. 7d. 3 per cent. Reduced Annuities and £9,746 13s. 4d. Consols were vested in trustees upon trust to pay the income to the wife for life for her separate use without power of anticipation, with remainder to her husband, and after the death of the survivor, as the husband and wife by deed, or the survivor by deed or will should appoint, and in default of appointment for the children of the marriage in equal shares.

There were two children of the marriage, Arthur William Crichton, born 1833, and Henry Benyon Crichton, born in 1835.

Two of the four trustees of the settlement died soon after 1852, and the third in 1863. John Clutterbuck, the surviving trustee, died in 1863, having appointed his widow and the said W. J. Crichton his executors. The widow consented to the realization of the whole of the trust funds and the receipt of the proceeds by W. J. Crichton.

On the 25th of August, 1863, one of the sons, Henry Crichton, was married to a Miss Llewellyn, and W. J. Crichton transferred to the trustees of the settlement £4,100 India 10½ per cent. Stock, which he had purchased with his own money.

On the 19th of February, 1864, the Consols subject to the settlement of 1832 were sold for

(a.) Reported by G. B. HAMILTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

£8,869 9s. 6d., which was invested in the purchase, in the names of W. J. Crichton and his wife, of £2,500 India 5 per cent. Stock and £5,000 Russian 5 per cent. Stock, costing £8,871 5s.; W. J. Crichton providing the difference. On the 29th of July, 1865, the Reduced Annuities were sold, and realized £9,744 12s. 1d., which was invested in £3,000 Brazilian 4½ per cent. Bonds, costing £2,403 15s., in the names of W. J. Crichton and his wife; £4,000 India 5½ per cent. Stock, costing £4,459 1s. 11d., and £4,000 London and St. Katharine's Dock Stock, costing £2,885, in the names of W. J. Crichton and Arthur Crichton. On the 4th of August, 1864, W. J. Crichton transferred £5,000 Russian 5 per cent. Bonds, purchased with his own moneys, into the joint names of himself and Arthur Crichton. The dividends were received by Arthur Crichton, as also of the £4,000 India Stock, as part of an allowance of £300 a year made to each son. In 1879 the £4,000 India Stock was sold, and the proceeds received by W. J. Crichton.

In May, 1867, on the marriage of the other son, Arthur Crichton, £5,500 India 3 per cent., £7,500 London and St. Katharine's Dock Stock, £2,500 4½ per cent. Preference Stock of the same company, and £3,600 in shares of the Grand Junction Canal Co., worth in all £15,490, were transferred to the trustees of Arthur Crichton's settlement.

W. J. Crichton originally intended to settle £10,000 only on Arthur, but after correspondence had passed agreed to increase the amount. There was no evidence that Arthur Crichton knew the source from which the price of the stocks was derived.

W. J. Crichton transferred various sums to his son Henry jointly with himself, and some to Henry's wife jointly with Henry and himself; but the total amount was less than half the value of the Consols and Reduced Annuities included in the settlement of 1832.

In April, 1870, W. J. Crichton drew up a document headed "Instructions to my executors," giving particulars of his dealings with the funds.

Arthur Crichton died in 1882, and Mrs. Crichton, the tenant for life, in 1887. In 1886 W. J. Crichton conveyed to Henry an estate called Broadwood Hall, in Shropshire, to qualify him to act as a justice of the peace, in consideration of "natural love and affection." After Henry's death this was sold for £7,000.

In July, 1888, W. J. Crichton married again, and Henry Crichton died in 1889.

In July, 1891, the executors of Arthur and Henry Crichton brought an action against W. J. Crichton for administration of the trusts of the settlement of 1832 and for an account of the proceeds of the sale of Consols and Reduced Annuities. W. J. Crichton died on the 8th of December, 1891, and the action was continued against his executors.

Everitt, Q.C., and Stock, for the plaintiffs.—As W. J. Crichton received the trust funds, his estate is answerable for them. There is no satisfaction when the amount given is less than the debt. Moreover, Henry's settlement was made before there was any debt. The amount transferred to Arthur was given under circumstances sufficient to rebut the presumption of satisfaction. The doctrine of satisfaction by advancement only applies for the benefit of children: Lee v. Head,, 3 W. R. 591; Meinertzhagen v. Walters, 20 W. R. 918. The conveyance of Broadwood Hall cannot be treated as a trust for W. J. Crichton. 18 Geo. 2, c. 20, requires the ownership to be beneficial, and to presume a resulting trust would be a fraud on the policy of the law: Curtis v. Perry, 6 Ves. 739; Brackenbury v. Brackenbury, 2 Jac. & W. 391.

They also cited Plunkett v. Lewis, 3 Hare 316; Tolson v. Collins, 4 Ves. 483; Bellasis v. Uthwatt, 1 Atk. 426; Batstone v. Salter, 23 W. R. 816, L. R. 10 Ch. App. 431; Davys v. Boucher, 3 Y. & C. Ex. 397; Lee v. Head, 3 W. R. 591, 1 K. & J. 620; Ford v. Tynte, 2 H. & M. 324, 13 W. R. Ch. Dig. 4; Noel v. Walsingham, 2 Sim. & St. 99.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., Swinfen Eady, Q.C., and Micklem, for the executors of W. J. Crichton.—W. J. Crichton on making the settlement upon Henry's marriage contemplated the receipt of trust funds. It was all one transaction. The instructions to executors are admissible as being a declaration against interest, and show this. As to Arthur, the circumstances do not rebut the legal presumption of satisfaction. The sons acquiesced, and cannot ask for the money over again: Seed v. Bradford, 1 Ves. Sen. 501. At all events they cannot claim over again what actually went into their hands: Evans v. Benyon, 37 Ch. D. 329, 36 W. R. Dig. 208. The interest of the sons under the settlement of 1832 are portions, and a gift of a less amount is a satisfaction pro tanto: Kirk v. Eddowes, 3 Hare 509. There is a resulting trust in favour of the father of the estate in Shropshire, or in the alternative it is a part satisfaction: Bengough v. Walker, 15 Ves. 507; Lawes v. Lawes, 30 W. R. 33, 20 Ch. D. 81; Vickers v. Vickers, 36 W. R. 545, 37 Ch. D. 525.

S. Hall, Q.C., and Curtis Price, for another executor of W. J. Crichton.

Everitt replied.

Cur. adv. vult.

Aug. 9, 1895.—NORTH, J., after dealing at length with the facts of the case, said:—

So far as Arthur is concerned, the question of satisfaction rests on the settlement made upon his marriage, and the investments in £5,000 Russian Bonds and £4,000 India 5½ per cent. Stock made in 1864 and 1865. As regards the two latter, I do not see how the dealings with those can possibly amount to a satisfaction of the liability of W. J. Crichton.

There are numerous cases which show that the debt of a father to a child may be satisfied by an advance to the child of an equal or greater amount, whether in the father's lifetime or by will: Plunkett v. Lewis, a case of a debt being satisfied by a marriage portion; Talbot v. Shrewsbury, Prec. in Ch. 394, a case of satisfaction by a legacy. But there is a leaning against any presumption of satisfaction in such cases, and there are many exceptions to this general rule.

If, for instance, the amount advanced is less than the debt, as in the present case, there is no satisfaction even pro tanto: Cranmer's case, 2 Salk. 508; Graham v. Graham, 1 Ves. Sen. 263; Thynne v. Glengall, 2 H. L. Cas. 131.

Each of these sums was less than the liability; therefore, even if they had been advanced to Arthur irrevocably, they would not have been any satisfaction. Again, there is another exception to that rule within which the present case falls—namely, where the debt is certain and the alleged satisfaction is contingent or uncertain, even though of greater amount than the debt—a fortiori, I may add, if the contingency does not take place.

There are many illustrations of this in cases where a legacy made payable after the death of a testator is held not to be a satisfaction of a debt payable on the testator's death, as to which see the recent decision of Stirling, J., in In re Horlock, 43 W. R. 410, [1895] 1 Ch. 516, and the cases there cited. I also desire to refer to Mathews v. Mathews, 2 Ves. Sen. 635, and Talbot v. Shrewsbury. These authorities, with many others, seem to me conclusive upon the present question. I cannot understand how the father's debt or liability to the son could be satisfied by investments in the joint names, which ultimately came not to the son, but to the father, the debtor; nor how the son's certainty of succeeding ultimately to a moiety of the settled funds in default of an appointment which never was, and which the father contemplated never would be, made could be satisfied by giving him a chance of succeeding to something else of a smaller amount.

But, though I think it clear that Arthur's settlement was not a satisfaction in whole or in part of the father's liability, the fact that £4,000 of the London and St. Katharine's Dock Stock settled arose from the investment of £2,885, part of the proceeds of the Reduced Annuities is not immaterial. The sons Arthur and Henry, and their representatives, complaining of the conversion and appropriation by their father of the proceeds of the securities originally settled, are entitled to follow the proceeds of the conversion, and, so far as such proceeds cannot be traced, to recover from the father's estate the loss arising from their misappropriation; and as it has been proved that this part of the proceeds of the improper conversion came to Arthur's hands, his representatives cannot claim it over again from the father's estate, but must be treated as having received that amount: Nail v. Punter, 5 Sim. 555; Evans v. Benyon.

[His lordship, after giving his reasons for holding that the transfers of stocks into the joint names of W. J. Crichton, Henry, and Henry's wife did not effect satisfaction, proceeded:]

There is one other important matter to which I have not yet alluded. On the 29th of September, 1886, after the death of his son Arthur, the father conveyed to his son Henry an estate called Broadwood Hall, in Shropshire, for the purpose of giving him a qualification to act as a justice of the peace. After Henry's death, the estate was sold by his executors, with the father's concurrence, for £7,000, which the executors of Henry claim to retain. The defence alleges that this estate was held by Henry as a trustee of his father, and that any part of the proceeds of sale which the executors can retain must be taken in satisfaction or part satisfaction of any claims of Henry under the original settlement. The deed recited the father's desire to convey the fee, and the consideration was expressed to be "natural love and affection." This latter circumstance, though not conclusive, is entitled to serious consideration when the value of the property is not shown to exceed the amount of the debt alleged to be satisfied by the transaction: Plunkett v. Lewis, Lawes v. Lawes. Again, there is no memorandum in writing, and no evidence of any express trust, which would indeed be somewhat at variance with the terms of the deed, and on a voluntary conveyance by a father to a son no trust results by operation of law. Again, in order to confer a qualification to act as justice of the peace a beneficial occupation is necessary, and not merely a legal title, and the defendant's counsel have admitted that Henry did have such beneficial occupation. Under these circumstances, the creation of such a trust as is alleged would have been a fraud upon the law, and the father could not be heard to aver its existence: Curtis v. Perry, Brackenbury v. Brackenbury, Cecil v. Butcher, 2 Jac. & W. 565, and Childers v. Childers, 5 W. R. 586, 3 K. & J. 310, though that case was reversed on appeal, on the ground that for the qualification then in question a beneficial occupation was not requisite.

It is hardly necessary, therefore, to consider the point whether a conveyance of land could be presumed to be a satisfaction of a debt. As regards the difficulty of ascertaining the value of the land, it was said that this was no greater than in the case of a residue, and the defendant's counsel relied on the cases of Bengough v. Walker, Lawes v. Lawes, and Vickers v. Vickers; but those cases were all as to the satisfaction, not of debts, but of portions, which stand on a different footing. I have referred to a great many authorities in connection with this case, but have not found one in which a debt has been treated as satisfied, in whole or in part, either by a conveyance of land or by a gift of residue. The result is that the gift of Broadwood Hall was not a satisfaction, and that no part of the purchase-money can be taken into account in discharge or reduction of the liability of the father's estate.

I must, therefore, declare that the father's estate is liable to make good to the estates of each of his sons the sum of £4,873 6s. 8d. Consols, with interest thereon at the rate of 2¾ per cent., being the Consols rate of interest from the 8th of December, 1891, the date of his death.

Before the father's death Reduced Annuities had been paid off, or converted at par, and ceased to exist, so I must further declare that the father's estate is liable to make good to the estate of Henry Crichton the sum of £5,428 16s. 9d., with interest thereon at 4 per cent. from the 8th of December, 1891, and is liable to make good to the estate of Arthur W. Crichton the sum of £2,214 6s. 10d., with like interest. This sum is the value at par of one moiety of the Reduced Annuities, after deducting therefrom the £3,214 10s. Reduced Annuities realized to raise the £2,885 cash invested in the purchase of £4,000 London and St. Katharine's Docks Stock forming part of that transferred to the trustees of Arthur's settlement. The costs must follow the event.

Solicitors, Mullens & Bosanquet; Nield & Stronts; Nye & Moreton.

Q. B. Div.
(Lord Russell of Killowen, C.J., Grantham and Vaughan Williams, JJ.)

Nov. 11, 12; Dec. 7.

SOUTTER v. RODERICK. (a.)

Election law—Parliamentary franchise—Registration—Occupation elector — Claim for vote in borough—Description of qualification—Two dwelling-houses—Omission in claim of the word "successive"—Power to amend—Parliamentary and Municipal Registration Act, 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 26), ss. 24, 28 (13)—Registration Order, 1895, Schedule 3, Part I., paragraph 17 (b).

A notice of claim to have claimant's name inserted in the list of occupation electors for a borough was in the following terms:—"(third column) Nature of qualification — Dwelling-house: (fourth column) Description of qualifying property—69, Richmond-road; 3, Hamilton-square." The claimant had in fact occupied during the qualifying period in immediate succession the two houses set out in the fourth column. The claim was objected to on the grounds, first, that it was not a claim for successive occupation, the word "successive" not being inserted in the third column; and, secondly, that the revising barrister had no power to amend the claim by inserting the word "successive." The barrister overruled the objections, and amended and allowed the claim.

Held, (1) (Vaughan Williams, J., dubitante) that

(a.) Reported by ERSKINE REID, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

the notice of claim, on the reasonable construction of its terms, must be taken to be a claim for successive occupation; (2) that having regard, however, to the Registration Order, 1895, Schedule 3, Part I., paragraph 17 (i) (b), the qualification was not sufficiently described in the claim, which ought to have contained the word "(successive)" in the third column; and (3) that the barrister had power under section 28, sub-section (13), of the Registration Act, 1878, to amend the claim by inserting therein the word "(successive)."

Quære, whether there is any power to amend a claim which, on the reasonable construction of its terms, is equivocal.

Hitchins v. Brown, 2 C. B. 25; Foskett v. Kaufman, 34 W. R. 90, 16 Q. B. D. 279; and Plant v. Potts, [1891] 1 Q. B. 261, 39 W. R. Dig. 142, discussed.

Appeal by the plaintiff (the party objecting to the claims of A. Le Blonde and others, claiming to be placed on the list of occupation electors) from a decision of the the revising barrister for the Borough of Southwark (Bermondsey Division), allowing the claims.

The facts and arguments are sufficiently stated in the judgments of the court.

By the registration order of the 8th of March, 1895 (made under the power conferred by section 76, sub-section (7), of the Local Government Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 41), it is (inter alia) provided in schedule 3, part 1, paragraph 17 (i), as follows: "The nature of the qualification should be entered" —(in the voters lists and in the claim lists)—"as nearly as possible in accordance with the words of the statute conferring the franchise; for instance—(b) the nature of a household qualification should be stated thus: 'dwelling-house,' or in the case of successive occupation 'dwelling-house (successive).'"

Costello, for the appellant.

R. Heber Jones, for the respondent.

Cur. adv. vult.

Dec. 7.—Lord RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN, C.J.—This is an appeal from the revising barrister of Southwark, who had allowed the name of the claimant, Alfred George Le Blonde, and those of seventeen other voters to be inserted in the list of occupiers for the borough. His claim was in the following form: (first column), Name of claimant in full, surname being first—Le Blonde, Alfred George; (second column), place of abode—3, Hamilton-square; (third column), nature of qualification—dwelling-house; (fourth column), description of qualifying property—69, Richmond-road, Stamford-hill; 3, Hamilton-square. It was proved that the claimant had occupied the two dwelling-houses set out in the fourth column in immediate succession and for the qualifying period. It was objected by the appellant that the claim was invalid by reason of the omission of the word "successive" in the third column, and that the revising barrister had no power to amend the claim by inserting the word "successive," because, it was contended, it gave another and a different qualification. The revising barrister overruled both objections, and from that decision this appeal is brought.

The first question, therefore, is whether the claim as it originally stood was sufficient. The appellant contended that by reason of the instructions to overseers in the registration order of the 8th of March, 1895, schedule 3, part 1, paragraph 17 (b), the qualification should have been stated as "dwelling-house (successive)." The respondent relied on the case of Hitchins v. Brown, 2 C. B. 25, as establishing the sufficiency of his claim. In that case "house" only appeared in the third column, but in the fourth column both were fully described with the word "previously" before one of them. The barrister in that case amended the claim by inserting "houses occupied in immediate succession"; and the court held on appeal that the claim was originally sufficient, but that the amendment made it more accurate. Since that case, however, was decided the registration order above referred to has been issued, and I think, having regard to the instructions it contains, that the qualification was not sufficiently described.

The real question in the case is the second one—viz., Had the barrister power to amend the statement of the qualification as he did? It was contended on behalf of the appellant that he had not, because it gave the claimant a different qualification from that stated. If that really is the result of the amendment, then the barrister clearly had not the power to make the amendment, and for authority on this point it is sufficient to refer to the cases of Bartlett v. Gibbs, 5 M. & G. 81, and Foskett v. Kaufman. But is that the effect of the amendment? To answer this question it is important to see what was exactly the qualification stated. It seems to me that, giving to it a reasonable construction, the qualification stated must be taken to be for successive occupation. The claimant could not qualify by occupation of two houses except by reason of successive occupation, and therefore the fair interpretation of the claim seems to me to be that it is one for successive occupation. It was contended that the claim might be regarded as being for occupation of one or other of the two houses during the qualifying period. But, even if that be so (which I do not think), then one or other of the two houses is surplusage, and the barrister would have to amend by striking out one or other, so as to make it clear in respect of which the qualification was claimed. The highest at which the appellant's argument can, in my judgment, be put is that the nature of the qualification is insufficiently stated, and in that case the barrister had power, as it seems to me, under section 28 (13) of 41 & 42 Vict. c. 26, to amend the description of the qualification "for the purpose of more clearly and accurately defining the same." I do not think that the case of Foster v. Kaufman assists the appellant on this point, because on the face of the claim in that case there was no ambiguity. It was a claim for occupation of one house, and it was sought to amend it into a claim for successive occupation of two houses. The case of Hitchins v. Brown, which I have already mentioned, closely resembles the present case, the only difference being the insertion of the word "previously" in the fourth column in the claim in that case. It was argued that this made an important difference, but I do not think so. The idea of "successive" occupation is not necessarily conveyed by the statement that another house was occupied "previously," and it might have been argued in that case, too, that the claim was susceptible of being regarded as a claim for occupation of one or other of the two houses. I think that case was rightly decided, but my conclusions in this case would have been the same apart from it. I think the revising barrister ought freely to exercise the very ample powers of amendment given to him by section 28 of the Registration Act of 1878 to correct any bonâ fide mistake made in the list or in any claim or notice of objection; and while (apart from section 24 of that Act) he cannot so alter a claim as to make the qualification a new or different one from that in the claim, he ought, following the words of section 28 (13), to make such change in the description of the claim as may be necessary "for the purpose of more clearly and accurately defining the same." I think the amendment made in the present case falls within that description. For the reasons I have given I think this appeal must be dismissed with costs.

GRANTHAM, J.—In this case we are asked to say whether the revising barrister was right in amending the claim of the respondent where, in a claim for successive occupation, the respondent had omitted to add the word "successive" after the word "dwelling-house," though he properly inserted the names of the houses of his successive occupation in the fourth column.

In my judgment the barrister was right in so amending. What is the nature of the qualification for which the respondent claims? It is "occupation" as distinguished from "ownership" or any other qualification, and it is still more definitely described as occupation of a dwelling-house. The respondent has described all that gives him the right to vote—namely, the "occupation" of a dwelling-house, and the dwelling-house which he occupied. First one dwelling-house and then the other during the prescribed period.

By the statutory rules and orders of March, 1895, recently published, it is apparent that it is correct to speak of the qualification derived from the successive occupation of two or more dwelling-houses as the occupation of a "dwelling-house" in the singular, and as the respondent has so claimed in the third column, and has in the fourth column correctly described the qualifying property—namely, the two houses—it seems to me that he has done all that the Act requires him to do, and that the word "successive" is really surplusage; but, whether so or not, the absence of the word cannot disqualify, and if it is necessary to be inserted to comply with the rules, then the revising barrister was justified in adding it by way of amendment for the purpose of more accurately describing the qualification.

I am aware that the Court of Appeal in Plant v. Potts, the case most relied on by the appellant did not agree with the liberal construction I had put in that case upon the amending clauses of the Registration Act, 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 26), s. 28, and I loyally bow to their better judgment; but the judgments of the Court of Appeal in that case do not compel me to apply a still narrower construction than has yet been given to the Act, to a case differing essentially from that one.

Prior to Plant v. Potts no one had suggested that the decision of the court in Hitchins v. Brown, decided in 1847, was incorrect; and as that case was not mentioned by the Court of Appeal in Plant v. Potts, and as the facts in the case of Hitchins v. Brown are almost identical with the present case, and not with Plant v. Potts, I cannot consider, in dealing with the present case, that Hitchins v. Brown has been overruled. In fact, if I am wrong in that view, then it seems to me that the special power of amendment given in the Registration Act, 1878, will be a dead letter. If we examine the judgment of the Court of Appeal in Plant v. Potts, I think their lordships clearly intended to exclude such a case as this from the effect of their decision. On p. 262, [1891] 1 Q. B., the Master of the Rolls says: "In other words, a revising barrister can only amend an insufficient description of the qualification, but cannot alter the description into a description of another qualification." Again, Lopes, L.J., says, at p. 264: "After careful consideration, I have come to the conclusion that they (sub-sections (12) and (13) of section 28 of the Act of 1878) empower a revising barrister to correct an insufficient or inaccurate statement of qualification in the third column, provided such a correction does not involve a change or alteration of the qualification as it appears in the list."

On authority, therefore, of previous decisions, as well as on what I believe to be a proper construction of the Act, my judgment must be in favour of the respondent.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J.—In this case Lord Russell, C.J., and Grantham, J., have arrived at the conclusion that, giving to the qualification stated a reasonable construction, it must be taken to be for successive occupation, and that it cannot reasonably be read as being for occupation of one or other of the two houses. I am not at all sure myself that many a reasonable man would not read this qualification as being a qualification by occupation of a dwelling-house at 69, Richmond-road, Stamford-hill, by a person occupying at the date of the claim 3, Hamilton-square. I cannot but think that if the evidence had shown a sufficient qualification by reason of occupation of 69, Richmond-road, and no sufficient successive occupation of the two houses mentioned to give a qualification in respect of successive occupation, the statement of qualification would have been properly argued to have been a reasonably clear statement of a qualification by occupation of a single dwelling-house. If so, the qualification as stated might reasonably be read as referring to either one of two different qualifications, and in that case I should doubt the power of the revising barrister to amend. He would in such case, by amending, not merely be more clearly and accurately defining the qualification stated; he would by the amendment exclude from the statement one of the qualifications possibly included, and therefore would be altering the description of the qualification, while the equivocal claim capable of meaning either one of two qualifications would have been unfair to the objector as throwing on him the necessity of making two set of inquiries. Fairness to the objector seems to be a matter which should be taken into consideration. [See the judgment of Lord Esher, M.R., in Dashwood v. Ayles, 34 W. R. 53, 16 Q. B. D. 298.]

If the claim could equally well describe either franchise, I should say it ought not to be amended. But inasmuch as both my learned brothers think the qualification stated, reasonably read, means "successive occupation" and not a claim for occupation of one dwelling-house for the requisite period, I am not prepared to differ as to the construction of this particular claim, which is not a matter of principle or of any importance except to this particular claimant and objector. But I wish to record my dissent from the proposition that where the description of the claim is equally applicable to one qualification as to another, the revising barrister has power to amend or ought to amend. Subject to these observations, I concur in the result and judgment.

Appeal dismissed. Leave to appeal granted.

Solicitor for appellant, Chalton Hubbard.

Solicitors for the respondent, Franks & Timbrell.

Q. B. Div. Commercial Causes. (Mathew J.) Dec. 3, 5.

TYSER AND OTHERS v. THE SHIPOWNERS' SYNDICATE (REASSURED) AND OTHERS. (a.)

Insurance — Marine insurance — Syndicate of underwriters — Policy signed by manager of syndicate — Joint or several liability of members—Partnership.

(a.) Reported by Sir SHERSTON BAKER, Bart., Barrister-at-Law.

The manager of a syndicate of underwriters, which had been formed under an agreement, entered into a policy of reinsurance on ships valued at £79,300. The subscription form was signed by the manager as manager for the syndicate, and the proportion which each member underwrote was written opposite his name. The agreement authorized the manager to sign policies on behalf of the syndicate, and under it no liability was to attach to any member beyond his own proportion set opposite to his name, and the profits or losses were to be divided amongst or to be borne by the members in proportion to the amounts subscribed by each.

Held, that the liability on the policy was not a joint, but a several liability, and that the agreement did not constitute the members partners in the business.

Action tried by Mathew, J., in the Commercial Court.

The action was brought to recover a total loss upon a policy of marine insurance effected by the defendants upon the steamship Brunswick for £500, and for return of premiums.

The plaintiffs were underwriters at Lloyd's, and the defendants were a syndicate of underwriters, consisting of twenty members—not members of Lloyd's—of which John M. Corderoy was the manager, and he underwrote for the members of the syndicate.

The syndicate was formed under an agreement, dated the 28th of February, 1894, between John M. Corderoy, insurance broker, called the manager, Thomas R. Miller, manager of certain mutual insurance clubs, and the several persons whose names were written in the schedule to the agreement, and who formed the syndicate.

This agreement was to last for twelve months, and at the end of that time it was renewed for another twelve months.

By a policy dated the 4th of March, 1895, the manager, on behalf of the syndicate, reinsured a risk which the plaintiffs had underwritten for £79,300, on the hulls and machinery of certain ships, of which the Brunswick was one, valued as per original policies or policy. This policy of the 4th of March, 1895, was in the ordinary form of a Lloyd's policy, and contained this special clause: "The Shipowners' Syndicate (Reassured)—special clause: It is specially agreed that the assured are hereby entitled, by way of further security for the performance of the obligations of the subscribing underwriters, and of each and every of them, to the benefit by way of first charge of the policies of reinsurance effected or to be effected, and all moneys received thereunder.—John M. Corderoy, manager." Then the subscription to the policy was: "The Shipowners' Syndicate (Reassured)—John M. Corderoy, manager: John M. Corderoy, 6½ thirtieths, Thomas R. Miller, 1½ thirtieths," and the names of the other members of the syndicate followed, with the amounts in thirtieths set opposite the name of each, making in all thirty thirtieths on the £79,300. The subscription form ended: "The Shipowners' Syndicate (Reassured)—John M. Corderoy, manager."

By clause 11 of the agreement the manager was bound forthwith as risks were accepted to reinsure the whole of the total loss risks, and by clause 16 "all policies of reinsurance and all moneys received thereunder shall be held in trust by the manager and the said T. R. Miller, and such third party as they may appoint, primarily as security as the assured under each policy the risk of which is reinsured, and by way of further security the following special clause is to be inserted in every policy": [This special clause was the same as that set out in the policy.] Under this provision Mr. Corderoy forthwith reinsured in the present case in two clubs—namely, the Uniform Line Steamship Insurance Association and the New Marine Mutual Insurance Association.

There was a total loss of the vessel while this policy was in force, and the present claim having been brought, the following were the questions to be tried: (1) Whether the liability of the members upon the policy was a joint or several liability; (2) whether, in the event of a loss and any individual members being unable to pay, the assured are entitled to recover from the trustees the proportion of reinsurance actually received from the clubs to which such individual member is entitled, or whether the whole amount received from the club is to be applied to cover the assured against any deficiency through default of any member or members; (3) whether the policies of reinsurance are to be retained by the trustees or handed over to the assured.

The clauses of the agreement relied on by the parties are referred to in the judgment.

Herbert Reed, Q.C., and Scrutton, for the plaintiffs.

Joseph Walton, Q.C., and Manisty, for the syndicate.

Warmington, Q.C., Lewis Thomas, and W. de B. Herbert, for the defendant Hedges, a member of the syndicate.

Gore-Browne, for the defendant Pattenden, a member of the syndicate.

Scott Fox, for the defendant Wheatley, a member of the syndicate.

Cur. adv. vult.

Dec. 5.—MATHEW, J., read the following judgment:—This action was brought to recover for a total loss of the ship Brunswick. The plaintiffs were underwriters at Lloyd's, who had reinsured with other underwriters, described in the writ as the "Shipowners' Syndicate (Reassured)." The writ was issued on the 22nd of November, and an application was made for an early trial on the ground that several actions were pending, and that it was of great importance that the rights of the parties should be speedily ascertained. It was arranged that statements of the points in dispute should be exchanged and the cause entered.

The trial took place on the 3rd of December, and I have now to deliver judgment. The defendants are a group of underwriters, not members of Lloyd's, who, under the terms of an agreement which will be more fully referred to hereafter, had authorized a manager named Corderoy to underwrite policies of marine insurance on account of the several persons forming the syndicate. The plaintiffs' policy had been effected with Corderoy as manager. It was in the ordinary form of a Lloyd's policy, and was described as a reinsurance on ships to the amount of £79,300, valued as per original policies. The usual clause provided that the assurers promised and bound themselves, each one for his own part, for the true performance of the contract in the policy, confessing the consideration paid. At the end of the policy the subscription was in the following form: [His lordship then read from the subscription form of the policy as stated above.] The first point raised with reference to this policy was whether the liability of the members of the syndicate was joint or several. For the plaintiffs it was contended that the syndicate was in point of fact a firm or partnership; that the name "syndicate" imported combination for purposes of profit, and that there was therefore a joint liability upon the policy. The question was stated to be of great importance because the operations of the syndicate had been very extensive, and had resulted in considerable losses, and if each member of the syndicate were liable for the whole of the losses the result might prove most disastrous to individuals. For the defendants it was argued that upon the face of the policy the liability was several, and not joint.

It was said to be in the ordinary course of business that one underwriter should act for a number of other underwriters at Lloyd's, and should subscribe policies for each member of the group; and in support of that position, which was really not disputed, attention was called to the original policy effected by Tyser & Co. at Lloyd's, from which it appeared that insurances had been effected for eight gentlemen whose names, as in this case, were stamped on the policy, and who insured in different proportions a sum of £100. It was said when the terms of the subscription to this policy were examined that the same principle was followed, and that each member of the syndicate made himself responsible in the same way for the proportion which he underwrote of the amount insured.

Then the plaintiffs' counsel called attention of the special clause in the policy under which "the assured became entitled to the benefit, by way of first charge, of the policies of reinsurance effected or to be effected by the subscribing underwriters and all moneys received thereunder." It was said that if it were left in doubt by the form of the subscription whether the liability were joint or several, this clause showed an intention to enter into a joint undertaking, for it provided that there should be a "further security for the obligations of the subscribing underwriters and of each and every of them." This proved, it was said, that "syndicate" meant something equivalent to firm, company, or partnership. But, on the other hand, the word "syndicate" does not indicate in what way the members are acting together, and they are described in the clause as "subscribing underwriters." I see no ground for thinking that it was intended by this provision in the policy to enlarge the obligations of the underwriters or to extend the security which this special clause was intended to afford. If each underwriter was responsible onlyfor the obligation created by his own subscription, it was unlikely that he should extend his liability to the obligations of his fellows; and the reasonable construction seems to me to be that each underwriter undertook that the benefit of any reinsurance to which he was entitled should be available for the assured. The clause seemed to be intended to prevent the loss of the security by the insolvency of any of the underwriters, and the suggestion that the object was to provide against a possible loss of the security by bankruptcy seems to me improbable.

I am therefore of opinion that the liability upon the policy is several, and not joint. If this view be correct, the case would seem to be concluded. But the case was further argued for the plaintiffs on the ground that the agreement under which the syndicate was formed and carried on business, of itself constituted a partnership; and, as this point was discussed at considerable length, it may be desirable that I should express my opinion upon it. The syndicate was originally formed on the 28th of February, 1894, and was to last for a year. At the end of that time the syndicate was continued for another year, the members being the persons whose names appeared at the foot of the plaintiffs' policy. The agreement was between John Matthew Corderoy, the manager, Thomas Robson Miller, the manager of certain mutual reinsurance clubs, and the several persons whose names appeared in the schedule thereto, thereinafter called the syndicate. After reciting that the syndicate had arranged with the manager that he should be authorized to underwrite policies in the names of the persons forming the syndicate, power was given to the manager to insure steamers by time policies, either on the terms of Lloyd's policies or on club terms. Clause 4 provided as an inducement to insurers that the manager should be at liberty to return 20s. per cent. on the amount covered in the event of the vessels incurring no accident during the currency of the policy. Clause 5 provided that the manager was empowered to sign policies on behalf of the syndicate, and in the individual names of the members thereof, the manager affixing opposite the name of each member on each and every policy the respective proportions of risk taken by such individual member. Clause 6 provided that no liabilities should attach to any member of the syndicate beyond his own proportion of the risk accepted in his name, the members not being liable for one another or in any way guaranteeing the solvency the one of the other. Upon these clauses there would seem to be no foundation whatever for the argument of the existence of a partnership, but great reliance was placed on the clauses that follow. By clause 7 the manager's remuneration was to be 5 per cent. upon the gross premiums and 10 per cent. upon the profits, if any, available for distribution among the members. By clause 8 the manager was at his own expense to keep proper books for the syndicate accounts and the accounts of the members thereof. He was to provide offices and necessary staff for the conduct of the business in the City, and to issue accounts of the working thereof to the members. By clause 9 the manager was to debit against the syndicate account the necessary subscription to Lloyd's. These clauses, it was said, showed that a joint business was contemplated, with a common fund for expenses and an ultimate distribution of the net profits among the members. But all these provisions are analogous to the arrangements that might be made with the manager of an underwriting account at Lloyd's for several underwriters. The provision for the creation of a fund out of moneys belonging to all the underwriters is in no way inconsistent with the obligation of each underwriter to subscribe pro rata for any expenses incidental to insuring.

Very great reliance was placed by the plaintiffs' counsel on clause 11, by which the manager was bound, as risks were accepted on behalf of the members of the syndicate, to reinsure the whole of the total loss risks. It was said that what was contemplated was a reinsurance on behalf of the members of the syndicate jointly; and it was said that in compliance with that provision a reinsurance had been effected with two clubs—the Uniform Line Steamship Insurance Association and the New Marine Mutual Insurance Association, and when the policies came to be examined it appeared that they had been issued by name to the "Shipowners' Syndicate (Reassured)" in each case. But the effect of these reinsurances is perfectly clear. The assured were the members of the syndicate. The title of the syndicate was descriptive only; and if it had been necessary to proceed against the clubs on their policies the interest must have been averred in the members individually, and for contribution to losses the individual members would have been liable (see Great Britain 100 A 1 Steamship Insurance Association v. Wyllie, 37 W. R. 407, 22 Q. B. D. 710). It is difficult to see how a joint insurance could be effected, for each underwriter must reinsure his own risk. A policy by all to cover the risk of one would not be a valid contract of insurance, from the absence of interest in all but the one. An insurance by all to cover the risk of each is open to the same observation. The true meaning of the clause seems to me to be that where the manager accepted risks on behalf of the members he was bound to reinsure each of them. Thus construed, the clause works easily. Upon the plaintiffs' construction it would give rise to considerable difficulty. The fact that for convenience' sake the name of the syndicate was used for the purposes of reinsurance with the clubs does not, and could not, alter the real nature of the contract. Clause 12 was also relied upon by the plaintiffs, for it enabled the manager, on behalf of the syndicate, to undertake the management of collision and salvage cases, &c., and also to make advances to owners to meet average expenses, &c. But this was doing no more than permitting the manager to do what the Salvage Association does for the underwriters at Lloyd's, and is no more inconsistent with the several liabilities of the members of the syndicate than is the employment of the Salvage Association with the several liabilities of the underwriters who employ it. Clauses 13 and 14 and the final clause 15 strongly favour the contention of the defendants that the agreement was not intended to create a partnership; and my judgment, therefore, upon the construction of the agreement, as well as upon the construction of the policy, is for the defendants. The further question was raised as to whether the syndicate jointly or the individual members were bound to return premiums for short interest. I am of opinion that it is in each case a liability of the individual members in the proportion of the amounts subscribed by each of them. Mr. Reed also contended, though not very strenuously, that, even though there was no partnership in fact, the members had held themselves out as partners, and he relied upon the fact that an office had been opened where the name "Shipowners' Syndicate (Reassured)" appeared upon the door; also that the same name was stamped on the paper used by the manager.

These, with the other facts in the case, were relied upon. They are clearly insufficient to justify me in coming to any such conclusion.

Judgment for defendants.

Solicitors for the plaintiffs, Waltons, Johnson, Bubb, & Whatton.

Solicitors for the syndicate generally, W. A. Crump & Son.

Solicitor for the defendant Hedges, W. H. Herbert.

Solicitor for the defendant Pattenden, A. J. Oliver.

Solicitors for the defendant Wheatley, Steavenson & Couldwell.

Court of Appeal.

From Chan. Div. (Lord Herschell; and A. L. Smith and Rigby, L.JJ.) Nov. 22.

In re KINGSTON COTTON MILL CO (LIMITED). (a.)

Company — Winding up — Auditor — Misfeasance — "Officer" of company—Table A—Companies (Winding-up) Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 63), s. 10.

Where the articles of association of a company, so far as they relate to the auditing of accounts, are substantially the same as those contained in Table A, and as the articles relating to audit in In re London and General Bank, 43 W. R. 481, [1895] 2 Ch. 166, the auditor is an "officer of the company" within the meaning of section 10 of the Companies (Winding-up) Act, 1890.

(a.) Reported by ARNOLD GLOVER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Appeal from the decision of Vaughan Williams, J.

A summons was taken out against the directors and auditors of the Kingston Cotton Mill Co. (Limited) by the official receiver and liquidator for a direction that they were liable to pay certain sums of money which were alleged to have been improperly applied in payment of dividends upon certain preference shares, and that they were guilty of misfeasance or breach of trust in relation to the company in that they authorized, sanctioned, participated, or recommended, or permitted the issue of, reports and statements of accounts containing false and misleading entries with respect to the value of the company's property, stock-in-trade, and reserve fund.

The auditors moved to stay all proceedings under the summons as against the applicants on the ground that they were not officers of the company within the meaning of section 10 of the Companies (Winding-up) Act, 1890. That section provides that "where, in the winding-up of a company under the Companies Acts it appears that any person who has taken part in the formation or promotion of the company, or any past or present director, manager, liquidator, or other officer of the company, has misapplied or retained, or become liable or accountable for, any moneys or property of the company, or been guilty of any misfeasance or breach of trust in relation to the company, the court may, on the application of the official receiver or of the liquidator of the company, or of any creditor or contributory of the company, examine into the conduct of such promoter, director, manager, liquidator, or other officer of the company, and compel him to repay any moneys or restore any property so misapplied or retained, or for which he has become liable or accountable, together with interest after such rate as the court thinks just, or to contribute such sums of money to the assets of the company by way of compensation in respect of such misapplication, retainer, misfeasance, or breach of trust as the court thinks just."

The articles of association dealing with auditors were as follow:—

"129. Once at least in every year the accounts of the company shall be examined, and the correctness of the balance-sheet ascertained by one or more auditor or auditors.

"130. The first auditors shall be appointed by the directors. Subsequent auditors shall be appointed by the company in general meeting.

"131. If one auditor only is appointed, all the provisions herein contained relating to auditors shall apply to him.

"132. The auditors may, but need not, be members of the company, but no person shall be eligible as an auditor who is interested otherwise than as a member in any transaction of the company, and no director or other officer of the company shall be eligible during his continuance in office.

"133. The appointment of the auditors shall be made by the company at their ordinary meeting in each year.

"134. The remuneration of the first auditors shall be fixed by the directors, and of subsequent auditors shall be fixed by the company in general meeting.

"135. Any auditor shall be re-eligible on his quitting office.

"136. If no auditor shall be appointed at any ordinary meeting, or if any casual vacancy occurs in the office of any auditor appointed by the company, the directors shall forthwith appoint an auditor to act until the next ordinary meeting.

"137. If no appointment of auditors is made in manner aforesaid, the Board of Trade may, on the application of not less than five members of the company, appoint an auditor to act until the next ordinary meeting, and fix the remuneration to be paid to him by the company for his services.

"138. Every auditor shall be supplied with a copy of the balance-sheet, and it shall be his duty to examine the same with the accounts and vouchers relating thereto.

"139. Every auditor shall have a list delivered to him of all books kept by the company, and shall at all reasonable times have access to the books and accounts of the company. He may, unless he himself is an accountant, employ accountants or other persons at the expense of the company to assist him in investigating such accounts, and he may, in relation to such accounts, examine the directors or any other officer of the company.

"140. The auditors shall make a report to the members upon the balance-sheet and accounts, and in every such report they shall state whether in their opinion the balance-sheet is a full and fair balance-sheet, containing the particulars required by these articles and properly drawn up so as to exhibit a true and correct view of the state of the company's affairs; and in case they have called for any explanation or information from the directors, whether such explanation or information has been given by the directors, and whether the same has been satisfactory; and such report shall be read together with the report of the directors at the ordinary meeting."

Article 124 provided that the accounts of the company should be kept "in such manner and upon such principle as shall be decided by the auditors."

Vaughan Williams, J., held that the auditors were "officers of the company" within the meaning of section 10 of the Companies (Winding-up) Act, 1890.

The auditors appealed.

Swinfen Eady, Q.C., and Eve, Q.C., for the appellants.—It may be that if auditors are guilty of negligence in the performance of their duty, an action will lie against them as against any other professional person who is guilty of negligence, but they are not amenable to the summary jurisdiction conferred by the Act of 1890. An auditor is not an "officer of the company" within the meaning of section 10 of that Act. That section is levelled at those persons who conduct the affairs of the company and have control of its funds. "Misfeasance" in the section means misfeasance in the nature of a breach of trust, and an auditor is not a person who can be guilty of misfeasance of that kind: In re Canadian Land Co., Coventry and Dixon's case, 28 W. R. 775, 14 Ch. D. 660. It is not compulsory to have an auditor at all, if the articles exclude the obligation imposed by Table A; and except in the case of a bank, the officer aimed at by section 10 must be an officer ejusdem generis with those enumerated. In In re Great Western (Forest of Dean), &c., Co., Carter's case, 34 W. R. 516, 31 Ch. D. 496, it was held that a solicitor was not an officer of the company, and in In re Imperial Land Co. of Marseilles, In re National Bank, 18 W. R. 661, L. R. 10 Eq. 298, that a banker was not. [RIGBY, L.J., referred to In re Patent Bread Machinery Co., Ex parte Valpy and Chaplin, 20 W. R. 347, L. R. 7 Ch. App. 289.] [Cozens-Hardy, Q.C.—That is over-ruled by Wright v. Horton, 36 W. R. 17, 12 App. Cas. 371.] The cases were referred to in In re Liberator Permanent Benefit Building Society, 71 L. J. N. S. 406, 43 W. R. Dig. 43. In re The London and General Bank, 43 W. R. 481, [1895] 2 Ch. 166, was decided upon the special circumstances of the case and the Act of Parliament, and Kay, L.J., was careful to guard himself from holding that in every case of a joint-stock company the auditor is an officer of the company. [Lord HERSCHELL.—If we hold in your favour in this case, we should do so on a very thin and narrow distinction from that case. His lordship referred to In re Native Iron Ore Co., 24 W. R. 503, 2 Ch. D. 345, and In re South Durham Iron Co., Smith's case, 27 W. R. 845, 11 Ch. D. 579, where Valpy's case was discussed.] It was also discussed in In re International Pulp and Paper Co., Knowles' Mortgage, 25 W. R. 822, 6 Ch. D. 556.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and W. D. Rawlins, for the official receiver.—This case has really been decided by the Court of Appeal in In re London and General Bank. That case was decided under the Companies Act, 1879, which, by section 7, introduced provisions with regard to audits which are practically identical with those contained in Table A, and in the present case it is admitted that the articles of association dealing with auditors are substantially the same as those of Table A. That case, therefore, cannot be distinguished.

Lord HERSCHELL.—In this case an application is made under the 10th section of the Companies (Winding-up) Act, 1890, to proceed against the directors and the auditors of the company on the ground that they have been guilty respectively of misfeasance within the meaning of that section. We have not here to determine whether they have been guilty of such misfeasance. We have not the facts before us. We have not even to determine whether the allegations in the summons show a primâ facie case of what would be misfeasance under the statute. All that we have to determine is whether the auditors in the present case are persons in such a position, coming within the meaning of the word "officers" in section 10, as to entitle the liquidator to proceed against them.

Now, a question very similar to this came before the Court of Appeal in the case of In re London and General Bank. The question there was whether the auditors of the London and General Bank were "officers" within the meaning of the section in question. This court held that they were, and I can see no substantial distinction between that case and the present. I will allude in a moment to the distinctions which have been suggested, but it seems to me that it would be frittering away the case altogether if we were to rest our determination upon any of the distinctions which alone can be made in the present case.

Now, I desire to express no opinion whatsoever whether the London and General Bank case was rightly or wrongly decided. It may be that the reasoning in that case is open to criticism. It may be that some considerations which bear upon the question were not referred to or had not full effect given to them. Upon all that I express no opinion at all. I desire to retain absolute liberty of action, in case it should hereafter become necessary, on the question whether In re London and General Bank was rightly decided.

Now let us see what In re London and General Bank did decide. It decided that the auditors appointed in that case were "officers" within the meaning of the section. On what ground? Under the Act of 1879 certain articles contained in Table A, which it had been open to companies either to adopt or to reject as they pleased, became by statute absolutely binding on banking companies. They had to appoint auditors, and certain provisions were made applicable to them which were in substance the provisions of Table A, so far as auditors are concerned, in the Act of 1862. I say "in substance," and so far as it is material to the present case. Now, that company —the banking company—besides what I may call these compulsory articles, had also articles of its own. The reasoning in In re London and General Bank was rested largely, I may say mainly, on this, that the auditors were by the provisions of the Act of 1879, which were made applicable to the bank, made officers of the company. The language of those provisions was dwelt upon as showing that they were officers of the company. It is true, and here comes the distinction suggested, that in that case they were so denominated in an indemnity clause in the articles, whereas in the present case they are not so denominated; and an argument might be based on the indemnity clause with the view of supporting the contention that they are not officers. But it would be far too narrow a distinction upon which to rest any difference of decision.

In the present case the articles are, in substance, the same. The auditors are created officers, if they are officers, in precisely the same way in the present case as in the London and General Bank case. I can see no substantial distinction between the two. If misfeasance of officers extended to the auditors in that case, it seems to me that no substantial reason can be given why misfeasance of officers should not extend to auditors in the present case. That really is all I need say. I cannot in substance distinguish the two cases. The reasoning which led to the conclusion in the one case seems to me logically and necessarily to lead to it in the other.

But, of course, all that we decide is that in a case identical with the London and General Bank case, as I take this to be in substance, the auditor is an "officer." We decide that, as bound by the London and General Bank case. Beyond that our decision does not go. I say this because some general observations were made by the learned judge in the court below, and I am not going to express any opinion at all on any of the points to which allusion was made. Those are not determined by the present case. All that is determined is this, that where the facts in substance are identical (and I have shown that I think them identical here) between the London and General Bank case and any case that arises the London and General Bank case must be treated as an authority. For these reasons I think that this appeal must be dismissed.

A. L. Smith, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. There cannot be a doubt that we are bound by the London and General Bank case, and the real question to-day is whether or not the present case can be distinguished from the London and General Bank case in substance, and from the reasoning which was given by the learned Lords Justices in coming to the conclusion that the auditor was an "officer" of the company. There are three points, I understand, which are alluded to. The first is that in the London and General Bank case the auditors were "officers" by statute. It was pointed out by Mr. Cozens-Hardy that, although that was so, Table A was in substance incorporated in that case in the articles of the bank. The next thing that was pointed out was that in the London and General Bank case there was a definition clause which alluded to auditors as "officers," which is not present here; and the third distinction which was pointed out was that in the indemnity clause "auditor" was mentioned, in the present case "officer" is mentioned and not "auditor." Except those three distinctions that have been pointed out, the rest of the case is absolutely identical. In my opinion we should be frittering away the judgment in the London and General Bank case altogether if we were to try and distinguish the present case. Being bound by the London and General Bank case, I say that in any case which comes within the terms of it the auditor is an "officer" of the company, and further than that I am not prepared to go on the present occasion.

Rigby, L.J.—I arrive at the same conclusion—that is to say, that we are in this case bound by the decision in the London and General Bank case. I cannot see any substantial distinction between those clauses with regard to auditors that were made compulsory on the company by the Act of 1879 and the clauses in the present case, although in the articles of association there are minor differences. I do not think they are sufficient to differentiate the two cases, and we are bound loyally to follow that case. I give no kind of opinion one way or the other whether in support of or against the general question, and especially I give no kind of opinion with regard to other questions which are raised in the judgment of Vaughan Williams, J., which might seem to have a more general effect than the decision in the London and General Bank case.

Solicitors, Collyer-Bristow, Russell, Hill, & Co.; Robbins, Billing, & Co.

From Q. B. Div. (Lord Esher, M.R., and Lopes, and Kay, L.JJ.) Nov. 21.

Colonial Securities Trust Co. v. Massey. (a)

Practice—Appeal—Action tried without jury—Issues of fact—Rule of Court of Appeal.

Per Lord Esher, M.R., and Lopes, L.J.—Where an action is tried by a judge without a jury, the presumption is that his decision on the facts was right, and that presumption must be displaced by the appellant, and unless he can satisfactorily make out that the decision of the judge was wrong, the appeal will be dismissed; and this rule applies also to the case where the witnesses have not been examined before the judge in the court below.

Per Kay, L.J.—The appeal being in the nature of a rehearing, it is the duty of the Court of Appeal, where the witnesses have not been examined before the judge in the court below, to try the case itself, and to pronounce the judgment which it thinks that the judge ought to have pronounced.

Appeal of the defendants from the judgment of Day, J., at the trial of the action without a jury.

The questions at the trial were questions of fact, the material evidence being that taken on commission. The case is only reported for the observations of the court with regard to appeals on questions of fact from the decisions of judges when trying actions without juries.

C. A. Cripps, Q.C., Edward Pollock, and P. Rose-Innes, for the defendants.

Bompas, Q.C., and T. W. Chitty, for the plaintiffs.

Lord Esher, M.R.—We must first consider what is the rule of conduct of this court when hearing an appeal on the facts from the decision of a judge trying an action without a jury. It must be based upon the rule of conduct of the old Court of Appeal in Chancery. In Chancery the appeal was called a rehearing, because the Court of Appeal could set aside the decree of the Vice-Chancellor and pronounce the decree that he ought to have pronounced on the facts. At common law no such thing as a rehearing was known. The Court of Appeal in Chancery, however, acted on this rule of conduct, that they would not allow the appeal unless they were satisfied that the judge below was wrong. If they were left in doubt whether he was right or wrong, they would say that the appellant had not discharged the burden that was upon him of proving that the judge was wrong, and would dismiss the appeal. The Court of Appeal would be more unlikely to disturb the judgment if the witnesses had been before the judge than if they had not. Still the same rule applies, though not so strongly in the latter as in the former case; and this court will not set aside the judgment unless it is satisfied that it is wrong. I have often expressed this view, and it has been well expressed by Lopes, L.J., in Savage v. Adam, W. N. (1895) 109: "Where a case tried by a judge without a jury comes to the Court of Appeal the presumption is that the decision of the court below on the facts was right, and that presumption must be displaced by the appellant. If he satisfactorily makes out that the judge below was wrong, then, inasmuch as the appeal is in the nature of a rehearing, the decision should be reversed; if the case is left in doubt, it is clearly the duty of the Court of Appeal not to disturb the decision of the court below." [His lordship then reviewed the evidence, and came to the conclusion that the appeal should be dismissed.]

(a.) Reported by W. F. Barry, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

LOPES, L.J., concurred.

KAY, L.J.—This is an appeal from a judge sitting without a jury. By ord. 58, r. 1, the appeal is in the nature of a rehearing. Some of the witnesses were examined before the judge, but the case does not depend upon their evidence at all, but upon the evidence taken on commission. So far as this latter evidence is concerned, we have the same means of judging of it as the learned judge, and we must see whether we take the same view of the evidence as he does; and if we do not, we must respectfully differ from him, and pronounce the judgment that we think he ought to have pronounced. We must, in fact, try the case ourselves. I quite agree that in a case of difficulty, where this court cannot come to the conclusion that the judge was wrong, it must give full weight to the decision of the judge. But I conceive it to be the duty of the Court of Appeal to try the case and to pronounce the judgment which it thinks that the judge ought to have pronounced. [His lordship then reviewed the evidence, and said:] I agree that in a case of such doubt and difficulty great importance should be given to the decision of the learned judge, but having done so I have arrived at a different conclusion, and feel it my duty to express it.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the plaintiffs, Bompas, Bischoff, & Co.

Solicitors for the defendants, Ingle, Holmes, & Son.

From Prob. Div. & Adm. Div. (Lindley, Lopes, and Rigby, L.JJ.) } June 28; July 1, 2; Aug. 7, 1895.

RUSSELL v. RUSSELL (a.)

Divorce—Cruelty—Husband charged by wife with committing an unnatural offence—Charge persisted in after verdict of jury acquitting husband—Restitution of conjugal rights—Judicial separation—Matrimonial Causes Act, 1884 (47 & 48 Vict. c. 68), s. 5.

Per Lindley and Lopes, L.JJ.—To constitute legal cruelty there must be danger to life, limb, or health bodily or mental, or a reasonable apprehension of it.

Per Rigby, L.J.—There may be exceptional cases in which, without bodily injury or threat of it, the injury to mental feelings may be legal cruelty.

Where a wife persisted in charging her husband with having committed an unnatural offence of which he had been acquitted by the verdict of a jury,

Held (Rigby, L.J., dissenting), that such conduct on the part of the wife did not amount to legal cruelty, and formed no ground for granting the husband a decree of judicial separation; but,

Held also (by Lindley, Lopes, and Rigby, L.JJ.), that the wife's conduct disentitled her to a decree for restitution of conjugal rights, inasmuch as, since the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1884, the court, by necessary implication, had power to refuse a decree for restitution wherever the result will be to compel the court to treat one of the spouses as deserting the other without reasonable cause, contrary to the real truth of the case.

Appeal of the Countess Russell, the petitioner, from an order of Pollock, B., made on the 24th of April, 1894.

In 1890 the petitioner brought a suit against the respondent for judicial separation, and therein charged him with having committed an unnatural offence.

The jury in that suit found a verdict in favour of the respondent, and the suit was dismissed.

The petitioner subsequently, in conversation, in letters, and in an interview with the editor of a newspaper called the Hawk, repeated the charge against her husband.

In the present suit the petitioner sought restitution of conjugal rights, and the respondent counterclaimed for judicial separation on the ground of cruelty on the part of the petitioner in making and persisting in such charges.

At the trial of the suit before Pollock, B., the jury found that the petitioner had been guilty of cruelty, and also that in her conduct and correspondence since the former trial she had not acted bonâ fide.

Upon these findings Pollock, B., dismissed the petitioner's suit, and decreed judicial separation in favour of the respondent.

The petitioner appealed.

Murphy, Q.C., and Barnard, for the appellant.—There is no evidence of legal cruelty, and the judge misdirected the jury. That being so, there is no answer to the wife's petition. To constitute legal cruelty there must be injury to health, present or proximate. There is an unbroken line of authorities in favour of that proposition; and if the courts are once driven off that ground, where are they to stop? The Divorce Court must administer the ecclesiastical law, and under that law the only answer to an action for restitution is the commission of a matrimonial offence.

They referred to Holmes v. Holmes, 2 Lee 116; Evans v. Evans, 1 Hagg. Cons. 35; Milner v. Milner, 4 Sw. & T. 240, 10 W. R. Div. Dig. 16; Paterson v. Paterson, 3 H. L. Cas. 308; Otway v. Otway, 2 Phil. 95; Barlee v. Barlee, 1 Add. 301; Westmeath v. Westmeath, 2 Hagg. Ecc. Supp. 1, 57; Bray v. Bray, 1 Hagg. Ecc. 163; Dysart v. Dysart, 3 Notes of Cas. 324; Furlonger v. Furlonger, 5 Notes of Cas. 422; Gale v. Gale, 2 Rob. Ecc. Rep. 421; Curtis v. Curtis, 1 Sw. & T. 192; Burroughs v. Burroughs, 9 W. R. 680, 2 Sw. & T. 303; Pichard v. Pichard, 13 W. R. 188, 33 L. J. P. & M. 158; Scott v. Scott, 34 L. J. P. & M. 22; Cousen v. Cousen, 4 Sw. & T. 164, 13 W. R. Dig. 13; Milford v. Milford, 15 W. R. 319, L. R. 1 P. & D. 295; Forth v. Forth, 15 W. R. 1091,

(a.) Reported by ARNOLD GLOVER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

36 L. J. P. & M. 122; Stace v. Stace, 16 W. R. 1176, 37 L. J. P. & M. 51; Kelly v. Kelly, 18 W. R. 767, L. R. 2 P. & D. 59; Birch v. Birch, 21 W. R. 463, 42 L. J. P. & M. 23; Rippingall v. Rippingall, 24 W. R. 967; Mytton v. Mytton, 35 W. R. 368, 11 P. D. 141; Henderson v. Broomhead, 7 W. R. 492, 28 L. J. Ex. 360; Seaman v. Netherclift, 24 W. R. 884, 1 C. P. D. 540; Oliver v. Oliver, 1 Hagg. Cons. 361; Neeld v. Neeld, 4 Hagg. Ecc. 263; Greenway v. Greenway, 6 Notes of Cas. 221; Tomkins v. Tomkins, 1 Sw. & T. 168, 6 W. R. Div. Dig. 12; Duplany v. Duplany, [1892] P. 53, 40 W. R. Dig. 77; Sullivan v. Sullivan, 2 Add. 299; Miles v. Chilton, 6 Notes of Cas. 636; Andrews v. Rose, 37 W. R. 239, 14 P. D. 15; and Mackenzie v. Mackenzie, [1894] A. C. 384, 43 W. R. Dig. 161.

Robson, Q.C., and Bargrave Deane, for the respondent.—There can be no offence of a more serious character than this, to make deliberately a false allegation with the ulterior motive of getting money. The cases cited merely refer to cruelty of the ordinary character. In Bray v. Bray the parties were living together, and it was a mere domestic quarrel. [LOPES, L.J.—Is there any case in the books in which mere words have been held to amount to cruelty?] Milner v. Milner and Kelly v. Kelly [LOPES, L.J.—There what was done injured the lady's health.] The violence was not the substance of the case. [LOPES, L.J.—Can you produce any case in which there was not some violence and injury to health.]

They referred to D'Aguilar v. D'Aguilar, 1 Hagg. Ecc. 775; Saundars v. Saundars, 5 Notes of Cas. 408 at pp. 418, 419; Stace v. Stace; Forth v. Forth; Woodey v Woodey, 23 W. R. 386, 31 L. J. N. S. 647; Paterson v. Paterson; and Mackenzie v. Mackenzie.

Murphy, Q.C., in reply, referred to Otway v. Otway, 13 P. D. 141, 37 W. R. Dig. 84, and Weldon v. Weldon, 32 W. R. 231, 9 P. D. 52.

Cur. adv. vult.

LOPES, L.J., read the following judgment, in which LINDLEY, L.J., concurred.—This is a most important case, and admittedly one of first impression; it is, therefore, with anxious care that the court approaches its consideration and determination. It is a suit by the wife for the restitution of conjugal rights, which the respondent resists on the ground of his wife's cruelty. The jury found that the petitioner had been guilty of cruelty towards the respondent, and that in her conduct and correspondence since the first trial she had not acted bonâ fide—which means that she did not believe the charge made against her husband. The cruelty set up may be thus stated—viz., that the wife, who had for two years been living apart from her husband, persisted in charging him with the commission of an unnatural offence, of which he had been acquitted by the verdict of a jury, and which charge she had refused to apologize for or retract.

Two questions arise—(1) Was legal cruelty established? If it was, the respondent is entitled to a judicial separation, and the wife fails in the suit for restitution of conjugal rights. (2) If it was not, is the petitioner, in the circumstances of this case, entitled to a decree for restitution of conjugal rights? The facts of the case, so far as concerns the present inquiry, are not largely, if at all, in dispute. It is necessary, however, to state some of them, in order to make the judgment of the court intelligible. The petitioner and respondent were married in February, 1890, and they separated in the following May. They then lived together again for a short time, but in June they separated again for a period of three months. The three months went by, and they never cohabited again. In November, 1890, the wife filed her petition for a judicial separation, charging her husband with many acts of cruelty towards her, and amongst them with having committed an unnatural offence.

In December, 1891, that petition was tried. The jury, after a long trial, acquitted the husband of the cruelty alleged, and his character was thereby completely vindicated. Then commenced the course of conduct on the part of the wife of which the respondent now complains. It may be thus described—that she deliberately persisted in charging him with the criminal offence of which the jury had acquitted him. She did this on several occasions by word of mouth, and by letters addressed to members of his family and others, and would not retract or apologize. In an interview which the petitioner had with the editor of the Hawk she reiterated her charge against her husband, and intimated that had the opportunity been afforded her she could have established it. The jury have found that the petitioner did not believe the charge to be true. If she did not, her repeating it is the more reprehensible. If she did, her desire now expressed to return to cohabitation with her husband is incredible. However, that she conducted herself in the way we have described is indisputable. Is this legal cruelty? This is the question the court has to determine. The learned judge in the court below has not defined legal cruelty, and has left it somewhat at large to the jury. The court, in our judgment, ought to define it—we will not say exhaustively, but, at any rate, sufficiently for the purposes of this case. We define it thus: There must be danger to life, limb, or health, bodily or mental, or a reasonable apprehension of it, to constitute legal cruelty.

We propose to test the definition by some of the more important cases that have been decided on the subject. Section 22 of the Divorce and Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857 (20 & 21 Vict. c. 85), says: "In all suits and proceedings other than proceedings to dissolve any marriage the court shall proceed on principles and rules which, in the opinion of the court, shall be as nearly as may be conformable to the principles and rules on which the ecclesiastical courts have hitherto acted, but subject to the provisions herein contained and to the rules and orders under the Act." It is material, therefore, to consider what, in the view of the ecclesiastical courts, constituted legal cruelty for which a divorce a mensa et thoro could be obtained. Evans v. Evans, decided by Lord Stowell in 1790, is the leading case on the subject. As we read that case, no husband could be found guilty of legal cruelty towards his wife unless he had either inflicted bodily injury upon her, or had so conducted himself towards her mental or bodily health as to raise a reasonable apprehension that he would either inflict actual bodily injury upon her or cause actual injury to her mental or bodily health. In a word, he must so have conducted himself towards her as to render future cohabitation more or less dangerous to her life, or limb, or mental or bodily health. There are some expressions in that most admirable judgment of Lord Stowell to which we would wish to refer. At p. 38 (1 Hagg. Cons.) the learned judge says: "What merely wounds the mental feelings is in few cases to be admitted, when they are not accompanied with bodily injury, either actual or menaced. Mere austerity of temper, petulance of manners, rudeness of language, and a want of civil attention and accommodation, even occasional sallies of passion, if they do not threaten bodily harm, do not amount to legal cruelty; they are high moral offences in the marriage state undoubtedly—not innocent, surely, in any state of life—but they are not that cruelty against which the law can relieve." At p. 39 the learned judge sums up what he had previously said thus: "These are negative descriptions of cruelty, they show only what is not cruelty; and yet, perhaps, the safest definitions which can be given under the infinite variety of possible cases that may come before the court. But if it were at all necessary to lay down an affirmative rule, I take it that the rules cited by Dr. Bever from Clarke and the other books of practice are a good general outline of the canon law, the law of this country, upon this subject. In the older cases of this sort which I have had an opportunity of looking into, I have observed that the danger of life, limb, or health is usually inserted as the ground upon which the court has proceeded to a separation. This doctrine has been repeatedly applied by the court in the cases that have been cited. The court has never been driven off this ground. It has been always jealous of the inconvenience of departing from it; and I have heard no one case cited in which the court has granted a divorce without proof given of a reasonable apprehension of bodily hurt. I say an apprehension, because, assuredly, the court is not to wait till the hurt is actually done; but the apprehension must be reasonable." This was the state of the law in 1790, and we venture to say that the doctrine there enunciated as to what constituted legal cruelty has never been materially altered. At that time no amount of want of civility, rudeness, insult, or abuse, however gross, which did not affect life, limb, or mental or bodily health, or where there was not a reasonable apprehension of its so doing, was considered by the ecclesiastical tribunals to amount to legal cruelty, and that though the parties were at the time cohabiting. So far as we can ascertain, the authority of the case of Evans v. Evans has never been questioned. It would be superfluous to cite the long course of decisions with regard to cruelty which have been decided since Evans v. Evans. Before the Divorce and Matrimonial Act, 1857, and since the passing of that Act, the same rule with regard to what constitutes legal cruelty has been maintained, and has been followed by Sir Cresswell Cresswell, Lord Penzance, and Sir James Hannen; and Sir Charles Butt, in December, 1891, at the trial of the case of Russell v. Russell, when the present petitioner sued for a judicial separation on the ground of cruelty, said, in laying down the law to the jury, that cruelty had been very often defined as injury causing danger to life, or limb, or health, or causing reasonable apprehension of danger to life, or limb, or health; and it is, generally speaking, where the continuation of the conduct charged would be likely to produce injury, either bodily or physical, or injury to health without any physical violence, that this court interposes to protect the wife. There is no case in the books where words alone, however violent, however galling, and even if imputing a crime of the most disgraceful kind, have been held per se to constitute legal cruelty, and this when the parties were cohabiting as husband and wife.

The case of Bray v. Bray is a case which, so far as we can discover, has never been cited or followed as an authority, and is contrary to Gale v. Gale, subsequently referred to. Bray v. Bray was a decision only with regard to adultery. In Milner v. Milner the assault was quite sufficient to show that the husband was unable to control himself, and could not be trusted not to break out into violence towards his wife. In Popkin v. Popkin, 1 Hagg. Ecc. 765*n*, a husband's attempt to debauch his own female servants, and in Durant v. Durant, 1 Hagg. Ecc. 733, the bringing by him of groundless and malicious charges against his wife's chastity were only held to be acts of legal cruelty to the extent that it was said of them that they would weigh with the court in conjunction with other charges. In Popkin v. Popkin it was said: "The attempts to debauch his own women servants was a strong act of cruelty; perhaps not alone sufficient to divorce, but which might weigh, in conjunction with others, as an act of considerable indignity and outrage to his wife's feelings." And in Durant v. Durant the court said: "If a person who had ill-treated his wife, and had been guilty of acts of violence and words of menace, and finally made a charge of misconduct and criminality which he had not attempted to allege nor to prove, and under that pretence had shut his door against her, it cannot be doubted that such conduct would be admissible matter in a suit for separation by reason of cruelty." By some authorities in the civil law this was held to be a distinct ground of separation, and passages were quoted in the argument to that effect, which it is unnecessary again to state. These courts, and the law of this country, have not gone the length of recognising it as a substantive ground, but it is a fact amongst others per quod consortium amittitur. In Oliver v. Oliver it is said: "Words of menace importing the actual danger of bodily harm will justify the interposition of the court, as the court ought not to wait until the mischief is actually done. But the most innocent and deserving woman will sue in vain for the interference for words of mere insult, however galling." Again, in Gale v. Gale a charge of incest per se was held to be insufficient to constitute legal cruelty. Sir John Dodson, in his judgment, said: "Undoubtedly the charge of having committed incest is not per se sufficient to constitute legal cruelty; but coupled with other averments of a substantial character, I think, on the authority of the cases cited, that charge may form a part of the libel." Birch v. Birch is worthy of notice. It was the petition of the wife for dissolution of the marriage on the ground of adultery coupled with cruelty, and was decided by Sir James Hannen in 1873. The cruelty relied on was of this nature. The husband frequently beat one of the children with great violence in the wife's presence, swore at and abused her, and refused her delicacies which her state of health required. She did not allege that she had ever been struck by her husband, or that any act of violence had been committed by him towards her. Sir James Hannen says: "I cannot hold consistently with the authorities that legal cruelty is established. I must hold to those views which seem to have been taken by my predecessors, that the cruelty must be of such a character as to endanger the life, the limbs, or the health of the party claiming relief. In saying this it must be such as to endanger the health of the complaining party; it does not follow that it should be such as actually to reach that point so as to cause injury to health. If there be reasonable ground to believe that it will be persevered in so as to cause mischief, then the compaining party may bring it before the court as constituting legal cruelty, for it is not necessary that he or she should wait until the mischief is done. But I cannot come to the conclusion in this case that the wife had any apprehension of personal violence."

We proceed to deal with the cases upon which the respondent relies. We select the strongest of them: Paterson v. Paterson, has been mainly relied upon by the respondent. It was a Scotch case, and, although it was said that the general principle of the law as to divorce a mensa et thoro was the same in England and Scotland, Lord Brougham, at the end of his judgment, says: "I will not say that the law of Scotland, as far as decided cases go, may not extend somewhat further than our laws in favour of the remedy." Lord Brougham at p. 337 (3 H. L.) says:—

"Suppose a man were continually charging his wife with every sort of immorality and criminal conduct and there were not a shadow of foundation for those charges, made before her family, her friends, relatives, and servants, and in face of the world, there is little doubt that what now rests only upon opinions would ultimately assume the form of decisions, and that to such injurious treatment, making the marriage state impossible to be endured and rendering life almost unbearable, the courts of the country would extend the remedy of a divorce a mensa et thoro." These, however, were obiter dicta, and were not necessary for the decision, and it is to be observed that the House of Lords, the Court of Session having pronouncedf or a divorce, reversed the interlocutor. Again, at p. 318, Lord Brougham says: "That the ground of the remedy is confined to personal violence is not the law of England, and certainly not the law of Scotland. The law is nearly, if not altogether, the same in the two countries. It is not true that the law of England either requires actual injury to the person or threat of such injury." We presume that this means that a reasonable apprehension of danger to life, limb, or health, bodily or mental, will suffice without any actual personal injury or the threat of it, because at p. 309 Lord Brougham had said: "Separation of married persons is not justified by conduct on the part of the husband rendering the wife's life miserable and uncomfortable, unless such conduct is accompanied by violence, actual or menaced, to her life, limb, or health, or by cruelty and maltreatment rendering it impossible for her to live with him." We cannot think this case can be relied upon as a decision making the conduct of the wife in this case sufficient to constitute legal cruelty. Nor do we find in subsequent cases that it has been cited or allowed to prevail as establishing such an extension of the remedy. Then there is the case of Kelly v. Kelly, which has gone as far as any case has gone in the direction contended for by the respondent. It was decided by the Judge Ordinary, Lord Penzance, and was in 1870 appealed to the full court, consisting of Channel, B., and the Judge Ordinary. And it was held that if force, whether physical or moral, is systematically exerted to compel the submission of a wife to such a degree and during such a length of time as to injure her health and render a serious malady imminent, although there be no actual physical violence such as would justify a decree, it is legal cruelty, and entitles her to a judicial separation. Previous cases were carefully considered, and Channel, B., after reviewing the evidence, says at page 71 (L. R. 2 P. & D.): "In conclusion, we have no doubt whatever that the law was correctly laid down on the hearing of this case, that the evidence warranted the conclusion of legal cruelty drawn from it; and, satisfied as we are of the extreme peril to which Mrs. Kelly's health was exposed without any adequate fault of her own, we think that the interference of this court was justified and necessary, and the appeal should be dismissed." The Judge Ordinary, at p. 72, says: "These, then, are the grave misdeeds which, according to the argument of the appellant, are to warrant this court in deciding that Mrs. Kelly is to return to her husband and be subject again to that discipline which, in the opinion of all who saw her when she last escaped from it (an opinion, be it remembered, that Mr. Kelly does not even in argument question), would end in her paralysis or madness." Again, at p. 76: "The health and safety of the wife is no doubt the leading consideration," and "so much injustice, so much perversion of mind, such abiding rancour for so trifling a cause, so much deliberate oppression under provocation so slight, moral chastisement so severe, administered with so much system, maintained with such tenacity up to the brink of so perilous a danger to health, with so utter a disregard of consequences, and all to extort confession of motives of which there is no proof, and force repentance without consciousness of wrong, will probably never be exhibited again." That the decree proceeded on the ground of the great danger to the health of Mrs. Kelly is beyond controversy.

In the case we are now considering no injury to health or reasonable apprehension of it is alleged, or proved, or even suggested. If the point had been raised, the jury ought to have dealt with it, and it should have been left to them. This court cannot now say that there must be injury to the husband's health, and act upon any such inference. Kelly v. Kelly, therefore, cannot be relied upon by the respondent. We do not know of any other case to which it is necessary to refer. The present case is a case where the cruelty alleged is cruelty by the wife towards the husband. The difference of the sexes makes no essential difference in the principles applicable to the case. Dr. Lushington said, in Furlonger v. Furlonger: "Generally speaking, that would be cruelty if practised by a wife towards her husband which would be held to be cruelty if done by him towards her. I say generally speaking, for I think there must be some distinctions necessarily founded on the great difference between the sexes, and the power of the husband in ordinary circumstances to protect himself from the wife's violence; still the same great rule of danger to life or limb must prevail. In these as in all other cases of the same genus necessary protection is the foundation of all separation."

Mr. Deane in his very able argument for the respondent ventured on a definition of legal cruelty. He said the test was "whether the spouse complained of had so treated the complaining spouse and so manifested his or her feelings towards her or him as to cause a reasonable apprehension that the duties of married life could not be discharged, but married life must be unbearable if an order was made that married life should be resumed." Mr. Deane admitted that there was no case in the books which had so far extended the doctrine of legal cruelty. We are not prepared in the face of such a consistent body of authority arrayed against it, proceeding from the most eminent judges who have ever adorned the tribunals dealing with the subject, to authorize such a departure. If such an extension of the remedy is to be allowed, it seems to us that it is for the Legislature, or at any rate for the ultimate court of appeal, to take this important step in advance.

It is said this is an exceptional case, and so it may be; but if it is held that the conduct of the wife here constitutes legal cruelty, it would be difficult logically to say that any spouse who leaves the other spouse and charges him or her, and persists in so doing, with any serious criminal offence—viz., murder or larceny—without any justification for so doing, was not guilty of legal cruelty for words used without any suggestion of danger to life, limb, or health, and thereby entitled to a divorce a mensa et thoro, and, if coupled with the adultery of the husband, to a divorce a vinculo. Adhering to the definition of legal cruelty which, for the purposes of this case, we have laid down—viz., that there must be danger to life, limb, or health, present or proximate, by which we mean a reasonable apprehension of it, to constitute legal cruelty, we come to the conclusion that there was in this case no evidence of legal cruelty which ought to have been left to the jury, and that the respondent is not therefore entitled to the decree for a judicial separation which he prays in his answer.

We come now to the question of the wife's right to a decree for restitution of conjugal rights. Her case is simply this—viz., that, unless her husband is entitled to a decree for divorce or separation, she is entitled, as a matter of course, to a decree for restitution. She contends that the court has no discretion in the matter, and cannot by law refuse her relief in the case supposed, however detestable her conduct may have been, and although it is plain that her real object is not to live with her husband, but to procure a separation from him, and to compel him to make her an allowance. These are startling propositions, and they require careful examination. It will be convenient, first, to ascertain the ecclesiastical law on the subject before the passing of the Divorce Act, and then to inquire what modifications in that law were introduced by that Act, or have been made since. By the ecclesiastical law of this country, which was founded on the canon law, marriage has long been considered indissoluble. But judicial separation could be obtained by either party for adultery or cruelty on the part of the other. Unless, however, a judicial separation could be pronounced, the obligation of both husband and wife to live together was invariably recognized and was vigorously enforced. There are numerous cases in the books in which restitution of conjugal rights has been decreed at the instance of sometimes a husband and sometimes a wife whose conduct was unbearable, though falling short of cruelty in the technical sense of the word. (See, inter alia, Holmes v. Holmes, Oliver v. Oliver, Dysart v. Dysart, Simmons v. Simmons, 1 Robertson 566; Hayward v. Hayward, 1 Sw. and Tr. 81; Rippingall v. Rippingall.) The law on this subject will be found carefully investigated in Dysart v. Dysart and in a case which arose in Ireland in 1846, and to which we will refer. It is Seaver v. Seaver, 2 Sw. and Tr. 665, which was decided first in the Consistory Court of Dublin, and afterwards, on appeal, in the Court of Delegates. In this case both husband and wife had committed adultery. Neither, therefore, could obtain a divorce a mensa et thoro from the other, and it was held that the wife was entitled to a decree for restitution of conjugal rights. All the older authorities were there examined, and it was laid down in the clearest language that the ecclesiastical law of England recognized no middle state in the relation of husband and wife between that of consortium vita and divortium a mensa et thoro. It was in vain contended that in such a case as that before it the court ought not to interfere at the instance of either party against the other. The court held that, although the wife had committed adultery, yet she was entitled to a decree for restitution of conjugal rights so long as the relation of husband and wife subsisted and no decree for separation could be pronounced against her. Such we take to have been settled law previously to 1857, when the Divorce Act was passed. Cases were referred to in which the court allowed facts to be pleaded in answer to a suit for restitution of conjugal rights, although those facts would not have justified a decree for separation (Moore v. Moore, 3 Moore P. C. 84; Stace v. Stace, Woodey v. Woodey). But, although there are expressions in the judgments in those cases which point to a difference between suits for restitution and suits for separation, as regards particularity and certainty of pleading, and even cogency of evidence (Simmons v. Simmons), those cases do not warrant the inference that the court could or would refuse to decree restitution by reason of conduct falling short of adultery or cruelty in the technical sense. The question whether the ecclesiastical court had a discretion to refuse a decree for restitution on the ground of misconduct short of adultery or cruelty sufficient to warrant a decree for separation has been more than once considered, and we can find no case in which the court ever did refuse a decree for restitution where there was no sufficient ground for separation. In Seaver v. Seaver the court considered it had no discretion. (See also Westmeath v. Westmeath, Simmons v. Simmons, Rippingall v. Rippingall). In Dysart v. Dysart Dr. Lushington would not go so far as to say that extraordinary and unforeseen combinations of circumstances might not justify the court in holding its hand and not assisting either party, but he said in effect that such a course could only be justified on the improbability of safe cohabitation. Improbability of peace and happiness would not be sufficient. In none of the cases to which we have alluded did the question arise as to the right of husband or wife to a decree for restitution where the petitioner did not bonâ fide desire to resume cohabitation. The observations of Dr. Lushington in Simmons v. Simmons and in Dysart v. Dysart on the motives of the petitioner do not touch this point, which we pass over for the present, although we shall return to it. We pass now to the Divorce and Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857. Sections 2 and 6 transfer the jurisdiction previously exercised by the ecclesiastical courts in matrimonial matters to the new court created by that Act, and called the Court for Divorce and Matrimonial Causes. A new ground for separation—viz., desertion without cause for two years and upwards—was introduced by section 16 and by section 17. The new court is empowered upon petition to make a decree for restitution of conjugal rights or judicial separation on being satisfied of the truth of the allegations contained in the petition and that there is no legal ground why the same should not be granted. The use of the words "may decree," and not "shall degree," suggests an intention on the part of the Legislature to confer on the court a discretion as well as a power; but section 22 shows, we think, that no discretion which was not possessed by the ecclesiastical courts was intended to be conferred on the new court. The effect of that section is that the principles and rules acted on by the old courts in cases of restitution and separation are to be followed by the new court, subject to the creation of the new ground for separation by section 16, and to the new procedure by petition introduced by section 17, and to any rules which may be made under the authority of the Act. This construction of the sections is in accordance with Julius v. The Bishop of Oxford, 28 W. R. 726, 5 App. Cas. 214, and with decisions since the Act in suits for restitution of conjugal rights. In Burroughs v. Burroughs, Sir Cresswell Cresswell, and in Scott v. Scott, Lord Penzance, held that in a suit for restitution nothing short of a ground for separation afforded a defence to the respondent. In the recent Scotch appeal of Mackenzie v. Mackenzie, Lord Herschell expressed great doubt whether the rule not to refuse a decree for restitution of conjugal rights where no separation could be decreed was as inflexible and free from exception as the ecclesiastical courts held it to be. But, having regard to the numerous and weighty decisions in those courts, and to section 22 of the Divorce Act, and to the decisions upon it, we are not prepared to say that the law can be judicially held to be less rigid than we have stated, except in some cases which will be noticed presently. The only other alterations which have been made in the old law relating to suits for restitution of conjugal rights have been made by the Judicature Acts and by 47 & 48 Vict. c. 68. The effect of the Judicature Acts has been indirect, but at the same time very important. It is, however, confined to separation deeds. These, as is well known, were treated as illegal and void by the ecclesiastical courts. (See Westmeath v. Westmeath.) But when it was settled, as it ultimately was (see Besant v. Wood, 12 Ch. D. 605, 27 W. R. Dig. 95), that the Court of Chancery would restrain a suit for restitution of conjugal rights if brought contrary to a covenant not to institute such a suit, and when the Judicature Acts made the Divorce Court a division of the High Court and abolished injunctions to stay actions, and substituted in all branches of the High Court defences instead of such injunctions, it followed that a separation deed containing a covenant not to sue for restitution of conjugal rights became a defence to a suit for such restitution. (See Marshall v. Marshall, 27 W. R. 399, 5 P. D. 19; Clark v. Clark, 33 W. R. 405, 10 P. D. 188.) The Judicature Acts, however, have not altered the general principles on which the ecclesiastical courts acted in suits for restitution except in the particular to which we have alluded; and the alteration in the law as to separation deeds has really no bearing on the present case. We have alluded to it simply to show that we have not overlooked it.

There remains for consideration the Act of 1884 (47 & 48 Vict. c. 68), which was passed expressly to amend the law as to the restitution of conjugal rights in England. The Act in terms relates only to the consequences of not obeying a decree of restitution when made; it does not in terms refer in any way to the grounds upon which such a decree can be refused. The old process of attachment for enforcing obedience to such a decree when pronounced is abolished (section 2). In lieu of that process the court is empowered, if the respondent refuses to obey the decree, to order a proper provision to be made for the wife if she is the petitioner (section 2), or for the husband if he is petitioner (section 3). In addition, however, to this, it is enacted by section 5 that a respondent who refuses to obey the decree shall be deemed guilty of desertion without reasonable cause, and that a suit for separation may be forthwith instituted, although two years may not have elapsed since failure to comply with the decree. It becomes most important, therefore, to consider what is the effect of section 5 of the Act of 1884. In our judgment it has materially altered the old law as to restitution of conjugal rights, and has given the court a power to refuse a decree which it had not before.

By section 16 of the Matrimonial Causes Act of 1857 desertion is the first time made a ground for judicial separation, and is not governed by the old ecclesiastical law; but it is no ground for a sentence of judicial separation unless the desertion is without cause. If the wife were petitioning for a judicial separation here on the ground of desertion against her husband, her conduct towards him would disable her from contending that the desertion was without cause, and she would fail in the suit.

By section 5 of the Act of 1884 disobedience to a decree for restitution of conjugal rights is made equivalent to desertion without cause. If, therefore, the petitioner obtains a decree for restitution of conjugal rights, she will be at once entitled to institute a suit for judicial separation for the statutory desertion created by the Act of 1884, although she could not, under section 16 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857, have obtained such a decree unless it had been desertion without cause. We cannot think that such a result was ever intended, or that the necessity of proving absence of reasonable cause was intended to be taken away. It seems to us that since 1884, and by necessary implication, the court must have power to refuse a decree for restitution wherever the result will be to compel the court to treat one of the spouses as deserting the other without reasonable cause contrary to the real truth of the case. The practical consequence of this view of the Act of 1884 is that neither party obtains relief. Not the wife, because her conduct justifies the husband in saying that he has reasonable cause for refusing to live with her; not the husband, because his wife's conduct, bad as it has been, does not amount to cruelty in the legal sense of that term when speaking of grounds for divorce or separation. This state of things is anomalous, for before 1884 it was well settled that a respondent to a petition for restitution of conjugal rights was entitled to a separation if the petitioner failed to obtain relief. But this was because the only ground for failure was cruelty or adultery by the petitioner.

Now there is another ground introduced by necessary implication from the language of the Act of 1884, and analogy to the principles on which the ecclesiastical courts acted at first sight requires us to hold that as the petitioner fails in her application the respondent ought to succeed in his. The language of the Act of 1884 does not, however, warrant the inference that such a consequence as this was intended, and to hold that a respondent to a petition for restitution of conjugal rights is entitled to a judicial separation whenever the petitioner is refused relief would be so seriously to enlarge the grounds for separation that we do not feel justified in going so far. We are satisfied that such a result as that was never intended by Parliament. The court is bound to see that the Act is not used for a purpose for which it was never intended, and this principle, although it introduces an anomaly, compels us to refuse relief both to the wife and to the husband, even at the risk of being thought somewhat illogical.

The petition of the wife for restitution of conjugal rights and the counter-claim of the husband praying for a judicial separation must both be dismissed with costs, the costs of the one to be the set off against the costs of the other in the court below, and there will be no costs of appeal.

RIGBY, L.J.—The alleged cruelty in the case consists of charges of criminal offences of an infamous kind, persisted in after they had been found by the verdict of a jury to be untrue, and, as to the most important of them, brought forward and maintained under such circumstances as to preclude the belief that it was really thought by the wife to be true. No such case has ever before been brought before a court. For myself I can imagine no case of repeated insult or indignity more atrocious, and the question is whether it constitutes a case of legal cruelty. The judgment of Sir William Scott in Evans v. Evans is the leading authority on the subject. It has been quoted and relied upon from time to time, and, so far as I know, its accuracy has never been questioned as to any part of it, but it must be taken as a whole, and no one part can safely be left out of consideration. Sir William Scott begins by declining to define cruelty, and stating that it is the duty of the courts to keep the rule extremely strict; that the causes must be grave and weighty, and such as to show an absolute impossibility that the duties of married life can be discharged; that in a state of personal danger no duties can be discharged, "but what falls short of this is with great caution to be admitted." It is important to notice that he does not say that personal danger is absolutely necessary, and that nothing short of it can be admitted, but only that what falls short is to be admitted with great caution. It is clear that he thinks that there may be cases where there is no personal danger, though such cases would be very exceptional. Lower down he says: "What merely wounds the mental feelings is in few cases to be admitted, where they are not accompanied with bodily injury, either actual or menaced." This involves that, in his opinion, there may be exceptional cases in which, without bodily injury or threat of it, the injury to the mental feelings may be legal cruelty. He does not, of course, attempt to indicate those cases, but I cannot doubt that he would have included a case like the present, since I am unable to imagine a case where the injury to the mental feeling could possibly be greater. Further on he refers to the case of wounding, not the natural feelings, but the acquired feelings arising from particular rank and situation, and states that, though the courts will not absolutely exclude considerations of that sort where they are stated merely as matter of aggravation, yet they cannot constitute cruelty where it would not otherwise have existed. He made no such statement with reference to the wounding of ordinary mental feelings, and the difference of treatment of the two classes of cases is, in my judgment, significant and important. He then refers to the decided cases, saying: "In the older cases of this sort which I have had an opportunity of looking into I have observed that the danger of life, limb, or health is usually inserted as the ground upon which the court has proceeded to a separation. This doctrine has been repeatedly applied by the court in the cases that have been cited. The court has never been driven off this ground. It has always been jealous of the inconvenience of departing from it, and I have heard no one case cited in which the court has granted a divorce without proof given of a reasonable apprehension of bodily hurt." Now, as a description of the cases actually decided, this may be, and doubtless is, an accurate description. But it is certain that Sir William Scott did not intend to define legal cruelty; he expressly disclaims such an intention. If, indeed, there had been any decided case in which such charges as in the present case or verbal outrages of a similar nature had been considered before his time and treated as not constituting legal cruelty, the words used in this part of the judgment might be considered as a withdrawal of what he had before said. But no such case has been cited, and, indeed, since the time of Sir William Scott there have been, so far as I can find, only two cases in which verbal outrages of a nature at all comparable to those charged and proved in this case have been dealt with. I mean the cases of Bray v. Bray, decided by Sir John Nicholl in 1828, and Gale v. Gale, in which verbal charges of incest were made by a husband against a wife. In the first case Sir John Nicholl says: "It is not, I think, possible to conceive cruelty of a more grievous character (except, perhaps, great personal violence) than the accusation (of incest) made by this husband against his wife." Here it is important to observe that the reference to great personal violence makes it impossible to contend that Sir John Nicholl was not using the word "cruelty" in the sense of legal cruelty. In Gale v. Gale, which was, like Bray v. Bray, a case for divorce a mensa et thoro brought by a wife against a husband, where a charge of incest with a stepfather was made by the husband, Sir John Dodson said that "the charge of having committed incest is not per se sufficient to constitute legal cruelty," unless coupled with substantial acts of violence. I am altogether unable to reconcile that case with Bray v. Bray, and, for myself, I consider the earlier case as more in accordance with Evans v. Evans than the later. Of course there are numerous cases, including some decided by Sir William Scott himself, in which a general rule appears to have been laid down involving the necessity of violence or injury to health reasonably to be apprehended as a minimum for the establishment of legal cruelty, and there cannot be the slightest doubt that, as a general rule, covering the great—it may be the overwhelming—majority of cases, this is so. It appears to me that the existence of this general rule, which is pointed out by Sir William Scott as a good general outline of the canon law, as distinguished from a definition, accounts sufficiently for all the decisions and judgments referred to which must be considered with reference to the nature of the cases before the court. Nowhere do I find that a single judge has denied in direct language the possibility of extreme cases arising as pointed out in Evans v. Evans. I do not think that it is necessary for me to mention more than two other cases. The first is Paterson v. Paterson. This was a Scotch case; but, although it was said that in some decided cases the Scotch courts might have gone somewhat further than the English, the courts of both countries apply the same principles of the canon law, and I see no reason to question the statement of Lord Brougham that the law of both countries, so far as it is material for the present purpose, is the same. Lord Brougham's own opinion is plainly show by his observations (3 H. L. C., at pp. 328-9) to the effect that "if a husband, without any violence or threat of violence to the wife, without any maltreatment endangering life or health, or leading to an apprehension of danger to life or health, were to exercise mere tyranny, to utter constant insults, vituperation, scornful language, charges of gross offences (utterly groundless) . . . if such a case were to be made out, or even short of such a case—viz., injurious treatment which would make the married state impossible to be endured, rendering life itself almost unbearable, then I think the probability is very high that the Consistory Courts of this country would so far relax the rigour of their negative rule, at present somewhat vague, as to extend the remedy of a divorce a mensa et thoro to a case such as I have put." But I wish particularly to call attention to the actual order of the House. The Lord Ordinary had dismissed the action "in respect the libel is laid upon a series of insults and indignities said to have been offered by the defender to the pursuer, unaccompanied with personal violence, or any menace thereof; and that, without an allegation to that effect, it appears to be settled, on authorities which the Lord Ordinary is not entitled to question, that a libel at the instance of a wife against a husband founded on such averments as those now urged is not relevant." Lord Brougham said, with reference to this: "That, my lords, is not the law of Scotland; it is not the law of England; it is an inaccurate statement of the law in both countries; though I will not say that the law of Scotland, as far as decided cases go, may not extend somewhat further than our law in favour of the remedy." The words quoted were ordered to be struck out of the finding of the Lord Ordinary, which was otherwise confirmed. They appear to me to raise the very question whether there may not be a series of insults and indignities, independently of violence or the menace thereof, capable in themselves of amounting to legal cruelty. The other case to which I wish to refer is Milner v. Milner, decided by Sir C. Cresswell in 1852. There, no doubt, there had been an assault, but not one of an aggravated nature such as to create pain or injury to health. The gravamen of the charge was the indignity to the wife of treating her publicly as a prostitute, and it is this, to my mind, which Sir C. Cresswell characterizes as "gross and abominable cruelty." That gross and abominable insult can only be called "cruelty" when it is accompanied by an assault not in itself sufficient to constitute legal cruelty appears to me so revolting a conclusion that I am glad that I do not feel myself constrained by authority to support it. In words taken from the judgment of Sir W. Scott in Evans v. Evans, I say that the charges established are grave and weighty, and such as to show an absolute impossibility that the duties of married life can be discharged. Disputes would inevitably arise between this ill-assorted pair, and I have no confidence or belief that, under provocation, a wife of the temper of the petitioner for restitution would not repeat, while I feel certain that the husband would be under the constant and reasonable apprehension of the repetition of, the infamous charges already made. I see no possibility under such circumstances of the duties of married life being fulfilled. It is about as clear as anything future can be that this husband and wife will never live together, even though a decree for restitution were granted. But the only hypothesis on which such a decree can be granted is that they are to do so, and I see no possibility of that taking place with safety to either the one or the other. I go further, and say that to force the husband and wife into the intimacy of married life with such charges existing, and not unlikely to be repeated—for I give no weight to withdrawals by counsel at the crisis of a case—would raise a state of personal danger to one or the other of the parties, it matters not which.

I think that the jury had good ground for the conclusion at which they arrived, that there was cruelty on the part of the wife entitling the husband to a judicial separation.

Solicitors, Valpy, Chaplin, & Peckham; Vandercom, Hardy, Oatway, & Doulton.

High Court of Justice.

Q. B. Div.
(Lord Russell of Killowen, C.J., Pollock, B., and Wright, J.)

Aug. 1; Dec. 7.

BUCKLER (Appellant) v. WILSON (Respondent). (a.)

Adulteration—Margarine—Sale contrary to section 6—Article not purchased for test purposes—Delivery to purchaser in borough—Jurisdiction of county justices—Time for service of summons—Margarine Act, 1887 (50 & 51 Vict. c. 29), ss. 6, 17, 12—Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 63), ss. 6, 12, 14, 20, 21, 28—Sale of Food and Drugs Act Amendment Act, 1879 (42 & 43 Vict. c. 30), s. 10—Poor Law Amendment Act, 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 106), s. 27—Municipal Corporations Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 50), s. 154.

B. contracted to supply the Guardians of the Poor of the Louth Union with "good fresh butter," and on the 10th of December, 1894, delivered, under such contract, butter at the union workhouse. On the following day it was examined by the committee, and, in the absence of the defendant, one pound of it was divided into three parts, of which one part was sent to an analyst, one part was kept by the Guardians, and one part was taken to B.'s shop, and left there with a letter notifying what had been done. Both B. and the purchasers resided within the borough of Louth, which is one of the parishes in the Louth Union, and does not possess a separate court of quarter sessions.

The analyst to whom one part of the butter was sent certified that it contained 25 per cent. of margarine. An information was preferred against B. for selling margarine otherwise than as prescribed by section 6 of the Margarine Act, 1887. The case was heard and determined by the county justices, who convicted B.

Held, that as the article in question was not purchased "with the intention of submitting the same to analysis," but was sold and delivered for consumption under a contract, compliance with section 14 of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875, was not necessary as a condition precedent to the prosecution under the Margarine Act, 1887.

Held also, that the county justices had jurisdiction to hear and determine the case under 30 & 31 Vict. c. 106, s. 27, and 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 76, s. 111 (now in substance section 154 of 45 & 46 Vict. c. 50); and that section 20 of the Food and Drugs Act, 1875, merely says that the person "may" take proceedings "in the place where the article or drug sold was actually delivered to the purchaser."

Held further, that as the justices had found as a fact that margarine is not a perishable article, and that it was not purchased for test purposes, it was not necessary that the summons should have been served under section 10 of the Food and Drugs Act, 1879, within twenty-eight days from the time of the purchase.

Parsons v. Birmingham Dairy Co., 30 W. R. 748, 9 Q. B. D. 172, dissented from.

Guardians of Enniskillen v. Hilliard, 14 L. R. Ir. 214, approved.

Case stated by justices.

At a court of summary jurisdiction at Louth, in the county of Lincoln, on the 23rd of January, 1895, an information dated the 18th of January, 1895, preferred by Porter Wilson, clerk to the Guardians of Louth, and who is the respondent in this case, against H. Buckler, a grocer, the appellant, was heard and determined.

The information stated "that the appellant, on the 8th of December, 1894, did unlawfully sell margarine by retail otherwise than in a packet duly branded or durably marked in the manner prescribed by section 6 of the Margarine Act, 1887, and did not deliver the same to the purchaser in or with a paper wrapper on which was printed . . . 'Margarine' contrary to the form of the statute in such case made and provided."

The appellant was convicted, and fined £5 and costs.

The facts of the case as set out in the judgment are as follow:—

Upon the hearing of the information it was proved that the appellant had entered into a contract with the Guardians of the Poor of the Louth Union for the supply of "good fresh butter, English"; that on Saturday, the 8th of December, 1894, the appellant, under his contract, delivered 39lb. of butter (or margarine) at the union workhouse in Louth; that on the following Monday, the 10th of December, 1894, the butter (or margarine) was examined by the workhouse visiting committee, and 1lb. of it was on the same day, in the absence of the defendant, divided into three parts, each part being wrapped in a separate paper. One part was taken by the master of the workhouse to the appellant's shop at Louth, and, the appellant not being there at the time, the master left it with a letter, of which the following is a copy: "December 10, 1894.—At a meeting of the house committee of the Louth Union this morning the butter supplied by you was examined, and a pound of it cut into three parts; one of such parts will be sent to an analyst, one will be kept by the Guardians, and the third I have been instructed to bring to you. I am, sir, most respectfully yours, John T. Crowson, Master." The butter or margarine was sold by retail otherwise than in a package duly branded or durably marked in the manner prescribed by section 6 of the Margarine Act, 1887, and the appellant did not deliver the same to the purchaser in or with a paper wrapper on which was printed in capital letters, not less than a quarter of an inch square, "Margarine." It was also proved that by the directions of the Guardians one of the sealed samples of butter (or margarine) was sent by post (registered) to Dr. Muter, public analyst for the administrative county, and a certificate from him was produced in which he stated that the sample of butter received from the Guardians of the Louth Union for analysis, in his opinion, contained seventy-five parts of butter and twenty-five parts of margarine.

(a.) Reported by E. G. STILLWELL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

It was contended before the justices on the part of the appellant that they, being county justices, had no jurisdiction to hear and determine the case on the ground that the workhouse of the Louth Union and the place where the goods were supplied from and delivered to the purchasers and the places where the defendant lived and carried on business were situated within the borough of Louth, and that the proceedings should have been commenced before the magistrates for the borough of Louth, and that section 20 of 38 & 39 Vict. c. 63 applied.

On the part of the respondent it was contended that the justices had jurisdiction on two distinct grounds: (1) that the borough of Louth being one of the parishes comprised in the Louth Union, section 27 of 30 & 31 Vict. c. 106 applied to these proceedings; and (2) that as no separate court of quarter sessions had been granted to the borough of Louth the county justices had concurrent jurisdiction (5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 76, s. 111). [Now section 154 of 45 & 46 Vict. c. 50.]

It was also contended on the part of the appellant that the summons had not been legally issued, and that the Margarine Act, 1887, required the same steps to be taken as were required in proceedings under the Food and Drugs Acts, 1875 and 1879—namely, the service of the summons within twenty-eight days from the time of the purchase for test purposes—and that this had not been done, as the alleged offence was committed on the 8th of December, 1894, and the summons was issued and served on the 18th of January, 1895, and returnable and heard on the 23rd of January, 1895.

On the part of the respondent it was contended (1) that section 10 of 42 and 43 Vict. c. 30 (Food and Drugs Act, 1879) did not apply to proceedings under the Margarine Act, 1887; (2) that butter is not a perishable article within the meaning of the Food and Drugs Acts; and (3) that the butter (or margarine) the subject of the proceedings was not purchased for "test purposes."

It was also contended on the part of the appellant that it was necessary to the proceedings that there should be notification forthwith as required by section 14 of 38 & 39 Vict. c. 63 (Food and Drugs Act, 1875), and also that there ought to have been an offer to divide in the presence of the defendant or his agent then and there, that each part should be marked and sealed, and that the letter of the 10th of December, 1894, was not a sufficient notification as to analysis.

On the part of the respondent it was contended (1) that section 14 did not apply to these proceedings, inasmuch as the butter (or margarine) was not purchased "with the intention of submitting the same to analysis."

The justices were of opinion (1) that as justices of the peace acting in and for the Parts of Lindsey, in the county of Lincoln, they had concurrent jurisdiction with the borough justices in the borough of Louth (such borough not having a separate court of quarter sessions); (2) that jurisdiction was given them to adjudicate in this case by section 27 of 30 & 31 Vict. c. 106; (3) that the Margarine Act, 1887, does not require the same steps to be taken as are required in proceedings under the Food and Drugs Acts, 1875 and 1879; (4) that butter is not "a perishable article" within the meaning of the Food and Drugs Act; (5) that the butter (or margarine) was not purchased for "test purposes"; (6) that section 14 of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875, does not apply to these proceedings for the reason that the article was not purchased "with the intention of submitting the same to analysis."

The questions for the opinion of the court were:—

(1) Whether the county justices had jurisdiction to hear and determine the case.

(2) Whether the Margarine Act, 1887, requires the same steps to be taken as are required in proceedings under the Food and Drugs Acts, 1875 and 1879.

(3) Whether section 14 of 38 & 39 Vict. c. 63 (Food and Drugs Act, 1875) is applicable, the article not having been purchased with the intention of submitting the same to analysis.

H. D. Bonsey, for the appellant.

Stanger, Q.C., for the respondent.

The arguments sufficiently appear in the judgment.

Cur. adv. vult.

Dec. 7.—Lord RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN, C.J., after stating the facts of the case, read the following judgment:—The first point raised by the appellant was that the justices, being county justices, had no jurisdiction to hear and determine the case, on the ground that under section 20 of the Food and Drugs Act, 1875, the proceedings should have been commenced before the magistrates for the borough of Louth, in which was situate the workhouse "where the article sold was actually delivered to the purchaser." The section runs thus: "When the analyst, having analyzed any article, shall have given his certificate of the result, from which it may appear that an offence against some one of the provisions of this Act has been committed, the person causing the analysis to be made may take proceedings for the recovery of the penalty herein imposed for such offence before any justices in petty sessions assembled having jurisdiction in the place where the article or drug sold was actually delivered to the purchaser, in a summary manner." It should first of all be noticed that the section merely says "may take proceedings," but, further, I think that under section 27 of 30 & 31 Vict. c. 106, and section 111 of 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 76* the justices clearly had jurisdiction.

The second point raised by the appellant was that margarine was a perishable article within the meaning of section 10 of the Food and Drugs Act Amendment Act, 1879, and that under that section the summons should have been served within twenty-eight days from the time of the purchase for test purposes. The magistrates, however, have found as facts that margarine is not a perishable article, and that the purchase was not made for test purposes. We cannot set aside these findings, as there is no evidence before us on which we could say they were wrong. It follows that the summons need not have been served within twenty-eight days under section 10, and no contention was made before the magistrates that it was not served within a reasonable time. It is, moreover, at least doubtful whether section 10 of the Act of 1879 applies to proceedings under the Margarine Act.

*5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 76, has been repealed, but the substance of section 111 has been re-enacted in section 154 of the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 50).

I now come to the substantial question raised by the appellant—viz., whether compliance with section 14 of the Food and Drugs Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 63), is necessary as a condition precedent to a prosecution under the Act. Proceedings under the Margarine Act, 1887, are by section 12 of that Act to be the same as prescribed by sections 12 to 28 inclusive, of the Food and Drugs Act, 1875. Section 14 of the latter Act is as follows: "The person purchasing any article with the intention of submitting the same to analysis shall, after the purchase shall have been completed, forthwith notify to the seller, or his agent selling the article, his intention to have the same analyzed by the public analyst, and shall offer to divide the article into three parts, to be then and there separated, and each part to be marked and sealed or fastened up in such manner as its nature will permit, and shall, if required to do so, proceed accordingly, and shall deliver one of the parts to the seller or his agent." Now it is clear that if that section is applicable to this case its provisions were not complied with, and the conviction by the magistrates is wrong. But is it so applicable? I think not, for the magarine in question was not purchased by the Guardians "with the intention of submitting the same to analysis." It was delivered to them, as the case states, under a contract for the regular supply to them of good fresh butter. But the appellant's contention is that a prosecution for an offence against the Act can only be maintained where a sample has been purchased, whether by an officer under the Act or by a private individual, with a view of submitting the same to analysis. With this contention I do not agree, though it must be confessed the question is by no means free from the difficulty which constantly arises in construing many Acts of Parliament—namely, the difficulty of reconciling several different and loosely drawn sections. I cannot think, having regard to the scope of the Margarine Act and of the Food and Drugs Act and to the offences set out in section 6 of the latter and sections 6 and 7 of the former Act, that it was the intention of the Legislature that a prosecution should be confined within such narrow limits as those contended for. For example, by section 7 of the Margarine Act, "every person dealing with, selling, or exposing, or offering for sale, or having in his possession for the purpose of sale any quantity of margarine contrary to the provisions of the Act shall be liable to conviction for an offence against the Act." Could anything be wider than this? And yet can it in reason be said to be necessary that, for the purposes of a prosecution for "exposing, or offering for sale, or for having in his possession for the purpose of sale," a sample shall have been purchased for the purpose of analysis and analyzed as described in the Food and Drugs Act, 1875 (section 14)? The Act does not limit the initiation of a prosecution to the purchase of a sample with a view to analysis; and, having regard to the offences the Margarine Act was aimed at and to its preamble, I cannot think it was so intended. The chief difficulty is raised by sections 20 and 21 of the Food and Drugs Act, 1875, which, dealing generally with proceedings under that Act, certainly at first sight seem to imply that the formalities prescribed by section 14 have taken place. It seems to me, however, that the effect of section 21 is merely to make the production of a certificate of an analysis under section 14 of itself sufficient evidence of the facts therein stated. There is nothing in the Act to prevent the proof of an offence by other satisfactory evidence, nor is it necessary that the purchaser should obtain the certificate of the "public analyst" except where he purchases "with an intention" of submitting to analysis. Section 12 merely gives him the right on certain payments to claim an analysis from the public analysts. Finally, it may be pointed out that by section 28 of the Food and Drugs Act, 1875, nothing in the Act is to "take away any other remedy against an offender under this Act." On this part of the case two decisions were cited to us—one, Parsons v. Birmingham Dairy Co., 30 W. R. 748; 9 Q. B. D. 172, in which Field and Cave, JJ., not expressly, but inferentially, decided that section 14 applies to every purchaser, whether purchasing with the intention obtaining an analysis or not; the other, Guardians of Enniskillen v. Hilliard, 14 L. R. Ir. 214, 33 W. R. Dig. 6, in which Dowse, B., and Andrews, J., expressly dissented from that decision. I wish to say that I agree with the reasoning of the learned judges in the Irish case, and I entirely adopt the view of the Act expressed by them. It seems to me that to adopt the contention of the appellant in this case would be to largely restrict the operation of a salutary Act, and to exclude that class of cases of which the present is an example, where there is a contract for the delivering of provisions within the Act which may extend over a considerable period of time, and also the class of cases in which provisions are purchased from time to time in small bulk without any suspicion at the time of purchase of any deceit being practised by the seller. I cannot think this is the true construction of the Act.

The appeal will therefore be dismissed, with costs.

POLLOCK, B., and WRIGHT, J., concurred.

Appeal dismissed with costs.

Solicitors for the appellant, E. H. Wyles, for John Barker, Great Grimsby.

Solicitors for the respondent, Kime & Hammond, for Wilson & Sons, Louth.

Q. B. Div.
Commercial Causes.
(Mathew, J.)

Nov. 27, 28; Dec. 2.

FRANCIS v. BOULTON. (a.)

Insurance—Marine insurance—Goods—Partial or total loss—How partial loss calculated—Costs of conditioning—Average.

A cargo of rice on board a lighter was insured by a policy wherein the rice was valued at £450. While the policy was in force the lighter was sunk by perils insured against, and the rice damaged. The damaged rice was afterwards kiln-dried at a cost of £68, and sold as damaged rice for £111, being almost one-third of its sound value.

Held, that the rice was not a total loss, but a partial loss only; and that the mode of ascertaining the partial loss was to obtain the difference between the sound value and the price which the damaged rice actually fetched, without deducting the cost of the kiln-drying; the proportion of this loss to the sound value is the proportion of the value in the policy to which the assured is entitled.

Commercial cause.

(a.) Reported by Sir SHERSTON BAKER, Bart., Barrister-at-Law.

The following statement of the facts is taken from the written judgment of the learned judge.

The action was an action brought against an underwriter on a policy of marine insurance, dated the 18th of May, 1892, to recover for a loss of goods occasioned by the sinking of a lighter in the River Thames.

The plaintiff, who was a lighterman, had effected a policy at Lloyd's on goods, as interest might appear, to cover the risks of transit in his lighters between Tilbury and Hammersmith. The policy contained the following clause: "Warranted free from particular average, unless the vessel or craft is stranded, sunk, on fire, or in collision. The collision to be of such a nature as may reasonably be considered to have occasioned damage to cargo. Each cargo on lighter to be deemed a separate insurance, but to pay warehousing, forwarding, and special charges if incurred, as well as partial loss arising from transhipment."

On the 30th of January, 1893, the plaintiff's barge, the Intent, took on board 630 bags of rice to be carried to Hammersmith, and a declaration was made upon the policy, and the rice valued at £450.

The lighter in the course of her transit to Hammersmith, and while the goods were covered by the policy, came into collision with the steamer Ulleswater, and was in danger of sinking. An attempt was made to beach her, but she filled and sank, and the rice remained under water for two tides. Notice was at once given to the underwriter, and Mr. Frost, the representative of the Salvage Association, was employed to attend to the matter on his behalf.

The lighter was floated, and, after temporary repairs, proceeded to her destination, where the cargo was tendered to the owners. They refused to accept it. An offer was made to purchase the damaged rice for about £50, but this offer was refused; and under the advice of Frost, and with the approval of the underwriter, it was determined that the rice should be kiln-dried and sold.

The kiln-drying cost £68 11s. 8d., and the rice was sold as "river-damaged, kiln-dried, rough, broken rice," and fetched £111 4s. 2d.

The present action was brought to settle disputes which arose between the plaintiff and his underwriter (1) as to whether there had been a total loss of the goods or only a partial loss; (2) as to the mode in which the partial loss should be ascertained. (There was also a third question as to the costs of an unsuccessful action by the plaintiff against the Ulleswater).

Lawson Walton, Q.C., and C. C. Scott, for the plaintiff.—The rice was completely damaged and had lost its merchantable character as rice. There was therefore a total loss, and not a partial loss merely: Asfar v. Blundell, ante, p. 130; Roux v. Salvador, 3 Bing. N. C. 266; Lidgett v. Secretan, 19 W. R. 1068, L. R. 6 C. P. 616. As to the second point, how the partial loss, assuming that there was only a partial loss, is to be estimated, our contention is that we are entitled to deduct the cost of conditioning the rice—namely, the £68, and the partial loss is to be estimated on the basis of contrasting the sound value with the damaged value of the rice, that is, its value on arrival in its then damaged condition. We have to contrast the sound value of the goods upon their arrival with what the goods would have actually fetched if sold on arrival in their damaged condition, without taking into account the cost of conditioning. The rice, after being conditioned, was sold for £111. We have to deduct the cost of the kiln-drying, and we get about £40 odd, which we say is the damaged value.

Joseph Walton, Q.C., and J. A. Hamilton, for the defendant.—There was a partial loss only of the rice, and not a total loss. The case of Asfar v. Blundell entirely supports the view that there was here only a partial loss. There it was held that there was a total loss of the goods, which were dates, upon the ground that the dates had completely lost their merchantable character as dates, and that that character could not have been restored by any conditioning. Here the rice was still rice, although damaged, and it arrived in specie as rice, which is the test whether the loss is total or partial: Roux v. Salvador; Arnould on Marine Insurance, p. 1011; Glennie v. The London Assurance Co., 2 Man. & S. 371. The second point is as to the mode of calculating a partial loss, assuming that there was a partial loss only. We submit that the true principle for estimating a partial loss is that laid down in Johnson v. Sheddon, 2 East 581, which has ever since been followed by average adjusters in practice. That principle is to contrast the sound value of the goods with the value which the goods have actually fetched when sold in their damaged condition. In this case we have, according to that principle, to contrast the sound value with the £111, which the damaged rice was actually sold for; and the cost of conditioning ought not to be deducted. The difference between the sound value and the damaged value so estimated, without deducting the cost of the kiln-drying, is the proportion of the value in the policy which is payable by the underwriter: Arnould, p. 930.

Lawson Walton, Q.C., replied.

Cur. adv. vult.

Dec. 2.—MATHEW, J., read the following judgment. [Having stated the facts his lordship proceeded:—] It was agreed by counsel that the principles upon which the claims in this action should be dealt with should be decided by me, and that the figures should be settled in accordance with the judgment by the average adjusters for the plaintiff and defendant respectively. With respect to the first question—namely, whether there was a total loss of the goods, reliance was placed on the evidence of the plaintiff and Mr. Frost, who described the rice after it had been immersed for two tides as unmerchantable as sound rice, smelling offensively, and as unfit for food. But as against this the defendant relied on the fact that the offer for the purchase of the damaged rice had been refused, and that Frost and the plaintiff had sanctioned the kiln-dying of the rice as the best course to be taken in the interest of all concerned. The plaintiff relied upon the judgment of Lord Esher, M.R., in Asfar v. Blundell, and on the cases of Roux v. Salvador, and Lidgett v. Secretan; while on the other hand, reliance was placed for the defendant on the class of cases of which Glennie v. The London Assurance Co. most closely resembled the present. I am of opinion that there was not a total loss of the rice, and that the loss was partial only. The case is distinguished from Asfar v. Blundell by the fact that the rice was capable of being conditioned, and that when kiln-dried it was sold as rice and fetched about a third of its sound value.

The second question—namely, the principle upon which the amount of the partial loss was to be ascertained, gave rise to considerable argument. The plaintiff's case was that his claim in respect of the partial loss amounted to 77 per cent. of the sum insured, while the underwriters assessed the claim at about 57 per cent. It was hardly disputed that the right mode of ascertaining the percentage of liability in this case was by contrasting the sound value with the damaged value at the date of loss; and it was said for the plaintiff that the damaged value was the amount which the goods would fetch if sold on arrival in their then condition. In other words, that the damaged value should be taken to be what the goods would have fetched, less the costs and charges of kiln-drying, which would work out at about £40. The defendant relied on the principles laid down in Johnson v. Sheddon, and insisted that the correct mode of calculating the partial loss was by ascertaining the percentage of difference between the gross value of the goods when sound and when damaged, and that the sound value in this case should be compared with £111 4s. 2d., the sum which the damaged goods actually fetched. Three gentlemen of experience as average adjusters gave evidence that this was the method of adjusting such a loss invariably adopted; and I am satisfied that in principle the practice of average adjusters in this respect is right. It is to be borne in mind that under the suing and labouring clause the underwriter is liable for costs reasonably incurred in conditioning the damaged goods, and therefore it would not be just, as between him and the assured, to calculate the loss for which he was liable on the value of the goods when unconditioned. Thus, suppose the sound value of the goods to be £1,000, their damaged value unconditioned £500, and their value when conditioned £750; as the underwriters would have to pay the cost of conditioning, the loss to the owners would be 25 per cent. of the insured value; but if the argument for the plaintiff was right, the loss would be 50 per cent. Upon this second question my judgment is therefore in favour of the defendant.

Judgment for defendant.

Solicitors for the plaintiff, Drake, Son, & Parton.

Solicitors for the defendant, Thomas Cooper & Co.

Q. B. Div.
(Pollock, B., and Wright, J.)

July 29, 1895.

THE BRITISH INSULATED WIRE CO. (LIMITED) v. THE PRESCOT URBAN DISTRICT COUNCIL. (a.)

Local government—Illegal contract—Contract with local authority — No penalty clause — Right of action—Public Health Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55), s. 174 (2).

The Public Health Act, 1875, s. 174 (2), enacts that with respect to contracts made by an urban authority under that Act the contract shall specify some pecuniary penalty to be paid in case the terms of the contract are not duly performed.

Held, that this provision is not directory, but is peremptory. An action will therefore not lie against a local authority for money due under a contract which does not contain a penalty clause.

Special case stated in an action, and raising questions of law for the opinion of the court.

On the 12th of November, 1892, an agreement was entered into between the Local Board for the district of Prescot, in the county of Lancaster, and the plaintiff company, whereby it was agreed that the plaintiff company should efficiently, by means of electricity, for the period of five years from the 1st of January, 1893, light the streets, courts, alleys, and places in the said district theretofore lighted by means of gas. The agreement provided for the number of lamps to be supplied by the plaintiff company, and the payment to be made by the Local Board therefor, and the agreement further provided that if the Local Board desired to extend the lighting of the streets in any part of their district theretofore not lighted by gas, the plaintiff company should provide the light in consideration of an additional annual payment to be agreed upon, or in default of agreement to be fixed by arbitration. The agreement provided that all disputes arising thereunder should be settled by arbitration.

The agreement was sealed by both parties thereto with their respective seals, but the agreement contained no penalty clause.

The plaintiff company carried out the agreement by supplying electric light from the 1st of January, 1893, until the 31st of March, 1895, and were paid the amounts payable in accordance with the terms of the agreement for the supply of light to the end of the quarter ending on the 30th of June, 1894. The amount so paid was £553 1s. 3d. in all.

This action was brought to recover the sum of £278 9s. 9d. claimed to be payable under the agreement for the supply of electric light from the 1st of July, 1894, to the 31st of March, 1895. The plaintiff company had duly supplied the lights, &c., stipulated for by the agreement, and also the extra lamps claimed for; and if the contract was valid and binding upon the defendants and enforceable against them, the plaintiff company would be entitled to the said sum of £278 9s. 9d.

The Prescot Local Board was an urban authority under the Public Health Act, 1875, and the agreement was a contract made under that Act.

By virtue of sections 21 (1) and 85 (5) of the Local Government Act, 1894, the defendants were the same corporate body as the Prescot Local Board, under a new name.

The question for the opinion of the court was whether the agreement was void or not binding upon or not enforceable against the defendants by reason that the agreement did not specify some pecuniary penalty to be paid in case the terms of the agreement were not duly performed. It was agreed that the court should give judgment in the action in accordance with its opinion on this question of law.

The Public Health Act, 1875, s. 174, enacts that "with respect to contracts made by an urban authority under this Act, the following regulations shall be observed—namely: (2) Every such contract shall specify the work, materials, matters, or things to be furnished, had, or done, the price to be paid, and the time or times within which the contract is to be performed, and shall specify some pecuniary penalty to be paid in case the terms of the contract are not duly performed."

Arkle (Lawson Walton Q.C., with him), for the plaintiff company, contended that the provisions of section 174 (2) of the Public Health Act, 1875, were merely directory, and not peremptory. The intention of the Legislature was that the contract should contain some provision for the purpose of liquidating damages. That was provided for in this case by the arbitration clause.

He referred to Melliss v. Shirley Local Board, 34 W. R. 187, 16 Q. B. D. 446; Nowell v. Mayor, &c., of Worcester, 9 Ex. 457, 2 W. R. Dig. 190; Young v. Mayor, &c., of Royal Leamington Spa, 31 W. R. 925, 8 App. Cas. 517.

WRIGHT, J., referred to Attorney-General v. Gaskell, 31 W. R. 135, 22 Ch. D. 537.

Danckwerts, for the defendants, was not called upon to argue.

(a.) Reported by F. O. ROBINSON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

POLLOCK, B.—I am of opinion that in this case our judgment must be for the defendants. The provisions in sub-section 2 of section 174 of the Public Health Act, 1875, are not merely directory, but are essential to every contract entered into by an urban authority. No valid reason has been shown why when the Legislature has expressly required certain things to be done we are to construe that as a voluntary matter. It is quite true that it has been held that sub-sections 3 and 4 of section 174 are directory only. But there is a distinction between these sub-sections and sub-section 2, for they relate to the things to be done before any contract is entered into, and done by the urban authority only the contractor having nothing to do with the matters mentioned.

WRIGHT, J.—I am of the same opinion.

*Judgment for the defendants.

Solicitors for plaintiff company, Morris, Allens, & Chapman, for F. J. Leslie & Co., Liverpool.

Solicitors for defendants, Chester, Mayhew, Broome, & Griffiths, for Henry Cross, Liverpool.

House of Lords.

From C. A. (England). Dec. 5.

TREGO AND ANOTHER v. HUNT. (a.)

Partnership — Goodwill — Vendor and purchaser — Making list of customers with view to use after expiration of partnership—Injunction.

Although a person who has sold the goodwill of his business is not thereby precluded from starting a similar business, yet he is not at liberty to solicit custom from the old customers specifically. And this is equally so when partners have agreed that the goodwill shall on the expiration of the partnership belong exclusively to one of the partners.

Labouchere v. Dawson, 20 W. R. 309, L. R. 13 Eq. 322, followed.

Pearson v. Pearson, 32 W. R. 1006, 27 Ch. D. 145, overruled.

Decision of the Court of Appeal, 43 W. R. 371, [1895] 1 Ch. 462, reversed.

This was an appeal by the plaintiffs from the Court of Appeal (43 W. R. 371, [1895] 1 Ch. 462) affirming a decision of Stirling, J. (reported 43 W. R. 263).

The facts were shortly as follows. The appellants, Mrs. Trego, W. W. Smith, and the respondent were partners under a partnership agreement, dated the 13th of February, 1889, which provided that the appellants and the respondent should carry on the business under the old style of Tabor, Trego, & Co. for a term of seven years, and also that the goodwill should nevertheless be and remain the sole property of Mrs. Trego.

In December of last year it came to the knowledge of the appellants that the respondent had employed a clerk of the firm, out of office hours, to copy for him the names, addresses, and businesses of all the firm's customers.

The appellants brought this action, and moved for an injunction to restrain the respondent from making copies of or extracts from the partnership books for any purpose other than the business of the partnership.

It was admitted by the respondent that his object in having the copy made was to acquire information which would enable him to canvass the customers of the firm for his own rival business when the partnership came to an end.

Stirling, J., and the Court of Appeal refused the injunction, following Pearson v. Pearson, 32 W. R. 1006, 27 Ch. D. 115, which was binding upon them.

Graham Hastings, Q.C., and H. H. Cozens-Hardy, Q.C. (O. Leigh Clare with them) for the appellants.—Labouchere v. Dawson, 20 W. R. 309, L. R. 13 Eq. 322, is good law, and Pearson v. Pearson, 32 W. R. 1006, 27 Ch. D. 145, is wrong: Labouchere v. Dawson was approved in Ginesi v. Cooper, 14 Ch. D. 596, 28 W. R. Dig. 109; Leggott v. Barrett, 28 W. R. 962, 15 Ch. D. 306; Mogford v. Courtenay, 29 W. R. 864; Walker v. Mottram, 30 W. R. 165, 19 Ch. D. 355.

They also cited Shackle v. Baker, 14 Ves. 468; Cruttwell v. Lye, 17 Ves. 335; Kennedy v. Lee, 3 Mer. 452; Churton v. Douglas, 7 W. R. 365, Johns. 174; Cook v. Collingridge, Jac. 607, Collyer on Partnership, 2nd ed., p. 209; and Johnson v. Helleley, 13 W. R. 220, 2 De G. J. & S. 446.

Sir R. E. Webster, Q.C., and Buckley, Q.C. (G. Henderson with them), for the respondent.—Pearson v. Pearson is in accordance with Cruttwell v. Lye and the earlier authorities. Labouchere v. Dawson went far beyond what had previously been held.

They also cited Dawson v. Beeson, 31 W. R. 537, 22 Ch. D. 504, and Hall v. Barrows, 12 W. R. 322, 4 De G. J. & S. 150.

Cozens-Hardy replied.

The House took time for consideration.

Cur. adv. vult.

LORD HERSCHELL.—A very important question, which has given rise to much difference of judicial opinion, presents itself for decision in the present case. For some years prior to 1876 William Henry Trego, the husband of the appellant Anna Trego, had carried on business as a varnish and japan manufacturer, at Bow and in London, under the name of Tabor, Trego, & Co. In that year he took the respondent into partnership, but upon the terms that the goodwill of the business should be and remain the sole property of William Henry Trego. The partnership continued until his death. In February, 1889, a partnership agreement was made between the appellants and the respondent that they should carry on the business under the old style of Tabor, Trego, & Co., for a term of seven years. The agreement provided that the goodwill should nevertheless be and remain the sole property of Anna Trego. In December of last year the appellants found that the respondent had employed a clerk of the firm, out of office hours, to copy for him the names, addresses, and businesses of all the firm's customers. The respondent admits that his object in having the copy made was to acquire information which would enable him, when the partnership comes to an end, to canvass these persons, and to endeavour to obtain their custom for himself. The appellants accordingly brought this action, and moved for an injunction to restrain the respondent from making copies of or extracts from the partnership books for any purposes other than the business of the partnership.

Stirling, J., in the course of his judgment, said: "It has been admitted in the argument, and for the purposes of it, that the defendant intends, in the event of the partnership coming to an end at the beginning of next year, to use this list for the purpose of soliciting the customers of the present firm. He proposes then to engage in a business of a similar nature to that carried on by the firm, and the question which I have to decide is whether he is entitled to make such a use of the list." It seems clear, therefore, that the point in contest before the learned judge who heard this motion was whether the respondent was entitled to make use of the list of the customers of the firm which he had obtained in order to canvass them when he started business on his own account. I mention this because it may have been open to contention on behalf of the respondent that he was at all events entitled, whilst he remained a partner, to make copies of the partnership books, and that it was premature to come to the court to restrain the use of these copies, even if he were not entitled when he ceased to be a partner to canvass the customers of the firm; but in view of the fact that the respondent threatened to use the list for the purpose of canvassing the persons named therein, and having regard to the course taken before the learned judge, I think it would have been open to him to grant an injunction, though not in the terms prayed for, if the canvassing of those customers would be a wrongful act on the part of the respondent. Stirling, J., and the Court of Appeal had, I think, no alternative but to refuse to grant any injunction. They were bound by the decision of the Court of Appeal, in the case of Pearson v. Pearson, that even though the goodwill belongs to one of the partners, it is lawful for the other, on the termination of the partnership, to canvass the customers of the firm. Consistently with that decision, I think it would have been impossible to hold that the appellants were entitled to an injunction; that case is, however, open to review by your lordships, and the real question in the present case is whether it was well decided.

* Aug. 9.—The plaintiffs appealed, but after the appeal had been opened the court suggested a settlement, and the case was accordingly settled.

(a.) Reported by C. H. GRAFTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The question whether a person who had sold the goodwill of his business was entitled afterwards to canvass the customers of that business came first before the courts for decision in the case of Labouchere v. Dawson. Lord Romilly, M.R., answered in the negative. He was of opinion that the principles of equity must prevail, and that persons are not at liberty to depreciate the thing which they have sold. He considered that the defendant was not entitled personally, or by letter, or by his agent or traveller, to go to any one who was a customer of the firm, and to solicit him not to continue business with the old firm, but to transfer it to him—that this was not a fair and reasonable thing to do after he had sold the goodwill. He accordingly granted an injunction to restrain the defendant, his partners, servants, or agents, from applying to any person who was a customer of the old firm prior to the date of the sale, privately, by letter, personally, or by a traveller, asking such customers to continue to deal with the defendant, and not to deal with the plaintiffs.

In the case of Ginesi v. Cooper Sir George Jessel, M.R., followed the decision in Labouchere v. Dawson, and expressed in very strong terms his concurrence with it. He granted an injunction restraining the defendants, their clerks, servants, agents, workmen, or others from soliciting or in any way endeavouring to obtain the custom of or orders for goods similar in character to those dealt in by the old firm from such of the customers as were customers of the old firm, or from attempting to take away any portion of the business bought by the plaintiff. This was all the plaintiff in that case asked for; but the learned judge went further, and expressed a strong opinion that a man who sold the goodwill of his business must not only refrain from soliciting the old customers to deal with him, but must not deal with them. It was not, he said, necessary to decide it on that occasion, but he stated it because he thought what the meaning of selling the goodwill of a trade or business is should be thoroughly understood. In the case of Leggott v. Barrett, which came before the same learned judge shortly afterwards, he acted upon the same view, and extended the injunction to restrain the defendant from dealing with the customers of the old firm. From the judgment in that case there was an appeal; but the appellant confined his appeal to that part of the order which restrained him from dealing with the customers of the old firm. He made no objection to the injunction so far as it restrained him from canvassing those customers. The Court of Appeal dissolved that part of the injunction of which the appellant complained. They thought they could not on any just principle prevent the defendant from supplying a man with goods if he applied to him; that there was no implied obligation upon him either legal or moral to shut his door against a customer who came to him of his own free will; that a sale of goodwill did not involve an implied contract not to deal with any customers of the old business the goodwill of which was sold. The case is chiefly important for present purposes in so far as it discloses the view taken by the learned judges who on that occasion constituted the Court of Appeal on the point now under consideration. In the case of Pearson v. Pearson, to which I shall have occasion to refer immediately, Cotton, L.J., stated that the decision in Labouchere v. Dawson was doubted in Leggott v. Barrett by James, L.J., and himself. This is no doubt correct so far as Cotton, L.J., is concerned; but I am unable to find any very clear indication that this was the view of James, L.J. It is quite true that in an early part of his judgment he said: "I do not like going much into the case because what I should say might, perhaps, be considered to mean that the injunction which is submitted to is too wide." But in a later part of the judgment he says: "At first it did appear to me that we might, from the equity view of the case, say that the defendant should be prevented from dealing with any customer or customers whom he had so solicited; but it appears to me that was too vague and too wide." He pointed out that a man might give the order afterwards without any reference to previous solicitation. Further on, when discussing the effect of the agreement, and showing that there was no implied obligation not to deal with the customer, he says: "It means that you are not to solicit customers." The impression produced upon my mind by the whole of the judgment is that the learned judge had not arrived at the conclusion that Labouchere v. Dawson was wrong. Brett, L.J., expressed a decided approval of that decision. He was of opinion that on the sale of a goodwill for a valuable consideration there was an implied contract that the vendor would not solicit former customers, who were really the people who formed the goodwill.

The next case in which the matter was brought under consideration of the Court of Appeal was that of Walker v. Mottram. In that case the goodwill of the business carried on by a bankrupt had been sold by his trustees in bankruptcy. It was sought afterwards to restrain the bankrupt from soliciting the customers of that business. Sir George Jessel, M.R., refused to grant an injunction, on the ground that the doctrine laid down in Labouchere v. Dawson did not apply to the case of a bankrupt whose business had been sold by his trustees. This judgment was affirmed by the Court of Appeal. Of the Lords Justices who then constituted the court, Baggallay, L.J., expressed a strong doubt as to the correctness of the decision in Labouchere v. Dawson. He said that it appeared to him as at present advised that it went far beyond what any of the previous decisions would have sanctioned. Lush and Lindley, L.JJ., the other members of the court, said that the rule laid down in Labouchere v. Dawson had, it was believed, been recognized and acted upon in practice, and, whatever else might be said of it, the rule was in accordance with the general opinion of what was fair and right, and was easily applied in practice.

In the case of Pearson v. Pearson the question came again before the Court of Appeal. The facts were there less favourable to the plaintiff than in the case of Labouchere v. Dawson, and Baggallay and Lindley, L.JJ., both considered that, even if Labouchere v. Dawson were rightly decided, the case then before them was not governed by it. Baggallay and Cotton, L.JJ., however, distinctly rested their judgments on the ground that the decision in Labouchere v. Dawson was wrong, and ought to be overruled. Lindley, L.J., on the other hand, was of opinion that it was rightly decided. The reason of Baggallay, L.J., for dissenting from Labouchere v. Dawson, so far as it is disclosed by the report of his judgment, appears to be that it went beyond a number of decisions of a higher court, and, as he thought, without sufficient reason. Even assuming that the decision in Labouchere v. Dawson went beyond previous decisions, this does not seem to me to afford any indication that it was wrong, unless it can be shown that it was in conflict with the principles involved in those earlier decisions. Cotton, L.J., examined the earlier decisions, and arrived at the conclusion that Lord Eldon was against the notion that the vendor of the goodwill of a business was, in the absence of express contract, to be restrained from carrying on a similar business in the way in which he might lawfully carry it on if there had been no sale of the goodwill. The learned lord justice pointed out that Lord Romilly rested his decision in Labouchere v. Dawson on the principle that a man could not derogate from his grant. "But," he said, "it is admitted that a person who has sold the goodwill of his business may set up a similar business next door, and say that he is the person who carried on the old business; yet such proceedings manifestly tend to prevent the old customer from going to the old place. I cannot see where to draw the line. If he may, by his acts, invite the old customers to deal with him and not with the purchaser, why may he not apply to them and ask them to do so? I think it would be wrong to put such a meaning on 'goodwill' as would give a right to such an injunction as has been granted in the present case."

I propose now to examine the older authorities. I may state at once, however, that I can find nothing in them inconsistent with the decision in Labouchere v. Dawson. It no doubt went beyond them, inasmuch as it dealt with a question not determined by them, but this seems to me to be no demerit, nor to afford any indication that it was wrong. The earliest case which has any bearing upon the point is that of Cruttwell v. Lye, before Lord Eldon. The business of a bankrupt, who was a carrier between Bristol and London, had been sold by his assignees in bankruptcy. He afterwards commenced carrying on the trade of a carrier between Bristol, Bath, and London, but though the termini were the same the route employed was different. He addressed direct solicitation to the public for the carriage of their goods, stating that he had been reinstated in his business, and there was further, in the opinion of the Lord Chancellor, so much probability of direct solicitation to the customers of the old concern, in some few instances, that the fact might fairly be assumed. Under these circumstances, the purchaser of the bankrupt's business applied for an injunction. The case was therefore the same as Walker v. Mottram, where Sir George Jessel, than whom no one has more strongly insisted upon the propriety of the decision in Labouchere v. Dawson, was of opinion that no injunction should be granted. The bankrupt was no party to the contract of sale; there could, therefore, be no implied contract on his part to be derived from it. It is most material also to observe what was the nature of the injunction then in question. It was whether the bankrupt was to be restrained from carrying on the trade which he was pursuing of carrying goods between Bristol, Bath, and London. The Lord Chancellor held that he could not be so restrained, and I think it must now be taken as settled that the sale of the goodwill of a business, even when the vendor himself is a party to the contract, does not impose upon him any obligation to refrain from carrying on a trade of the same nature as before. But Lord Eldon certainly did not decide that such a vendor was entitled to solicit the customers of the old firm. He was not asked for an injunction to restrain the defendant from so doing. It was sufficient for the decision of that case that, in the opinion of the Lord Chancellor, there was no principle arising out of the provisions of the bankruptcy law upon which the court could hold that the bankrupt ought not to engage in the same trade and by the same road as before, though I think that, so far, the opinion of the Lord Chancellor would have been the same if the sale of the business had been effected by the bankrupt himself, and not by his assignees. The importance of the case consists in the definition which Lord Eldon gave of the goodwill there sold. He said: "The goodwill which has been the subject of the sale is nothing more than the probability that the old customers will resort to the old place. Fraud would form a different consideration; but if that effect was prevented by no other means than those which belong to the fair course of improving a trade in which it was lawful to engage, I should in imposing it carry the effect of my injunction to a much greater length than any decision has authorized or imagination ever suggested." These observations were much relied on by Cotton, L.J., in Pearson v. Pearson. If the language of Lord Eldon is to be taken as a definition of goodwill of general application, I think it is far too narrow, and I am not satisfied that it was intended by Lord Eldon as an exhaustive definition. "'Goodwill,' I apprehend," said Wood, V.C., in Churton v. Douglas, "must mean every advantage, every possible advantage, if I may so express it, as contrasted with the negative advantage of the late partner not carrying on the business himself, that has been acquired by the old firm in carrying on its business, whether connected with the premises in which the business was previously carried on, or with the name of the late firm, or with any other matter carrying with it the benefit of the business." The learned Vice-Chancellor pointed out in this connection that it would be absurd to say that when a large wholesale business is conducted the public are mindful whether it is carried on in Fleet-street or in the Strand. The question, What is meant by "goodwill"? is, no doubt, a critical one. Sir George Jessel, discussing in Ginesi v. Cooper the language of Wood, V.C., which I have just quoted, said: "Attracting customers to the business is a matter connected with the carrying on of it. It is the formation of that connection which has made the value of the thing that the late firm sold, and they really had nothing else to sell in the shape of goodwill." He pointed out that in the case before him the connection had been formed by years of work. The members of the firm knew where to sell the stone, and he asks: "Is it to be supposed that they did not sell that personal connection when they sold the trade or business and the goodwill thereof?" The present Master of the Rolls took much the same view as to what constitutes the goodwill of a business. I cannot myself doubt that they were right. It is the connection thus formed, together with the circumstances, whether of habit or otherwise, which tend to make it permanent, that constitutes the goodwill of a business. It is this which constitutes the difference between a business just started, which has no goodwill attached to it, and one which has acquired a goodwill. The former trader has to seek out his customers from among the community as best he can. The latter has a custom ready made. He knows what members of the community are purchasers of the articles in which he deals, and are not attached by custom to any other establishment. What obligations, then, does the sale of the goodwill of a business impose upon the vendor? I do not think they would necessarily be the same under all circumstances. In the case of Cook v. Collingridge, Eldon, L.C., had to determine what orders were to be given where a partnership had expired by effluxion of time, and where the goodwill had to be valued. He declared that there existed no obligation upon the partners to restrain them from carrying on the same trade, or any of them wanting to do so; that a claim to have an estimated value put upon any subject that could be considered as described by the term "goodwill" could not be supported upon the same grounds or principles as those in which a value was received from a partner buying the share of the partner going out of the business and retiring from the trade altogether. He thought that all that could be valued was the chance of the customers adhering to the old establishment, notwithstanding that the previous partners or any of them carried on a similar business elsewhere.

In Johnson v. Helleley a bill was filed by the surviving partner to wind up the business of the partnership. The usual decree was made. The chief clerk certified that it was most beneficial that the business should be sold as a going concern. The Master of the Rolls ordered it to be stated in the advertisement and particulars that the surviving partner would be at liberty to continue carrying on the business of a wine merchant in the same town and place. This judgment was affirmed by the lords justices. In Hall v. Barrows Westbury, L.C., said: "I think the direction to value the goodwill should be accompanied by a declaration defining what is meant by it, at least negatively; that is to say, that a declaration that the goodwill is not to be valued upon the principle that the surviving partner, if he were not the purchaser, will be restrained from setting up the same description of business." In cases of this description, where a partnership has been dissolved by effluxion of time or death, the goodwill is regarded as a part of the assets, and subject, therefore, to realization on winding up the partnership; but it would obviously be absurd that because a partnership becomes thus dissolved those who formerly constituted the firm, or the survivors thereof where the dissolution has been due to death, should thereafter be restrained from carrying on what trade they pleased. Whatever restriction the sale of the goodwill may impose, it is clear that in this class of cases it could not extend to prevent the former partners carrying on a similar trade to that in which they were previously engaged. It is noteworthy that in Johnson v. Helleley it was thought necessary to warn intending purchasers that, though the goodwill was being sold, one of the persons who had previously carried on the business might continue to trade in the same town, and Lord Westbury thought it necessary to give the same warning to the person who was to value the goodwill in Hall v. Barrows. These circumstances appear to me to afford an indication that the courts recognized that their view of what was meant by "goodwill" and the effect of a sale of it, differed from the popular conception.

Where the goodwill of a business is not sold under circumstances such as I have been discussing, but the sale is the voluntary act of the vendors, I am by no means satisfied that a different effect might not have been given to the sale and the obligations which it imposed. It might have been held that the vendor was not entitled to derogate from his grant by seeking in any manner to withdraw from the purchaser the customers of the old business, as he would do by setting up a business in such a place or under such circumstances that it would immediately compete for the old customers. It is now, however, too late to make any such distinction. I think it must be treated as settled that whenever the goodwill of a business is sold the vendor does not, by reason only of that sale, come under a restriction not to carry on a competing business. This is really the strong point in the position of those who maintain that Labouchere v. Dawson was wrongly decided. Cotton, L.J., says: "It is admitted that a person who has sold the goodwill of his business may set up a similar business next door, and say that he is the person who carried on the old business. Yet such proceedings manifestly tend to prevent the old customers from going to the old premises. I cannot see where to draw the line. If he may by his acts invite the old customers to deal with him and not with the purchaser, why may he not apply to them and ask them to do so?" I quite feel the force of this argument, but it does not strike me as conclusive. It is often impossible to draw the line, and yet to be perfectly certain that particular acts are on one side of it or the other. It does not seem to me to follow that because a man may by his acts invite all men to deal with him, and so, amongst the rest of mankind, invite the former customers of the firm, he may use the knowledge which he has acquired of what persons were customers of the old firm, in order, by an appeal to them, to seek to weaken their habit of dealing where they have dealt before, or whatever else binds them to the old business, and so to secure their custom for himself. This seems to me to be a direct and intentional dealing with the goodwill, and an endeavour to destroy it. If a person who has previously been partner in a firm sets up in business on his own account and appeals generally for custom, he only does that which any member of the public may do, and which those carrying on the same trade are already doing. It is true that those who were former customers of the firm to which he belonged may of their own accord transfer their custom to him; but this incidental advantage is unavoidable, and does not result from any act of his. He only conducts his business in precisely the same way as he would if he had never been a member of the firm to which he had previously belonged. But when he specifically and directly appeals to those who were customers of the previous firm he seeks to take advantage of the connection previously formed by his old firm, and of the knowledge of that connection which he has previously acquired, to take that which constitutes the goodwill away from the persons to whom it has been sold, and to restore it to himself. It is said, indeed, that he may not represent himself as a successor of the old firm, or as carrying on a continuation of their business; but this, in many cases, appears to me of little importance and of small practical advantage if canvassing the customers of the old firm were allowed without restraint. I do not think that in cases where an injunction was granted in the terms employed in Labouchere v. Dawson there would be any real difficulty in drawing the line and determining whether there had been a breach of it or not. In several cases such injunctions were granted, and there is nothing to show that any practical difficulty arose in enforcing them.

It is not material to consider whether, on the sale of a goodwill, the obligation on the part of the vendor to refrain from canvassing the customers is to be regarded as based on the principle that he is not entitled to depreciate that which he has sold, or as arising from an implied contract to abstain from any act intended to deprive the purchaser of that which has been sold to him, and to restore it to the vendor. I am satisfied that the obligation exists, and ought to be enforced by a court of equity. I have, so far, dealt with the case as if the goodwill had been sold, but I think the rights and obligations must be precisely the same, for present purposes, when on the creation of a partnership it has been agreed that the goodwill shall belong exclusively to one of the partners.

For these reasons I think the judgment must be reversed, and that an injunction should be granted in the form adopted in Labouchere v. Dawson, with the modification rendered necessary by the circumstance that here the partnership has not yet expired. The respondent must repay to the appellants the costs which the Court of Appeal ordered them to pay to him.

Lord MACNAGHTEN.—The question for the House to determine is this: Is a person who has sold the goodwill of his business, or one in the position of the respondent, who has been taken into partnership upon the terms that on the expiration of the partnership the goodwill shall belong solely to his partner, at liberty to solicit the old customers of the business to give their custom in preference to him? In 1872 Lord Romilly, M.R., decided the question in the negative in Labouchere v. Dawson. In 1884 the question was determined the other way by the Court of Appeal in Pearson v. Pearson; and Labouchere v. Dawson was overruled by Baggallay and Cotton, L.JJ., differing from Lindley, L.J., who thought Lord Romilly's decision right. In Labouchere v. Dawson the question arose out of a sale of goodwill. In the present case there is a subsisting partnership between the appellants and the respondent in the business of varnish manufacturers. One of the terms of the partnership is that the goodwill "shall be and remain the sole property" of the appellant Anna Trego. The partnership will expire on the 1st of January, 1896. The business is extremely lucrative, the connection very large. The respondent is, or was when the action was commenced, employing one of the clerks in copying out the names and addresses of the customers of the firm, with the avowed intention of soliciting their custom as soon as the partnership expires. The object of the action was to obtain an injunction to restrain this proceeding on the part of the respondent. It is not necessary to consider whether the action at the outset was or was not open to objection on technical or other grounds. For this much, at least, is to be said in favour of the respondent—that he met the case fairly and frankly from the very first, without any attempt to embarrass the plaintiff or to conceal his own object. His case was, "The law allows it." There was, indeed—or there seemed to be at the last moment, if I am not doing injustice to the respondent—an attempt on his part to recede from the position which up to that time he had maintained, and to suggest difficulties in the way of any judgment in favour of the appellants. But I am quite sure that your lordships will not for a moment listen to such a suggestion after the case has been fought out in all the courts on the real issue between the parties.

After the observations of my noble and learned friend I do not think it necessary to deal with the question at any length. The arguments on the one side and on the other are summed up in Labouchere v. Dawson and Pearson v. Pearson, and little remains but to choose between the conflicting views of very eminent lawyers. Nor do I think it necessary to do more than allude to the case in which Sir George Jessel, M.R., held that a person who had sold the goodwill of his business could not even deal with his former customers. There I think the Master of the Rolls went too far. The decision trenched on the rights of the public. On the other hand, the Master of the Rolls was, I think, clearly right in refusing to extend the principle of Labouchere v. Dawson to a sale in bankruptcy. There is, I think, all the difference in the world between the case of a man who sells what belongs to himself and receives the consideration and a man whose property is sold without his consent by his trustee in bankruptcy, and who comes under no obligation, express or implied, to the purchaser from the trustee. "A person not a lawyer," said Plumer, V.C., in Harrison v. Gardner, 2 Madd. 219, in 1817, "could not imagine that when the goodwill and trade of a retail shop were sold the vendor might the next day set up a shop within a few doors and draw off all the customers. The goodwill of such a shop in good faith and honest understanding must mean all the benefit of the trade, and not merely a benefit of which the vendor might the next day deprive the vendee. The authorities, however, are strong to show that the sale of a goodwill does not import restraint, and that a person selling the goodwill of a business for however large a consideration is not prevented setting up the trade." I agree, in substance, with the Vice-Chancellor's observations.

What "goodwill" means must depend on the character and nature of the business to which it is attached. Generally speaking, it means much more than what Lord Eldon took it to mean in the particular case before him, in Cruttwell v. Lye, where he says: "The goodwill, which has been the subject of sale, is nothing more than the probability that the old customers will resort to the old place." Often it happens that the goodwill is the very sap and life of the business, without which the business would yield little or no fruit. It is the whole advantage, whatever it may be, of the reputation and connection of the firm, which may have been built up by years of honest work, or gained by lavish expenditure of money. I do not think that "a person not a lawyer," to use the Vice-Chancellor's phrase, would suppose that a man might sell the goodwill of his business and then set to work to withdraw from the purchaser the benefit of his purchase. However, authorities which it is now too late to question do undoubtedly show that a man who has sold the goodwill of his business may do much to regain his former position, and yet keep on the windy side of the law. The common law has always been jealous of any interference with trade. It was a lighter matter to interfere with freedom of contract and avoid covenants under seal. And so, the common law being the final arbiter on these questions, too little attention perhaps was paid to what was fair and just between man and man. A person who has sold the goodwill of his business is under no obligation to retire altogether from the field. Trade he undoubtedly may, and in the very same line of business. If he has not bound himself by special stipulation, and if there is no evidence of the understanding of the parties beyond that which is common to all cases, he is free to set up in business wherever he chooses. But, then, how far may he go? He may do everything that a stranger to the business, in ordinary course, would be in a position to do. He may set up where he will. He may push his wares as much as he pleases. He may thus interfere with the custom of his neighbour as a stranger and an outsider might do; but he must not, I think, avail himself of his special knowledge of the old customers to regain, without consideration, that which he has parted with for value. He must not make his approaches from the vantage ground of his former position. He may not sell the custom and steal away the customers. That, at all events, is opposed to the common understanding of mankind and the rudiments of commercial morality. Is it conceivable that the respondent would ever have been taken into partnership if he had hinted at such a manœuvre while negotiations for a partnership were pending? It was said that you cannot draw the line; but I think the line may be drawn at this point. It is quite true that you cannot protect the purchaser completely. With Lindley, L.J., I regret it. It is quite true that it would be better that he should protect himself by taking apt covenants from the person with whom he is dealing. But this, I think, is rather a counsel of perfection than a reason for leaving the purchaser entirely at the mercy of the vendor. The principle on which Labouchere v. Dawson rests has been presented in various ways. A man may not derogate from his own grant; the vendor is not at liberty to destroy or depreciate the thing which he has sold; there is an implied covenant on the sale of goodwill that the vendor does not solicit the custom which he has parted with; it would be a fraud on the contract to do so. These, as it seems to me, are only different turns and glimpses of a proposition which I take to be elementary. It is not right to profess and to purport to sell that which you do not mean the purchaser to have; it is not an honest thing to pocket the price, and then to recapture the subject of sale, to decoy it away or call it back before the purchaser has had time to attach it to himself and make it his very own. I am of opinion that the appellants are entitled to judgment.

Lord DAVEY.—This appeal comes before your lordships in a somewhat unsatisfactory form. The plaintiffs and the defendant are partners together for a term which will expire on the 1st of January, 1896. On the expiration of the partnership the goodwill of the trade or business will be the sole property of the plaintiff Anna Trego. The notice of motion asked that the defendant might be restrained from making any copy or extract from the books of the partnership for any purpose other than the business of the partnership. In my opinion, the relief asked for was misconceived. As well under the general law as under the express provision of the articles of partnership the defendant was entitled during the partnership to have access to the books and to make copies thereof or extracts therefrom. It is conceivable that, if the defendant proposed to use such extracts for purposes injurious or hostile to the interests of his firm, he might be restrained from so doing. But in such case it would not be the obtaining of the information, but the use the partner proposed to make of it when obtained, which would be restrained. In my opinion, the plaintiffs have no right to prevent the defendant from making any extracts from the books he thinks fit. Indeed, in the present case, as was observed at the bar, the list of the creditors of the firm would be of service to the defendant if the law as laid down in Labouchere v. Dawson be maintained, in order to enable him to know whom he may not solicit, and to keep himself within the law. It was, however, admitted that the defendant intends after the expiration of the partnership to set up a business on his own account similar to that carried on by his firm, and he claims the right, if he thinks fit to do so, to solicit custom for his own business from the customers of his present firm. The question which has been argued before your lordships is whether he has any such right. Upon this question there has been a remarkable difference of judicial opinion. The defendant has contracted for valuable consideration that, at the expiration of the partnership, the goodwill shall belong to the plaintiff Anna Trego. To the lay mind it would undoubtedly seem a remarkable state of the law that a person who has entered into such a contract should be at liberty to go to the customers of the old firm and solicit them not to deal with the plaintiff, but to deal with him, and thus endeavour to secure for himself the business connection which he has contracted shall belong to the plaintiff. But it would probably seem to the lay mind equally remarkable that a man who has sold a business and goodwill to another should be at liberty to set up a similar business on his own account in the same street, next door, or opposite to the premises on which the business he has sold was and is carried on; nay, more, that he may advertise himself as having been a partner in or the founder or manager of the business which he has sold, provided he does not represent that the business which he is carrying on is the same or identical business with that which he has sold. Yet it is well settled that he may do all this. It has been established by a series of cases that in the sale of a goodwill or business no covenant is implied that the vendor will not start a new business in opposition to the purchaser of the old business. It is enough to refer to Cruttwell v. Lye, Churton v. Douglas, Johnson v. Hellelley, and the dicta in Hookham v. Pottage, 21 W. R. 47, L. R. 8 Ch. App. 91. An express covenant not to carry on business would be incapable of being enforced as a restraint of trade if it were larger than the necessity of the case, having regard to the particular character of the business, demanded, or, perhaps, unless it was restricted in some way either in time or space. It seems to follow that a general covenant not to carry on business in competition with the purchaser, which would be invalid if expressed, cannot be implied. I think it is to be gathered from dicta and expressions used by learned judges in the Court of Chancery that the idea of goodwill and of what is comprised in the sale of a business has silently been developed and grown since the days of Lord Eldon, who, in one passage of his judgment in Cruttwell v. Lye, seemed to regard goodwill as only the habit of customers to resort to the old premises. In Labouchere v. Dawson Lord Romilly granted an injunction against the vendor of the goodwill of a brewery from applying to any person who was a customer of the old firm prior to the date of the sale "privately by letter, personally, or by a traveller, asking such customer to continue to deal with the vendor, or not to deal with the purchasers." The judgment was based on the principle that a man cannot derogate from his own grant; that he cannot sell a thing, and destroy the value of it. It was admitted in the judgment that a man may solicit customers generally in any public manner he pleased. It is agreed on all hands that the decision in Labouchere v. Dawson went considerably beyond the cases relating to goodwill decided before that time. In Ginesi v. Cooper Sir George Jessel expressed himself as prepared to extend the injunction so as to prohibit the vendor from dealing with the customers; and in Leggott v. Barrett he granted an injunction to that effect, but that part of the order was reversed in the Court of Appeal, and I understand that no such order is now asked for at the bar. I may remark, in passing, that the injunction in Ginesi v. Cooper went far beyond the order in Labouchere v. Dawson, and to an extent which, in my opinion, cannot in any event be supported. It restrained the defendant "from in any way endeavouring to obtain the custom of such of the customers of the petitioner as were customers of the old firm, or from attempting to take away any portion of the business bought by the petitioner." This form of order would prevent the defendant from issuing public advertisements or carrying on business in competition with the petitioner, as it is admitted he may do. In the case of Leggott v. Barrett there was no appeal against so much of the order as simply followed Labouchere v. Dawson. It was therefore unnecessary for the court to express any opinion upon it. The present Master of the Rolls, however, expressed his approval of the doctrine. James and Cotton, L.JJ., did not express any approval of it, and I think it may be inferred from the judgments that Cotton, L.J., certainly, and James, L.J., possibly, were not prepared to do so. In Pearson v. Pearson Baggallay and Cotton, L.JJ., expressed their dissent from Labouchere v. Dawson, and overruled it, while Lindley, L.J., expressed his approval of it. This is in substance an appeal from Pearson v. Pearson. On the argument of this case at your lordships' bar it certainly appeared to me that the logical result of the principle upon which I understand the case of Labouchere v. Dawson to be founded would be to restrain the vendor of the goodwill of a business from carrying on business in competition with the purchaser at all. Your lordships were not asked to take that course. And, having regard to the well-established doctrine against restraint of trade, it would be impossible, as I have already said, to imply such a general covenant. I doubted whether it was right, if you allowed the vendor to trade in competition, to impose fetters upon him which might prevent his doing so effectually or successfully. I was also struck with the vagueness and difficulty of applying the injunction as granted in Labouchere v. Dawson. Questions may arise as to the persons to be comprised under the designation of customers. The injunction also may operate most unequally. In a business of a special character it might practically prevent the defendant from carrying on business at all, whereas in a business of a different character it might have very little effect. Further consideration, however, has satisfied me that the decision in Labouchere v. Dawson, although it does not go so far as I think would be abstractedly just, is founded on a right principle; and the difficulty of doing complete justice should not prevent us from meting out such scanty measure of protection to the purchaser of a goodwill as the circumstances permit of; and although the difficulties I have pointed out exist, they are not insuperable or, probably, formidable in practice. The question whether any person is a customer within the meaning of the injunction is one of fact, to be ascertained when it arises. I have had the opportunity of reading the judgment which has been delivered by my noble and learned friend (Lord Herschell), and I desire to express my concurrence in the reasoning upon which it is founded. In particular I think that the principle, on which the injunction asked for may be supported, is that the defendant is availing himself of the knowledge of the connection formed by his old firm to take away or to depreciate the value of the goodwill and connection which he has contracted shall belong to the plaintiff. I agree as to the form of the injunction, and also as to the costs.

Lord HERSCHELL stated that Lord Ashbourne concurred.

Orders of Chancery Division and Court of Appeal reversed. Declaration that the appellants were entitled to an injunction restraining the defendant, his partners, servants, or agents, from applying privately, by letter, personally, or by a traveller, to any person who was, prior to the dissolution of the partnership of Tabor, Tregor, & Co., a customer of that firm, asking such customer to continue, after the dissolution, to deal with him (the defendant) or not to deal with the plaintiffs; and that the respondent do repay to the appellants the costs of the Court of Appeal which have been paid to him.

Solicitors for the appellants, Miller, Wiggins, & Naylor.

Solicitor for the respondent, H. J. Mannings.

Court of Appeal.

From Chan. Div. (Lindley, A. L. Smith, and Rigby, L.JJ.) — Dec. 6.

DUNHILL v. NORTH-EASTERN RAILWAY CO. (a.)

Lands Clauses Acts—Superfluous lands—Pre-emption—Compulsory sale by railway company—Lands Clauses Act, 1845 (8 & 9 Vict. c. 18), ss. 127, 128.

It is not to be inferred from the compulsory sale by one railway company to another of lands which, if not sold, might have been required for the purposes of the selling company, that the lands are superfluous lands in the hands of that company.

Under the powers of a special Act passed in 1863 the defendants acquired certain lands from the plaintiff's predecessors in title. Under the powers conferred by a special Act passed in 1883 the Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Co. acquired compulsorily, among other lands, part of the lands acquired by the defendants from the plaintiff's predecessors in title. The Act contained a proviso that the enactment should not affect or prejudice any estate, right, title, interest, or advantage of the plaintiff, his heirs or assigns. The evidence showed that the lands, if they had not been sold to the Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Co., might have been required for the purposes of the defendants' undertaking.

Held (reversing the decision of Kekewich, J.), that the lands sold to the Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Co. could not be treated as superfluous lands of the defendants.

Hobbs v. Midland Railway Co., 30 W. R. 516, 20 Ch. D. 418, approved.

Lord Carington v. Wycombe Railway Co., 16 W. R. 494, L. R. 3 Ch. App. 377, distinguished.

By the North-Eastern Railway Co.'s (Hull and Doncaster Branch) Act, 1863, the defendants were authorized to take, for the purposes of a railway therein described, certain lands shown on the deposited plans. The Act contained the following provision: "The railways by this Act authorized shall be completed within five years from the passing thereof, and on the expiration of that period the powers of this

(a.) Reported by ARNOLD GLOVER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Act, or the Acts incorporated herewith, granted for executing the same, or otherwise in relation thereto, shall cease to be exercised, except as to so much of those railways as shall then have been completed, and also except those powers which are by the same Acts, or any of them, declared to be continued or which may lawfully be exercised for a longer period."

The defendants, in exercise of their powers under the above-mentioned Act, bought from the plaintiff's predecessors in title about 57 acres of land in the parish of Snaith, in the county of York. The defendants constructed a part of their Hull and Doncaster Branch Railway across the lands so acquired. They used only about 11 acres for the purposes of their railway, leaving about 46 acres which were never used for the purposes of the defendants' undertaking.

By section 40 of the Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Act, 1883, the Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Co. were authorized to purchase certain lands at Goole, in the parish of Snaith, which included the 57 acres which had been originally purchased by the defendants from the plaintiff's predecessors in title. The section contained a proviso "that nothing in this section contained shall alter vary, lessen, abridge, or in any manner affect or prejudice, any estate, right, title, interest, or advantage" of the plaintiff, William Henry Carter Dunhill, his heirs or assigns. The plaintiff had opposed the Act, and the proviso was inserted for his protection. The Act was not opposed by the defendant company.

In pursuance of the powers granted by their Act the Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Co. purchased from the defendants 7 acres or thereabouts of the said lands, and paid to the defendants for the same £2,247 10s.

By various Acts of Parliament, and ultimately by the North-Eastern Railway Act, 1891, the period within which the company might sell and dispose of any superfluous lands was extended until the 28th of July, 1894, when it expired.

The evidence showed that if the 7 acres had not been sold to the Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Co. they would have been required for the purposes of the defendants' undertaking, and this view was adopted by Kekewich, J.

The plaintiff contended that the lands purchased by the Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Co. were at the time of the sale superfluous lands of the defendants, and ought to have been offered to him in accordance with section 128 of the Lands Clauses Act, 1845. He claimed the difference between the sum of £2,247 10s., the proceeds of sale, and the fair value of the lands at the time of the sale as between the plaintiff and the defendants, or, alternatively, damages in respect of the sale.

The Lands Clauses Act, 1845, provides as follows with regard to lands acquired by the promoters of the undertaking and not required for the purposes thereof:—

"127. Within the prescribed period, or if no period be prescribed within ten years after the expiration of the time limited by the special Act for the completion of the works, the promoters of the undertaking shall absolutely sell and dispose of such superfluous lands, and apply the purchase-money arising from such sales to the purposes of the special Act; and in default thereof all such superfluous lands remaining unsold at the expiration of such period shall thereupon vest in and become the property of the owners of the lands adjoining thereto in proportion to the extent of their lands respectively adjoining the same.

"128. Before the promoters of the undertaking dispose of any such superfluous lands they shall, unless such lands be situate in a town, or be lands built upon or used for building purposes, first offer to sell the same to the person then entitled to the lands (if any) from which the same were originally severed; or if such person refuse to purchase the same, or cannot after diligent inquiry be found, then the like offer shall be made to the person or to the several persons whose lands shall immediately adjoin the lands so proposed to be sold, such persons being capable of entering into a contract for the purchase of such lands; and where more than one such person shall be entitled to such right of pre-emption such offer shall be made to such persons in succession, one after another, in such order as the promoters of the undertaking shall think fit."

Kekewich, J., decided that the lands sold were superfluous lands of the defendants, and that the plaintiff was entitled to the difference between £2,247 10s. and the fair value of the lands as between the plaintiff and the defendants.

The defendants appealed.

Renshaw, Q.C., W. Baker, and E. R. P. Moon, for the appellants.—It cannot be said that these are superfluous lands simply because we sold them. We were compelled to sell them, and the case is therefore even stronger than Hobbs v. Midland Railway Co., 30 W. R. 516, 20 Ch. D. 418. If the plaintiff has any rights, they are against the Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Co. As to Lord Carington v. Wycombe Railway Co., 16 W. R. 494, L. R. 3 Ch. App. 377, relied upon by the learned judge, that is a different case altogether. In that case the company never wanted the land at all, and there was moreover no statutory obligation to sell. So far as the action claims damages it is barred by the Statute of Limitations.

They referred to Ross v. Rugge-Price, 24 W. R. 786, 1 Ex. D. 269.

Warrington, Q.C., and E. Ford, for the respondent.—Assuming that the land was within section 128 of the Lands Clauses Act, 1845, it should have been offered to us first, and is subject to that binding obligation. We were entitled to be the vendors to the Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Co. after giving a fair price. The difference between the two prices is trust property. As to whether the land is within section 128, the Legislature has permanently dedicated these 7 acres to purposes which are not those of the North-Eastern Railway Co., and by so doing has made them superfluous lands in the hands of that company: Lord Beauchamp v. Great Western Railway Co., 16 W. R. 241, 1155, L. R. 3 Ch. App. 745. [RIGBY, L.J.—Your argument would be the same if the land at the time of the sale were actually being used, say, for example, for a station.] It is sufficient for us to show that as a fact the lands are superfluous. Hobbs v. Midland Railway Co. was a different case, for there the company sold the land under stipulations for its own benefit. In the present case there is not a word saving the rights of the defendants. The proviso in the Act of 1883 has the effect of transferring the plaintiff's rights to the purchase money. That Act was not opposed by the North-Eastern Railway Co. Moreover, it does not follow from the Act that the Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Co. should buy the land from the North-Eastern Railway Co. If the land had been offered to the plaintiff, they would have bought from him, and in that case he would have realized the difference between the two prices.

LINDLEY, L.J.—This case has been very ingeniously argued, and we have had the opportunity of considering the judgment of the learned judge who decided the matter. The point is a very short one, and it appears to me, I confess, free from any real difficulty.

It appears that prior to the Act of Parliament of 1883 the plaintiff, Mr. Dunhill, or his predecessor in title (it is not necessary to distinguish between the two), sold some land to the North-Eastern Railway Co., for the purpose of their railway. The land which was so sold consisted of 57 acres, and amongst the land so sold was a piece of 7 acres, which is the subject matter of the present proceedings. In the year 1883 this piece of 7 acres had been conveyed to the North-Eastern Railway Co. by a deed of May, 1871, which vested the lands in the North-Eastern Railway Co. The North-Eastern Railway Co. owned them. They were the owners in every sense of the word of those 7 acres. The evidence shows that in 1883 the lands were not superfluous lands, that is to say, they were not within the sections 127 and 128 of the Lands Clauses Act, nor could anybody then say that they were not required for the purposes of the North-Eastern Railway. The evidence is that they were required. The time, the ten years referred to in the various statutes, had not expired, and Mr. Dunhill was not in a position to say to the North-Eastern Railway Co.: "The time has come for me to assert my rights under the sections 127 and 128, and I require you to sell this land and to give me the right of pre-emption to which I am entitled." Mr. Dunhill had in 1883 the chance or possibility of acquiring the 7 acres, if at the end of ten years they should not be required for the purposes of the North-Eastern Railway Co., or if he could prove that even before the end of ten years they were not so required.

Now, that was the position of affairs when the Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Act of 1883 was passed. At that time it is important to bear in mind that Mr. Dunhill had no right whatever and no interest whatever in these lands, unless they became superfluous lands, or lands not required for the purposes of the North-Eastern Railway, in which case he got a right of pre-emption under the Lands Clauses Act. In 1883 the Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Co. obtained an Act which enabled them to obtain compulsorily the 7 acres for the purpose of their undertaking. Parliament gave them that power by the 40th section of the Act of 1883, which simply says this—that the "company," that is the Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Co., may purchase or take by compulsion or agreement certain lands in Goole which include the 7 acres. Now, what was the position of affairs then? I will not allude to the proviso for the moment, but what was the position of affairs then? Kekewich, J., has held, and the plaintiff contends, that by that very circumstance these lands must be treated as no longer wanted for the purpose of the North-Eastern Railway Co. That appears to me to be an inference which it is impossible to draw from any language contained in the Act of Parliament. What does the Legislature say? It does not say: "You do not want these lands." It says: "Whether you want them or not, the Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Co. are entitled to have them." It does not say: "You do not want them for the purpose of your undertaking" in this case, any more than it says to a private owner: "You do not want your land, the railway company does; the railway company shall have it." What the Act says to a private owner is: "You may want your land, but public reasons and convenience are such that it justifies us in making you part with it, however much you want it, for public purposes." That is what Parliament has said to the North-Eastern Railway Co. Whether the North-Eastern Railway Co. opposed the Bill or not I do not know; but here is this Act of Parliament, which clearly enables the Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Co. to take these lands, however much the North-Eastern Railway Co. may want them. How can it be said under the circumstances, and how are we to infer either as a matter of fact, or to hold as a matter of law, that the mere circumstance that Parliament forces the North-Eastern Railway Co. to give up this piece of land to the Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Co. is equivalent to saying: "You, the North-Eastern Railway Co., do not want it, and because you do not want it you shall part with it"? Such a construction seems to me to be impossible. But that is really the root of the decision of Kekewich, J., which is appealed against. I cannot help thinking that Kekewich, J., has got rather confused by the other cases. Certainly the case of Lord Carington v. The Wycombe Railway Co. does not touch this at all. In that case the land obviously was land not required for the purpose of the railway company, and in that case there was no such element as we have here to deal with —that is to say, an Act of Parliament passed compelling the railway company to part with its land. With regard to the case of Hobbs v. The Midland Railway Co. I think the view taken by Manisty, J., was right—that if you find the railway company selling land before the ten years has expired the primâ facie inference is that the company does not want the land. That is only a primâ facie inference; you must look at the facts to see whether the land is or is not wanted for the purpose of the railway. If you find, as Manisty, J., found in Hobbs v. The Midland Railway Co., that the land was wanted, and was sold nevertheless by an ultra vires proceeding, you cannot infer from the sale itself, what is contrary to the fact, that the land is superfluous land. Therefore I think that the decision was perfectly right, and the principle upon which the decision proceeded was also perfectly right. Kekewich, J., thought the case of Lord Carington v. The Wycombe Railway Co. was opposed to the case of Hobbs v. The Midland Railway Co.; but I think it is to be entirely distinguished from that case, and also from this case.

Now, if that view is well founded, and I have not the slightest doubt about it myself, what becomes of this litigation? It ends in this, that the plaintiff is entirely in the wrong, and I think he is in the wrong from beginning to end.

Now I will say a word or two about the proviso, because in the clause which authorizes the Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Co. to take the 7 acres there is this proviso: [His lordship read the proviso, and continued:] I have pointed out what in my opinion the plaintiff's rights exactly were when this Act of Parliament was passed; and it appears to me, although the language is not so explicit as it might be, to follow from this that if the 7 acres had become superfluous lands in the hands of the Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Co., Mr. Dunhill might have had the benefit of this proviso, and might have been able to say to them if that happened: "Treat me as a person who sold those lands to you, and give me the right of pre-emption under the Lands Clauses Act which I should have had against the North-Eastern Railway Co. if they had not required them." That, it seems to me, is the true effect of the proviso. It seems to me it has no other operation, but of course that may be an important operation. It may not be important to Mr. Dunhill as matters are; but if these lands should become superfluous lands in the hands of the Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Co., that proviso might be of use to Mr. Dunhill. Apart from that, it appears to me that is the only effect the proviso can have. It appears to me that to ask us to hold that this proviso gives him a right to say, contrary to the fact, that these lands are to be treated as superfluous lands in the hands of the North-Eastern Railway Co., is to ask us to say that which is not warranted either by the language of the section or by the real truth.

Therefore I think this appeal must be allowed, and judgment must be given for the defendants, with costs both here and below.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—In or about the year 1863 Mr Dunhill sold certain land to the North-Eastern Railway Co., for the purpose of their undertaking. There were 7 acres of it that in 1883 had not been utilized by the North-Eastern Railway Co. for the purpose of their undertaking. At that time the ten years mentioned in the Lands Clauses Act had not run out, because there had been various prolongations of time; and in the year 1883, beyond all question, the ten years had not run out, and those ten years by reason of subsequent prolongations did not run out till the year 1894. As a matter of fact, in the year 1883 these lands de facto were not superfluous lands within the meaning of the section in the hands of the North-Eastern Railway Co. It was admitted by Mr. Warrington (although he said he did not agree with what Kekewich, J., said) that they were not, that it was impossible on the evidence to hold that they were superfluous lands at that date. Now, I have looked through the evidence in consequence of what Mr. Ford has said, not adopting the remarks of his leader, and I find there are two or three passages in the evidence of Mr. Gibb, who is the general manager of the railway company, which bear upon this point. [His lordship referred to the evidence, and continued:] Therefore de facto this land in 1883 was not superfluous land in the hands of the North-Eastern Railway Co.

Now, what has happened? Have the North-Eastern Railway Co. sold this land, before the expiration of what I will call the ten years, within the meaning of the sections 127, 128, and 129? In my judgment they have done nothing of the sort. Those sections apply to voluntary sales by a railway company, and not to a case where the Legislature has thought fit to intervene and compulsorily take lands out of the hands of a railway company. The object of those sections is well known. In the year 1845 it was contemplated that unless railway companies were compelled to sell their superfluous lands they might become large landowners with large powers, and might become holders of land greatly in excess of what was requisite and necessary for their undertaking. If one reads sections 127, 128, and 129 carefully, in my judgment they apply to the case only of a voluntary sale by a railway company of its own land.

Now, what has happened? In 1883—the defendant company not at the moment requiring these lands, but before ever the lands did become superfluous lands within the meaning of the Act — the Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Co. wanted these lands for the purpose of their undertaking. In those circumstances the Legislature intervened, and in 1883 the Legislature insisted that the Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Co. should purchase, and were entitled to purchase by compulsion, these 7 acres from the North-Eastern Railway Co. Under these circumstances what is the result? It is said, because the North-Eastern Railway Co. have been compelled by the Legislature to sell lands which were not superfluous lands, the Act of the Legislature constituted them superfluous lands, although they were not so de facto, in the hands of the North-Eastern Railway Co., and that therefore the plaintiff had a right of pre-emption, and that the lands ought to have been offered to him before the Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Co. were entitled to purchase these lands from the North-Eastern Railway Co. Now, I cannot see how that can be at all. In my judgment a compulsory purchase under the Act of Parliament cannot be held to be any evidence, and is no evidence at all, that lands which are not de facto superfluous lands at the time become superfluous by reason of the existence of the legislative power empowering the company to purchase land. Kekewich, J., with all submission to him, has gone wrong in trying to apply either of the two cases —viz., the case of Hobbs v. The Midland Railway Co. and Lord Carington v. Wycombe Railway Co. With all submission to the learned judge, they have nothing to do with this case. There was no taking by compulsion by the Act of the Legislature in either of those cases. In those cases there was a voluntary sale; and, if I may be allowed to say so, I think Manisty, J., was quite right in holding that a valid sale by a railway company of lands which had been in the company's possession prior to the expiration of the ten years was something from which you might infer that those lands were superfluous lands—for this reason, if they were not superfluous lands, what right had the company to sell those lands at all? In the case of Lord Carington v. Wycombe Railway Co. the railway company had bought land in the first instance, not for the purpose of its own undertaking, but for the purpose of selling it immediately afterwards at a profit to another purchaser, and that was set aside; and Manisty, J., set aside the conveyance in the case of Hobbs v. Midland Railway Co., and so relegated the parties to their original rights. It seems to me that neither of those cases touches the point which we have to decide here—namely, whether the compulsory power of purchase which was given by the Legislature by the Act of 1883 to the Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Co. converted lands which were not de facto superfluous lands into superfluous lands. I confess I cannot follow the learned judge in his decision upon the point, and I think he was wrong; and I think he was wrong because he missed the point.

Then with regard to the other question, about the proviso, I have nothing to add to what has fallen from my brother Lindley. I should like, however, to point out this—that when the Act of Parliament of 1883 was passed on the facts of the case there was no right with regard to the North-Eastern Railway Co. which could be preserved, as to these superfluous lands, to Mr. Dunhill; for the best of all reasons, that at that time they were not, and, as it is proved, they never would have been, superfluous lands in the hands of the North-Eastern Railway Co. to which Mr. Dunhill could have any right at all. It is true that, as these lands were transferred by compulsion to the Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Co., it might be possible that they might become superfluous lands in the hands of the Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Co.; and that might have been the idea of the draftsman and of the Legislature when they inserted this proviso in favour of Mr. Dunhill. But in my judgment that proviso in no way alters this case, or converts lands which were not superfluous into being de facto superfluous lands. Therefore I am opinion, for these reasons, the appeal must be allowed.

RIGBY, L.J.—The question arises, first of all, independently of the proviso. As pointed out by my brother Lindley, the Act of 1883 does not prove that the Legislature thought the land was not required for the purposes of the North-Eastern Railway Co.; it does prove that the Legislature thought it might be better, for public purposes, to place it in the hands of the Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Co. That is all it proves, according to my mind.

Now, what has happened? In 1883 it is plain that the period had not arrived when the railway company were bound to say definitely whether the lands were superfluous lands or not, and the time was ultimately extended to the year 1894; at any rate, in 1883 it was not incumbent on the North-Eastern Railway Co. definitely to make up their minds upon the question. In other words, the vendor, the plaintiff, had no existing right whatsoever with regard to the land. Ultimately he might become entitled to the land in default of the company dealing with it, if it really was land not required for the purposes of their railway. That was all the right, apparently, that he had.

Now let us follow out the consequences of the sale. Before notice to treat was given them the railway company was under no obligation to offer it to the plaintiff. When notice to treat was given that formed a statutory contract, and they were bound. They were no longer in equity the owners of the land at all. A conveyance had to take place, and that was all. How can a man who has no equitable interest in land, and which he is selling in obedience to a statute, go through the form—because it must be a form only—of saying: "I will sell you the land"? He had no power to do so; he could not have done it. I think that conclusively shows that the sections which have been referred to under the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, namely, sections 127 and 128, cannot have been intended to deal with such a case at all. It is idle for an Act of Parliament to say: "You, who, by reason of the notice to treat which has been legally served upon you, have no longer any equitable interest in the land, shall sell it." It cannot mean that.

Now look at the proviso. As I have said, all the right the plaintiff had was a contingent right, a right arising at a future time, in case it turned out that the lands were lands which were not required for the purpose of the North-Eastern Railway. Now, the evidence as to that shows conclusively what would have been the position of the land, namely, that the land at the expiration of the time in 1894 would have been required for the purpose of the North-Eastern Railway. Therefore Mr. Dunhill's rights were nothing at all. I cannot understand how under those circumstances the cases referred to have any application. I can understand when a railway company sells, and it is recited that the lands are superfluous lands, which means the same thing as saying they are not required for the purposes of the Act, that as between themselves and the adjoining owners they are bound. The case of Lord Carington v. The Wycombe Railway Co. would be sufficient authority for that. I agree with Manisty, J., that it is not conclusive evidence, and it does not operate by way of an estoppel, so as to make a railway company say what they never intended to say, that the land was not required for the purpose at all. In my judgment there is nothing in either of these authorities to lead to the conclusion that a sale of this kind under compulsory powers given to another railway company has any effect in showing that the lands were not required, and would not have been required before the end of the term, for the purpose of the railway company.

Solicitors, Williamson, Hill, & Co., for A. Kaye Butterworth, York; Beyfus & Beyfus.

From Chan. Div. (Lindley, Lopes, and Kay, L.JJ.) May 22, 1895.

In re STONE.
BAKER v. STONE. (a.)

Will—Construction—Bequest per stirpes or per capita.

A testator bequeathed the income of his property to his wife for life, and after her death equally between his brother and sisters, and "at the decease of either of my before-named brother or sisters, their interest herein to be equally divided amongst their children, and after the decease of all I desire the whole of my property to be sold . . . and to be equally divided between the children of the aforesaid, share and share alike."

The testator's wife survived all the brothers and sisters. Upon her death;

Held (reversing the decision of Stirling, J.), that the proceeds were divisible amongst the children per capita, and not per stirpes, notwithstanding the fact that the division was per stirpes so long as any brother or sister was living.

Appeal from Stirling, J.

The testator, John Stone, by his will, dated the 10th of January, 1841, gave and bequeathed all his property to his wife for her life, and after her decease the income was to be equally divided between his brother and sisters, and "at the decease of either of my before-named brother or sisters their interest herein to be equally divided amongst their children, and after the decease of all I desire the whole of my property to be sold, moneys called in, &c., &c., and to be equally divided between the children of the aforesaid, share and share alike."

The widow survived the brother and sisters, each of whom left children. On the widow's death the estate was divisible, and the question arose whether the children took per stirpes or per capita.

Stirling, J., on the authority of Brett v. Horton, 4 Beav. 239, held that the children of the testator's brother and sisters living at his death were entitled per stirpes, and not per capita.

The children who wished for a distribution per capita appealed.

Ingle Joyce, for the appellants.—There is no ambiguity in the context, and there will be nothing irrational or unjust in carrying out the testator's intentions. Stirling, J., felt himself bound by Brett v. Horton, which, however, does not govern this case, for there the division was between individuals and a class of individuals.

He referred to Nockolds v. Locke, 5 W. R. 3, 3 K. & J. 6, and In re Campbell's Trusts, 34 W. R. 629, 33 Ch. D. 98.

Vernon Smith, Q.C., for the respondents.—Brett v. Horton has never been doubted, and is still treated as good law. It governs this case.

LINDLEY, L.J.—The question arises whether the declaration of Stirling, J., that the proceeds are divisible amongst the children of the brother and sisters of the testator per stirpes, and not per capita, is correct. That depends upon the language of the will. [His lordship read the will, and said that the expression "proceeds arising from my aforesaid property" did not mean the proceeds arising from sale and conversion, but the income of the property afterwards directed to be sold, and continued:—] Obviously the division is to be per capita, and not per stirpes; the language is not open to ambiguity. It is said that there is no sufficient expression of intention to alter the shares after the deaths of the brother and sisters. I think that the testator directed a division of the income per stirpes because he meant that the shares of his brother and sisters in the income should not be interfered with. I cannot see any reason for not giving effect to the plain intention of the testator. I decline to go into the cases, seeing as I do an intention clearly expressed in the will, and finding no rule of law opposed to giving effect to it.

(a.) Reported by W. SHALLCROSS GODDARD, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The declaration must be that the proceeds of sale are divisible per capita, and not per stirpes.

LOPES and KAY, L.JJ., gave judgment to the same effect.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitors, Rowcliffes, Rawle, & Co., for Hippisley, Bristol.

High Court of Justice.

Chan. Div. }
Chitty, J. } Jan. 21.

In re SOMES.
SMITH v. SOMES. (a.)

Power — Extinction — Release — Benefit to releasor — Validity—Conveyancing and Law of Property Act, 1881 (44 & 45 Vict. c. 41), s. 52.

The principles of the law relating to fraudulent appointments do not apply to the release of a power. Such a release will not be invalidated by a benefit resulting to the releasor.

The ratio decidendi of Smith v. Houblon, 26 Beav. 482, 8 W. R. Ch. Dig. 53, and In re Radcliffe, Radcliffe v. Bewes, 40 W. R. 323, [1892] 1 Ch. 227, explained.

Originating summons.

Under a marriage settlement of 1862, and a conveyance and appointment of 1887, certain estates stood vested in trustees upon trust for a father for life with remainder to the trustees upon trust for sale, the proceeds of sale to be held upon such trusts for the benefit of his daughter and her issue born in his lifetime as he should by deed appoint; and in default of and subject to any such appointment in trust for the daughter absolutely.

In September, 1893, the father released his power of appointment, to the intent that the settled property might become vested in the daughter as in default of appointment.

In December, 1893, the father and daughter mortgaged their interests for £10,000, which was paid to the father and applied by him for his own purposes.

The father subsequently became bankrupt, and the trustees, at his request and with the consent of his trustee in bankruptcy, and at the request of the daughter, and with the concurrence of the mortgagee, sold the property for £16,500, which sum was paid to the trustees.

The question arising, how this fund ought to be dealt with, the trustees took out this summons to determine whether they could or ought properly to distribute the proceeds of sale as the daughter, the father's trustee in bankruptcy, and the mortgagee might direct.

(a.) Reported by G. ROWLAND ALSTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Farwell, Q.C., and Dauney, for the trustees.—The real question is, "Can there ever be such a thing as a fraudulent release of a power?" If there can, this is a case of it, as it is absolutely clear that the release was made with a view to the father's benefit. If the father had appointed the fund to the daughter with a like view, the appointment would have been clearly bad. Does not the same rule apply to releases? The court is not bound to assist such a release: Cunynghame v. Thurlow, 1 Russ. & M. 436n.; In re Little, Harrison v. Harrison, 37 W. R. 289, 40 Ch. D. 418. The cases of Smith v. Houblon, 26 Beav. 482, 8 W. R. Ch. Dig. 53, and In re Radcliffe, Radcliffe v. Bewes, 40 W. R. 323, [1892] 1 Ch. 227, do not say that all releases are necessarily valid. Again, although the Conveyancing Act, 1881, s. 52, has enabled powers simply collateral to be released, a power coupled with a duty cannot be released—In re Eyre, Eyre v. Eyre, 49 L. T. 259, 32 W. R. Dig. 148; Saul v. Pattinson, 34 W. R. 561—any more than it could before the Act: In re Dunne's Trusts, 1 L. R. Ir. 516, 27 W. R. Dig. 242. In this case it was the father's duty to preserve his power of giving a direct interest to the daughter's issue, unless he chose to exercise his power by a bonâ fide appointment to the daughter. He cannot escape the duty of acting bonâ fide by releasing the power.

Byrne, Q.C., and R. F. Norton, for the daughter and the mortgagee.—The case is on all fours with Smith v. Houblon, and the present state of the law cannot be more clearly stated than in Farwell on Powers, pp. 11, 12, 438, 439, where all the cases cited are discussed and explained.

C. E. E. Jenkins, for the father's trustee in bankruptcy.

CHITTY, J.—The objection of the trustees is based on the fact that the father obtained a benefit by releasing the power. It is contended that a release is subject to the same rules as an appointment. It is well settled that a power of this class can be released: Smith v. Houblon. In that case the father had a power of appointment among children over a fund which, in default of appointment, was limited to them equally. Being beneficially entitled in default of appointment to one-third of the fund as representative of a deceased child, he assigned that one-third share to his mortgagees and released his power. It was held that this power was effectually released. Now, the very same objection arose in that case as is suggested here—viz., that the person releasing acquired a benefit. If the fraudulent appointment rules apply to releases, that case was wrongly decided. But the point was considered in In re Radcliffe, in which case the Court of Appeal followed Smith v. Houblon and rejected Cunynghame v. Thurlow. In In re Radcliffe the father, who executed the release, was entitled as administrator to the interest of a deceased son. I am informed by two of the counsel in that case that, though a point was mentioned in the report as to the father's life interest and the son's reversion being held by the father in different rights, in point of fact there were no substantial debts for the son's administrator to pay. It is therefore plain on the facts of In re Radcliffe that the father, in executing the release, was augmenting the beneficial interest which he already took under the settlement. That case appears by itself a sufficient authority to justify, or more properly speaking to bind, me in holding that the release of a power is not invalidated by the fact of a benefit resulting to the person releasing. If it is necessary for me to express a broader opinion, it appears to me that there is a fallacy in applying the principles of fraudulent appointments to releases.

The donee of a power like this is under no duty to exercise it. There is no fiduciary relation between him and the objects of the power, except that if he exercises the power he must exercise it honestly for the benefit of those objects. I cannot find any ground for applying that doctrine to the release of a power. Two cases, viz., Saul v. Pattinson and In re Eyre, Eyre v. Eyre, were cited to show that the release could not stand. But in each of those cases the power was coupled with a duty, and was part of the trust, so that the trustees could not get rid of it. I have nothing to say about those decisions except to observe that they have no application to the present case.

I therefore answer the question in the affirmative.

Solicitors, Street, Poynder, & Whatley; Saxton & Son; Trinder & Capron.

Chan. Div. }
Kekewich, J. } May 29, 1895.

THOMSON v. TRUSTEES, EXECUTORS, AND SECURITIES INSURANCE CORPORATION. (a.)

Company — Company formed to carry on financial operations — Capital — Assets — Investment — Surrender of part to improve remainder — Reduction of capital — Ultra vires — Memorandum of association — Companies Acts, 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 131), s. 9, and 1877 (40 & 41 Vict. c. 26), s. 3.

The surrender by a limited financial company of a part of a security, constituting one of its assets, for the purpose of improving the remainder, where the company is acting within the scope of its business as set forth in the memorandum of association, is not a reduction of capital within the Companies Acts, 1867 and 1877, requiring the sanction of the court.

Motion.

The defendant corporation was incorporated in 1887 under the Companies Acts, 1862-1886, with a nominal capital of £2,000,000, divided into 200,000 shares of £10 each.

By the memorandum of association the objects were declared, inter alia, to include the receiving of money on deposit, making loans on security, and "generally of lending money on such terms as might seem expedient, and the carrying on of financial operations of every kind, the borrowing of money and giving security, the investing of money, the managing, disposing of, or otherwise dealing with all or any part of the property of the company, and the doing of all things conducive to the attainment of such objects."

The corporation held 6,325 fully paid-up £5 shares in a company formed for constructing a railway in Spain under a concession granted by the Spanish Government.

By an agreement dated the 14th of May, 1895, and made between the corporation and the said railway company, after reciting that, owing to lack of funds, the company were unable to complete their line, and consequently were likely to forfeit their concession, and that, it being impossible to raise further capital, a bank would advance the requisite money on the guarantee of approved guarantors, and that in consideration of giving the guarantee the guarantors should have transferred to them by the shareholders a part of the issued share capital in proportion to their holdings, it was agreed that the corporation, on being satisfied that the scheme had become binding on all parties, would at the request of the railway company transfer 2,000 shares, of the nominal value of £10,000, being part of the 6,325 shares held by them, as the railway company might direct.

The plaintiff thereupon, on the 23rd of May, 1895, issued a writ, on behalf of himself and all other shareholders in the corporation, against the corporation claiming a declaration that the agreement was ultra vires, and an injunction preventing it from being carried into effect. The plaintiff also served notice of motion to the same effect, on the ground that the corporation would derive no benefit from the transfer, that it therefore amounted to a surrender of assets, and was consequently ultra vires.

By the affidavit of its general manager the corporation stated that the object of the proposed transfer was to assist the railway company in completing its line, and thus to give a real value to the rest of the shares held by the corporation, and that unless this was done the whole agreement would fall through, and by the affidavit of the chairman of the railway company it was shown that if the agreement fell through the line would remain uncompleted, and that total loss would result.

By consent the motion was treated as the trial of the action.

E. B. Cooper, for plaintiff.—By section 9 of the Companies Act, 1867, no reduction of capital such as is here proposed by the surrender of a part of the assets of the corporation, can be made without an order of the court obtained as prescribed by the Act. Section 3 of the Companies Act extends the meaning of "capital." It is ultra vires, not being sanctioned by the memorandum of association.

Renshaw, Q.C., and Kirby, for defendant corporation.—As a financial company the corporation may do what it thinks best to protect assets. The memorandum covers what is proposed, and the court will not interfere with the corporation in the carrying on of its business: Taunton v. Royal Insurance Co., 12 W. R. 549, 2 H. & M. 135.

KEKEWICH, J.—I think that what is proposed to be done by the corporation cannot be called a "reduction of capital," and if this is so it is clearly within their powers. It is true that the rules enacted by the Legislature to be followed in a case of reduction of capital are very strict, but they were never intended to paralyse the ordinary business of a company, and in reference to that business they must be somewhat elastically construed.

Were I to hold this to be "a reduction of capital" I should be obliged to say that whenever a company parts with any of its assets—e.g., investments or securities—that is a reduction of capital. In one sense it is, but not in the sense of reducing the capital of a trading corporation.

Suppose, for instance, a company allowed to invest on mortgage of land invests £10,000 on such a mortgage, and that the land becomes depreciated and impossible to let, and the company cannot and apparently never will get anything out of their mortgage, and suppose the mortgagor were to say to them, "If you will release a few acres here, I think I should lay out some roads and so forth, and in a few years the value of the whole estate, and consequently of your security, will be much improved," and the company think it is worth trying, and honestly think that by giving up part of their security they may obtain a benefit, would it not be utterly absurd to hold in such a case that this was a reduction of capital, needing the sanction of the court on a petition and the writing of the words "and reduced"? Now, this is a case on similar lines. This is an investment or security forming part of the assets of the company. The company's assets are employed in business, and this being a financial company has a right to advance its business in any manner within what an ordinary business man might do in the ordinary way of advancing his business. This motion is treated as the trial of the action, and I give judgment for the defendants, the judgment to be prefaced by the words "the court being of opinion that there is nothing to prevent the defendant company from entering into and carrying out the agreement of the 14th of May, 1895." The plaintiff to pay all costs of the action.

(a.) Reported by C. C. HENSLEY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Solicitors, Ashurst, Morris, Crisp, & Co.; Slaughter & May.

Q. B. Div.
(Lord Russell of Killowen, C.J., and Wills and Wright, JJ.) Dec. 21.

Ex parte ARTON (No. 1). (a.)

Extradition — Requisition by foreign Government — "Offence of a political character"—Bonâ fides of foreign Government—Jurisdiction of court—Extradition Act, 1870 (33 & 34 Vict. c. 52), s. 3.

Upon an application by the accused for a writ of habeas corpus, the court has no jurisdiction to entertain or deal with the question whether the foreign Government in demanding the surrender was acting in good faith and in the interests of justice.

Application for a rule nisi for a habeas corpus.

The application was made on behalf of Emile Arton, now a prisoner in Her Majesty's Prison, Holloway, and it called upon the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Sir John Bridge, and the Government of the French Republic to show cause why a writ of habeas corpus should not issue to bring up the body of Emile Arton, against whom an order of extradition had been made by Sir John Bridge, sitting at Bow-street Police Court.

The offences in respect of which the order of committal had been made were six in number: (1) Falsification of accounts and using falsified accounts; (2) fraud as agent or trustee; (3) obtaining money and goods by false pretences; (4) crimes against the bankruptcy laws; (5) larceny; (6) embezzlement.

The application for the rule was made upon four grounds, namely—first, that the magistrate committed the accused for an offence which is not within the Extradition Treaty; secondly, that the depositions did not disclose a primâ facie case in support of the charges; thirdly, that the demand for Arton's surrender was not made in good faith; and, fourthly, that the demand was made for political purposes.

The Extradition Treaty with France, made in 1878, provides, in clause 3, that the crimes in respect of which extradition is to be granted are the following: (18) "Fraud by a bailee, banker, agent, factor, trustee or director, or member or public officer of any company, made criminal by any Act for the time being in force"; and section 3 of the Extradition Act, 1870 (33 & 34 Vict. c. 32), provides that "the following restrictions shall be observed with respect to the surrender of fugitive criminals: (1) A fugitive criminal shall not be surrendered if the offence in respect of which his surrender is demanded is one of a political character, or if he prove to the satisfaction of the police magistrate, or the court before whom he is brought on habeas corpus, or to the Secretary of State, that the requisition for his surrender has, in fact, been made with a view to try or punish him for an offence of a political character."

C. W. Mathews, in support of the application.—With regard to the first ground of the application, the crime of "faux," which is included in the order of committal, and which is translated as "falsification of accounts and using falsified accounts," is not a crime within the meaning of the Extradition Treaty with France, and therefore it is not a crime with respect to which extradition can be granted. [A rule was in the result granted upon this ground.] With regard to the second ground of application, that the depositions do not disclose a primâ facie case against the prisoner, as this applies to two only of the offences charged, and as there is a primâ facie case with regard to the other offences, it would be useless to insist further upon the point. [Lord RUSSELL, C.J.—The court wish you to pass over the third ground for the present, and deal with the fourth and last ground.] By dealing with the third ground and going through the facts of the case as disclosed in Arton's affidavit, the argument in support of the fourth ground would have been very much strengthened. The fourth ground is that the requisition was made for political purposes. I submit that the demand for the surrender, although ostensibly made for crimes of fraud, is in reality made for the purpose of obtaining political secrets. The surrender of the prisoner is demanded with a view to try or punish him for an offence of a political character within the meaning of section 3 of the Extradition Act, 1870. If surrendered upon these charges, he will be placed on his trial ostensibly for these charges, but certain questions will be put to him relating to political matters, and if he refuses to answer and disclose these political secrets he will be in contempt, and will be punished for contempt of court, and may be imprisoned until he answers. This is punishing him for an offence of a political character. The case of Ex parte Castioni, 39 W. R. 202, [1891] 1 Q. B. 149, shows that the court can go into all the facts to enable them to judge whether there has been a political offence. [The Court refused to hear any argument on the third ground.]

Lord RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN, C.J. — It is not necessary that the court should consider the general law of extradition, except to point out the distinction between its political and its strictly judicial aspect, with the latter of which alone we have to deal. Extradition is founded upon the broad principle that it is in the interests of civilized communities that crimes, acknowledged by civilized communities to be such, should not go unpunished, and it is part of the comity of nations that one State shall assist another to bring those who commit such crimes to justice. But the application of that principle, and the conditions under which extradition shall be granted, and the formalities to be observed in the obtaining of extradition, are all matters primarily for the two political Powers in question to arrange in the first instance by treaty, and then to put into law by a legislative enactment what are the conditions, the limitations, and the class of crimes for which extradition will be granted. It is to the expression of the Legislature in Acts of Parliament, and to that alone, that judicial tribunals can refer. The Act or Acts of Parliament are at once the sole source, and at the same time the strict limitation, of the judicial functions of the court. We are sitting here as judges, and as judges only, and we have nothing to do with political questions or political considerations, except in so far as they are introduced into the Act or Acts we are called upon to construe.

(a.) Reported by Sir SHERSTON BAKER, Bart., Barrister-at-Law.

The first ground on which this motion was made was that the person in custody has been committed for crimes not within the Extradition Treaty. That applies to one only of the six charges on which the order of committal has been made, namely—the crime of faux, or "falsification of accounts and using falsified accounts." It has been argued that that does not come within the enumeration of offences described in the Treaty, and there is no doubt that to justify a committal for any crime it must come within the Treaty and come within the Act of Parliament. The only category in the 3rd article of the Treaty which can be said to relate to it is the one which deals with "fraud by a bailee, banker, agent, factor, trustee, or director, or member or public officer of a company," within the meaning of the 18th category of the Treaty. The court think that there is sufficient in this point to grant a rule upon the point; and if, upon argument of the rule, those who represent the Crown are unable to satisfy the court that it is properly included, then steps will be taken to prevent the man committed being charged with that offence.

The next point is that the accused has been committed for offences of which there is no primâ facie proof, and no doubt the contention on this second point is quite right, namely—that the court is entitled, and is bound, to see whether or not there has been made out before the magistrate such a primâ facie case of guilt as would entitle him in the ordinary case of a crime committed against the municipal laws of this country to commit the person charged to take his trial for that offence. The allegation of the want of sufficient proof is restricted to two of the charges out of six, namely—fraud by an agent within category 18 of clause 3 of the Treaty, and the obtaining money and goods by false pretences; but it is admitted that both these are within the Treaty and the Act of Parliament as an offence in respect of which an extradition may properly be made. It is also conceded that as regards the remaining offences it could not be successfully contended that there was not ample evidence to justify the committal. In view of that fact, the point has not been insisted upon as to the alleged sufficiency of the evidence of the two charges, fraud by an agent and obtaining money and goods by false pretences.

The third ground urged is that the demand for an extradition is not made in good faith and in the interests of justice. I will pass by that for the present, and come to the fourth, which is that the offences for which the prisoner is committed are political in their character, and that the surrender has been demanded from political motives.

There is no doubt that if it had been shown that the surrender was demanded for an offence of a political character, or that the surrender was demanded with a view to try or punish the accused for an offence of a political character—if either of those alternative propositions could have been established—it would furnish a ground either for the intervention of this court, or for a declaration by this court that for such an offence no extradition could legally, under the Act of Parliament, be made. Is there any real ground for either of these suggestions? First, is this an offence of a political character, or is any one of the offences an offence of a political character? The bare enumeration of them seems to be an answer to that suggestion. The bare enumeration of them shows that they are completely divested of any offence of a political character. Then can it be said that the requisition is made with a view to try or punish him for an offence of a political character? It seems to me to be perfectly clear that what that means is this—that, with regard to a person whose extradition is demanded, for having committed an offence of a political character, the pretence of a charge of another and a different crime which does come within the Extradition Act and the Treaty is resorted to as a pretence and excuse for demanding the extradition, in order that he may be tried and punished for a political offence which he has already committed. The learned counsel was pressed as to what was the political offence, or the offence of a political character, which it can be alleged this man has committed. The answer was that it is impossible to give it a name or to describe it. I therefore come to the conclusion, as regards that fourth point, that there is no evidence to warrant us in coming to the conclusion either that the offence in respect of which surrender is demanded is one of a political character, or that the requisition for his surrender has been made to punish him for an offence of a political character.

The third ground was that the demand was not made in good faith and in the interests of justice. I pointed out that this was in itself a very grave and serious statement to put forward, and one which ought not to be put forward unless there are very strong grounds for supporting it. It means to convey not only a reflection of the gravest kind upon the motives and actions of the responsible Government of a neighbouring and friendly Power, but also a very grave imputation, not lightly to be made, upon the judicial authorities of that friendly Power. But is this a matter open to us at all? In my judgment it is not. This bears upon the political aspect of the question. Into its consideration matters enter of which this court is incompetent to judge, and of which, as I conceive, it has no authority to judge. They are considerations, if they exist at all, to be addressed to the Executive of this country, and they cannot enter, and ought not to enter, into the judicial consideration of this question, which to my mind turns solely upon the terms of the Act of Parliament and the Treaty on which that Act was made. Upon these grounds there will be no rule granted, except on the first point.

WILLS, J.—I am entirely of the same opinion. With regard to the point that Arton's surrender has been demanded with the view to try or punish him for an offence of a political character, I think it is impossible to doubt, applying the ordinary principles of construction, that the offence of a political character of which the Act speaks must be one which has been already committed. It is admitted that there is no conduct of the prisoner which can be so described, or which can fulfil that condition, that the prisoner has already committed a political offence against the laws of France; but it is said that if he be surrendered he will, when he gets into the hands of the French judicial authorities, be compelled either to disclose matters which he knows or to undergo indefinite imprisonment until he does answer the questions. The same considerations prevail here which induce us to say that we cannot enter into the question whether the Executive of a foreign country at peace with us is honest or dishonest in the discharge of its duty, and these considerations lead us to refuse to entertain the question whether it is probable that the French courts will depart from their own laws. We must assume that the French courts will administer justice according to their own laws; but, whether they do that or not, we have no right to interfere beforehand to prevent them from exercising in this case the kind of procedure which they exercise with regard to any criminal who may come within their jurisdiction. That seems to me to be an absolute and complete answer to the argument addressed to us.

WRIGHT, J., concurred.

Application refused, except on the first ground.

Solicitor for the accused, Arthur Newton.

IN BANKRUPTCY.

Q. B. Div.
(Vaughan Williams, J.) } Dec. 3.

In re BASSETT.
Ex parte LEWIS. (a.)

Bankruptcy—Costs—Set off of costs of an appeal to a Divisional Court of the Queen's Bench Division against costs of an appeal to the Divisional Court in Bankruptcy—Bankruptcy Rules, 1886, r. 353.

The costs of an appeal to a Divisional Court of the Queen's Bench Division cannot be set off against the costs of an appeal to the Divisional Court in Bankruptcy.

Application by Mr. Lewis, liquidator of Bassett & Co. (Limited), for the payment out of court of a sum of £20 lodged by him as security for costs of an appeal to the Divisional Court in Bankruptcy, under the following circumstances.

Mr. Lewis, shortly after his appointment as liquidator of Bassett & Co. (Limited), brought a misfeasance summons, under the Companies (Winding-up) Act, 1890, against Mr. Bassett, a director of the company, in the Birmingham County Court. Mr. Lewis succeeded on the summons, and Mr. Bassett appealed to the Queen's Bench Division, where his appeal was dismissed with costs.

Mr. Lewis then presented a bankruptcy petition against Mr. Bassett in the same county court, and the petition was dismissed. Mr. Lewis appealed to the Divisional Court in Bankruptcy, but the appeal was dismissed with costs (see 43 W. R. 427).

Mr. Lewis now applied for the payment out of court of the sum of £20 lodged by him as security for the costs of his appeal, upon the ground that he was entitled to set off the costs of the appeal to the Queen's Bench Division, in which he had succeeded, against the costs of the appeal to the Divisional Court in Bankruptcy, in which he had failed.

Muir Mackenzie, for Mr. Lewis.—In the case of Ex parte Griffin, Re Adams (No. 2), 28 W. R. 714, 14 Ch. D. 37, it was held that costs in the High Court could not be set off against costs in bankruptcy, but where that case is cited in Williams on Bankruptcy, 6th ed., p. 128, it is stated that this can hardly be so now that bankruptcy matters are assigned to the Queen's Bench Division.

F. C. Willis, for Mr. Bassett.—In Robson on Bankruptcy, 7th ed., p. 373, it is stated that the costs of proceedings in the High Court not in bankruptcy cannot be set off against the costs of proceedings in bankruptcy, and Barker v. Hemming, 28 W. R. 764, is cited in support of that proposition.

The cases of Pelton v. Harrison (No. 2), [1892] 1 Q, B. 118, 40 W. R. Dig. 181, and Blakey v. Latham, 38 W. R. 193, 43 Ch. D. 23, were also referred to.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J.—In my judgment I ought not to allow these costs to be set off. I should like to do so if I could see my way to it, because I think that in the present case such a set-off would be just and equitable between the parties. It is, however, clear that up to the date of the passing of the Judicature Act costs of an appeal on the chancery side could not be set off against an appeal on the bankruptcy side; the question, up to that date, was altogether unarguable. Now, it must be seen whether there is anything in the Judicature Act to alter this state of things, and I cannot discover that there is anything express on this point to be found in the Act itself. The rules which give power to a taxing master to set off relate only to the common law side—or rather, to the Queen's Bench Division. Therefore, as there is no express enactment or rule allowing the set-off in such a case as the present, it must be seen whether there is anything in the fact that these judgments are both of them judgments of Divisional Courts, which points to the conclusion that one set of costs may be set off against the other.

I think that there is nothing at all in this fact which can lead me to such a conclusion, and I am therefore of opinion that the costs of the appeal from the county court to the Queen's Bench Division cannot be set off against or deducted from the costs of the appeal from the county court to the Divisional Court in Bankruptcy. There are many and good reasons for keeping costs in bankruptcy distinct from other costs. Proceedings in bankruptcy are in themselves of a very special nature, and are taken against a man with a view of altering his status, and, in my opinion, costs in such proceedings ought not to be set off against or deducted from costs in other proceedings.

Application dismissed.

Solicitors for the applicant, Harveys & Capron.

Solicitor for the respondent, F. Hatton.

(a.) Reported by P. M. FRANCKE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Prob. Div. & Adm. Div.
Probate. } July 8, 1895.

IN THE GOODS OF PONSONBY, DECEASED. (a.)

Probate—Administration—Bodily incapacity of executor—Grant during incompetency for use and benefit.

Where a sole executor was bodily incapable of acting, and likely to remain so for some time, the court granted letters of administration with the will annexed to a residuary legatee for life, for the executor's use and benefit during his incompetency.

Motion for a grant of letters of administration of the personal estate of Georgina Melita Maria Ponsonby, with will dated the 17th of May, 1877, and codicil dated the 17th of December, 1894, to Harriet Julia Frances Ponsonby, one of the residuary legatees for life, for the use and benefit of Sir Henry Frederick Ponsonby, the surviving executor, during his incompetency.

The deceased died on the 18th of February, 1895, having by her said will and codicil appointed Sir Henry Frederick Ponsonby and the Rev. Frederick John Ponsonby her executors and trustees, and in the events which had happened leaving her sister, the said Georgina Melita Maria Ponsonby, residuary legatee for life of two-thirds of the estate, and another sister, Selina Barbara Baring, residuary legatee for life of the remaining one-third. The Rev. Frederick John Ponsonby predeceased the testatrix. Sir Henry Frederick Ponsonby was dangerously ill, totally unable, and not likely for a long time, according to the doctor's affidavit, to be able to understand or attend to business matters.

(a.) Reported by J. GERARD LAING, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The sister Selina Barbara Baring had given her written consent to the present application.

R. A. Pritchard and Priestley, in support of the motion, applied for a grant either under section 73 of the Court of Probate Act, 1857 (20 & 21 Vict. c. 77), to the residuary legatee as such, or for a grant in the terms of the motion without reference to section 73, referring to Williams on Executors, 9th ed., p. 441. Where the executor is disabled from acting or becomes incapable of legal acts as here, then there should be a grant of temporary administration, as put in 1 Oughton's Oido Judiciorum, tit. 219, 1n (a 2), Durante corporis aut animi vitio.

JEUNE, P.—I think the passage in Oughton includes bodily incapacity, and the grant should go in the terms of the motion.

Motion allowed.

Solicitors, Leman & Co.

House of Lords.

From C. A. England. } Dec. 2.

FORD'S HOTEL CO. v. BARTLETT. (a.)

Arbitration—Stay of proceedings—"Step in proceedings"—Arbitration Act, 1889, s. 4—Practice—Appeal—Judicature Act, 1894, s. 1.

A defendant by taking out a summons for obtaining an order for an extension of time for delivery of defence takes a "step in the proceedings" within the meaning of section 4 of the Arbitration Act, 1889.

Decision of the Court of Appeal, 43 W. R. 453, [1895] 1 Q. B. 850, affirmed.

Section 1 of the Judicature Act, 1894, applies only to appeals from the High Court to the Court of Appeal.

This was an appeal from the Court of Appeal (Lopes and Rigby, L.JJ.) reported 43 W. R. 453, [1895] 1 Q. B. 850.

The action was brought to recover the balance of money alleged to be due for work done under a building contract, which contained a stipulation that any disputes arising between the parties out of the contract should be referred to arbitration.

The defendants, the present appellants, entered an appearance, and on three occasions obtained from the plaintiff written consents to extensions of time for delivering their defence. The defendants took out a summons asking for further time for delivery of defence, and obtained from the master a further allowance of fourteen days.

The defendants then applied at chambers under section 4 of the Arbitration Act, 1889, for a stay of all proceedings in the action.

Collins, J., made the order. This was reversed by the Court of Appeal.

The defendants appealed.

Edward Boyle (J. P. Murphy, Q.C., with him), for the respondent, urged a preliminary objection. By section 1 of the Judicature Act, 1894, no appeal lies from an interlocutory judgment or order without the leave of the court.

[The House was of opinion that the section only applied to appeals from the court of first instance to the Court of Appeal.]

Cyril Dodd, Q.C., and Arnold Statham (W. H. Nagle with them), for the appellants.—An application for an extension of time is not a "step in the proceedings within the meaning of the Arbitration Act: Chappell v. North, 40 W. R. 16, [1891] 2 Q. B. 252; Brighton Marine Palace and Pier Co. v. Woodhouse, 41 W. R. 488, [1893] 2 Ch. 486; Ives v. Willans, 42 W. R. 396, 483, [1894] 1 Ch. 68; 2 Ch. 478; Rein v. Stein, 66 L. T. N. S. 470, 40 W. R. Dig. 192; Young v. Buckett, 30 W. R. 511; Spincer v. Watts, 37 W. R. 676, 23 Q. B. D. 350; Richards v. Cullerne, 7 Q. B. D. 623, 30 W. R. Dig. 103.

Murphy, Q.C., and Edward Boyle, for the respondents, were not heard.

Lord HALSBURY, C.—I think this is a very plain case. The 4th section of the Arbitration Act, 1889, provides that a person who has by any contract agreed to go to arbitration may be compelled to observe that contractual obligation if some proceeding before the court is taken in order to stay the proceedings. In this provision there come the words which your lordships have to construe—viz., "before delivering any pleadings or taking any other steps in the proceedings."

Now, the defendants took out a summons in this form: "Let all parties concerned attend the master at chambers . . . on the hearing of an application on the part of the defendants that they may have one month's further time to deliver defence therein."

Upon this summons the master made an order that the defendants should have fourteen days' further time for delivering their defence. The sole question upon which we have been engaged so long is whether this is a step in the proceedings. It seems to me that it is. I am not going to give any definition of what a "step in the proceedings" may be; it is enough for this case to say that this is a "step in the proceedings."

There can be no doubt that what was in the mind of the Legislature was this—one of the great scandals which indueed the Legislature to interfere by statutory provision was the delay; and another was the costs incurred, notwithstanding that the proceedings did not go on, so that there were a great number of proceedings for which the parties had to pay, although they furnished no ultimate decision of their rights. The intention of the Legislature in giving effect to the contract of the parties, and saying that one of them should be entitled to make an application to insist that the matter should be referred according to the original agreement, was that they should at once, and before any further proceedings were taken, specify the terminus a quo, and that if an application to stay proceedings was made under those circumstances then that the court should enforce the contractual obligation to go to arbitration. That seems to me a very wise provision—that costs should not be thrown away in beginning to litigate.

I have designedly avoided saying anything about the other point which one of the appellant's counsel attempted to argue, namely—that, independently of the Act of 1889, the court has an inherent jurisdiction to stay proceedings in an action. Nothing appears to me more mischievous as a precedent than, when a case of this sort involving a question simply upon procedure is taken and appealed from court to court on one ground, for the parties when they come before the last court of appeal to attempt to raise a question dependent on a wholly different ground, and one which has not been considered by any one of the learned judges before whom the case had come.

(a.) Reported by CHARLES H. GRAFTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Under these circumstances I apprehend your lordships will not think it right to consider such a point at all. Confining ourselves to the one point which has been litigated here, I entertain no doubt whatever that the appeal ought to be dismissed with costs, and I move your lordships according.

Lord WATSON.—I am of the same opinion. The only question raised by this appeal is an exceedingly small one, and in my opinion it has been rightly decided by the learned judges in the Appeal Court. I see no reason to doubt that an order obtained upon a summons for extension of time for delivery of defence is a "step in the proceedings" by the defendant within the meaning of section 4 of the Arbitration Act.

Lord MACNAGHTEN and Lord MORRIS concurred.

Lord SHAND.—I am also of opinion that the application by the appellants for an extension of time to deliver their defence, upon which an order giving fourteen days was obtained, was a step in the proceedings. The proceeding in question was unlike that in the cases which have been mentioned, where agents without coming into court at all had given an extra-judicial and voluntary consent, because this proceeding took place judicially in chambers, which was the same as if in court. It is true the application came before a master, and not before the judge; but he was sitting as representing the judge, and the proceeding was therefore unquestionably judicial and a proceeding in the cause. I think further that the proceeding of presenting such a summons and supporting it before the master implied a statement to the effect that the appellants were to defend the action. It was on that representation only that the order of court was obtained. Having regard to the provisions of the Arbitration Act, this appears to me to have been in effect an abandonment of the proposal to have the subject of the cause disposed of by arbitration. On these grounds I am of opinion with your lordships that the appellants' summons with what followed on it, was a step in the proceedings, and that the judgment of the Court of Appeal ought to be affirmed.

Lord DAVEY.—I concur.

Order appealed from affirmed, and appeal dismissed with costs.

Solicitors for the appellants, W. L. Cooper, for Morgan & Co., Chepstow.

Solicitors for the respondent, Munns & Longden.

Court of Appeal.

From Chan. Div. (Lindley, A. L. Smith, and Rigby, L.JJ.) Dec. 18.

In re HARVEY.
HARVEY v. HOBDAY. (a.)

Mortgage—Settlement—Charge on inheritance—Payment by tenant for life—Presumption of intention for own benefit—Relation of parent and child.

The fact that the relationship of parent and child exists between a tenant for life and remaindermen, though not immaterial, is not of itself sufficient to rebut the presumption that a tenant for life who pays off a charge upon the inheritance intends to keep the charge alive for his own benefit, and not for the benefit of the remaindermen.

(a.) Reported by W. SHALLCROSS GODDARD, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Appeal by the plaintiff from a refusal of Kekewich, J., to vary the chief clerk's certificate.

The plaintiff, a son of Charlotte Emily Harvey, widow of Charles Bloomfield Harvey, took out a summons in November, 1894, to have it determined whether he, as executor of his mother, who was tenant for life under her husband's will, was entitled to be paid by the trustees of the will out of the corpus of the estate an amount which had been applied by the trustees out of the income of the widow as tenant for life in order to pay off a mortgage upon the inheritance. The testator left all his property (except a pair of houses in Western-road, Romford, which were not to be sold during the widowhood of his wife, and which were subject to a mortgage) to his executors upon trust to sell and to pay the income of the proceeds to his wife during widowhood, and after her death or second marriage to divide the corpus equally amongst his children who should be then living.

The two houses in Western-road, Romford, were mortgaged to a building society, the principal money and interest being repayable by monthly instalments. The trustees applied the rents of one of the houses for the monthly repayments, and by the addition of a further sum from the testator's estate finally paid off the mortgage in June, 1882.

Mrs. Harvey died in March, 1891, having never remarried. The houses were sold in May, 1893, for £1,225, and the plaintiff claimed so much of this amount as represented capital in the monthly payments to the building society. An inquiry was directed as to what amount (if any) was due to the plaintiff as executor of the widow and tenant for life in respect of money expended out of the widow's income in paying off the incumbrances. The chief clerk by his certificate found that nothing was due, and Kekewich, J., affirmed this decision.

The plaintiff appealed.

Warrington, Q.C., and G. Curtis Price, for the appellant.—The question is whether there is any different presumption of law where the relationship of parent and child exists between the tenant for life and the remaindermen.

They referred to Burrell v. Earl of Egremont, 7 Beav. 205; Morley v. Morley, 4 W. R. 75, 5 De G. M. & G. 610; and Topham v. Booth, 35 W. R. 715, 35 Ch. D. 607.

Renshaw, Q.C., and Marcy, for the respondents.—The law on the subject is clearly laid down in Adams v. Angell, 25 W. R. 139, 5 Ch. D. 634, 25 W. R. Dig. 163.

They also referred to Jones v. Morgan, 1 Br. C. C. 206.

LINDLEY, L.J.—I think it is established by the evidence beyond any reasonable doubt that, as a matter of fact (whatever the explanation of it may be), the rents of one of the two mortgaged houses were applied by the trustees of the will in paying the instalments which became due under the mortgage to the building society. Then, as regards the law, I think Mr. Warrington is right in saying that the onus is upon the defendants to prove that the ordinary legal presumption does not apply, that is, that a tenant for life who pays off an incumbrance upon the inheritance does so for his own benefit. The fact that the tenant for life and the remaindermen stood in the relation of parent and child is no doubt a material circumstance, and if there were anything else to rebut the presumption that fact would be of importance.

But I do not think any of the authorities goes the length of saying that the existence of that relationship standing alone is sufficient to rebut the presumption. We must therefore look at the circumstances to see what there is to rebut the presumption. [His lordship stated the facts, and continued:—] The tenant for life had no option about paying off the mortgage debt; indeed, it was rather to her interest that it should be paid off. And it is one important fact that no other property but these two houses was subject to the mortgage. The fact that some arrangement was made that the rent of one of the houses should be applied in paying off the mortgage debt does not throw any light upon the question whether the tenant for life intended that it should be paid off for the benefit of her children. Then, putting all the facts together, it comes to this: on the one side is the legal presumption which I have mentioned, and on the other side there is nothing to rebut it but the relationship between the parties; and that, as I have already said, is not, in my opinion, sufficient to rebut the presumption. I think that the appeal must be allowed. The costs of all parties will come out of the fund.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—I am satisfied by the evidence that the rents of the one house were applied in paying off the building society's mortgage. What, then, is the presumption of law when such a payment is made by a tenant for life? I cannot do better than read what was said by Lord Langdale in Burrell v. The Earl of Egremont, 7 Beav., at p. 232: "A simple payment of the charge, without more, is sufficient to establish the right of the tenant for life to have the charge raised out of the estate. He has no obligation or duty to make a declaration, or to do any act demonstrating his intention. The burden of proof is upon those who allege that in paying off the charge he intended to exonerate the estate." The burden of proof, therefore, is upon the respondents. Have they discharged it? It is said on their behalf that the tenant for life is a mother and the remaindermen are her children. It seems to me that, according to the authorities which have been cited, that of itself is not sufficient to rebut the presumption, and there is nothing else to rebut it. In my opinion, therefore, the presumption has not been rebutted, and the decision of Kekewich, J., was erroneous.

RIGBY, L.J.—I have arrived at the same conclusion. The case is in some respects one of importance. Probably it was never explained to the tenant for life that if she paid off the mortgage debt she would be entitled to a charge upon the inheritance to the extent of the principal. The voluntary relinquishment of that which the law allowed her to receive is not so strong an indication as the payment of a lump sum would have been; and if in the ordinary case of payment of a mortgage debt by a tenant for life the legal presumption arises, then in this case, where the debt was payable by instalments consisting of principal and interest, and probably all that the tenant for life knew was that if the instalments were not punctually paid the building society would come down on the property, I think it would require more than a mere suggestion of some arrangement that she should pay off the mortgage debt for the benefit of her children, to rebut the presumption that she did not intend to relinquish her right to a charge upon the property. The appeal must be allowed.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitors for the appellant, A. H. Hunt & Co.

Solicitors for the respondent, Walker & Battiscombe.

From Q. B. Div. (Lord Esher, M.R., Lord Herschell, & Kay, L.J.) Dec. 13.

DUNN v. REG. (a.)

Crown—Prerogative—Servant of the Crown—Civil servant—Contract for personal service—Appointment held during pleasure.

The prerogative of the Crown to dismiss its servants at pleasure applies to all public servants under the Crown, whether military or civil, unless there be some statutory provision for a higher tenure.

Where an authority representing the Crown appoints a person as a servant of the Crown in terms for a certain number of years, there must be taken to be imported into such appointment the right of the Crown to dismiss at pleasure, and no petition of right lies against the Crown in respect of such dismissal.

If any authority representing the Crown were to exclude such right by express stipulation, it would be a violation of public policy, and could not derogate from the power of the Crown.

This was an appeal by the petitioner from the decision of Day, J., given on the hearing of a petition of right for a new trial on the ground of misdirection, the learned judge having directed the jury to return a verdict for the Crown on the ground that all contracts of service held under the Crown, whether military or civil, are determinable at the pleasure of the Crown.

The petitioner alleged that in January, 1892, he entered the service of her Majesty's Niger Coast Protectorate under a contract made with him by Sir Claude Macdonald, Commissioner and Consul General for the Protectorate. The terms of the alleged contract were that the petitioner was to serve for a term of three years, and was engaged for a term of three years certain, at a salary of £200 for the first year, increasing £50 a year to £350.

The circumstances under which this alleged contract was entered into were as follows. Sir C. Macdonald, being then in Africa, was desirous of finding men willing to enter the service of the Protectorate, and consequently wrote to Major Verner in England, requesting him to engage men fit and suitable for the service. In this letter he communicated the terms of the service, stating that the engagement would be for three years certain. Major Verner communicated with the petitioner, who alleged that the said Major Verner read the said letter over to him and engaged him on behalf of Sir C. Macdonald. The petitioner accepted the engagement, and on the 29th of January, 1892, entered the service of the Protectorate as consular agent. On the 9th of October, 1893, the petitioner received a letter written by direction of Sir C. Macdonald informing him that his services were no longer required. The petitioner thereupon claimed to be paid his salary up to the end of the three years according to the alleged contract, or, alternatively, for damages for breach and non-performance of the said contract.

W. H. Stevenson, for the appellant.—The Crown had not the power in this case to dismiss the petitioner, because it had engaged him for a term of three years certain. Sir C. Macdonald acted with the authority of the Crown. [KAY, L.J.—He had not any authority to engage the petitioner except during pleasure of the Crown.] [Lord ESHER, M.R.—All servants of the Crown are appointed during her Majesty's pleasure, except certain people who for the good of the country are by Act of Parliament appointed for a certain time. That doctrine is laid down in Shenton v. Smith, 43 W. R. 637, [1895] 2 A. C. 229. A petition of right will lie for a breach of contract resulting in unliquidated damages: Thomas v. The Queen, 23 W. R. 176, L. R. 10 Q. B. 31. The Crown is held now to be liable for breaches of contract. [Lord ESHER, M.R.—If the Crown can dismiss when it likes, there was no breach of contract.] [Lord HERSCHELL.—In Chitty on the Prerogatives of the Crown it is in substance laid down that the servants of the Crown are divided into two classes, those who hold during pleasure, and those who hold during good behaviour or under some statutory tenure.]

(a.) Reported by E. G. STILLWELL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Counsel further cited In re Tufnell, 24 W. R. 915, 3 Ch. D. 164; The Queen v. Mitchell, 6 T. L. R. 332; Cooper v. The Queen, 28 W. R. 611, 14 Ch. D. 311.

Sir R. Finlay, Q.C., S.G. (Sutton with him), for the Crown.—The general rule is that all servants of the Crown hold at the pleasure of the Crown, unless provision has been made to the contrary by statute. The ground of public policy is just as applicable to other forms of employment as it is to military service. Sir C. Macdonald held his office himself only during the pleasure of the Crown, and could not make a contract on behalf of the Crown for a certain time without power of dismissal. Such a contract would be unconstitutional. The rule which applies to soldiers is equally applicable to civil servants. This was expressly laid down by Lord Esher, M.R., in the Court of Appeal, and by Lord Watson in the House of Lords in the case of De Dohsé v. The Queen. (This case was decided in 1886, but is not reported.) [Counsel read from shorthand notes extracts from the judgments; these appear in the following judgment.]

Lord ESHER, M.R.—In this case a relation was instituted between the petitioner, under this petition of right, and the Crown in respect of the public service; that relation was that the petitioner should become a servant of the Crown, and that he should be paid a salary. There is nothing express in his appointment with regard to the length of time during which his service should continue; but that seems to me, in my view of the matter, immaterial. It seems to me that the point in this case is one which I, in the case that has been referred to (De Dohsé v. The Queen), foresaw would some day come before the court to be determined, and I cannot help thinking that in what has been quoted I foresaw what would be the decision of this court when the question should come before it; but it was not thought expedient to determine it then, because the case was one of military service. These are the words: "Admitted, therefore, that no person, whether called a Government or anything else, could make a contract for seven years for military service. Now, whether that doctrine with regard to the Crown is confined to military service or not need not be decided to-day, in my opinion. I take leave to say that I do not accept at all that the doctrine is confined to military service under the Crown. All service under the Crown itself is public service, and to my mind it is most likely that the doctrine which is said to be confined to military service applies to all public service under the Crown, because all public service under the Crown is for the public benefit, and therefore it may be that the Crown has despotic authority to get rid of those servants who are employed for public purposes and for the benefit and advantage of the public."

That is what I seem to have said would probably be the decision of the court in a case where the service is a civil service for public purposes. Instead of saying it is probable, I have now only to say it is an absolute doctrine. That suggestion of mine was before the House of Lords in the case that has been cited to us, and it seems to me that the judgment of Lord Watson has almost in terms declared that what I said would be my opinion if the case arose, is a right opinion, and that he has said that it is an absolute decision, and must be made a decision. Let us see how he follows that: "In the first place, it appears to me that no concluded contract is disclosed in the statement contained in the petition of right; and in the second place I am of opinion that such a concluded contract, if it had been made, must have been held to have imported into it the condition that the Crown has the power to dismiss." I entirely think that is right. "Further, I am of opinion that if any authority representing the Crown"—that is, if any officer of Government of the highest kind—"were to exclude such a power by express stipulation, that would be a violation of the public policy of the country, and could not derogate from the power of the Crown." That is, could not derogate from the power of the Crown to dismiss at pleasure. Anything more conclusive than that doctrine it seems to me could not be cited. I take that to be the rule laid down in the House of Lords. It is in consonance with what I expressed I thought would be the rule to be laid down in this court. But I think myself that the case of Shenton v. Smith is equally decisive. I think that one cannot read the judgment of the Privy Council in that case without seeing that it was meant to express precisely the same doctrine which has been more concisely and more clearly stated by Lord Watson in the House of Lords. I think both authority and principle alike are to the effect of what Lord Watson has stated, and that therefore this petition was wrongly conceived, and cannot be supported.

Lord HERSCHELL.—I am of the same opinion. The petitioner was appointed by Sir Claude Macdonald as consular agent or vice-consul in the Niger Protectorate.

The question is whether he can maintain a petition of right in respect of his services being put an end to when they were. His case is that he was engaged for three years certain, and that therefore there was no right in the Crown to put an end to his services before that period, and that if the Crown does so it must be liable for an action for damages for breach of contract. Now, persons employed in the service of the Crown in this way are, I take it, unless there be some statutory provision for a higher tenure, ordinarily engaged on the understanding that they hold during the pleasure of the Crown.

When, therefore, the petitioner here was appointed by Sir Claude Macdonald, although the appointment was in terms for three years, there must be taken to be imported into it the right of the Crown, which applies in the case of all civil servants, to put an end to that employment at the pleasure of the Crown. Most unquestionably there is here not a tittle of evidence to warrant a suggestion, even were it possible, that Sir Claude Macdonald had authority to employ this petitioner on any other terms than those which are applicable to the service of the Crown. The public interest is what has led to those being the terms upon which persons are employed in the public service. It has been pointed out in the cases to which reference has been made that the appointment being for the public good it is essential to the public good that there should be a power to determine that appointment at pleasure, except where it has been considered more for the public good that there should be another tenure.

For these reasons I think the appeal should be dismissed.

KAY, L.J.—I shall assume in this case that Sir Claude Macdonald did definitely engage the petitioner to be a civil servant of the Crown at a certain salary for a term of three years certain, and the question is whether, if he did so engage him, that prevented the Crown from exercising its ordinary right of dismissing him at pleasure.

Now, in the first place, one cannot help being struck by this, that Sir Claude Macdonald's own appointment, as stated by the Solicitor-General, was during the pleasure of the Crown, and it certainly would seem very strange if Sir Claude Macdonald, who was appointed during the pleasure of the Crown, should have power to bind the Crown by an appointment for three years, during which the Crown would not be able to dispense with the services of a subordinate so engaged. But I take it the general principle is satisfactorily established by the cases which have been referred to. Some of them were cases of military employment, and it was sought to say that in cases of military employment other considerations entered, and that it might be very much indeed for the advantage of the public service that the Crown should have this power of dismissal at pleasure in the case of military appointments, but that such considerations did not apply to the case of the appointment of a civil servant. But that does not convince me at all. It seems to me that in many cases the continued employment of a civil servant would be just as detrimental, or even more detrimental, to the public interest of this country than the employment of a military officer. One cannot help seeing that in distant parts, and in places where our frontiers closely approach those of other Powers, a question of peace or war might be determined by the action of a civil servant upon the spot, and therefore it seems to me that the same consideration applies with at least as much force in the case of a civil servant as it does in the case of a military servant, for maintaining the power of the Crown to dismiss its servant upon its pleasure. Then when we turn to the authorities they seem to me decisive. Besides the case of De Dohsé v. The Queen, in the House of Lords, in which the words used by the noble lords are perfectly general, and not confined to the case of military service at all, there is the case in the Privy Council of Shenton v. Smith, which was not the case of military service, but was the appointment of a man who was a doctor in a part of the British dominions. That was an appointment clearly of a man as a civil servant, and yet it was distinctly held that that appointment was subject to the power of the Crown to dismiss at the pleasure of the Crown. In my opinion Sir Claude Macdonald had not, any more than any other servant of the Crown in his position could have, power to appoint a civil subordinate servant of the Crown for a definite term so as to bind the Crown not to dismiss him before that term had expired.

That point is the principal question, and it must be decided, I think, against the plaintiff in this petition of right, and therefore the appeal must be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors, A. S. Dunn; Solicitor to the Treasury.

From Q. B. Div. (Lord Esher, M.R., and Lopes and Kay, L.JJ.) Dec. 4.

GODFREY v. GEORGE. (a.)

Practice — Execution — Order for payment of costs— Solicitor—Attachment — Disciplinary jurisdiction of the court—Order in a criminal matter—Election in favour of one of two remedies—R. S. C., 1883, ord. 42, r. 24.

A person is not precluded from bringing an action to enforce an order of the court for the payment of costs, under Ord. 42, r. 24, by reason only that he has a remedy by attachment under the order.

Where there is a remedy by action and also a remedy by attachment in respect of the same matter, the plaintiff is not precluded from exercising the one remedy by having made an unsuccessful attempt to enforce the other.

But, semble, per Lord Esher, M.R., and Lopes, L.J., that if the plaintiff had obtained a writ of attachment, and the defendant had been taken under it, the plaintiff's remedy by action would have gone.

An order for the payment of the costs of proceedings taken to have the name of a solicitor struck off the rolls is not an order in a criminal matter.

Appeal from the Queen's Bench Division.

The action was brought to recover £317, money and interest payable under an order of the court. The defendant was a solicitor.

In 1884 he owed various sums of money, amounting to £514 1s. 8d., to Mr. Stuckey Wood, who was a client of the defendant.

In November, 1884, Mr. Wood assigned the debt to the plaintiff, who was also a solicitor.

On the 24th of January, 1885, £100 of the debt was paid off; but in February the plaintiff, being unable to obtain further payment, commenced proceedings against the defendant to have his name struck off the rolls.

On the 17th of February an order was made, by which £200 was ordered to be paid forthwith to the plaintiff, and £131 13s. 10d. to be paid into court, it being referred to the master to ascertain the exact amount of the defendant's indebtedness to the plaintiff. The £200 was duly paid to the plaintiff, and the £131 13s. 10d. was paid into court.

On the 3rd of August, 1885, a further order was made by consent, by which it was ordered that the £131 13s. 10d. should be paid out of court to the plaintiff, that the balance of £102 7s. 10d. should be secured by bills drawn by the defendant on his wife, and that the costs of the proceedings should be taxed and paid to the plaintiff. The taxed costs amounted to £142 2s. 6d. No bills were given, and, with the exception of £29, no money was paid under the order of the 3rd of August.

In 1886 the plaintiff issued an execution under the order, the return to which was nulla bona.

In 1895 the Divisional Court were moved for a writ of attachment against the defendant for disobedience to the order; but the court declined to issue the writ.

The plaintiff then brought the action to enforce the order, and to recover the balance of £102 7s. 10d.

Wright, J., gave judgment in favour of the plaintiff for the costs payable under the order; but with regard to the £102 7s. 10d. he said that that debt was merged in the order of the 3rd of August, which only provided for security being given, and did not order the payment of the money; and, the original debt being barred by the Statute of Limitations, he gave judgment for the defendant on that part of the claim.

(a.) Reported by C. G. WILBRAHAM, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Both parties appealed.

Ord. 42, r. 24, provides that "every order of the court or judge in any cause or matter may be enforced against all persons bound thereby in the same manner as a judgment to the same effect."

Crump, Q.C., and Lewis Thomas, for the defendant.—The plaintiff could not bring an action on such an order as this was. His only remedy was by writ of attachment. Ord. 42, r. 24, does not apply where there is a remedy by attachment: Philpott v. Lehain, 35 L. T. N. S. 855, 25 W. R. Dig. 134; Norton v. Gregory, 73 L. T. N. S. 10. In the latter case Lord Esher, M.R., said: "Some orders, indeed, are enforceable by attachment, upon which, perhaps, no action can be brought." Moreover, the order in this case, being made on an application to strike a solicitor off the rolls, was an order in a criminal matter: In re Dudley, 32 W. R. 264, 12 Q. B. D. 44; In re Freston, 31 W. R. 581, 804, 11 Q. B. D. 545; and was therefore not enforceable by action. Even assuming the plaintiff to have had both remedies, his election in moving for an attachment precluded him from pursuing his other remedy.

Marshall, Q.C. (Pollard with him).—The plaintiff desires to issue a bankruptcy notice. This could not be done on the order. Therefore the plaintiff was compelled to sue for judgment on the order. If the plaintiff made any election, it was in favour of civil proceedings, for in 1886 he issued a fi. fa. An election which is to preclude him from a further remedy must be an effectual one. An attachment is not a remedy, but a punishment for misconduct.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—In this case the plaintiff claims to recover money from the defendant upon an order made by the court that the defendant should pay the costs of certain proceedings. But it is said that the court have no power to entertain such a claim. Let us see what the order was. There was a motion against the defendant, who was a solicitor, to have his name struck off the rolls on the ground of misconduct in misappropriating money belonging to a client. The court made an order commanding him to pay costs to the plaintiff. That order therefore became an order for the payment of the amount of the costs. That was in 1885. It is said that it was not such an order as came within ord. 42, r. 24, because it was an order made in a criminal matter. In re Hardwick, 32 W. R. 191, 12 Q. B. D. 148, is an express authority that an order made by the court in the exercise of its jurisdiction over its officers is not an order in a criminal matter. If it had been, there could have been no appeal to this court. In that case the point was specially raised as to the right of appeal, and the whole court came to the conclusion that the appeal was good, because the order was not one in a criminal matter. There have been many appeals from orders of the Divisional Court of this kind, and the appeals have been heard in this court, and sometimes this court has disagreed with the Divisional Court. In re Hardwick is a decision that an appeal lies because it is not an order in a criminal matter. It is an order in a civil matter, and it is for the payment of money. It is therefore within the words of ord. 42, r. 24.

But, it is said, the solicitor might be attached. So he might. That is under the general jurisdiction of the court over its officers, it having been an order made for misconduct in his professional character. Because he may be attached, can it be said that an action cannot be brought against him? Several authorities show that an action will lie. Therefore he may be attached, or an action on the order as if it were a judgment may be brought. Then, it is said, assuming that to be true, the plaintiff must elect which of the remedies he will adopt. I can see no ground for saying that before he has done anything—that is to say, suppose he has commenced an action and has also given notice of a motion for an attachment—he can be put to his election. I know of no authority for it. If he had moved for an attachment, and an order had been made and the defendant had been taken under the order and put into prison, then, in my opinion, the plaintiff could not have maintained his action; for his legal claim would have been satisfied. But if the attachment had issued and the defendant had escaped before it was executed, then, the plaintiff's claim not having been enforced, his right of action would remain.

It has been the constant practice of the courts that if a person has two remedies for the same matter he may proceed on either until his claim is satisfied by one of them. Therefore, if the plaintiff fails in his motion for an attachment, he still has his remedy by action. The plaintiff in the present case did endeavour to enforce his remedy by attachment; but the court refused to issue the writ. How can it be said that his claim was satisfied? His remedy by attachment having failed, he is entitled under those circumstances to resort to his other remedy.

It seems to me, therefore, that judgment on this point ought to be for the plaintiff.

[His lordship then dealt with the plaintiff's appeal as to the £102 7s. 10d., which he allowed, saying that the learned judge was wrong in holding that the debt was merged in the order and that it was barred by the Statute of Limitations.]

LOPES, L.J.—It is said that an action will not lie on the order of the 3rd of August, 1885, because it was an order in a criminal matter, and was consequently not governed by ord. 42, r. 24. In In re Hardwick it was held that a proceeding of the kind in which this order was made was not a proceeding of a criminal nature, and that an appeal would therefore lie. The action was brought upon an order for the payment of costs by the defendant to the plaintiff. For such an action being maintainable Philpott v. Lehain and Norton v. Gregory are authorities. It is clear that an action may be brought on any order. Then it is said that, because there was also a remedy by attachment and that the plaintiff had moved for a writ of attachment, he was ousted from his remedy by action. It is important to notice that the court refused to issue the writ, and so the proceeding was abortive. If it had not been abortive, in all probability his remedy by action would have been ousted, on the analogy of a ca. sa.; for if in former times a writ of ca. sa. issued and the debtor was taken, that was a satisfaction of the creditors' claim, but if the debtor escaped the ca. sa. did not operate as a discharge of the ordinary remedy. But here the motion for attachment failed. It seems to me, therefore, that under those circumstances the plaintiff was at liberty to bring his action. He could not have obtained satisfaction by means of both remedies, but he was entitled to do so by one or the other, and if not by one, then by the other.

The plaintiff's cross appeal was not resisted by Mr. Crump.

KAY, L.J., after stating the facts, proceeded:—It is quite clear that an action may be brought upon an order of this kind. It is not, indeed, a judgment, but it may be enforced as if it were a judgment. It was argued that the plaintiff could not succeed in the present case, because he had already made an unsuccessful attempt to get the defendant committed. His motion for that purpose did not succeed, and no order was made. I do not like to speak of the jurisdiction of the court to punish its officers as a remedy for the recovery of money. It is, rather, the mode in which the court deals with its officers with the object of preventing a recurrence of misconduct. No doubt, the effect of its exercise often is to obtain the payment of money; but it should not be treated as though that were the real object. The disciplinary jurisdiction of the court may be put into action by no matter whom. The right to put it into action is not confined merely to those who are aggrieved. Therefore the power to move for a writ of attachment is not a remedy to recover the money. But when that course has been resorted to, are all other remedies done away with? I do not think so. The application to get the defendant committed failed. Thereupon this action was brought to enforce the order as if it were a judgment, and to recover the balance for which security was to be given under the order, together with the taxed costs.

I think the learned judge was right as far as the costs were concerned, and that what had been done did not bar the plaintiff's claim. It is not necessary to decide whether, if an attachment had been obtained, the plaintiff would have been ousted of his civil remedy. I reserve my opinion on that point.

Defendant's appeal dismissed, and plaintiff's appeal allowed.

Solicitors for the defendant, Foss & Ledsam.

Solicitors for the plaintiff, Marshall & Marshall.

High Court of Justice.

Chan. Div. North, J. — Nov. 27.

In re BEEMAN.
FOWLER v. JAMES. (a.)

Administration—Insolvent estate—Annuity—Right of retainer—Judicature Act, 1875, s. 10.

An administratrix is not entitled to retain out of the estate when insolvent the estimated value of an annuity covenanted to be paid to her by the deceased. Her only right is to prove with the other creditors. Arrears due at the death can be retained.

Summons taken out in the action by the defendant, Mrs. James, to have it determined whether she, as administratrix of the estate of her son, T. G. Beeman, was entitled to retain out of the estate a sum representing the estimated value of an annuity of £6 per week, covenanted to be paid to her by T. G. Beeman by indenture of the 10th of October, 1891, and by which she released to T. G. Beeman her life interest in certain trust funds.

T. G. Beeman died on the 22nd of September, 1894, intestate. Letters of administration were granted to Mrs. James. The estate proved insolvent, and on the application of a creditor the usual order for accounts and inquiries was directed on the 6th of April, 1895. It was conceded that as regards the arrears due at the death, Mrs. James would have a right of retainer.

Gatey, for the defendant.—Loane v. Casey, 2 W. Bl. 965, covers this case. There an executor was held entitled to retain in respect of instalments of an annuity not due till after the death of the testator. A right of retainer attaches, although the amount has not been ascertained: In re Morris' Estate, 23 W. R. 120, L. R. 10 Ch. App. 68. In bankruptcy the right to prove for the value of future instalments is recognized, and therefore the administratrix must be able to retain to the extent of such value.

Cann, for plaintiff.—The right exists only in respect of an actual debt. The right has never been recognized in bankruptcy, and is not affected by the 10th section of the Judicature Act, 1875. In re Hargreaves, 44 Ch. D. 236, 38 W, R. Dig. 3, shows that a person who is to be paid in the future is not a creditor so as to be able to commence administration proceedings: In re Compton, 30 Ch. D. 15.

Gatey, in reply, cited Hochster v. De la Tour, 1 W. R. 469, 2 E. & B. 678.

NORTH, J.—I think the administratrix is entitled to retain the arrears of the annuity up to the death, but I do not think that she is entitled to retain out of the estate the amount of the estimated value of her future annuity. If the estate were solvent, she could not do so, and it would be giving her at once what she is not yet entitled to. The statute, no doubt, does allow a person making a claim in respect of an annuity in arrear to prove for the estimated amount, but it does not enable him to take all. The person is not thereby made a creditor for such sum.

When the annuity is not in arrear there is no right to administration, as is shown by In re Hargreaves; but if there is an administration decree, then the annuitant is allowed to prove. The administratrix will be allowed to prove for the value of her future annuity in competition with the other creditors.

Solicitors for the plaintiff, Macarthur & Co.

Solicitor for the defendant, Dolling Smith.

Chan. Div. Stirling, J. — Dec. 12, 19, 21.

In re POCOCK'S CONTRACT. (a.)

Settled land — Married woman — Person having the powers of a tenant for life— Settled Land Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 38), ss. 2 (1), 58 (1) (ix.).

Under a will land was limited to the use of trustees during the life of a married woman upon trust to pay the income to her for her separate use without power of anticipation, with remainder to such uses as she should by will appoint, and in default of such appointment to the use of herself in fee.

Held, that by virtue of section 58 (1) (ix.) of the Settled Land Act, 1882, the married woman was entitled to exercise the power of sale conferred by that Act upon tenants for life.

This was a summons under the Vendor and Purchaser Act, 1874, raising the question whether the vendors respectively had the powers of a tenant for life under the Settled Land Act, 1882, under the following circumstances.

Under the will dated the 1st of June, 1881, of Mary Ann Collins, land stood limited unto and to the use of trustees and their heirs upon trust as to one equal moiety to pay the rents and profits thereof to

(a.) Reported by R. SILLEM, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

(a.) Reported by WM. SCOTT THOMPSON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Mary, the wife of Samuel John Pocock, for her life for her separate use and benefit, but with a restraint on anticipation, and from and after the decease of the said Mary Pocock to the use of such person or persons for such interest, and generally in such manner in all respects as the said Mary Pocock, whether covert or sole, should by will appoint, and in default of appointment, and subject to any partial appointment, to the use of the said Mary Pocock, her heirs and assigns. And the other moiety of the same hereditaments was thereby limited to similar uses in favour of Elizabeth Prankerd, the wife of Arthur Prankerd.

The said Mary Ann Collins died on the 6th of January, 1894, and her will was duly proved.

By a contract in writing, dated the 17th of October, 1894, and made between the said Mary Pocock and Elizabeth Prankerd, hereinafter called the vendors, of the one part, and the governors of the Wisbech Grammar School, hereinafter called the purchasers, of the other part, it was agreed (inter alia) that the vendors, as tenants for life respectively of equal moieties of the said hereditaments, would sell, and the purchasers would purchase, the fee simple in possession free from incumbrances of the said hereditaments.

The purchasers objected to the title on the ground that it was doubtful whether the vendors had any power to sell under the Settled Land Act, 1882; and ultimately the vendors issued the present summons under the Vendor and Purchaser Act, 1874, asking to have the validity of the above objection determined by the court.

The summons was heard on the 12th of December, 1895.

Ingle Joyce, for the vendors, argued that the case fell within the definition contained in section 2, sub-section 1, of the Settled Land Act, 1882.

E. M. Jackson, for the purchasers.

His lordship reserved judgment.

On the 19th of December his lordship mentioned the case in court, and stated that he had not been able to satisfy himself that the will constituted a settlement within the meaning of section 2, sub-section 1, of the Settled Land Act, 1882; but he wished to call the attention of the parties to section 58 of that Act, and directed the summons to be put into the paper for the 21st of December, in order that the parties might have an opportunity of considering the effect of section 58.

The case was according reargued on the 21st of December by the same counsel.

Stirling, J.—I am much obliged to Mr. Jackson for the argument he has offered on this point, but I confess I do not see any reason why this case does not fall within the provisions of section 58 of the Settled Land Act, 1882.

Now, the short facts are these. Under a will made in the exercise of a limited power of appointment the real estate now stands limited unto and to the use of trustees during the life of a married woman, to her separate use without power of anticipation, with remainder to such uses as she should by will appoint, and with remainder to the use of herself in fee. The legal estate, therefore, is in the trustees. The equitable interest is in the married woman during her life, fettered by the restraint on anticipation, and then she takes a fee liable to be defeated by the exercise of the power of appointment.

Now, it was contended that that constituted a settlement within the meaning of section 2, sub-section 1, being an instrument under or by virtue of which the land stands for the time being limited to or in trust for any persons by way of succession. I have a difficulty in adopting that view, because it seems to me hardly to fall within the words. This is an instrument, no doubt, by which the land stands limited to or in trust for one and the same person for various estates and interests by way of succession. That is not the language of the Act. What the Act deals with is an instrument under which the land stands for the time being limited to or in trust for any persons, being more than one, by way of succession.

But section 58, sub-section 1, provides this: "Each person, as follows, shall, when the estate or interest of each of them is in possession, have the powers of a tenant for life under this Act as if each of them were a tenant for life as defined in this Act." Then clause ix. includes amongst those persons "a person entitled to the income of land under a trust or direction for payment thereof to him during his own or any other life, whether subject to expenses of management or not, or until sale of the land, or until forfeiture of his interest therein on bankruptcy or other event." Therefore a person entitled to the income of land under a trust or direction for payment to him during his own life is plainly within that class; and here the trust is to pay the rents and profits to the lady for her life. She is exactly such a person as is there designated. But then, no doubt, one has to consider whether this is a settlement. Sub-section 2 provides for that: "In every such case the provisions of this Act referring to a tenant for life, either as conferring powers on him or otherwise, and to a settlement and to settled land, shall extend to each of the persons aforesaid, and to the instrument under which his estate or interest arises, and to the land therein comprised."

Now, it seems to me plain that that was meant to extend the definition of a settlement to instruments not included under section 2 of the Act, and that is very well illustrated by the case which immediately precedes, namely, a tenant by the courtesy. If either by conveyance or otherwise a married woman was entitled absolutely in fee to an estate in land, upon her death leaving her husband surviving and an heir, it is the obvious intention that the husband, as being tenant by the courtesy, should be treated as a tenant for life and have the powers of a tenant for life; but unfortunately the words of sub-section 2 were not apt to that case, because the right of the husband was not derived under an instrument, but under the law. Therefore the words of section 2 were not wide enough to include that case, because they only extended the definition of a settlement to the instrument under which the estate or interest arose, and if the estate or interest of the husband did not arise under an instrument, but arose by the operation of the law, there was a difficulty in applying it to that case. But that was set right by the Settled Land Act of 1884, which said that for the purposes of the Act of 1882 the estate of a tenant by the courtesy should be deemed an estate arising under a settlement made by the wife. That seems to me to prove, if there were any doubt about it before, that the meaning of the Act of 1882 was to embrace under sub-section 2 of section 58 instruments that did not fall within the definition of settlements in the earlier part of the Act. There is nothing said as regards to whom the remainder is to go in clause ix. of sub-section 1; and, as it seems to me that the present case falls within the exact language of section 58, sub-section 1, clause ix., and as this is an Act which ought certainly not to receive a narrow construction, I think a title may be made by the married woman as tenant for life by virtue of the powers vested in her.

Solicitors, Peake, Bird, Collins, & Peake; Wing & Du Cane.

Chan. Div.
Stirling, J. Dec. 3, 4.

In re STAMFORD (EARL OF).
PAYNE v. STAMFORD. (a.)

Trustee—New trustee—Appointment—Trustee resident "abroad"—Solicitor for the tenant for life—Settled Land Acts, 1882, 1890.

The tenant for life under a will was empowered to appoint a new trustee of the will in the place of any trustee thereof who should (inter alia) be "abroad." In 1893 P., a trustee of the will, went to live at Lisieux, in Normandy, a place within sixteen hours' rail of London. He continued to attend meetings of the trustees, with rare exceptions; and declared his intention of returning to reside in England in 1898. In 1895 the tenant for life, in exercise of her power, appointed her solicitor a new trustee of the will in the place of P., on the ground that P. was "abroad" within the meaning of that power.

On a summons taken out by the trustees to test the validity of the new appointment,

Held, that P. was "abroad" within the meaning of the power, and that the tenant for life was consequently entitled to appoint a new trustee in his place.

Held also, that though the court would not itself appoint or confirm the appointment of the tenant for life's solicitor as a trustee of a settlement, yet it would not interfere with such an appointment when made by the tenant for life in good faith.

This was a summons taken out by the trustees of the will of the late Earl of Stamford to determine whether or not a certain indenture, dated the 28th of August, 1895, and made by the Countess of Stamford, the tenant for life under the said will, and being a deed of appointment of a new trustee in the place of a trustee who had gone abroad, was a valid appointment under the circumstances of the case, which were as follows.

The late Earl of Stamford died on the 2nd of January, 1883, having made his will on the 26th of January, 1875, whereby he appointed Arthur F. Payne, Robert Cocks, and Henry Ball executors and trustees thereof. The will was duly proved by these three persons, who were still alive. The trusts of the will were extremely long and complicated, but were shortly stated by Stirling, J., in his judgment, as follows. The testator devised four estates, in Staffordshire, Leicestershire, Cheshire, and Lancashire respectively, to the use of his trustees, their executors, administrators, or assigns, during the life of the countess upon certain trusts for her benefit, and he directed the said trustees to set apart out of the rents and profits of these estates the sum of £12,000 per annum, to be applied on account of his personal estate in or towards the discharge of his debts and the legacies and annuities given by his will, such payment and application to be in the absolute discretion of his said trustees. After the death of the countess the said estates were devised to uses in favour of different families, but in respect of the Lancashire estates the testator created a term therein of 1,000 years, and limited the same to the trustees upon trust to apply the rents and profits, firstly in payment of debts, and then in redeeming the mortgages on the four estates. The residuary estate was bequeathed to the trustees upon trust to convert the same into money, to pay thereout funeral expenses, debts, and legacies, and then to apply the surplus (if any) toward the discharge of the mortgages, with remainder to the countess absolutely. The testator, after giving various legacies general and specific, then declared that if either of his trustees or any trustee thereafter appointed should die in his lifetime, or decline to act, or having survived him should die, or be abroad, or desire to be discharged, or refuse or become incapable to act, then and in every such case it should be lawful for the countess during the continuance of the estates limited in trust for her benefit, and afterwards for the surviving or continuing trustee, or the executors of the last surviving or continuing trustee, to appoint a new trustee or new trustees.

The personal estate was insufficient to pay the debts in full, and had long since been exhausted. All the simple contract debts had been paid, but there remained mortgages to the amount of £800,000 and annuities of nearly £4,000 still undischarged. The executors had assented to the specific legacies and had paid all the pecuniary ones, but no personal estate remained in their hands available for distribution.

Up to the 29th of July, 1895, all the three trustees had acted together, but on the 8th of August the countess's solicitor, Sir Thomas Wright, forwarded to the trustees' solicitors a draft appointment of himself as trustee in the place of Arthur Payne, who it was therein alleged had gone to reside abroad. Owing to the absence from town of the member of the firm who attended to the trusts, this communication was merely acknowledged, whereupon without further correspondence with the trustees or their solicitors the countess executed the said indenture of the 28th of August, and appointed Sir Thomas Wright as trustee as aforesaid in place of Mr. Payne. It was the validity of this appointment which was now in question.

From the evidence it appeared that Mr. Payne had from the commencement of the trust acted in conjunction with his co-trustees in the administration and management of the testator's estates, but that in 1893, in consequence of his wife's ill health, he went to reside at Lisieux, in Normandy. He had, however, been constantly in communication with the trustees and their solicitors, and had attended all the meetings of the trustees with few exceptions.

The special management of the Lancashire and Cheshire estates had been left entirely to Mr. Hall and Mr. Cocks respectively, the reason for this being that they had been the agents thereof during the lifetime of the late earl. The Leicestershire estates had been managed by Sir Thomas Wright, a solicitor of Leicester, who was appointed agent a few years after the earl's death. Mr. Payne, in his affidavit, stated that it had never been alleged until the 10th of August, 1895, that his residence abroad in any way interfered with the due administration of the trusts of the will or rendered it desirable that he should cease to be a trustee. From where he resided he could reach England in sixteen hours, and letters posted in London on any given day would be received by him the following day. He had taken his house at Lisieux on a lease which would expire in three years' time, when he intended to return to England.

Bucknill, Q.C., and Cartmell, for the applicants.—The appointment of Sir Thomas Wright in place of Mr. Payne is improper. In the first place, Mr. Payne is not "abroad" within the meaning of the power of appointment. The word means "permanently abroad"—so as to interfere with the performance of the duties of the office: In re Moravian Society, 6 W. R. 851, 26 Beav. 101; In re Arbib & Class' Contract, 39 W. R. 305, [1891] 1 Ch. 601, see p. 606; Skeats v. Evans, 42 Ch. D. 522, 38 W. R. Dig. 202.

(a.) Reported by ARTHUR MORTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

In the next place, the appointment of Sir Thomas Wright is open to objection, on the ground that he is the solicitor for the countess, the tenant for life. Now, the trustees will be trustees for the purposes of the Settled Land Acts, and the court has declined either to appoint or to sanction the appointment of the tenant for life's solicitor as a trustee when that is the case, because the interests of the tenant for life may conflict with those of the remaindermen: In re Kemp, 31 W. R. 930, 24 Ch. D. 485; Wheelwright v. Walker, 31 W. R. 363, 716, 23 Ch. D. 752; In re Tempest, 14 W. R. 850, L. R. 1 Ch. App. 485; Sugden v. Crosland, 4 W. R. 343, 3 Sm. & Giff. 192. This last case shows the deed is void.

Henry Fellows, for the Duncombes.

Borthwick, for J. F. Lambert.

W. A. Peck, for Lady Lambert.

Monnington, for Lord Stamford.

Hastings, Q.C., and Fossett Lock, for Lady Stamford.—There has been no decree for administration, and there is nothing to interfere with the exercise of the power: In re Norris, 32 W. R. 955, 27 Ch. D. 333. Being "abroad" is prima facie a disqualification: O'Reilly v. Alderson, 8 Hare 101. The court will not appoint the tenant for life's solicitor as trustee, but it does not follow that a person having an independent power of appointment cannot do so: Skeats v. Evans does not apply here, as in that case the person who made the appointment submitted the propriety of the appointment to the court, thus giving it jurisdiction.

Grosvenor Woods, Q.C., and Blakesley, for Sir Thomas Wright.

Cartmell replied.

STIRLING, J., stated the facts as above set out, and continued:—Without attributing any blame to the countess or her advisers, I think it is a matter of regret that the execution of the deed of appointment was not postponed until the trustees had been consulted and their views ascertained. However, what I have to decide now is whether the appointment is a valid one. The first question which arises is one of fact—i.e., whether or not Mr. Payne was "abroad" at the date of the appointment within the meaning of the power in the will contained, and which I have already read. I think the question may be decided without any difficulty upon Mr. Payne's own evidence, and I am of opinion that he was "abroad" within the meaning of the power. He has been residing abroad since 1893, and does not intend to return until the expiration of his lease—i.e., in three years' time. Therefore I think that on the 28th of August, 1895, he was properly described as "being abroad." Now, I do not desire to depart from anything laid down by Lord Romilly in In re Moravian Society. In each case it is a question of fact; and here I come to the conclusion on the facts that Mr. Payne was abroad at the time the deed was executed by the countess. It is said that residence abroad is not a disqualification for the office of a trustee; and I am asked to read the clause as if a new trustee could only be appointed in the place of a trustee who is abroad, when the fact of residence abroad interfered with the proper discharge of the duties of the trust. Those words, however, are not in the will. The trustee, by residing abroad, as laid down by Wigram, V.C., in O'Reilly v. Alderson, puts himself in a position which entitles any cestui que trust to require that the office should be filled by another trustee. Certainly, in this case none of the remaindermen have called upon the countess to exercise the power of appointing a new trustee, but nevertheless it was within her discretion to do so. If the exercise of that power were capricious, the court might interfere; but no such case has been suggested. Mr. Payne's residence abroad created a certain amount of inconvenience and expense. The countess, as tenant for life, is quite competent to exercise the power, and I cannot see that she has exercised it with caprice or without good cause.

It is said, however, that Mr. Payne is in the position of an executor and legal personal representative of the testator, and that the power of appointment ought not to be exercised so long as there are debts remaining unpaid. If there were any personal estate remaining unadministered, there might be something in the contention; but in the present case the objection cannot prevail. All the general personal estate is exhausted. The pecuniary legacies have been paid, and the specific legacies assented to, and this can only have been done on the footing that the duties of the executors had been fully executed, and that they were willing to convert themselves into simple trustees. Hence nothing is now vested in Mr. Payne as executor virtute officii.

I now come to a matter which is deserving of my most serious consideration—i.e., the fact that the countess has thought fit to appoint as a trustee of this will her own solicitor. The trustees of the will are vested with a power of sale of the real estates, and they will also be trustees for the purposes of the Settled Land Acts, and as such trustees they may have to consider matters where the respective interests of the tenant for life and the remaindermen might conflict with one another, and where they will consequently be bound to hold an even hand between the parties. Now, it is suggested that the solicitor of the tenant for life is not in a position to discharge that duty properly, and, I must say, I feel that is a very forcible objection. In fact, it is an objection which would prevent the court itself from appointing a person in the position of Sir Thomas Wright, and from sanctioning any such appointment. The rule is clearly laid down in Cotton, L.J., in In re Kemp, 24 Ch. D., at p. 487, a case of the appointment of trustees for the purposes of the Settled Land Acts. In that case the Lord Justice says: "The appointment of trustees is required to impose a check upon the extensive powers conferred by the Act upon the tenant for life, and the 44th section contemplates there being differences between the trustees and the tenant for life. I have no doubt that Mr. Wood, as solicitor of the tenant for life, would advise him to the best of his ability, and recommend him to exercise his powers with a proper regard for the interests of the remaindermen. But solicitors, like judges, are fallible, and how could Mr. Wood as one of the trustees exercise a proper judgment on their behalf upon questions on which he had already advised the tenant for life? It would be Mr. Wood as trustee putting a check upon Mr. Wood as solicitor for the tenant for life, and he would be placed in a false position." This lays down a rule of practice for the guidance of the court from which it would not be right for me to depart, and of which, moreover, I entirely approve. But the question is, Is this rule binding under all circumstances? Can the court depart from it if it sees fit? Now, I myself have departed from it in one case—i.e., In re The Marquis of Ailesbury, 41 W. R. 644, [1893] 2 Ch. 345. The court ought certainly to be very slow to do so, and ought, before doing so, to be satisfied not only that there will be no disadvantage to the trust estate, but also that great advantages will accrue from such a course. If this were an application for the appointment of a new trustee, or for the sanction of the court to such an appointment, I should certainly decline to depart from the rule. This, however, is not such a case, and, as pointed out by Cotton, L.J., there is a difference between the question of the validity of a certain appointment by the donee of a power and the question whether the court would itself make or sanction such an appointment. This distinction was recognized by Pearson, J., in In re Norris.

The question, then, is, Does the existence of the rule prevent the donee of the power from exercising it by appointing her own solicitor? In my judgment, though I would not myself make or sanction such an appointment, yet when it has been actually done by the tenant for life it is not necessarily invalid. There is nothing apart from his position as solicitor to the countess which renders the person appointed unfit to fulfil the duties of the office, and no beneficiary has said anything against the appointment, but the matter has been left to the discretion of the court. Under these circumstances I cannot say that the appointment is other than a valid one.

Lastly, it is suggested that Mr. Payne still remains in the position of a legal personal representative, and may be under some liability. Now, if any such liability exist in the fact, nothing that has been done can prejudice his right to an indemnity. It is of the greatest importance that a trustee's right of indemnity be preserved, and I desire to say that no right of Mr. Payne as legal personal representative ought to be prejudiced, and for this purpose I reserve to him liberty to apply.

Solicitors, Bower, Cotton, & Bower; Smith, Fawdon, & Low, for Sir Thomas Wright, of Leicester; Iliffe, Henley, & Sweet, for Laycock, Dyson, & Laycock, of Huddersfield; A. E. Griffiths; Gamlen & Burdett.

Chan. Div. | Nov. 29.
Romer, J. |

BARTLETT v. MARSHALL. (a.)

Nuisance—Noise—Lawful trade—Character of neighbourhood.

The defendants had, since July, 1894, carried on the business of newspaper forwarding agents at premises in the City of London. The plaintiffs were respectively the leaseholders and the part occupiers of certain residential premises erected in 1886, and which were opposite to the defendants' premises. The occupying plaintiffs and others of the tenants of the plaintiffs' premises had been so disturbed by the noise of the defendants' carts and the shouts of their drivers and other of the defendants' employees between 2 a.m. and 6 a.m. that they were in many cases unable to sleep; and some of the plaintiffs' tenants had in consequence left and others had threatened to leave.

Held, that the defendants' business had caused a nuisance by noise so continuous and of such a character as to entitle the plaintiffs to an injunction.

Trial of action.

This was an action in which the plaintiffs the leasehold owners, and certain tenants, of premises known as Temple-chambers, in the City of London, claimed an injunction to restrain the defendants, who carried on the business of newspaper forwarding agents, from carrying on the said or any noisy business, and from continuing the nuisances occasioned thereby.

(a.) Reported by J. ARTHUR PRICE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The facts of the case were as follows. The premises in question consisted of a large block of buildings. They fronted on the east side Temple-avenue, and were bounded on the north by Tudor-street, and on the south by certain vacant land the property of the London Corporation. The premises had been erected by certain of the plaintiffs or their predecessors in title in the year 1886, and had been let by them since 1887 partly for offices and partly for residential chambers. At that time the land east of Temple-avenue was vacant. About two or three years ago the defendants built large premises on the east side of Temple-avenue, with an entrance into Temple-avenue on the west, and also into a street known as Tallis-street on the south—a street newly laid out and leading eastward, almost opposite the central entrance to the Temple-chambers.

On the 30th of July, 1894, the defendants commenced to carry on there, and have since carried on, the business of newspaper forwarding agents, the carrying on of which business caused a great deal of noise, and inconvenienced the sleep of the occupiers of the plaintiffs' residential chambers. In consequence of this the plaintiffs affirmed that their premises had been rendered unfit for habitation and far less comfortable than had formerly been the case, and that tenants thereof had been lost and would continue to be lost.

The defendants submitted that if the noise of which the plaintiffs complained existed, it was due not to the defendants' business, but to the ordinary traffic of the neighbourhood. They also submitted that, as the neighbourhood in which the premises of both parties were situated was devoted to the printing and publishing trades, the noise in the vicinity of the plaintiffs' premises was incident to the locality, and that the noise (if any) produced by the defendants' business was of so slight a character as to be no substantial addition to that otherwise produced in the neighbourhood.

The plaintiffs, in their reply, submitted that the noise was of such a character as entirely to change the quiet character of the neighbourhood, which entirely consisted of residential chambers and offices.

A large amount of evidence was offered on both sides, and several residents in the chambers, inspectors of police, police constables on duty in the neighbourhood, and others were examined.

The evidence was somewhat conflicting, but it appeared that the residents in the chambers were awakened by noise of the carts and vans of the defendants unloading and driving past, and by the shoutings or loud talkings of their drivers and other employees of the defendants, between the hours of 2 a.m. and 6 a.m. In consequence of this many of the residents were unable to sleep, and the result had been that some of them had left the premises, and others threatened to do so. It was also shown that since complaints were first made of the nuisance, except on the side of the plaintiffs' chambers facing or nearly facing Tallis-street, the noise had been considerably abated by the laying down of a wooden pavement in Temple-avenue.

Oswald, Q.C., and Boyle, for the plaintiffs.—The noise made by the defendants has considerably injured the interests of those of the plaintiffs who are reversioners, as some of the tenants of the residential chambers who were unable to sleep have left the premises, and there is therefore a loss in the matter of rents. If the noise is continued, the chambers must become more and more unsuitable for habitation. There is no question but that in such a case as this the court has a right to interfere: Bellamy v. Wells, 39 W. R. 158; Barber v. Penley, [1893] 2

Ch. 447, 41 W. R. Dig. 152; Benjamin v. Storr, 22 W. R. 631, L. R. 9 C. P. 400.

Eve, Q.C., and J. W. Greig, for the defendants.—The defendants are entitled in carrying on their business to make some noise. There has been nothing unreasonable in their conduct: Christie v. Davey, [1893] 1 Ch. 316, 41 W. R. Dig. 153. The locality in which the alleged nuisance has taken place must also be considered. It is impossible to apply to premises situate where the plaintiffs' premises are situate, the rules that may fairly be considered applicable to a house in Belgravia.

Oswald, Q.C., commenced to reply, but was stopped.

ROMER, J.—It almost invariably happens that cases involving nuisances give rise to a considerable conflict of evidence, and in that respect the present case forms no exception. I do not propose to go into the evidence in detail, but the conclusion to which I come on the facts is that the defendants' business has been so carried on as to be a nuisance by noise to those persons who sleep in rooms overlooking or near the defendants' premises. No doubt, after complaints were made matters improved, having regard to the state of things existing when the premises of the defendants were first opened; but the nuisance, although in a modified form, continued until this action was brought, and has continued since, although I must say that as far as those inhabitants of the plaintiffs' chambers who sleep in rooms not facing or nearly facing Tallis-street are concerned the nuisance has been greatly diminished by the laying down of wooden pavement in the Temple-avenue. I do not say that the defendants could not carry on their business without causing a nuisance, or that there have not been several mornings when substantially no nuisance was caused; but I am satisfied that the nuisance has been so continuous and of such a character as to entitle the plaintiffs to an injunction substantially as asked for by them. There must, therefore, be a perpetual injunction restraining the defendants, their servants and agents from carrying on the business so as to be a nuisance by noise to the occupants of the plaintiffs' chambers, and the defendants must pay the costs of the action.

[It was subsequently arranged that the injunction should be suspended for three months, that the defendants might see if anything could be done to diminish the noise, they undertaking to do their best to carry on their business so as not to cause a nuisance. An inquiry as to damages was also directed, but the costs were reserved.

Solicitors, Munns & Longden; Miller, Smith, & Bell.

Chan. Div.
Vaughan Williams, J. } Nov. 8.

GREAT NORTHERN RAILWAY CO. v. THE COAL CO-OPERATIVE SOCIETY (LIMITED). (a.)

Bill of Sale—Industrial and provident society—Debenture—Non-registration — Winding up—Incorporated company—Bills of Sale Acts, 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 31) and 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 43), s. 17.

Debentures issued by an industrial and provident society established under the Industrial and Provident Societies Act are not exempted from the provisions of the Bills of Sale Acts by section 17 of the Bills of Sale Act, 1882.

This was the further consideration of a debenture-holders' action, which raised the question whether certain debentures issued by the Coal Co-operative Society, which was an industrial and provident society established under the Industrial and Provident Societies Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 87), were or were not within section 17 of the Bills of Sale Act, 1882, in so far as they purported to charge the capital, stock, goods, chattels, and effects of the society. Section 17 of the last-named Act provides that "nothing in this Act shall apply to any debentures issued by any mortgage, loan, or other incorporated company, and secured upon the capital, stock, or goods, chattels, and effects of such company."

The debentures in the present case were expressed to be a charge upon the freehold, copyhold, and leasehold hereditaments of the society and the goodwill of its business, and all its capital, stock, goods, chattels, and effects, and all other its property both present and future.

Judgment was given in the debenture-holders' action on the 10th of May, 1894, and an order to wind up the society was made on the 7th of June, 1894.

The debentures not having been registered as bills of sale, the question as above stated arose between the liquidator of the society and the holders of the debentures.

Buckley, Q.C., and A. & B. Terrell, for the plaintiffs in the debenture-holders' action.—In section 17 of the Bills of Sale Act, 1882, the words "incorporated company" apply to societies under the Industrial and Provident Societies Acts; see sections 4, 5, 6, 11, subsection (1), and 12 of the Industrial and Provident Societies Act, 1876 (39 & 40 Vict. c. 45), and sections 4, 5, and 21 of the Industrial and Provident Societies Act, 1893 (56 & 57 Vict. c. 39).

Levett, Q.C., and Macnaghten, for the official receiver and liquidator.—The words in section 17 of the Bills of Sale Act, 1882, apply to companies for the registration of whose mortgages and charges there are other statutory provisions than those contained in the Bills of Sale Acts—for instance, companies incorporated under the Companies Act, 1862. The Industrial and Provident Societies Acts contain no such provisions for the registration of mortgages and charges. The mortgages and charges over chattels given by such societies are clearly within the mischief aimed at by the Bills of Sale Acts, and come within the definition in section 4 of the Bills of Sale Act, 1878. A society of this kind is not a "company." Section 60 of the Industrial and Provident Societies Act, 1893, expressly draws a distinction between a "registered society" and a "company." These societies are clearly not limited companies within the meaning of the Companies Act, 1862, as is shown by sections 54 and 55 of the Industrial and Provident Societies Act, 1893. The Forged Transfers Act, 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. 43), s. 2, says "company" shall mean "any company incorporated by or in pursuance of any Act of Parliament, or by Royal Charter." Sections 6 and 7 of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 75), show that the powers of that Act drew a distinction between companies and such a society as the society in the present case. These debentures are bills of sale taken independently of any statutory enactment. The question whether a bill of sale given by a company must be registered was left open in In re Standard Manufacturing Co., 39 W. R. 369, [1891] 1 Ch. 627. In Attenborough's case, 33 W. R. 387, 28 Ch. D. 685, Pearson, J., thought that it must be registered. But this society is not a company in any of the legal meanings of the word "company."

(a.) Reported by V. DE S. FOWKE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

They referred to Jenkinson v. Brandley Mining Co., 35 W. R. 834, 19 Q. B. D. 568.

Buckley, Q.C., in reply.—This society is a corporation, and is therefore not within the Bills of Sale Act. A debenture of a corporation is not within the mischief against which the Bills of Sale Acts are directed: Read v. Joannon, 38 W. R. 734, 25 Q. B. D. 300.

He also referred to section 10 of the Bills of Sale Act, 1878.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J.—As far as I can see, the question that I have to decide is one which at present is not decided. There is no direct authority. It is really, as far as I can see on the authorities, an open question, and I must decide it as best I can. Now, the first Bills of Sale Act, passed in 1854, was an Act passed with a specific object, which is stated in the preamble of the Act which is entitled "an Act for preventing frauds upon creditors by secret bills of sale of personal chattels," and begins with a recital: "Whereas frauds are frequently committed upon creditors by secret bills of sale of personal chattels, whereby persons are able to keep up the appearance of being in good circumstances." Now, the Act of 1854 is made to apply in favour of specified persons, and of those persons only—those persons being really execution creditors, and assignees in bankruptcy, and trustees under deeds for the benefit of creditors generally. That Act was amended in 1878, but the Act of 1878 was passed, as far as I understand, for the same object and for the protection of the same classes as the Act of 1854. Both Acts were passed to prevent the same mischief (i.e., frauds on creditors), and for the protection of the same persons, i.e., either individual creditors who had obtained judgment and issued execution, or creditors generally who got execution in the shape of bankruptcy. There is nothing in the Act of 1878 which indicates that there was any intention to afford any special protection to liquidators of companies in liquidation. Then one comes to the Act of 1882. The Act of 1882 has a very much wider scope than either of the previous Acts. It is not only intended for the prevention of frauds upon creditors, but it is also intended for the protection of debtors and those who are in need, against those who are apt to take advantage of their necessities to prey upon them and defraud them. So it is a natural consequence that one should find that the Act of 1882 does not only apply, as the Acts of 1854 and 1878 did, to a case where the grantee remained in possession of the property, notwithstanding the bill of sale, but also applies in the case of bills of sale, grants, and charges which are given as security for debts or advances, and to cases where the grantee may be in actual possession.

Now, that being the short history of the Acts, one finds in the Act of 1882 (s. 17) the provision upon which so much has been said to-day. That section runs: [His lordship read the section, and went on:—] Those who have argued on behalf of the debenture-holders say, in the first place, the Bills of Sale Acts, whether you take the two earlier Acts or the later Act, have no application whatever to bills of sale and similar instruments issued by corporations. They say the two earlier Acts did not apply to corporations at all, and they further say that with regard to the Act of 1882 (which has to be construed with the Act of 1878—an Act still in force, the Act of 1854 having been repealed) not only does the Act of 1882 itself not apply to bills of sale or debentures issued by companies, but also that the Act of 1878, which has to be read with the Act of 1882 as one Act, can no longer apply, if it did apply, to debentures issued by corporations or incorporated companies; and it is claimed by those persons who hold these debentures that they are persons holding debentures issued by an incorporated company within the meaning of section 17. On the other hand, it is argued on behalf of the liquidator that the Act of 1854 and the Act of 1878 did apply, and the Act of 1878 does apply, to debentures or bills of sale or charges issued by corporations or companies; and that with regard to section 17 of the Act of 1882, whatever it may do in the case of an incorporated company, the present society is not an "incorporated company" within the section; with the result that under the older Acts and under the later Act these debentures remain liable to the provisions of the Bills of Sale Acts generally.

A good deal of light is thrown on these contentions by the decision of Bowen, L.J., in In re the Standard Manufacturing Co., 39 W. R. 369, [1891] 1 Ch. 627. In that case Bowen, L.J., undoubtedly puts it that the judgment of the court is based upon the ground that mortgages or charges of any incorporated company for the registration of which other provisions have been made by the Companies' Clauses Act, 1845, or the Companies Act, 1862, are not within the Bills of Sale Act, 1878. If that is the whole of the decision of the Court of Appeal, I hold that the present society is not entitled to the benefit of that decision. It does not come within the scope of it at all. This society is not a company in which the registration of mortgages or charges is provided for by either of these two Acts, or indeed by any other Act. The result is that these debenture-holders are not entitled to say that they are exonerated from the provisions of the Bills of Sale Acts by reason of this decision of Bowen, L.J., because that decision is in terms applicable only to companies for the mortgages and charges of which provision is made for registration by the other two Acts. That being so, I cannot myself hold that that decision is one that the debenture-holders can successfully rely on. I have therefore to look at section 17, and see whether these debentures come within that section irrespective of Bowen, L.J.'s decision. I hold that this society does not come within it. The ground I should like best to put it on is the simple one that section 17 excludes from the operation of the Act of 1882 "companies," and that this is not a company, it is a corporation which bears the name of "society." The word "company" has come to have a very well-recognized meaning. There are various legal "companies," but this "society" does not come within the connotation of the word in any of its legal meanings. I think that alone would be sufficient ground for saying that the section is defined by the Legislature in favour of companies, and that if the Legislature had intended to include all sorts of corporations nothing would have been easier for the Legislature than to say so in plain terms. Though I think that a sufficient ground, I should like to add as a further ground that the absence of provisions for registration is a reason why the Legislature may very well have drawn the line between companies in respect of which there is such a provision made and corporations in respect of which there is no such provision. But it is my duty still to look at this decision of Bowen, L.J., and to see whether there is anything else in it which is either binding on me, or which I ought, in deference to Bowen, L.J., to follow. There is nothing that is binding on me. The question was distinctly raised in In re Standard Manufacturing Co., Aye or no, were corporations generally bound by the Bills of Sale Acts, irrespective of the effect of section 17? Bowen, L.J., looks at the Bills of Sale Acts. He points out that bills of sale charges or debentures issued by "companies" do not, in his opinion, come within the mischief pointed at by these Acts. He goes on, and points out that much of the language of the Acts is not apt language to use if the statutes were intended to apply to corporations; but at the same time he takes the definition clause under the Act of 1878 (section 4), which does not, for this purpose, materially differ from the definition clause under the Act of 1854, and says in terms that the words of that definition clause are wide enough to cover a bill of sale or debentures issued by a company. He winds up by saying that no corporation can, in any circumstance, be within the Bills of Sale Act, 1878. It seems to me that Bowen, L.J., deliberately and studiously leaves the question open. He goes on to say that "the view that debentures like the present are not within the Bills of Sale Act, 1878, was that adopted by Pollock, B., in John Welsted & Co. v. Swansea Bank, 5 Times L. R. 332; and by Lord Coleridge and Wills, J., in Read v. Joannon, 38 W. R. 734, 25 Q. B. D. 300; see also Edmonds v. Blaina Furnaces Co., 35 W. R. 798, 36 Ch. D. 215; Levy v. Abercorris Slate and Slab Co., 36 W. R. 411, 37 Ch. D. 260." He then says: "We agree with this view"—i.e., the view adopted in those cases — "and we think that this appeal should, therefore, be allowed, with costs both here and below." If he had stopped there, I should have felt that that was such an affirmation of the view contained in those cases, that it bound me. But he goes on to say, without a fresh sentence, "on the ground that the mortgages or charges of any incorporated company for the registration of which other provisions have been made by the Companies' Clauses Act, 1845, or the Companies Act, 1862, are not within the Bills of Sale Act, 1878." That is to say, he does not exclude companies generally from these Acts, but only companies in which provisions are made for the registration of mortgages. It seems to me, therefore, that Bowen, L.J., deliberately leaves open the question whether the Bills of Sale Acts apply to other companies—i.e., apply to companies in the case of which no provision is made for registration.

Being, then, at large to deal with the question, I cannot help starting with the Act of 1854, and remembering with regard to that Act that at the time when the Act of 1854 was passed the Companies Act, 1862, was not passed (i.e., the provisions for the registration of mortgages under the Act of 1862 were not in existence), and that, whatever may have been the intention of the Legislature at the time of the passing of the Act of 1854 with regard to companies coming within the provisions of the Companies' Clauses Act, 1845, the Legislature cannot have had any intention with reference to companies under the Companies Act, 1862. But with regard to those companies it seems that the decision of Bowen, L.J., is impossible to reconcile with Deffell v. White, 15 W. R. 68, L. R. 2 C. P. 144, and Shears v. Jacob, 14 W. R. 609, L. R. 1 C. P. 513, in which it was held in 1866 that the Bills of Sale Acts did apply to companies under the Companies Act, 1862. I assume that the company in Deffell v. White was a company under the Companies Act, 1862, from the date of the case (1866). In Shears v. Jacob the company is stated in terms to be a company "limited." With regard to the residue of the authority, there is some each way. There is a decision by Pearson, J., in Attenborough's case, 33 W. R. 387, 28 Ch. D. 685, which is a positive decision that debentures issued by companies come within the Bills of Sale Acts, or at all events it is the expression of a very decided opinion. There should be added the case of Ross v. Army and Navy Hotel Co., 35 W. R. 40, 34 Ch. D. 43, where Kay, L.J. (then Kay, J.), said the Companies Act seemed to assume that companies under the Companies Act are within the Bills of Sale Acts. It is true the court did not there avoid the security, but it was not at all on the ground that the Bills of Sale Acts had no application to such companies. On the other hand there is, as I have said, the case of Read v. Joannon, where Lord Coleridge expressly decides that corporations are outside the Bills of Sale Acts, and there are the cases mentioned by Bowen, L.J., which, without at all expressly deciding, seem to me to assume that the Bills of Sale Acts have no application to corporations at all. I think it right to mention that it is impossible to suppose that Bowen, L.J., meant to decide the case upon the ground that the Bills of Sale Acts have no application to companies at all, because, if he had intended to decide that, the elaborate grounds which he goes into for the decision would not have been necessary; he had only to say: "This point is concluded by Read v. Joannon." I have, therefore, first the decision of Bowen, L.J., which is a decision that companies in which provision is made for the registration of mortgages are not within the Act of 1878. I have to say whether I will go one step further, and say that no corporations are within the Bills of Sale Acts. I do not feel disposed to go that step further. What would most dispose me to go that step further is the fact that, though Bills of Sale Acts have been in force ever since 1854, there has not been (since the two cases I have mentioned) any decision avoiding debentures as coming within the Bills of Sale Acts. Down to 1882 the reason for that is that the question could not very often arise, because the Acts of 1854 and 1878 had no operation in favour of liquidators, and so far as execution creditors were concerned the question very rarely arose, because the moment an execution was put in you got a petition and a winding-up order, and in that way the raising of the question was avoided.

I hold that this industrial society is not excluded from the operation of the Bills of Sale Acts.

Solicitors, W. Barrs; Bowen, Cotton, & Bowen; Mossop & Rolfe.

Q. B. Div.
(Lord Russell of Killowen, C.J., and Cave, J.)

Oct. 30; Dec. 3.

ELLESMERE BREWERY CO. v. COOPER AND OTHERS. (a.)

Principal and surety — Co-sureties — Contribution— Alteration in bond—Materiality—Discharge of sureties.

A bond was given by the defendant C. as principal, and by the defendants N., E., P., and B. as sureties, by which they were jointly and severally bound to the plaintiffs in the sum of £150. The condition of the bond was that if C. duly accounted to the plaintiffs for all moneys received by him for them, the bond should be void. The bond provided that the liability of N. and E. should be limited to £50 each, and of P. and B. to £25 each. N. was the last surety to sign the bond, and after his signature added, in good faith, the words "for £25 only." The principal made default in the sum of £48.

Held, in an action against the principal and sureties, that the alteration by N. was a material alteration, casting an additional burthen upon the other sureties, and that as against them the bond was thereby rendered void; that the bond was also rendered void as against N., for his liability under the bond was undertaken on the faith of the joint liability of the other sureties.

(a.) Reported by F. O. ROBINSON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Appeal from the judgment of the county court judge of Shropshire.

The action was brought on a bond against the principal and sureties. Judgment was given for the plaintiff company against the principal, and for the sureties.

The plaintiff company appealed against the latter part of the judgment.

The facts and arguments are fully stated in the judgment of the court.

A. T. Lawrence, for the plaintiff company.

Hansell, for the defendants.

The following authorities were referred to: Dering v. Earl Winchilsea, 1 Cox 318; Craigthorne v. Swinburne, 14 Ves. 160; In re MacDonaghs, Ir. R. 10 Eq. 269, 24 W. R. Dig. 227; Thomson v. Butcher, 3 Buls. 300; Gardner v. Walsh, 3 W. R. 460, 5 E. & B. 83; Suffield v. Bank of England, 30 W. R. 932, 9 Q. B. D. 555; Pendlebury v. Walker, 4 Y. & Coll. Eq. Ex. 424.

Cur. adv. vult.

Dec. 3.—The judgment of the COURT (Lord RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN, C.J., and CAVE, J.), was against Cooper and four other defendants who had read by Lord RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN:—This was an action signed a bond as sureties for Cooper. At the trial before the learned county court judge of Shropshire judgment was given for the plaintiff as against Cooper, and judgment given for the four remaining defendants, the sureties.

The facts were that Cooper having become agent and traveller for the plaintiffs was called upon to give them some security. He accordingly gave the bond in question, in which he was joined by the four other defendants.

The bond is dated the 30th of April, 1894. By its terms the five defendants are jointly and severally bound to the plaintiffs in the sum of £150. It then recites that Cooper had been appointed agent for the company, and states the condition of the bond to be that if Cooper duly accounted for all moneys received by him for the plaintiffs and otherwise performed the duties of his agency, the bond should be void. It then provided that the liability of Nunnerley and Emberton (two of the defendants) should be limited to £50 each, and that of Pay and Bromfield (two other of the defendants) to £25 each. The effect, therefore, of the bond, as drawn, was that the principal and the sureties were jointly and severally bound in the sum of £150, but that liability could not be enforced against any of the sureties beyond the limit of the sum specified as to each of them. Nunnerly was the last to sign, and his signature thus appears on the bond: "Walter Nunnerley, Twenty-five pounds only."

The witness to the execution of each of the signatories was Mr. Bruce, the plaintiffs' manager, who, so far as appears, took the bond without making any objection to the manner of Nunnerley's execution, nor was it suggested that Nunnerly had surreptitiously added the qualification of "twenty-five pounds only" to his signature. As no evidence was given on the point, it cannot be assumed that Nunnerley in bad faith sought by the form of his execution of the bond to limit any liability he had previously agreed to undertake. The probability is that in giving particulars of his sureties Cooper had erroneously stated that Nunnerley had agreed to undertake liability to the extent of £50, whereas he had done so only to the extent of £25. Subsequently Cooper, the principal, received moneys for the plaintiffs to the amount of £48, for which he had failed to account, and judgment was given against him at the trial for that amount. The contested question was the liability of the other defendants, the sureties. The learned county court judge held that no one of them was liable, and gave judgment for them accordingly. The present appeal is against that judgment.

It was argued for the plaintiff:—

(1) That the form of Nunnerley's execution did not constitute an alteration of the bond so as to discharge from liability the three prior executing sureties;

(2) That if an alteration, it was not a material alteration, and therefore did not discharge such sureties; and, lastly,

(3) That in any case Nunnerley was liable to the extent of £50, or if not of £50, at least to the extent of £25.

In my judgment, no one of these contentions is well founded. I think the effect of Nunnerley's mode of execution on the facts of this case is substantially the same as if the proviso in the body of the bond had been altered by him before execution by striking out £50 and inserting instead £25. It was therefore an alteration; its effect I shall presently discuss. The argument of the learned counsel for the appellant was that the loss in question was to be divided into fourths, and that so long as each fourth did not exceed the sum for which each surety had become liable each of them was bound to pay, and without any right of contribution from his co-sureties, whether the fixed limit of his liability was for the greater or the smaller amount. Here it was said the fourth of the loss was £12, and as Nunnerley had clearly intended to make himself liable, as also had Pay and Bromfield for £25 each, it was immaterial whether Nunnerley signed for £25 or for £50. Each, it was contended, was bound to pay £12; and Emberton was bound to bear no more of the loss than the others.

In my judgment this contention is founded on a misapprehension of the law. It renders it necessary to consider the principle upon which liability of sureties inter se rests.

That principle is that sureties for the same principal and for the same engagement, even although bound by different instruments and for different amounts, have a common interest and a common burthen; so that if one surety who is directly liable to the creditor pays such creditor he can claim contribution from his co-sureties, whose obligations to the creditor he has discharged. But how is the amount of the claim to be determined? According to the argument of the learned counsel for the plaintiff it is to be determined by the number of the sureties. Thus, if there are four sureties and one of them pays all, he can recover one-fourth and one-fourth only, of his payment from each of the other three co-sureties. But this is not in all cases true, even where each of the sureties has made himself liable for the same amount. Thus, where four sureties are jointly and severally bound in a surety bond, and one of them pays the amount of the bond, but one of the remaining three sureties is insolvent, the right to contribution against the two other sureties is for thirds, not for fourths, of the sum so paid. But how, where, although the sureties are jointly and severally bound, there are different limits of liability, as in this case? It is clear that where the full amount of the bond is due and payable to the creditor, liability can only be enforced by him against each surety to the limit of the liability fixed in the instrument. In such case there would be no right of contribution, for each had paid to the limit of his liability. But suppose only half the amount of the bond is due and payable to the creditor, and such amount is paid by one only of the sureties who has fixed the limit of his liability at one-half the amount of the bond, could it be said that he had no right to contribution from his co-sureties? Surely not. The burthen is a common burthen of all, but unequally distributed. By his payment of the loss of one-half the surety has discharged a liability which might have been enforced against the other sureties up to the fixed limit. It would be against all equitable principles that in such a case the other sureties should go free, because it happened that the creditor had enforced payment against one only. Again, it is clear that one surety cannot keep for his own sole benefit a security for his suretyship where he is bound with other sureties for the same principal and the same engagement. Suppose, then, that one surety, whose limit of liability was £1,000, has realized £1,000 from such a security, being bound with three other sureties with a limit of liability of £2,000 each, making in all £7,000. It is clear that that £1,000 must be taken into account for the benefit of all the sureties inter se. But upon what principle? Surely, upon the only principle which will secure its equitable division—namely, proportional distribution. Thus the surety for £1,000 would benefit to the extent of one-seventh, and each of the others to the extent of two-sevenths each. The same principle must apply where the burthen has to be distributed. Where the claim of the creditor is to the full amount each must pay up to the fixed limit of his liability; but where the claim is less than such full amount, and it is discharged by one, the claim must be proportionately borne by the others, even where the claim does not exceed the fixed limit of the liability of the surety who has paid.

What I have so far said is, I think, to be gathered from the principles laid down in Dering v. Winchilsea; but in Pendlebury v. Walker, Alderson, B., expressly states the rule thus: "Where the same default of the principal renders all the co-sureties responsible, all are to contribute, and then the law superadds that which is not only the principle but the equitable mode of applying the principle, that they should all contribute equally, if each is a surety to an equal amount, and if not equally, then proportionately to the amount for which each is a surety." In Steel v. Dixon, 29 W. R. 735, 17 Ch. D. 825, Fry, J., cites with approval the language I have quoted; and later Pearson, J., in In re Arcedeckne, 24 Ch. D. 709, 31 W. R. Dig. 162, adopts the language of Fry, J. See also Ellis v. Emmanuel, 24 W. R. 832, 1 Ex. D. 157, and Evans v. Bremridge, 4 W. R. 161, 2 K. & J. 174.

Apply this principle to the present case. I assume the bond to have been executed according to its original tenor, without qualification or alteration.

The total loss being £48, Emberton having subscribed for £50 out of the total of £150 would be liable for one-third, and if he paid no more would have no claim for contribution; if he paid to the plaintiff more than one-third, he could claim contribution from his co-sureties in the proportion of their subscriptions. Stated as a sum in proportion, Emberton's liability would be arrived at thus: As 150 is to 50 so is 48 to the result. So worked out Emberton would be liable for £16 only, and if he paid more would have a claim for contribution. In like manner Pay and Bromfield would be liable for £8 each, and Nunnerley for £16.

Now, to appreciate the materiality of the alteration, let us consider its effect upon the liability of Nunnerley. He explicitly says: "I execute the bond only on the terms of my liability being limited to £25." He could not, therefore, in any case be made liable for more. Whether he can be made liable even for the £25 I shall presently consider.

What, then, is the effect of the altered limitation to £25 by Nunnerley upon the position of the other three sureties? Take Emberton's position. For simplicity assume that the total liability to the plaintiff company for £48 had been paid by Emberton. According to the tenor of the bond without the alteration, Emberton would have to bear two-sixths, equal to one-third, and Pay and Bromfield one-sixth each. But by the alteration it is manifest that Emberton, who has paid, would not have the same right of contribution against Nunnerley; and if Nunnerley is not bound at all, would have no right of contribution against him. The alteration, then, was clearly material. It is unnecessary to give similar illustrations as to Pay and Bromfield.

The result, therefore, is that neither Emberton, Pay, nor Bromfield can be made liable on this bond. Each of them is entitled to say: "The contract into which I entered was on the basis of Nunnerley being a party to it with a liability of £50. That is not the contract as it now appears from the bond, and I am, therefore not bound by it."

Their position would be still stronger if Nunnerley is not bound by the bond at all.

The remaining question then is, Is Nunnerley bound at all?

I have already intimated that, as he expressly said, "I shall be liable only for £25," he cannot be made liable for £50. But is he liable even for the £25? I think he is not. He, in good faith, as must be assumed, expressly limits his liability to £25; but he undertakes that liability, not as a separate or independent liability, but as part of a contract in which three other sureties are joining him, against whom in certain eventualities he will have rights of recourse, between whom and himself a common burthen is to be borne, although unequally distributed. But if in fact such other sureties are not bound by the contract (and I have adjudged that they are not), Nunnerley is entitled to say: "This is not the contract into which I have entered, and I am not bound by it."

The judgment of the learned county court judge must stand, and the appeal will therefore be dismissed, with costs.

Solicitors for the plaintiff company, Moore & Davies, for Salter & Giles, Ellesmere.

Solicitors for the defendants, Kennedy, Hughes, & Kennedy, for Lloyd, Ellesmere.

Prob. Div. & Adm. Div. } July 29, 1895.
Probate. }

IN THE GOODS OF HONYWOOD. (a.)

Probate — Amendment of grant — Error in name of executor.

A grant of probate was made to an executor in the name F. M., he being so described in the will, but his real name was F. J. M. The Bank of England refused to register the will or transfer stock belonging to the estate owing to this discrepancy.

The court allowed the grant to be amended by making it to "F. J. M., known in the will as F. M."

Motion by executors of the will of F. R. Hony-

(a.) Reported by J. GERARD LAING, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

wood that the grant of probate might be amended by altering the name of one of the executors from Frederick Marsden to Frederick John Marsden, which was his real name, although he was called Frederick Marsden in the will.

Barnard, for the executors, in support of the application.—The estate includes certain stock of the Bank of England, and this executor having signed the transfer F. J. Marsden the Bank has refused to register the grant or transfer the stock.

JEUNE, P.—I can see no objection to the probate going to "Frederick John Marsden, known in the will as Frederick Marsden."

Order accordingly.

Solicitors, Forster, Frere, & Co.

ERRATUM.—Ellesmere Brewery Co. v. Cooper, ante, at p. 255.—The first sentence in the judgment of this case should read as follows: "The judgment of the COURT (Lord RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN, C.J., and CAVE, J.) was read by Lord RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN, C.J.: This was an action against Cooper and four other defendants who had signed a bond as sureties for Cooper."

Court of Appeal.

From Chan. Div. (Lindley, Kay, and A. L. Smith, L.JJ.) — Jan. 22.

LOCK v. THE QUEENSLAND INVESTMENT AND LAND MORTGAGE CO. (LIMITED). (a.)

Company—Shares—Shares paid up in advance of calls—Payment of interest out of capital on shares so prepaid—Companies Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 89), ss. 14, 38, 101; Table A, clause 7.

By the articles of association of a company the directors were at liberty, as they thought fit, to receive payment from any shareholder of the whole or any part of the amount remaining unpaid on any shares held by him upon such terms in all respects as the directors might determine; and might also, if they thought fit, pay out of the capital of the company interest on sums paid up on shares in advance of calls. Some of the shareholders paid up in full the amounts remaining unpaid on their shares, such payments being payments in advance of calls, under an agreement with the company that they should receive interest at the rate of £6 per cent. per annum on the amount so paid up in advance.

Held, that such articles were perfectly legal and valid, and that the company was entitled to pay the interest on prepaid shares out of capital in the absence of profits.

Dale v. Martin, 9 L. R. Ir. 498, 11 ibid. 371, 31 W. R. Dig. 208, 32 ibid. Dig. 36, approved.

Appeal by the plaintiff from Stirling, J.

The company was formed in 1878, and the objects thereof were the investment and loaning of money in Queensland.

The original capital of the company was £2,000,000, but this was subsequently reduced, and now consisted of 164,992 preferred shares of £1 10s. each fully paid, and 164,992 ordinary shares of £7 each upon which only £1 had been originally paid. 20,000 of these latter shares, however, had been paid for in full by their respective holders, the payment of £6 per share being a payment in advance of calls.

In the year 1895 no profits were made by the company, the year's working resulting in a loss; but nevertheless the directors paid interest at the rate of £6 per cent. per annum to the holders of the 20,000 ordinary shares upon the amounts paid by them in advance of calls, in pursuance of an agreement to that effect.

Article 40 of the articles of association was as follows: "The board shall be at liberty, from time to time, as they think fit, to receive payment from any shareholder of the whole or any part of the amount remaining unpaid on any shares held by him upon such terms in all respects as the board may determine."

Article 150.—"All dividends on shares shall be declared by general meeting. No dividend shall be paid except out of the net profits of the company, either for the year, or remaining over from previous years in some reserve fund or otherwise; but the directors may, if they see fit to do so, pay out of the capital of the company interest on sums paid up on shares in advance of calls."

Article 154.—"If a larger amount be paid up on some shares than on others of the same class, the dividend on the shares of that class shall be paid in proportion to the amount paid up on each share, except in so far as all or some part of the excess shall have been received by the board on the terms of paying interest thereon, in which case the part bearing interest shall not be reckoned for the purposes of dividend."

Article 156.—"The directors shall deduct from the dividends payable to any member all such sums of money as may be due from him to the company on account of calls or otherwise."

Article 158.—"Unpaid dividends and interest on shares shall never bear interest as against the company."

The plaintiff moved before Stirling, J., for an injunction to restrain the company from making any such further payments of interest to shareholders except out of net profits.

Stirling, J., following the practice as settled in Ireland by the case of Dale v. Martin, 9 L. R. Ir. 498, 31 W. R. Dig. 208, and on appeal 11 ibid. 371, 32 W. R. Dig. 36, refused the motion.

The plaintiff appealed.

Brodie Cooper (Millar, Q.C., with him), for the appellant.—I admit that if this payment of interest—not dividend—out of capital is legal, it is expressly authorized by the articles of association; but the negociation, being between the company and a shareolder, was not in the nature of a loan, and therefore the transaction did not constitute a debt of the company. The principal was not repayable except in the case of a winding up. The express condition on which people are allowed to trade with limited liability is that the fund which the Legislature has ear-marked for the benefit of the outside creditors shall not be repaid to the shareholders in any shape or form. The disability to pay interest out of capital is not on the part of the company; it is the status of the shareholder which renders it illegal. The cases show not only that the shares shall be fully paid up, but also that the capital shall not be diminished by any transactions whatever between the shareholders and the company.

He referred to In re Sharpe, 40 W. R. 241, [1892] 1 Ch. 154; Trevor v. Whitworth, 36 W. R. 145, 12 App. Cas. 409; Ooregum Gold Mining Co. v. Roper, 41 W. R. 90, [1892] A. C. 125.

(a.) Reported by W. SHALLCROSS GODDARD, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Graham Hastings, Q.C., and C. E. E. Jenkins, for the respondents, were not called upon.

LINDLEY, L.J. — I do not feel, I confess, any difficulty about this case. I think that the answer to Mr. Brodie Cooper's argument, in which he has done full justice to his case, is this—it goes a great deal too far. If he is right, it would follow that no part of the capital of a limited company could be applied in paying a debt to a shareholder of any sort or kind.

Now, it is impossible to read Trevor v. Whitworth and Ooregum Gold Mining Co.'s case, and to suppose for a moment that the learned lords who decided those cases intended to lay down any such proposition as that. It is entirely contrary to certain sections of the Companies Act of 1862 itself. If you look to section 38, clause 7, and section 101 of the Companies Act of 1862, you will find that shareholders can be creditors of their own companies, and that they can stand and prove in competition with creditors of their own companies, provided only that their claims are not in respect of either shares or dividends or calls. In other words, if I am a shareholder in a limited company, and I lend that company £20,000 on the terms of being repaid with interest, I am entitled to be repaid that £20,000 and interest, out of the capital of the company in competition with the other creditors of the company, even on a winding up. I am not entitled to stand as a creditor of the company in competition with other creditors, or with any creditor, in respect of my capital, whether prepaid or not prepaid, or in respect of dividends or profits or anything of that sort, but in respect of debts contracted with me as an outsider, to use that expression, I am entitled.

Therefore Mr. Brodie Cooper's argument goes a great deal too far; and we have this simple question, Is there anything ultra vires of this company in the stipulation that it shall be lawful for the directors to pay to a shareholder, whilst the company is a going concern, so much money—6 per cent.—upon capital advanced before it has become due in respect of calls? I have already pointed out in the course of the argument how extremely disastrous it would be to companies to deprive them of that power. It is a benefit to the company to be able to raise money upon terms so much more advantageous to itself than by contracting an ordinary debt, in which case they would be compelled to repay the principal as well as the interest on it. By this machinery they can raise money by obtaining advances from the shareholders in respect of their calls not yet due, upon the terms of paying what I may call for convenience interest upon that capital so prepaid, which interest will cease when that capital is really called up. Nobody supposes that this interest will go on after all the capital is called up. It is interest on prepaid capital, and when the prepayment ceases to be a prepayment, there is no interest payable.

Now, if you look at the clauses in the articles, you will find that they are expressly framed with a view to carry out that kind of business arrangement. Article 154 does throw light on the true construction of articles 40 and 150, and it shows that when the capital is called up this arrangement about interest will cease, and the shareholders will be on a par. They will have to take dividends instead of interest. Now it is said that clause 7 in table A, which authorizes directors to pay interest in respect of prepaid calls, does not authorize the directors to pay that interest out of capital, and Mr. Brodie Cooper's contention is that we must read it as authorizing only the payment of interest out of profits. Well, I admit that the language is not so explicit as perhaps might be desired, but a construction has been put upon that clause in Ireland in 1883, first by the court of first instance, and secondly by the Court of Appeal, in which that court held that interest could be paid, even out of capital. We are asked to say that that is wrong, although it has stood from 1883 downwards, and has been acted on, I believe, ever since throughout the whole of England. I cannot help thinking that the judgment of the Irish court was right, and right in principle; and that the principle upon which the Irish Judges have decided the case does not infringe at all the principles laid down and acted on by the House of Lords in Trevor v. Whitworth and In re The Ooregum Gold Mining Co. The purchasing of shares is a totally different transaction, and so is issuing shares at a discount. The Act of Parliament says the shares are to be paid for, that £20 a share means £20 a share, and that the £20 is to be paid. And The Ooregum case means this—that you cannot avoid the liability by the company buying back the shares. That is all, but that has nothing to do with the payment of debts. You must look for the obligation to pay debts to sections 38 and 101; and, having regard to those, it seems to me that the decision of the Irish court is quite right, the decision of Stirling, J., is quite right, and that this appeal must be dismissed.

KAY, L.J.—In this case the articles of association distinctly authorize what has been done. Article 40 provides that—[His lordship read the article, and also articles 150 and 154, and continued:] First of all, is that legal or illegal? If these clauses are ultra vires, then, of course, the argument succeeds. Are they ultra vires? How can they be ultra vires, when we find in section 14 of the Act of 1862 that "any company may avail itself of the provisions of the Act, table A"; and section 7 of table A is this: "That the directors may, if they think fit, receive from any member willing to advance the same all or any part of the moneys due upon the shares held by him beyond the sums actually called for; and upon the moneys so paid in advance, or so much thereof as from time to time exceeds the amount of the calls then made upon the shares in respect of which such advance has been made, the company may pay interest at such rate as the member paying such sum in advance and the directors agree upon." That is the law. That provision of table A is made legal by the Act of Parliament itself. I have referred already to section 14 of the Act. Now, the provisions in these articles in effect are the same as that provision in table A; and therefore it is impossible to say that the articles, so far as they authorize the directors to agree to pay interest upon the capital paid by the shareholders on their shares in advance, are ultra vires or beyond the powers of the company whose articles contain that provision.

Then the next thing is, What is the meaning of the provision that the company may take from its shareholders, in advance—that is, before calls are made—money paid on their shares, and may agree to pay interest on such money at such rate as they think fit? That agreement to pay interest is a valid agreement, and the effect is this—that the company borrows money from its shareholders which it need not pay back, which is a great advantage to the company, because if it borrowed from outsiders then the money might be recalled, and they might have to pay back the capital; but borrowing it from shareholders they have not to pay back the capital, and therefore when they borrow it in that way the company get a great advantage. But they are at liberty to contract to pay interest, and what is that interest when it is contracted to be paid by the company? Is it anything but a debt? It is a valid contract. It is not a dividend on shares. Is it anything but a debt? I cannot conceive how in law it can be considered as anything but a debt? A contract to pay interest upon money which the shareholder voluntarily pays in advance on the faith of that contract must be a debt created by contract; and then, if it is a debt created by contract, and if that contract is a legal and valid contract, why should it not be paid out of capital? All debts are payable out of capital, whether they are for interest or principal, or whatever they are for. Debts are payable by the company out of the capital; and if this be a debt, it is payable out of the capital. The company, it seems, had not profits out of which to make these payments, and the debenture-holders are now objecting to these payments being made out of capital; but they are debts. If they are debts, how can they object? It seems to me that they are plainly debts which the company are bound to pay by contract with its shareholders, which contract, as I have said, is perfectly legal.

Now, I quite agree, if I may say so respectfully, with the reasoning of Fitzgibbon, L.J., in the case of Dale v. Martin which has been referred to. It is cited by Stirling, J., and I read from his judgment this part of the citation: "But then it is said the payment of the interest out of capital reduces the capital below the nominal amount fixed by the memorandum. This, it must be conceded, the board could not do; but the answer to the objection is that this is not a reduction of capital in any sense, except that of a spending of the capital in payment of a lawful debt, which occurs in every case in which money has to be paid out of capital in discharge of the liabilities of a company." That is a complete answer to that part of the argument. The company cannot reduce its capital. It cannot do it either by issuing shares at a discount or by repurchasing its own shares. That the House of Lords has decided in the two cases which have been cited to us. But this is not a diminution of the nominal capital. This is not a return of capital to the shareholders. As Fitzgibbon, L.J., says, it is a proper spending of its capital in payment of that which was a bonâ fide debt of the company. I think the decision, if I may respectfully say so, of the court in Ireland was quite right, and that the decision of Stirling, J., following that, was also quite right.

I observe in the case of Trevor v. Whitworth (12 App. Cas., at p. 415), Lord Herschell in his speech says this: "What is the meaning of the distinction thus drawn between a company without limit on the liability of its members and a company where the liability is limited, but in the latter case to assure to those dealing with the company that the whole of the subscribed capital, unless diminished by expenditure upon the objects defined by the memorandum, shall remain available for the discharge of its liabilities? The capital may, no doubt, be diminished by expenditure upon and reasonably incidental to all the objects specified. A part of it may be lost in carrying on the business operations authorized. Of this all persons trusting the company are aware, and take the risk. But I think they have a right to rely, and were intended by the Legislature to have a right to rely, on the capital remaining undiminished, by any expenditure outside these limits, or by the return of any part of it to the shareholders." This being expenditure within what seems to me to be the proper and lawful limits of the expenditure of a company, it comes exactly within those words of Lord Herschell in the case of Trevor v. Whitworth.

SMITH, L.J.—I entirely agree with what has fallen from my learned brothers. If I said anything, I should only be repeating; and I will simply say that I entirely agree.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the appellant, Ashurst, Morris, Crisp, & Co.

Solicitors for the respondents, Trinders & Capron.

From Chan. Div. (Lindley, A. L. Smith, and Rigby, L.JJ.) Dec. 16, 17.

In re STRAFFORD (EARL OF) AND MAPLES' CONTRACT. (a.)

Vendor and purchaser—Settled land—Tenant for life—Improvement rent-charge — Release of part of land charged—Consent of incumbrancers—Improvement of Land Act, 1864 (27 & 28 Vict. c. 114), ss. 68, 69—Settled Land Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 38), ss. 5, 30.

The tenant for life of an estate which was subject to an improvement rent-charge created under the Improvement of Land Act, 1864, agreed to sell a portion of the settled estate free from the rent-charge. The tenant for life proposed, with the consent of the owners of the rent-charge, to exonerate the land sold from the rent-charge by virtue of section 5 of the Settled Land Act, 1882; but the purchasers took the objection that under section 68 of the Improvement of Land Act, 1864, the consent of the Board of Agriculture (who now represented the commissioners referred to in the Act) must be obtained.

Held, that the consent of the Board of Agriculture was not necessary, and that a good title had been shown.

Appeal from Kekewich, J.

By an order dated the 11th of February, 1886, under the hands and seals of the Land Commissioners in pursuance of the Limited Owners' Residences Act, 1870 and 1871, and Improvement of Land Act, 1864, the Wrotham Park Estate was charged with a yearly sum of £1,265 11s. 4d.

The Earl of Strafford, the tenant for life of the Wrotham Park Estate, by a contract dated the 4th of June, 1895, agreed to sell to Frederick Maples and others for £2,500 a piece of land containing thirty-four acres or thereabouts, forming part of that estate.

The purchasers, in pursuance of the contract, delivered certain objections and requisitions, of which the first was as follows: "An effectual release of the property from the charge created by the abstracted order of the 11th of February, 1886, must be produced, and it must be handed to the purchaser on completion."

The vendor submitted to the purchasers a draft deed of exoneration, to which the owners of the rent-charge were parties, and by which they exonerated the premises sold from the charge. The purchasers approved this draft, but contended that it should be approved by the Land Commissioners, now the Board of Agriculture, in accordance with section 68 of the Improvement of Land Act, 1864. The vendor denied that there was any need to apply to the Board of Agriculture, and stated that he would exercise his powers under section 5 of the Settled Land Act, 1882, and exonerate the land from the rent-charge with the consent of the incumbrancers.

The purchasers still objecting to the title, the vendor took out a summons under the Vendor and Purchaser Act, 1874, asking for a declaration that upon the execution of the deed of exoneration, and without the consent of the Board of Agriculture, a good title had been shown to the premises according to the contract.

(a.) Reported by ARNOLD GLOVER, Esq., Barrister at-Law.

Upon this summons Kekewich, J., held that the consent of the Board of Agriculture must be obtained, and that the purchaser's objection was valid.

The vendor appealed.

Section 68 of the Improvement of Land Act, 1864, provides that the Inclosure Commissioners may either release from the charge any part of the land charged or may apportion the charge, provided that no lands shall in consequence of any such apportionment or release become charged with any greater amount than that to which in the opinion of the commissioners they have been durably benefited by the improvements in respect of which such charge was created.

Section 5 of the Settled Land Act, 1882, provides that "where on a sale, exchange, or partition, there is an incumbrance affecting land sold or given in exchange or on partition, the tenant for life, with the consent of the incumbrancer, may charge that incumbrance on any other part of the settled land, whether already charged therewith or not, in exoneration of the part sold or so given, and, by conveyance of the fee simple, or other estate or interest, the subject of the settlement, or by creation of a term of years in the settled land or otherwise, make provision accordingly."

Bramwell Davis, Q.C., and Pattison (F. E. Farrer with them), for the appellant.—There is no substance in this objection, for the purchasers cannot be damaged. Section 68 of the Act of 1864 is merely an enabling section, and does not prevent the owners of a rent-charge themselves releasing the charge. The vendor and the owners of the rent-charge can release the land by virtue of section 5 of the Settled Land Act, 1882.

They referred to Booth v. Smith, 33 W. R. 142, 14 Q. B. D. 318; In re Howard's Settled Estates, 40 W. R. 360, [1892] 2 Ch. 233, and Key and Elphinstone's Precedents in Conveyancing, 4th ed., vol 2, p. 688, note (a).

Warrington, Q.C., and Medd, for the respondents.—The question is whether section 5 of the Settled Land Act, 1882, applies to the case of a charge under the Improvement of Land Act, 1864, an Act which is left subsisting by the later Act, as may be seen by reference to section 30 of the Act of 1882, which extends the list of improvements contained in the Act of 1864. The important words are "with the consent of the incumbrancer," and they must be read with some limitation, such as "if at law they are in a position to consent." That would be necessarily implied, e.g., in the case of an infant or a limited company. Under section 16 of the Tithe Commutation Act, 1842, which is incorporated by the Improvement of Land Act, 1864, the purchasers may be called upon by the owners of the unsold lands to contribute to the payment of the rent-charge.

Bramwell Davis, Q.C., replied upon the last point.

LINDLEY, L.J., after reading the order of Kekewich, J., and stating the facts, proceeded as follows:—First of all, I will refer to the Settled Land Act, 1882. Section 5, on which this case really turns, begins in this way. [His lordship read the section, and continued:—] That is to say, according to the language of the section, a tenant for life on a sale, with the consent of the incumbrancer, may charge that incumbrance on any other part of the settled land in exoneration of the part sold. Now, that is an additional power given to a tenant for life who has power under section 3 to sell the settled lands. We all know that one of the great objects of the Settled Land Act of 1882 was to facilitate sales of land, and that it gave tenants for life enormous powers—amongst others, the power to sell land of which they were only tenants for life, notwithstanding the subsequent limitations. It was felt there might be a difficulty about incumbrances, and it was enacted that the tenant for life might do that which I have just mentioned. Nothing can be larger than the language which occurs in section 5 of the Settled Land Act, and I think it lies on anyone who says that that section does not mean what the words apparently do mean, to show to what extent, if any, those words ought to be restricted. The purchasers say here that a rent-charge created under the provisions of the Improvement of Land Act, 1864, is not an incumbrance within section 5 of the Settled Land Act. Why is it not? The reason alleged is that if you look at the Improvement of Land Act, 1864, you will find that these charges are made charges by the statutory commissioners, whose duty it is to consider the interest of everybody whose property is charged, and who have power to consider all the circumstances. Reference has been made to section 68 of that Act, and it is said that whenever a rent-charge has to be apportioned it can only be done by the commissioners subject to the conditions therein referred to. The question really turns more upon section 68 than upon any other, and I will refer to that without going through or referring to the various sections that have been read, and which I do not think it necessary to deal with. I will notice Mr. Medd's argument on the Tithe Act by-and-by.

Section 68 assumes the existence of a statutory rent-charge created under the earlier section. [His lordship read sections 68 and 69, and continued:] Just let us consider what that section (68) does. It says nothing at all about what the owners of the incumbrances can do themselves. The owner of the statutory charge is the owner of the incumbrance, and if he sees fit one cannot see why he should not release it. There is nothing here to prevent him doing it, or to prevent him releasing part of the land charged if he chooses to do so, and take the consequences. One of those consequences might be that by releasing part of the land he might release the whole; and he might, I suppose, if he chose, release the whole. Under Lord St. Leonards' Act the charge might be apportioned; but if the incumbrancer chooses to release the whole, there is nothing against it. The object of section 68 is not to fetter the owners of the charge, but to confer on the commissioners power which but for that section they would not have, and which, be it observed, can be exercised adversely to the persons interested in the estate. The duty is entrusted to the commissioners of looking after the interests of those who have charges. The proviso is all-important. If the commissioners are exercising their powers, then they are to take care that no land shall, in consequence of any apportionment or release made by them, become charged with any greater amount than that for which, in the opinion of the commissioners, they have received benefit. The owner of the rent-charge could not throw on the land which he chose to release the whole of the rent-charge which was charged on the land released and on the land not released. Of course, he could not not do that by himself. That could only be done with the consent of those who are interested in the whole of the land charged. But the commissioners can do that, and that is a very important thing.

Now let me pass from that, and let us see what there is inconsistent with section 5 of the Settled Land Act. I cannot see anything. I do not see what there is in the power given to the commissioners inconsistent with the subsequent legislation giving tenants for life power to sell land free from incumbrances. Why should they not, with the consent of the incumbrancers? They cannot do what the commissioners can do. That is another matter; but when you come to apply section 5 of the Settled Land Act, 1882, to other lands you find that upon the sale the tenant for life, with the consent of the incumbrancer, may charge that incumbrance on any other part of the settled land, whether already charged therewith or not, in exoneration of the part sold. I do not mean to say that he can give a statutory charge to take priority over all other charges. That would be quite another matter. If the incumbrancer chooses to take the charge, he will take it as an ordinary charge subject to priorities and everything else. It does not concern anyone but the incumbrancer. If he chooses to consent, it can be done; but if he does not consent, it cannot be done by the tenant for life. Now, it is said that there is something in the Settled Land Act, 1882 itself, which is inconsistent with this, and reference is made to section 30. That section, as I read it, merely enlarges the improvements which can be made under the Act of 1864, without referring to section 5 of the Settled Land Act. That is to say, there are two methods of improving lands, one under the Act of 1864, through the medium of the commissioners, now the Board of Agriculture. Their powers are increased by section 30, and that section does not refer to section 5 at all.

Nor is there any valid argument deducible from the repealing section (s. 64) of the Act of 1882. There are certain sections of the Act of 1864 modified by that repealing section and the schedule, but there is nothing there to curtail the power given to the tenant for life; and it appears to me that if we were to deny to the tenant for life the power to release the land under section 5, we should be doing that which is the last thing the Legislature contemplated. We should be hampering the tenant for life in the exercise of that power of sale which is given to him by section 3, and which is the cardinal power given by the Act of 1882.

Now, Mr. Medd has made a point which I thought was entitled to some attention. He says that the purchasers will not be safe in completing the purchase with such a deed of release as is tendered to them, because he says they may be called on to contribute to the payment of this rent-charge by the owners of the unsold lands. He refers to section 16 of the Tithe Act of 1842, which, he says, and says truly, is incorporated by the Act of 1864. When you look at the Tithe Act of 1842 it does not assist him at all. The case will not arise. Mr. Medd's client has a perfectly good title discharged from the whole of this statutory rent-charge. The release is made with the consent of the owner of that rent-charge; and Mr. Warrington's point, that notwithstanding this conveyance the owners of the rent-charge could come down upon the land, seems to me utterly untenable. It is very true that the draft does not contain any express words of release by the owner of the rent-charge. If that were all, I do not think that we should have had any summons or any appeal. That is not the point. The point is this. If the parties chose to execute a deed in that form, which they are content to do, would the purchasers have to run this inconceivable risk? It seems to me that they would have a perfectly clear and good title to the lands agreed to be sold, perfectly discharged, and not affected.

I think the appeal must be allowed.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—I agree.

RIGBY, L.J.—In deference to the opinion of the learned judge of the court below, although I should be content to rely entirely on the judgment which has been declared, I should like to add a few observations. The Act of 1864 was a very beneficial one, enabling limited owners to charge the lands of which they were limited owners with rent-charges for specified improvements. Of course, that is effectually safeguarded, and the course adopted was to create a jurisdiction in the commissioners, now represented by the Board of Agriculture, who were to see that the improvements were improvements such as would enhance the value of the land charged; and therefore all persons interested, including incumbrancers, would understand exactly the value of the improvements before they sanctioned the rent-charge.

Passing over the other sections of the Act, which appear to me immaterial or not sufficiently material to require separate consideration, it appears that the Legislature thought that a rent-charge of that kind, extending over, it may be, a large property, might seriously hamper owners of land in dealing with their properties; and section 68, as I understand it, makes the Board of Agriculture the tribunal for redressing any undue interference with the owners of land in dealing with their estates. It enables them, on the application of an owner in specified cases—one being where the owner is desirous of selling a portion of the land—to reconsider the position of things and inquire whether it is necessary that the whole of the rent-charge should remain charged by the absolute order made in the first instance. If they found that consistently with the interests of the holders of the rent-charge and the other persons concerned they might release a portion of the land, they had jurisdiction to do so; a jurisdiction carefully hedged about, no doubt, but still a jurisdiction which they could exercise in invitum, notwithstanding the resistance of the owners of the rent-charge, and notwithstanding, as I read the section, the resistance of the other persons interested, on the ground that no harm would be done them. They may apportion the rent-charge, or they may release a portion of the land from it and charge the whole on the other part of the property, although the property may have gone into different hands since the creation of the rent-charge. One portion, as the section itself contemplates, may be in the ownership of one person, or one set of persons, and others may have got into different ownerships. Obviously the very reasonable, and obviously the very necessary, thing is that in what they do as a tribunal of reference acting between the parties, whether they consent or not, is limited in this way, that they are not to throw on any one part of the property a greater burden than corresponds to the benefit which is derived by that property. Section 69 merely directs how the matter is to be carried into effect. I do not think for a moment that section 68 interferes with that liberty which the owners of a rent-charge under the Act had, in common with all other owners of property, of dealing with their own property as they think fit. And in the argument it was found impossible to press the matter so far as to say that if you have an owner of the land, a fee simple owner of the land or persons making up the fee simple, on the one side, and the owner of the rent-charge on the other, they might not agree as they pleased. That involves this, that the owner of the rent-charge may, if he thinks fit, release his charge without going to the tribunal appointed by the Board of Agriculture to entitle him to do that which his own power of ownership alone is sufficient to enable him to effect; and if he can release the whole charge, he may release part. I do not mean to say that he can affect the interest of parties who do not consent, and whose interests may be affected. I do not mean to say that he can increase the burden imposed on any part of the land; but I take it that it is clear that he can release, notwithstanding any of the provisions of the Act of 1864, any part of the lands from his rent-charge. Then, if he can do that of his own free will, he may do it when he is asked to do it, by a person who has power to sell land, on the occasion of a sale.

Now, when we come to the Settled Land Act, what do we find to be the scheme of that Act, speaking generally? It was an Act of great boldness and of great scope, but I think the provisions of it, when carefully considered, do point to this—that a tenant for life or the persons having the powers of a tenant for life under the Act, is for certain most important purposes to have a power as extensive as that which an owner in fee simple has. He may sell the land. If he can do that, an owner in fee simple can do no more. It by no means follows that he can be converted into an owner in fee simple by the Act. He is not; but he can sell the land, and by the Act provision is made for securing the purchase money for the benefit of those who are beneficially entitled under the settlement. When you have got so far as that, when you have made him for the purpose of the sale as capable of disposing of the whole of the property as if he were the fee simple owner of it—and when you find, as we do in section 5, a provision that he may with the consent of the incumbrancers in any case make an arrangement for releasing the part sold from incumbrance, and may always, with the consent of the incumbrancer, do that in exoneration of the property that remains unsold—I ask myself why should he be treated as having a less power for that purpose than if he were the owner in fee simple?; and I can see no answer to that, except that he should have all those powers just as he had the entire power of sale.

The question now is, whether there is anything in the Act of 1864 that prevents that primâ facie application of section 5 of the Settled Land Act, 1882, which the words certainly seem to force upon us. It appears to me that that question is already answered by the consideration that under the Act of 1864 itself, the incumbrancers may, if they choose, release any part of the property charged. By saying this I do not mean for a moment to assert that by releasing one portion of the property they can alone or in conjunction with the landowner make an additional charge in the nature of a rent-charge under the Act of 1864, with all its advantages and priorities over the other lands; but it appears to me that they do not lose that portion which is already charged; and it is for them to consider in any case whether they have not a sufficient security already on the parts which remain unsold, and whether, with the assistance of the tenant for life selling under the power of the Settled Land Act, they may not have that supplemented so as to make it a perfectly satisfactory security. Of course, if there is any doubt about that, the incumbrancers will take very good care not to consent. They cannot be obliged to consent. The Act never intended that they should be obliged; and if they do not consent, the only result will be that possibly there will be a sale of the land subject to the rent-charge or such portions as may be available, or the vendor will be driven to go and get the Board of Agriculture in a proper case to exercise the powers given to them by the section 68. If the owners of the rent-charge see their way to a sufficient security for themselves and consent to release the lands if sold, I can see no reason why they should not be allowed to do it. Section 30 of the Settled Land Act somewhat extends the powers of the Act of 1864, and, so far as my attention has been called to the matter, it in no way repeals any part of that Act. The very fact that the Legislature had in mind while passing the Act of 1882, the fact that there was a method of creating rent-charges upon land by limited owners by the intervention of the Board of Agriculture, rather leads me to the conclusion that when by section 5 they did not make any exception with regard to the Acts brought to their attention they did not mean, so far as any argument can be drawn from its absence, to make such exception.

Now, here we have the simple question, Have the owners of this rent-charge released the land proposed to be sold from the rent-charge? We have no question to consider as to the effect of that release. I think it is plain from the Act that, as regards persons beneficially entitled under the settlement, the tenant for life can give a charge on the properties which remain unsold. Whether it goes further or not is not a matter that has now to be determined. It would be difficult, perhaps, to establish whether it does go further, but that is a question for the consideration of the incumbrancers, and for their consideration alone. When we have the fact that they are prepared to execute a deed for the purpose of exonerating the property which is being sold, I say that that will effectually release the lands just as much as if it were done outside the court altogether on any occasion agreed upon between the owners of the land charged and the owners of the rent-charge. They can release, and by such agreement they do release.

With regard to Mr. Medd's point about contribution, to my mind that would be a very good point if the first one were established that there was no effectual release. But then it would not be wanted; if there is no effectual release, the land is charged, and that is enough. If there is an effectual release, there can be no right to contribution, because that right only exists between the owners of land subject to a common charge when each in equity is entitled to contribution. The Tithe Act, 1842, gave a summary remedy for contribution in the case of those persons who had paid the whole amount of a tithe rent-charge, or a greater proportion than their lands ought properly to bear—gave, in fact, the same remedy against the others as the tithe-owner himself would have had. But that would not enable any of them to get contribution from a person whose lands were not subject to the tithe rent-charge; nor need any action of that sort be apprehended here, if we are correct in holding that there is a release of the lands sold under this statutory provision.

I think that the objections on the part of the purchaser are fully met, and that a good title, so far as this matter is concerned, is made; and that being the only point that has or could be made, I think this appeal ought to be allowed, with costs.

Solicitors, Farrer & Co.; Valpy, Chaplin, & Peckham.

From Q. B. Div. (Lord Esher, M.R., and Lopes and Kay, L.JJ.) — Nov. 21, 22, 26, 27; Dec. 17.

GAS FLOAT WHITTON. (a.)

Admiralty — Salvage — County court — Jurisdiction — Subjects or objects of salvage — Ship — Gas float — Merchant Shipping Act, 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104), ss. 2, 458, 476—County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act, 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 71), s. 3.

The subjects or objects in respect of the saving of which, the High Court of Admiralty has jurisdiction by the common law are confined to a ship, her apparel, her cargo, including flotsam, jetsam, and lagan, or the wreck of them, and to freight in danger and saved by reason of the saving of the ship or cargo; and the subjects or objects of salvage are not enlarged by the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, or by any of the preceding statutes, or by the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act, 1868, with the sole exception that the saving of lives of persons in danger from being on board ship have been added to the list of such subjects or objects.

The plaintiffs claimed a salvage award in a county court having Admiralty jurisdiction for services rendered to a gas float adrift in the tidal waters of the Upper Humber. The structure was of iron, boat shaped, and contained gas, which supplied the light raised above it.

Held, that the gas float was not a "ship" or a "wreck" within the meaning of sections 2 and 458 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, and could not be the subject of salvage.

Appeal from the decision of the Divisional Court in Admiralty affirming the judgment of the judge of the Kingston-upon-Hull County Court.

The county court judge awarded damages for salvage services rendered in the River Humber by the respondents to a gas float, the property of the appellants, the Corporation of Trinity House, at Hull. The gas float was stationed near Brough, in the River Humber, for the purpose of a beacon. The nature of the float and the circumstances of the alleged salvage were ascertained by the county court judge, and were as follows: The float was of iron. The lower part bore the resemblance of a ship or boat. It had two ends, shaped like the bow of a vessel. It was about fifty feet long and twenty feet broad. It had no mast, stern post, fore post, or rudder. It could not be navigated. It always remained fixed by an anchor, or anchors, or otherwise, at a particular spot. It cost £600. Its interior was occupied by a gas cylinder, which supplied gas for the light night and day for about six weeks. The light was fixed on a structure of wood in the form of a pyramid fifty feet high. No one was ever stationed on the float, and it could not carry any man or goods from place to place, except that a man could ascend by means of a manhole to the light, in order to clean or arrange it. During a gale on the 22nd of December, 1894, the gas float got adrift and was driven ashore. The respondents, who were waterside men, fastened ropes to it, and kept it till the Trinity yacht arrived, when, with the respondents' assistance, it was got off.

The county court judge held that the gas float was a "ship," and, under the circumstances, a "wreck," within the meaning of sections 2 and 458 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, and that it was therefore the subject of salvage; and he gave judgment for the respondents, awarding them £15 in respect of their services.

The Divisional Court held that the gas float was not a "ship" or "wreck" within the meaning of sections 2 and 458; but that as such a structure, used in connection with navigation and exposed in the ordinary course of its use to the perils of the sea, would have been within the jurisdiction of the Admiralty if adrift upon the high seas, it was, by virtue of section 476 of the Merchant Shipping Act, also within the jurisdiction of the Admiralty when in the body of a county; which jurisdiction was extended to the county courts by section 3 of the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act, 1868. The judgment of the county court was therefore affirmed.

The arguments of counsel on both sides, together with the cases cited, appear sufficiently in the judgment of the court.

Sir W. Phillimore and F. Laing, for the appellants.

L. E. Pyke, Q.C., and Butler Aspinall (Arthur Pritchard with them), for the respondents.

Cur. adv. vult.

Lord ESHER, M.R., after stating the facts, proceeded:—The question in dispute was whether the county court had jurisdiction to hear and determine upon the claim of salvage reward. It was argued on behalf of the appellants before us that the gas float was not the subject matter of a salvage claim in the High Court of Admiralty within either its common law or any statutable jurisdiction; and that if it was not so, neither was it within the statutable jurisdiction of the county court. It was urged that the original—i.e., the common law—jurisdiction of the Court of Admiralty in respect of salvage was limited to claims in respect of alleged services to a ship and her apparel, or to the cargo of a ship, including cargo which had become flotsam, jetsam, or lagan, and to freight alleged to be saved by the saving of a ship or cargo, and to the wreck of ship or cargo; and that the alleged services were rendered on the high sea. It was true that the jurisdiction was extended by statute to the saving of life; but, it was urged, only to the saving of the life of a person whose life was in danger from his being or having been on board a ship and in danger on the high sea. Where in some cases the jurisdiction of the Admiralty Court was extended further than the limits of the high sea, yet it was so only in respect of the same objects or subjects as were within the jurisdiction of the Admiralty on the high sea. It was then argued that, upon the true construction of the statutes giving Admiralty jurisdiction to the county courts, they only conferred on those courts, in respect of salvage services occurring within counties, the same jurisdiction as to the same subjects and objects as were within the jurisdiction of the High Court of Admiralty where the services were rendered within its jurisdiction. It was then argued that the float in question was not in any sense a ship, was not a subject or object in respect of the saving of which the High Court of Admiralty could have exercised or could exercise salvage jurisdiction, and therefore was not a subject or object for the similar jurisdiction in the county court.

It was argued for the respondents that the High Court of Admiralty had jurisdiction in respect of salvage services claimed to have been rendered at sea far beyond services to ship, cargo, and apparel and freight; that such jurisdiction extended to the saving of any article in danger on the sea, or if not to all articles yet to all which could be brought under the denomination of maritime property; and that maritime property included every floating object which is constructed for the purposes of navigation, meaning thereby some reference to the business of navigation, although it itself was not intended ever to be and could never be navigated. It was urged that, even if such things were not the subjects or objects of salvage within the original jurisdiction of the Admiralty, they were rendered so by statute. And it was further argued that, though not now within the jurisdiction of the High Court of Admiralty either by common law or statute, they were by statutes within the jurisdiction of the county court.

(a.) Reported by C. G. WILBRAHAM, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The first point raised is, Whence is the original or common law jurisdiction of the High Court of Admiralty of England to be ascertained? The answer is from the continuous practice and the judgments of the High Courts at Westminster. This proposition was so stated in the case of the Gaetano and Maria, 30 W. R. 766, 7 P. D. 137: "Neither the laws of the Rhodians, nor of Oleron, nor of Wisby, nor of the Hanse Towns are of themselves any part of the Admiralty law of England." It was attempted by one of the counsel to say that the laws of Oleron were to be considered as part of the law of England. To anyone who reads some of their strange enactments it must be ridiculous to suggest that they are part of the English law. For instance, in the laws of Oleron, article 23, "if the pilot through ignorance causes the ship to miscarry, he shall make full satisfaction or lose his head"; article 24, "if the master or one of the marines or any one of the merchants cut off his head they shall not be bound to answer for it"; and article 26, "if the lord of any place be so barbarous as to maintain (wreckers, &c.), he shall be fastened to a post or stake in the midst of his own mansion-house, which being fired at the four corners thereof, all shall be burned together." But they contain many valuable principles and statements of marine practice which, together with principles found in the digest and in French and other ordinances, were used by the judges of the English Court of Admiralty when they were moulding and reducing to form the principles and practice of their court. All these sources of legal principles were used by Lord Tenterden in his great work. But he says in the last of his prefaces, in the preface to the fifth edition: "It should be observed, however, not only of all these treatises, but also of the civil law and the ordinances, without excepting even the ordinance of Oleron (which, being considered as the edict of an English prince, has been received with peculiar attention in the Court of Admiralty), that they have not the binding force or authority of law in this country, and that they are here quoted sometimes to illustrate principles generally admitted and received," &c.

It should be remarked that, as the law of the Admiralty is to be ascertained from the practice and judgments of its judges, it must be found or deduced from affirmative practice or judgments; neither principle nor proposition can be deduced from mere negative—i.e., by saying the point has never been treated in the Court of Admiralty. If you find that the Court of Admiralty has affirmatively stated that it has jurisdiction in certain cases, you cannot affirm that it has jurisdiction in other cases merely on the ground that the Court of Admiralty has not expressly excluded them by negative words; you must bring the proposed case within some affirmed principle or some affirmative judgment or practice.

The second point, therefore, is, What is the jurisdiction of the High Court of Admiralty as to salvage, ascertained from its practice and judgments and from statutes? As to its practice and judgments, irrespective of statutes, it seems to be one uniform, continuous statement by judges and writers of authority that the jurisdiction as to salvage is exercised in respect of a ship, her apparel, and her cargo, of freight in danger and saved by reason of the saving of the ship or cargo, and of flotsam, jetsam, or lagan, being each of them part of the cargo of a ship. Lord Tenterden thus expresses it: "It is the compensation that is to be made to persons by whose assistance a ship or its loading may be saved from impending peril, or recovered after actual loss. This compensation is known by the name of salvage." In Park on Insurance, ch. 8, on salvage: "Salvage is an allowance made for saving ship or goods, or both, from the dangers of the seas, fires, pirates, or enemies." In Kent's Commentaries, vol. 3, pp. 244-5, of salvage: "Salvage is the compensation allowed to persons by whose assistance a ship or its cargo has been saved in whole or in part from impending danger, or recovered from actual loss in cases of shipwreck, derelict, or recapture. The equitable doctrine comes from the Roman law, and it was adopted by the admiralty jurisdictions in the different countries of Europe." In Parsons, ch. 7, on salvage: "In admiralty, and generally in the law merchant, it means the compensation which is earned by persons who voluntarily assist in saving a ship or her cargo from peril." In Williams and Bruce's Admiralty, ch. 6, on salvage: "Salvage is the reward payable for services rendered in saving property lost at sea, or in saving any wreck, or in rescuing a ship or boat, or her cargo or apparel, or the lives of the persons belonging to her, from loss or danger." In Mr. Carver's book, which will be the Abbott on Shipping of the future, ch. 11, on salvage and wreck, s. 322: "By the common law one who saves, or helps in saving, a vessel, to which he is a stranger, from danger at sea, is entitled to a reward for his services." "So, also, with regard to cargo or other property belonging to a vessel at sea which is rescued from danger, whether while in a vessel or after having been thrown or washed out of her; those who rescue such property are entitled to reward and to a lien upon the property for the reward." "The reward thus payable to these salvors is called salvage."

There is no word used by any of these writers which mentions any subject or object of salvage under the common law jurisdiction as to salvage of the High Court of Admiralty other than the ship, her apparel, or cargo, or the wreck of them. If in Williams and Bruce more was meant by the phrase "property lost at sea," the statement is in the notes made to depend on the authority of American cases, which will be discussed hereafter.

In the last treatise on the subject of salvage—Kennedy on Salvage—the case is thus stated: "A salvage service, in the view of the Court of Admiralty, may be described sufficiently for practical purposes as a service which saves or helps to save maritime property—a vessel, its apparent cargo, or wreck—or lives of persons belonging to any vessel when in danger," &c. The learned author then quotes the American cases as to rafts of timber, but observes: "There does not appear, however, to be any reported case in which the English Admiralty Court has awarded salvage for the preservation of any but such maritime property as is included in the suggested description."

So far, therefore, as the text writers are to be considered, if the extended meaning of the subject matter of salvage in the High Court of Admiralty in its original or common law jurisdiction is that which is asserted on behalf of the plaintiffs in this case, all the writers but two have overlooked it; and of the two, one founds it solely on the American cases, and the other cites those cases but questions them.

If we go further and examine the sources of the English law, as for instance the laws of Oleron, of Wisby, and others, every article in them treats of ships, and what concerns them, and of nothing else. As for instance, article 63 of the laws of Oleron: "In all other things found by the seaside, which have formerly been in the possession of some or other, as wines, oil, and other merchandise, although they have been cast overboard, and left by the merchants," &c. And so in the most valuable and remarkable code known as the Ordinance of Louis XIV. of August, 1681, the whole of more than a hundred sections deals with ships and the affairs of ships only, and with the wreck of ships or effects called ship-wrecked effects: see section 45, "of wrecks and ships run aground." For these, see the Treatise on Sea Laws.

In the Black Book of the Admiralty there is not a passage which indicates anything but ships and the conduct of them. Laws of Wisby, Black Book of Admiralty, p. 405, ch. 13, of things found on the sea: "Should a man find goods driving on the sea, where he can see no land, should he bring these things to land he shall have half for his labour; if he could see the land, he shall have a third part. (1) Should a man find goods on the ground, where he has to use oars and hooks, he shall have the third part. (2) Should a man find a ship driving on the sea, and no people are in it, and he brings it to land, of that which results from it, whether from the ship or from the goods, he shall have half, and it shall remain outside the city's bounds. (3) Should a man find goods driving to land to which he can wade, he shall have of them the eighth penny; so likewise should a man find goods driven on to the shore, he shall have the eighth penny therefrom. If anyone denies that he has found such goods, and is afterwards convicted of it, that is theft." Reading the word "goods" here subject to the context of all the other clauses, it must, I think, mean goods which have been in a ship. The truth is that no merchant or legislator ever imagined goods at sea which had got there without having been in a ship.

Then turning to what is, after all, the chief source from which the jurisdiction of the Admiralty Court is to be ascertained—namely, the decisions of the English courts—we begin with Sir Henry Constable's case, 5 Co. Rep. 215, which defines what is "wreck of the sea," and that "flotsam" is when a ship is sunk or otherwise perished and the goods float on the sea; "jetsam" is when the ship is in danger of being sunk, and to lighten the ship the goods are cast into the sea and afterwards, notwithstanding, the ship perish; "lagan" is when the goods which are so cast into the sea, and afterwards the ship perishes, and such goods so cast are so heavy that they sink to the bottom, and the mariners, to the intent to have them again, tie to them a buoy or cork or such other thing that will not sink, so that they may find them again; and none of these goods which are called "flotsam," "jetsam," and "lagan" are called "wreck" so long as they remain in or upon the sea; and the Court of Admiralty shall have cognizance of them whilst they are in or on the sea.

In Hartford v. Jones, 1 Ld. Raym. 393, Lord Holt held in favour of a lien as against an action of trover, the lien being claimed for salvage servic s—i.e., being an Admiralty lien. But those services were alleged to be for saving the goods from a ship which took fire, and they hazarded their lives to save them. In Nicholson v. Chapman, 2 H. Bl. 254, an action of trover was brought in respect of a quantity of timber placed in a dock on the banks of the Thames, but the ropes accidentally getting loose, it floated and was carried by the tide. It was saved, and the defendant refused to deliver it until salvage was paid. Eyre, C.J., and the court held the saving of it was not such a salvage as the law recognized—i.e., in the Admiralty or common law courts. "The question is," said the Lord Chief Justice, "whether this transaction can be assimilated to salvage. The taking care of goods left by the tide upon the banks of a navigable river may, in a vulgar sense, be said to be salvage, but it has none of the qualities of salvage in respect of which the laws of all civilized nations, the laws of Oleron, and our own laws in particular, have provided that a recompense is due for the saving, and that our law has also provided that this recompense should be a lien upon the goods which have been saved." He then goes on to say that goods carried by sea are exposed to danger, and that the recompense is dictated by principles of public policy recognized in civilized and commercial countries. "Such are the grounds upon which salvage stands. They are recognized by Holt, C.J., in Hartford v. Jones. But see how very unlike this salvage—i.e., in Hartford v. Jones—is the case now under consideration." The difference thus alluded to evidently is that in the earlier case the goods were saved from a ship on the sea, in the later case the goods were never on the sea at all. In the case of Raft of Timber, 2 W. Rob. 251, Dr. Lushington refused to issue a monition, i.e., a summons, calling upon the owner of the raft to show cause why salvage should not be awarded. It is said that the question was only as to the locality in which the services were rendered. But Dr. Lushington also relied upon the nature of the object. "This," he said, "is neither a ship nor a sea-going vessel; it is simply a raft of timber."

There is no case in any English court in which the question of salvage reward has ever been entertained unless the subject of the salvage service was a ship, her apparel, or cargo or freight which is peculiar to ships, or wreck of a ship, or her cargo, or, by statute, the life of a person in danger because the person has been on board ship. It follows that no jurisdiction of the Admiralty in England can be carried, by reason of the practice or judgments of the Admiralty or any other court, beyond a claim for salvage in respect of the subjects and objects named. As to the alleged extension of the jurisdiction of the High Court of Admiralty by statute, the question is whether it has been extended by statute in cases of salvage claims to any subjects or objects which were not subjects or objects of salvage claims before the statutes.

The first statute really relied on was 3 & 4 Vict. c. 65, s. 6. It is an Act to extend the jurisdiction of the Court of Admiralty. It does extend the jurisdiction to subjects and objects in respect of which the court had no jurisdiction before. As to salvage there is only section 6 which is relied on. Section 6 is: "The High Court of Admiralty shall have jurisdiction to decide all claims and demands whatsoever in the nature of salvage for services rendered to any ship or sea-going vessel, whether such ship or vessel may have been within the body of a county or upon the high seas at the time when the services were rendered." This is to be construed according to the ordinary rules of construction. Having regard to the existing state of the law, it is impossible to say that the statute goes further than to extend the area of locality. It abolishes the distinction between the same services in respect of the same subjects or objects according as they were rendered within the body of a county or on the high seas, but does not alter the nature of salvage, which is a reward for services to ships, &c.

The statute 17 & 18 Vict. c. 78, s. 13, was relied on. The words are: "In all cases in which a party has a cause or right of action in the High Court of Admiralty of England against any ship or freight, goods, or other effects whatsoever, it shall be not necessary to the institution of a suit for such person to sue out a warrant for the arrest thereof, but it shall be competent to him to proceed by way of monition." The whole statute is as to the regulation in the Admiralty Court of the procedure of cases in the court. The statute is not applicable until the case is in the court. It does not affect the question of what case is or is not within the jurisdiction of the court—that is, what case is or is not capable of being brought into the court.

The statute 9 & 10 Vict. c. 99 was called to our attention, and was minutely dissected at immense length. It is repealed; but nevertheless it was said it could be used to show what were the subjects or objects of salvage. I think that after its repeal it cannot be used at all. But if it could, it does not seem upon a true construction to support the assertions for which it was cited. The section mainly relied on was section 40: "The High Court of Admiralty shall have jurisdiction to decide upon all claims and demands whatsoever in the nature of salvage performed, except in cases of goods hereinbefore directed to be sold as droits of Admiralty, whether in the case of ships or vessels, or of any goods or articles found either at sea or cast upon the shore, and whether such services shall have been performed upon the high seas or within the body of any county, anything in any Act contained to the contrary notwithstanding." But that section ascertains only the forum of trial. Section 19 enacts what can be saved so as to give a right to salvage, and the persons entitled to salvage reward for such saving: "Any person (except receivers under this Act) who shall act or be employed in any way whatsoever in the saving or preserving of any ship or vessel in distress or of any part of the cargo thereof, or the life of any person on board the same, or of any wreck of the sea, or of any goods, jetsam, flotsam, lagan, or derelict, or of any anchors, cables, tackle, stores, or materials which may have belonged to any ship or vessel, whether the said ship or vessel shall have been in distress or otherwise, &c., shall be paid a reasonable reward or compensation by way of salvage," &c. It seems that construing these two sections as parts of one statute, section 40 determines the forum in which the claims of persons, who claim to have performed the services to the subjects or objects named in section 19, are to be referred.

We are then brought to the main statute applicable to the case before us—the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104). It was passed to amend and consolidate the Acts relating to merchant shipping, not specifically to alter anything with regard to salvage. It does not in its title or preamble state an intention to alter the common law applicable to merchant shipping, but only the Acts relating to merchant shipping. The first section relied on is section 2, the interpretation section. Such a section in modern drafting of statutes does not itself affect the nature of anything spoken of or dealt with in the statute. It only avers that instead of repeating every one of several things dealt with in other sections, they are to be taken as repeated whenever the one word or phrase is used. Thus, whenever the word "ship" is used in any section of the Act, it is as if in that section the words were "a ship or any description of vessel used in navigation not propelled by oars." The statute deals with a variety of matters relating to merchant shipping, and with a great number of modes of dealing with such matters within and without different courts. One part of the statute deals with salvage. The sections relating to it are under the heading "Salvage in the United Kingdom." It deals, therefore, only with salvage on the high seas within the three miles limit, and with salvage within counties. Section 458 is: "When any 'ship'—i.e., 'when any ship or any description of vessel used in navigation not propelled by oars'—or boat is stranded or otherwise in distress on the shore of any sea or tidal water situate within the limits of the United Kingdom—i.e., of Great Britain and Ireland—and services are rendered (1) in assisting such ship—i.e., ship or any description of vessel used in navigation, &c.—or boat, (2) in saving the lives of the persons belonging to such ship—i.e., &c.—or boat, (3) in saving the cargo or apparel of such ship—i.e., &c.—or boat, and wherever wreck—i.e., wreck or jetsam, flotsam, lagan, and derelict found in or on the shores of the sea or any tidal water—is saved by any person other than a receiver within the United Kingdom, there shall be payable, &c.—a reasonable amount of salvage." Section 459: "Salvage in respect of the preservation of the life or lives of any person or persons belonging to any such ship—i.e., &c.—or boat as aforesaid," &c. The statute does not deal with salvage beyond the three miles limit.

It is obvious that within the limit it deals specifically with subjects or objects which, as has been stated at the commencement of this judgment, were the subjects and objects alone dealt with in the High Court of Admiralty before any statutes as regards salvage. This section does not add, either within or without the realm, to the subjects or objects of salvage. Section 476 is also under the heading "Salvage in the United Kingdom." It is: "Subject to the provisions of this Act, the High Court of Admiralty shall have jurisdiction to decide upon all claims whatever relating to salvage, whether the services in respect of which salvage is claimed were performed upon the high seas or within the body of any county," &c. In this section the subjects or objects of salvage are not mentioned. It deals with salvage. With what salvage? Obviously with that which is in law salvage—i.e., with the saving of objects and subjects which in law, i.e., the common law, the statute law, and the maritime law, are recognized as the subjects and objects of salvage reward. Section 497 is no larger. The statutes do not enlarge the subjects or objects, but by dealing only with the subjects and objects mentioned strongly corroborate the view hereinbefore expressed as to the original jurisdiction of the High Court of Admiralty. In Part 6, headed "Lighthouses" and "Management of Lighthouses," by the interpretation clause lighthouses, "in addition to the ordinary meaning of the word, shall include floating and other lights exhibited for the guidance of ships, and buoys and beacons shall include all other marks and signs of the sea." They are in this Act, all of them, distinguished from ships. The statutes have added one subject—i.e., life—as liable to salvage to be awarded by the High Court of Admiralty, but have added no others. The question argued, that a larger jurisdiction as to the subjects or objects of salvage is given to the county courts than to the High Court of Admiralty, is too preposterous to be worthy of further notice.

It was argued that the gas float was a ship within the ordinary meaning of the word ship, or within the meaning of what was said to be the definition of the word ship in some judgments of the court. It is said that the judgment of Lord Blackburn in Ex parte Ferguson, 19 W. R. 746, L. R. 6 Q. B. 290, is inconsistent with the view that "ship" is to be used only in its ordinary meaning amongst people conversant with shipping business. But the description given of that which in the case was called a "coble" made it clear that that coble was a vessel in its ordinary sense, though all cobles are not ships or vessels, but some are only boats.

The case of The Mac, 7 P. D. 126, 30 W. R. Dig. 106, was much relied on. It is the case of the hopper barge. I agree that expressions used by me were not happy. I think the first phraseology is enough. "The word includes anything floating on or upon the water built in a particular form and used for a particular purpose." But I think the subsequent phrase, "used for the purpose of navigation" was unhappy. It should have been "was being navigated." In the case of The Cleopatra, 47 L. J. Adm. 72, 27 W. R. Dig. 204, the thing saved was held to be sufficiently like a ship to be not unfairly treated as a ship. The case of The Caisson before Sir R. Phillimore, reported in the Maritime Register of the 12th of May, 1876, is relied on. It looks as if the judge of the Admiralty Court was asked by both sides to name the amount and the distribution of a fair reward. If so, he acted as an arbitrator. If he acted as a judge, the case is contrary to all others, and is wrong. It seems impossible to say that, within the ordinary English meaning among merchants or sailors or persons dealing with maritime affairs, this thing could be called a ship, a vessel, or a boat.

But now we have to deal with the argument that the general law maritime acknowledged in the High Court of Admiralty included and includes subjects or objects as the subjects or objects of salvage which are beyond ship material and cargo, including flotsam, jetsam, and lagan, and wreck of ship or cargo. It was argued that everything found floating on the water, although it itself could not possibly be a navigable thing, might be the subject or object of salvage. And it was said that there are American judgments which justify such a statement. If there are, I for one should hesitate before I differed from them. I have the greatest respect for American decisions. It is because of the reference to the American judgments that I have used immense labour in writing this judgment. I hope it will be some day considered in American courts. But, before examining the American judgments, I will refer to the statement of the law by Bowen, L.J., in Falke v. Scottish Imperial Insurance Co., 35 W. R. 143, 34 Ch. D. 248:—"The general principle is beyond all question, that work or labour done or money expended by one man to preserve or benefit the property of another do not, according to English law, create any lien upon the property saved or benefited, nor even, if standing alone, create any obligation to repay the expenditure. Liabilities are not to be forced upon people behind their backs, any more than you can confer a benefit upon a man against his will. There is an exception to this proposition in maritime law. With regard to salvage, the maritime law differs from the common law. That has been so from the time of the Roman law downwards. The maritime law, for the purposes of public policy and for the advantage of trade, imposes in these cases a liability upon the thing saved, a liability which is a special consequence arising out of the character of mercantile enterprises, the nature of sea perils, and the fact that the thing saved was under great stress and exceptional circumstances. No similar doctrine applies to things lost upon land, nor to anything except ships or goods in peril at sea."

The judgment of Martin, B., in Palmer v. Rouse, 6 W. R. 674, 3 H. & N. 509, seems to be to the same effect. "The case depends upon the construction of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854. That Act was passed with reference to shipping, and must therefore be taken to apply to matters connected with shipping. The Act gives a jurisdiction unknown at common law, and subjects the owners of goods to the payment of charges to which at common law they were not liable. It must therefore be construed strictly. Now, according to the well-known definition of flotsam, it refers to goods which, having been at sea in a ship, are separated from it by some peril."

The case principally relied on in the American Reports is that called A Raft of Spars, Abbott's Admiralty Reports, p. 291, in May, 1848. It was tried before Betts, J., in a district court having Admiralty jurisdiction. The raft, which consisted of sixteen spars, was observed to be adrift below the Narrows and floating out to sea. The libellant stopped the raft and towed it to the Staten Island shore. The owner instituted a replevin action in the Supreme Court of the State of New York. The alleged salvor instituted the salvage suit in the district court. The owner of the raft intervened in the Admiralty suit, and moved that the action there should be set aside, or that all proceedings in it should be stayed until the replevin suit in the State Court should be determined. It was on this motion that Betts gave judgment. "The single point that arises for decision upon the motion," says Betts, J., "is whether this court will, either as matter of right to the claimant or by comity towards the municipal courts, cause the prosecution of this suit to surcease until the action at law in the State Court is determined." It may be that the learned judge might have based his decision on the view that the Admiralty Court had no jurisdiction to entertain the question of salvage. But that point does not seem to have been argued at that stage; at all events, it is not noticed. The judgment seems to be that, assuming for the purposes of the motion before it that both courts had jurisdiction, there was no legal reason for postponing the hearing of the one suit to the hearing of the other. What might be decided in either court on the hearing was left to the future. The next case in order of date is Tome v. Four Cribs of Lumber, reported in several reports and in Taner's Dec. 533, in November, 1853. It was heard in the Circuit Court, on appeal from the District Court in Admiralty. Rafts or a raft of timber were being floated down the Susquehanna river. The rafts were anchored in the stream. By reason of a sudden rise in the river, accompanied by a high wind and heavy sea, the rafts went adrift and were carried down the river with the current. They were stopped by one Davis, who claimed salvage. The district court entertained and allowed salvage reward. In the Circuit Court the judgment was reversed by Taney, C.J., on the ground that the district court had no jurisdiction. The Chief Justice relied much on the case of Nicholson v. Chapman. He says: "These rafts anchored in the stream, although it be a public navigable river, are not the subject matter of Admiralty jurisdiction in cases where the right of property or possession is alone concerned. They are not vehicles intended for the navigation of the sea or the arms of the sea. They are not recognized as instruments of commerce or navigation by any Act of Congress. They are piles of lumber, and nothing more, fastened together and placed upon the water until suitable vehicles are ready to receive them and transport them to their destined port. And any assistance rendered to these rafts, even when in danger of being broken up or swept down the river, is not a salvage service in the sense in which the word is used in the courts of Admiralty. The district court, therefore, had not jurisdiction to issue the process,"

&c. This judgment seems to me to adopt the reason of the judgment in Nicholson v. Chapman contained in the words "the service had none of the qualities or character of the services for which the maritime law of all commercial nations allows salvage where the property is in danger of perishing from the perils of the sea." There are parts of the judgment of the Chief Justice which seem to show that he thought the raft in question was not in danger. But that is a point which would be an answer to the claim in the trial, and which would have to be tried by the court if it assumed or could assume jurisdiction. It is a not point of jurisdiction.

The case of Fifty Thousand Feet of Timber, 2 Lowell's Reports, p. 64, in 1871, in the district court, is with respect to two rafts of timber found floating in the harbour of Boston. Lowell, J., decreed a salvage reward. "A salvage service is performed when goods are saved from peril at sea or on other navigable waters, or cast upon the shores thereof." "There are two judgments that a raft of timber is an exception to the general rule: Nicholson v. Chapman, 2 H. Bl., and Tome v. Four Cribs of Lumber, Taney's Dec. 533." This seems to be hardly an accurate description. The cases did not state that there was an exception. They stated a rule, and decided that rafts of timber were not within it. The judgment, with deference, is more sarcastic than well considered. The learned judge asserts that Taney, C.J., was mistaken and Dr. Lushington wrong. He construes the English statute 9 & 10 Vict. c. 99, s. 40, with deference again I say, wrongly. He says that the only difficulty in the case before Dr. Lushington was as to locality, and he says "that it was so held by Betts, J., in a well-considered judgment." I cannot find in the judgment of Betts, J., any allusion to such a point. Lowell, J., says: "A suit for salvage is neither contract nor tort. It resembles the latter in being a proceeding for unliquidated damages and in depending on locality." Is that a correct description either of a salvage suit or even of the action to which the learned judge assimilates such suit? "If the services are rendered, it is of no consequence whether the goods are a ship or part of a ship, or were ever on board a ship. A great many of the cases are of mere derelict goods picked up at sea; and no one ever heard that it would be a defence to a proceeding for salvage that the goods had been washed out to sea from the shore by a gale or flood, or had been dropped from a balloon. I have had a case of the former kind, though, to be sure, the subject matter was an unmanned vessel. If it had been a barrel of oil, the principle would have been the same." I cannot accept this judgment as a careful discussion and decision on American law.

Bywater v. A Raft of Piles, 42 Federal Reporter, p. 917, in June, 1890, is decided on the authorities of Betts, J., and Lowell, J., and on an endeavour to distinguish the case before Taney, C.J.

Whilst writing this judgment, and, indeed, at a very late period of it, the counsel on both sides, with the loyalty always shown by counsel to the court, sent to me the case of Cope v. Vallette Dry Dock Co., 12 Davis's Reports, p. 625, decided in January, 1887, in the Supreme Court of the United States. It was an appeal from the Circuit Court of Louisiana, which had dismissed a libel for salvage brought in the district court on the ground that the district court sitting in Admiralty had no jurisdiction to entertain in the particular case a claim for salvage. The salvage claimed was in respect of saving from total loss a "dry-dock." It was a structure contrived for the purpose of taking ships out of the water in order to repair them, and for no other purpose. It consisted of a large oblong box with a flat bottom and perpendicular sides. In the year 1866 it had been put into position by being permanently moored by means of large chains to the banks of the Mississippi river, and was sparred off from the bank by means of spars to keep it afloat. When it was desired to dock a vessel the dry-dock was sunk by letting in water till the vessel to be docked could be floated into it. It was then raised by pumping water out, leaving the docked vessel in a position to be inspected and repaired. It was furnished with engines, but they could only be used for pumping, and the dry dock had no means of propulsion, either by wind, steam, or otherwise. It was not designed for navigation, and could not be practically used therefor. As a conclusion of law the Circuit Court found that the services of the libellants were not salvage services, and that neither that court nor the district court had jurisdiction of the case. The judgment of the Supreme Court contains the following passages:—"We have no hesitation in saying that the decree of the Circuit Court was right. A fixed structure such as this dry-dock, is not used for the purposes of navigation, is not a subject of salvage service any more than is a wharf or warehouse when projecting in or upon the water." "A ship or vessel used for navigation and commerce, though lying at a wharf and temporarily made fast thereto, as well as her furniture and cargo, are maritime subjects, and are capable of receiving salvage service." The judgment then cites the passage from Abbott, and cites other English authorities, and then says: "If we search through all the books from the Rules of Oleron to the present time we shall find that salvage is only spoken of in relation to ships and vessels and their cargoes, or those things which have been committed to or lost in the sea or its branches, or other public navigable waters, and have been found or rescued." The judgment then discusses the case of the hopper barge, and then, referring to the American cases, says: "There has been some conflict of decision with respect to claims for salvage services in rescuing goods lost at sea and found floating on the surface or cast upon the shore. When they have belonged to a ship or vessel as part of its furniture or cargo, they clearly come under the head of wreck, flotsam, jetsam, lagan, or derelict, and salvage may be claimed upon them. But when they have no connection with a ship or vessel some authorities are against the claim, and others are in favour of it." The only authority in America for the use of the large term insisted upon by the arguments before us is the case before Lowell, J. I think that case cannot be supported in America or acted on here. As to American law, I think the case in the Supreme Court is decisive.

I come, therefore, to the conclusion that, by the common law or original law of the High Court of Admiralty the only subjects in respect of saving of which salvage reward could be entertained in the Admiralty Court were ship, her apparel and cargo, including flotsam, jetsam, and lagan, and freight, and the wreck of these; that the only subject added by statute is life salvage, and that the county court has no right to exercise jurisdiction with regard to any other subject-matter than that which might be entertained by the High Court of Admiralty. Whether salvage could be granted for the saving of what is called a light-ship may be doubtful. I incline to think not. If it could, it is only because the light-ship would be held to be a ship. As to some instances which were proposed—viz., the Victory, in Portsmouth Harbour, I have no doubt that she is a ship. So was the Dreadnought, used for years as a hospital. So is a ship used as a coal hulk. But the thing in question in this case is not a ship in any sense. The appeal must be allowed.

LOPES and KAY, L.JJ., concurred.

Solicitors for the appellant, Rowcliffes, Rawle, & Co, for Wilson & Son, Hull.

Solicitors for the respondent, Pritchard & Sons, for J. & T. W. Hearfield & Lambert, Hull.

High Court of Justice.

Chan. Div.
North, J. } Nov. 29, 30.

HOLT & Co. v. SAUNDERS, GREEN, & Co. (a.)

Trade-mark—Action for infringement—Motion to expunge mark—"Trilby" in ordinary type—Patents, &c., Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 57), s. 64, sub-section 1 (a), (b), (d), (e).

Names of persons, whether real or fictitious, used as a trade-mark fall within sub-sections (a) and (b) of section 64 (1) of the Patents, &c., Act, and not within sub-section (e); hence a name not being a signature is not a good trade-mark unless printed, impressed, or woven in a particular and distinctive manner.

Motion by the defendants to rectify the Register of Trade-marks by striking off the word "Trilby," registered as a trade-mark in class 38 for aprons, gloves, &c., by the plaintiffs, who had commenced this action against the defendants for infringing the same. The trade-mark consisted of "Trilby" in ordinary type. The evidence went to show that the word had been taken from a well-known novel, and that it had also been used in connection with other goods by other manufacturers.

Vernon Smith, Q.C., and Kirby, for the defendants, in support of the motion.—"Trilby" is a word common to the trade: Burland v. Broxbourne Oil Co., 38 W. R. 89, 42 Ch. D. 274. Moreover it has reference to the character and quality of the goods, for in the novel "Trilby" wears an apron, and therefore it suggests an apron such as is described in the book: Harris' Trade-mark, 9 P. R. C. 492. According to that case, this mark could not have been registered under the Act of 1883; and Farbenfabriken, &c., Somatose case, 42 W. R. 488, [1894] 1 Ch. 645, shows that the Act of 1888 has not extended the scope of what may be registered. Names of persons, whether real or fictitious, can only be registered under sub-sections (a) and (b) of section 64, and not under sub-sections (d) or (e), and this mark does not fall within (b) because it is not a written signature, nor within (a) because it is not "printed, impressed, or woven in some particular and distinctive manner."

Swinfen Eady, Q.C., and Micklem, for the plaintiffs, against the motion.—There is no evidence that the mark has any reference to the character or quality of the goods; it is an invented word within the meaning of the Act; and as to the question of registration, proper names fall within sub-section (e), and Banks and James' Trade-mark (Shakespeare case), ante, p. 32, does not decide that they do not. The word "Lawford" was allowed a good mark for rackets in Slazenger v. Malings, W. N. (1885), p. 124.

NORTH, J., after stating that "Trilby" could not be considered an invented word at the date of registration, as there was nothing new about it in view of the publication of the name in the novel prior to the mark getting on the register, continued:—Sub-section (e) is more difficult, but I cannot see that "Trilby" has reference to the character or quality of aprons or a pair of gloves, and there is no evidence before me as to what one may learn as to their character or quality from the word by itself. But the reason why I think that it cannot be registered is that I do not think that sub-section (e) includes a name at all, and I look upon "Trilby" as a name. Sub-sections (a) and (b) deal with names. Now, sub-section (b) refers to the individual or firm applying for registration; but sub-section (a) says nothing about the individual or firm applying for registration. I take it, therefore, that the individual or firm there referred to is not confined to the individual or firm applying for registration.

Now, let us take the present case in its simplest form. I will assume that William James Holt, who made the affidavits, is the sole member of the firm. Now, if he came to ask to register for aprons the name "William James Holt," as I take it that the words "William James Holt" are not geographical nor descriptive of the goods, then, according to the argument before me, those words could be registered under sub-section (e). But then I find this difficulty—namely, that sub-section (a) requires that it must be the "name of an individual or firm printed, impressed, or woven in some particular and distinctive manner," and I take that to mean, that if "William James Holt" is used as a trade-mark it must be printed in some distinctive and particular manner; it would not do to have it in ordinary print. I think it impossible that William James Holt can have a trade-mark if his name is printed in a particular and distinctive manner, and also that he can have it under sub-section (e) if printed in the most ordinary style. I think, therefore, that the section must be read so as to make cases of names come under sub-section (a), and William James Holt could have registered his name under that sub-section alone. Then does it make any difference that the name sought to be registered is not the name of the person actually applying? Now, contrasting sub-sections (b) and (a), the words of the latter show that it is not confined to the case of the name of the firm or person applying, but that it may be the name of a person or firm not applying. Then is there anything to make it necessary that the name should be that of a living or dead individual, as opposed to the name of a fictitious individual? It seems to me that under sub-section (a), not only could William James Holt not register his own name, if in ordinary type only, but that he could not register the name of any other person if printed in ordinary type (In re Banks & James' Trade-mark). I take it that under sub-section (e) the applicant could not register the name "Shakespeare," "Sir Walter Scott," or "Du Maurier." Does it make any difference that the name sought to be used is not the name of a person, but the name of a fictitious character. I take it that if "Shakespeare" could not be registered as a name it would be equally impossible to register "Hamlet." Chitty, J.'s, decision in the Shakespeare case would be exactly in point had that case been decided under the Act of 1888; but the Somatose case shows that that Act has not extended the power of registration beyond that given by the earlier Act.

Motion allowed.

Solicitor for the defendant in the action, Le Voi.

Solicitors for the plaintiff in the action, Sharpe, Parker, & Co.

(a.) Reported by R. SILLEM, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Chan. Div.
Kekewich, J.

Nov. 28.

In re WHEELER AND DE ROCHOW'S TRUSTS. (a.)

Trustee—New trustee—Power to appoint new trustee—Person nominated for that purpose—Trustee Act, 1893 (56 & 57 Vict. c. 53), s. 10.

Where under a trust instrument a named person has power to appoint new trustees in certain events, on the happening of an event not specified in the instrument, but specified in the Trustee Act, 1893, the power of appointment is not exercisable by the named person.

Under the provisions of the settlement executed on the marriage of Mr. and Mrs. De Rochow it was provided that in case any trustee should "die, desire to be discharged from, or refuse, decline, or become incapable to act," the husband and wife, or the survivor of them, might appoint a new trustee in his place.

In March, 1895, one of the three trustees of the settlement was adjudicated a bankrupt, having previously absconded. By a deed, dated the 13th of July, 1895, Mr. De Rochow (the wife being dead) purported to exercise the power of appointment in the settlement, and by virtue of the provisions of the Trustee Act, 1893, to appoint one Sewell to be a trustee in place of the absconding trustee.

Cross summonses were then issued—one by Mr. De Rochow and Sewell, asking that under section 35 of the Trustee Act, 1893, the right to call for a transfer of and to transfer the trust funds, and to receive the dividends, might vest in the continuing trustees and the new trustee; and the other by beneficiaries asking for the appointment of a new trustee in place of the absconding trustee, and that the right to transfer or call for a transfer of the trust securities might be vested in the continuing trustees, and the new trustee to be so appointed.

Bramwell Davis, Q.C., and F. H. Maugham, for the applicants on the first summons.—The husband is enabled to appoint under section 10 of the Trustee Act, 1893, as the person nominated for the purpose by the settlement: In re Walker, Hughes' Contract, 24 Ch. D. 698; In re Coates to Parsons, 35 W. R. 375, 34 Ch. D. 370.

Warmington, Q.C., and G. Borthwick, for the beneficiaries.—The terms of the settlement do not provide for the case of bankruptcy. The court should appoint: Cecil v. Langdon, 33 W. R. 1, 28 Ch. D. 1.

Bramwell Davis, Q.C., replied.

KEKEWICH, J.—The power for the appointment of new trustees which is found in the 10th section of the Trustee Act, 1893, is of a remedial nature, devised to avoid difficulties and enable them to be overcome without having recourse to the court, and enabling trustees to be appointed by deed in cases where it was not formerly possible to do so. It was the intention of the Legislature to enlarge the powers conferred by a settlor or testator; not to oust the provisions of the instrument, but to extend them. We find in section 10 the words "the person or persons nominated for the purpose of appointing new trustees by the instrument, if any, creating the trust." What does that mean? In the first place, simply the persons named, in whom the power of appointing new trustees generally is vested, without the events in which the power was to arise being mentioned. Does the Legislature not intend that where the power is vested in persons in certain events which are expressed in the instrument they are to be empowered under the Act to appoint new trustees in events not contemplated by the instrument? Before adopting that construction it is to be observed that everything is made subject to the provisions of the instrument itself. On that construction there are many cases to which it would be difficult to apply the provisions of section 10. In my opinion, only the persons nominated in the particular events and for the particular property are the persons who are to have the power of appointing new trustees under section 10 of the Trustee Act, 1893. A testator or settlor might well consider that a person who was competent to appoint new trustees in some events was not competent to do so in others.

I think therefore that, as in this case the settlement does not confer the power of appointing new trustees in the event of the bankruptcy of a trustee, the powers conferred by the instrument are inapplicable. The powers given by the Legislature must be exercised by the persons appointed by the Legislature, and not by the persons nominated by the instrument. The result is that there will be no order on the first summons, and on the second there must be an order appointing a new trustee with a vesting order.

Solicitors, Dixon, Weld, & Dixon; Blunt & Co.

(a.) Reported by F. T. DUKA, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Chan. Div.
Kekewich, J.

Nov. 9.

In re SMITH.
SMITH v. THOMPSON. (a.)

Trustee—Investment—Discretion—Commission or bonus paid to trustee—Liability to make good loss.

A testator gave the residue of his estate to trustees to invest in or upon such stocks, funds, and securities as they "shall think fit." The trustees invested £3,000, part of the trust estate, upon debentures at par of the New Travellers' Club, one of the trustees receiving, without the knowledge of his co-trustee, a bonus or commission of £300 on the transaction. The co-trustee assented to the investment, thinking it would benefit the trust estate. As a matter of fact the debentures were not, and never had been, of par value, and at the time the action was brought were of little or no market value.

Held, (1) that "as they shall think fit" meant "as they shall honestly think fit"; (2) that the commission or bonus of £300 received by one of the trustees was a bribe, and therefore that that trustee did not "honestly think fit," and that consequently he was liable to make good the loss occasioned to the trust estate by the investment of the £3,000; (3) that the co-trustee (on the facts) acted bonâ fide, and therefore did "honestly" think fit, and that consequently his estate was not liable to make good the loss; (4) that the £300 commission was received by the trustee as agent of the trust estate, and consequently must be paid by him thereto.

Thomas Smith, by his will, dated the 10th of October, 1890 (as subsequently altered by a codicil), appointed Arthur Carpenter and the testator's son Clement Smith executors and trustees thereof, and thereby bequeathed the residue of his estate to the said trustees upon trust in their absolute discretion to invest the same "in or upon such stocks, funds, and securities as they . . . shall think fit."

The testator died on the 21st of January, 1892, and his will and codicil thereto were proved on the 19th of February, 1892.

(a.) Reported by C. C. HENSLEY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The trustees the defendant Arthur Carpenter and the said Clement Smith, invested the residue, which amounted to upwards of £17,000, in various mortgage securities, in colonial securities, and in debentures (hereinafter referred to) for £3,000 in a company called "The New Travellers' Club, Limited."

Carpenter was persuaded to apply, on behalf of the trustees, for £3,000 of such debentures at par by the promise that the company should pay him £300 as a bonus or commission for procuring such application by the trustees, which sum the company duly paid to Carpenter. The interest on the debentures was 5 per cent. per annum, and Carpenter suggested to Clement Smith that certain of the trust funds invested at 3½ per cent. should be sold, and that the proceeds, amounting to £3,000, should be invested in the said debentures. Clement Smith thereupon, on the 1st of May, 1893, wrote stating that one of the testator's businesses required help, and asked Carpenter to take up club stock for £3,000 at 5 per cent. interest for the benefit of the business, stating that he as one of the executors of the estate advised this. The transaction was completed in May, 1893, but Clement Smith did not discover that Carpenter had received £300 bonus until the month of July, 1894.

Clement Smith died on the 18th of October, 1894, and by his will appointed the defendant Carpenter and the defendant Catherine Jackson executors.

On the 1st of April, 1895, the defendant Bernard Thompson was appointed a new trustee of the will of Thomas Smith, in the place of Clement Smith deceased.

The said debentures were not and never had been of par value, and could have been bought for much less, and were now of little or no market value.

This was an action by the beneficiaries of the residuary estate of Thomas Smith, seeking to make Carpenter the surviving trustee, and the estate of Clement Smith the deceased trustee, jointly and severally liable for loss incurred by the trust estate owing to the above investment; and the plaintiffs asked (1) to have the real and personal estate of the testator Thomas Smith administered, and the testator's will carried into execution; (2) that the said colonial securities and the debentures might be realized; (3) that the defendant Carpenter and the estate of Clement Smith might be jointly and severally held liable for any loss which might accrue to the testator's estate by reason of the said investments in the said colonial securities and debentures, with interest at 4 per cent.; (4) that the defendant Carpenter might be ordered to pay the said sum of £300, with interest at 4 per cent.; (5) that if and so far as might be necessary the estate of Clement Smith might be administered.

Renshaw, Q.C., and W. Freeman, for plaintiffs.—The trustees were, under these very wide words, not justified in investing in these floating debentures: Lewis v. Nobbs, 26 W. R. 631, 8 Ch. D. 591; In re Brown, 33 W. R. 692, 29 Ch. D. 889. A trustee ought not to invest in bonds to bearer, nor to invest in mortgages without having a valuation previously made.

George Henderson, for the defendant Carpenter.

Marten, Q.C., and Dundas Gardiner, for the defendant Catherine Jackson. — Clement Smith knew nothing of the bonus received by his co-trustee, and acted bonâ fide, and, as he thought, for the benefit of the trust estate, throughout. That being so, he acted in accordance with the discretion given him by the will. The discretionary power is very wide.

KEKEWICH, J.—I think there is sufficient material before me to enable me to dispose of this case at once. It all turns on the meaning of the clause in the will: "And as to the rest, residue . . . to invest . . . in such stocks, funds, and securities as they shall think fit."

Two cases have been cited, Lewis v. Nobbs, before Hall, V.C., and In re Brown, before Pearson, J., where the judges gave a very wide interpretation to the words giving discretionary power to the trustees, and in my view rightly, because if a narrow interpretation were placed on such words they might as well be struck out altogether. Mr. Renshaw says that the trustees in this case could not invest on a mortgage without having a valuation. I should say that they were clearly authorized to do so if they thought fit. The question is, What is the meaning of "shall think fit"? I think it means "shall honestly think fit." A trustee could not honestly think a bad security fit, and in investing in such a security it could not be said that he had invested "as he thought fit." There are many authorities in which, where a trustee says, "I exercised my discretion in a particular way," the answer is, "No, you did not"—that is, "not with a due regard to your fiduciary position." As to the investments in colonial stocks and upon mortgages, I cannot say that the trustees did not "honestly think fit" so to invest; and, as to these debentures, I do not suppose that a very prudent man would invest in such debentures as a floating security of any limited company, whatever an ordinary man might do; but many people invest in securities of this kind, and have only a hazy idea of what "a floating security" means. Many think it is a good security; and why should not the trustee in this case "honestly think fit"? Mr. Renshaw says he cannot, because the debentures were securities to bearer, but that objection is not conclusive. The securities are locked in a box which requires two keys to open it. It would not be difficult to find in many modern settlements power to invest in bearer debentures.

The question is, Is Carpenter liable on other grounds; and, if so, is Smith liable because he concurred? The history of the matter is this. Smith was anxious to invest in order to increase the income, but the debentures were introduced by Carpenter. Smith trusted to Carpenter, and I do not see how I can say that he did not honestly think the investment fit; but Carpenter is liable, because he did not "honestly think fit." Carpenter is therefore liable for any loss, and must make it good; and Smith's estate must be exonerated. Carpenter must also account to the trust estate for the £300. He received it on behalf of that estate; I do not see that that is affected by his making good the money (i.e., loss arising from investment) the year after. He took it as agent of the trust estate.

Solicitors, Webster & Webster; Hunters & Haynes; O. E. Dawson.

Q. B. Div.
(Hawkins and Lawrance, JJ.) Jan. 13.

REG. v. EVANS AND OTHERS, JUSTICES, AND PARRY. (a.)

Bastardy—Affiliation summons—Putative father leaves England before birth of child—Ceases "to reside in England within twelve months next after the birth"—Bastardy Act, 1872 (35 & 36 Vict. c. 65), s. 3.

(a.) Reported by E. G. STILLWELL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Where the alleged father of a bastard child born on the 30th of January, 1894, left England in December, 1893, and did not return until March, 1895,

Held, that he "ceased to reside in England within twelve months next after the birth of such child" within the meaning of section 3 of the Bastardy Act, 1872, so that the mother could take out an affiliation summons at any time within the twelve months next after his return to England.

In this case a rule nisi had been obtained for a mandamus to the justices of the petty sessional division of the county of Anglesey to hear and determine an affiliation summons.

The facts of the case are as follows.

On the 30th of January, 1894, the complainant, Margaret H., gave birth to an illegitimate child, of which she alleged W. Parry, a second mate on foreign-going vessels, was the father.

The said W. Parry left England in December, 1893, prior to the birth of the child, and did not return until March, 1895.

On the 1st of March, 1894, the mother laid an information in bastardy before the justices against Parry as the putative father of her child, and a summons was thereupon issued against him. Owing to the absence of Parry this summons was not served upon him until March, 1895, when he returned to Falmouth.

The summons was then made returnable on the 1st of April, 1895, upon which date an adjournment was made to the 5th of May, when the summons was heard.

The defendant appeared and gave evidence, and the summons was dismissed, on the ground that the corroborative evidence was insufficient. The claimant then on the following day, having obtained further evidence in support of her application, obtained a second summons against the said W. Parry, which was made returnable in the same petty sessional division on the 20th of May, 1895.

On this summons coming on for hearing it was objected on behalf of the defendant that the justices had no jurisdiction to hear the application, on the ground that the same was not made within twelve months from the birth of the said child, and that the defendant had not ceased to reside in England within the twelve months next after the birth of such child; and the defendant himself deposed that he had left England on a voyage on the 29th of December, 1893, and that he remained away until the 22nd of March, 1895.

After hearing the evidence of the defendant, the justices allowed the objection, and decided that they had no jurisdiction to hear and determine the said application, and declined to do so.

From this decision the complainant now appealed.

Section 3 of the Bastardy Act, 1872, provides that any single woman who may be delivered of a bastard child "may either, before the birth or at any time within twelve months from the birth of such child . . . or at any time within the twelve months next after the return to England of the man alleged to be the father of such child, upon proof that he ceased to reside in England within the twelve months next after the birth of such child," apply for a bastardy summons.

E. Honoratus Lloyd, for the defendant, showed cause against the rule. The justices had no jurisdiction to hear the second summons. The complainant failed upon the first summons, which was taken out in proper time; and she cannot now succeed on a second summons, for the time has gone by. She must, according to section 3, take out the summons within twelve months from the birth of the child, except where the alleged father has ceased to reside in England within twelve months next after the birth of the child. In this case the defendant ceased to reside in England in December, 1893, and the child was not born until the 30th of January, 1894; therefore he did not cease to reside within the twelve months next after the birth within the meaning of section 3. [HAWKINS, J.—Did not the defendant cease to reside during the whole of the twelve months next after the birth of the child?] He could not continue to "cease to reside." A man ceases to live when he dies, but it cannot be said that he continues ceasing to live. [HAWKINS, J.—Ceasing to reside in England is, like desertion, a continuing act, and a man who leaves England ceases to reside there all the time he is absent.] The section refers to the time when he began to cease to reside, that is to the actual moment when he left England. If it had been intended to include the whole period of his absence, the section would have been made to read "ceased or had ceased to reside." The rule should be dismissed.

W. Mackenzie, in support of the rule, was not called upon.

HAWKINS, J.—I am of opinion that the point taken by counsel is absolutely untenable, and that the rule must be made absolute.

LAWRANCE, J.—I am of the same opinion.

Rule absolute for a mandamus.

Solicitors, W. Thornton Jones, Bangor; Peacock & Goddard, for S. R. Dew, Bangor.

IN BANKRUPTCY.

Q. B. Div.
(Vaughan Williams and Kennedy, JJ.) Dec. 19.

In re DURNFORD.
Ex parte DURNFORD. (a.)

Bankruptcy—Discharge subject to conditions—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 28 (2)—Bankruptcy Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 71), s. 8 (2).

Where an order of discharge has been granted subject to onerous conditions, and it appears that the creditors will benefit but slightly by the continuance of such conditions, while the bankrupt will be thereby unduly oppressed, the court will venture to disregard the interest of the creditors and grant the bankrupt an unconditional discharge.

Appeal by the bankrupt from two orders of his honour Judge Cadman, in the county court of Halifax.

The appellant was adjudicated bankrupt in 1885, being then a solicitor in practice in Halifax, with liabilities amounting to over £1,800. He obtained his discharge in the same year, subject to the following conditions: that he should produce his accounts every year to the official receiver, and that he should pay over to the official receiver any earnings and income over £200 a year until all his creditors should have been paid in full.

The bankrupt, finding that he was unable to get a practice together in Halifax, took a clerkship in Tenby, where he remained until 1888, at a salary rising from £130 to £160 a year.

From 1888 to 1893 he held a clerkship at Tunstall at £200 a year.

(a.) Reported by P. M. FRANCKE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

In 1893 he obtained a clerkship in London, and his salary in 1895 was raised to £330 a year.

When he presented his accounts for 1895 the official receiver, after allowing for the increased expense of living in London, fixed £17 as the amount to be paid over by the bankrupt for the benefit of his creditors, and took out a summons in the county court to enforce payment of this sum.

The bankrupt made a cross application that the conditions of his discharge might be varied.

The judge ordered the bankrupt to pay £17 to the official receiver, and refused to vary the order of discharge because it had not been made by himself, but by his predecessor Judge Snagge.

The bankrupt appealed.

Muir Mackenzie, for the appellant.—Since the date when this order of discharge was made the court has frequently laid down that these orders ought not to be made when the bankrupt is dependent upon a salary, but only where he has prospects of money coming to him from other sources. [He was stopped by the court.]

Sutton, for the official receiver.—My view is that the original order was oppressive, and I am merely here to see that the facts are properly put before the court, and do not wish to urge anything unfair to the bankrupt.

Cancellor, for a creditor.—The object of the order of discharge in this case was to benefit the creditors, not to punish the debtor; and it is hard upon the creditors who have had to wait for so long that as soon as the bankrupt begins to earn more than £200 a year he should seek to vary the order of discharge and escape from having to pay his creditors anything: In re Bullen, Ex parte Arnaud, 36 W. R. 836, 5 Morr. 243; In re Tobias & Co., Ex parte Tobias, 39 W. R. 399, [1891] 1 Q. B. 463. [VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J.—You may get the man dismissed from his situation if you cut him down to starvation wages.] I would suggest that the order be that he pay £50 a year for five years for the benefit of his creditors.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J.—Ten years have now passed since this order was made, and, as it appears to me that if it is continued in force the amount that the creditors will receive will be small in proportion to their debts, I think that we may consider the interests of the State in preference to the interest of the creditors. With regard to the sum of £17 ordered to be paid by the county court judge in respect of the surplus of past years, I dismiss the appeal, and leave that order unaltered, save that the bankrupt is to have three months within which to pay that sum.

With regard to the application to vary the order of discharge, I would say this. Here is a case in which the bankrupt was given his discharge ten years ago subject to these conditions. Since then his efforts to earn a livelihood and regain his position have been most creditable. No one can read the dates in his story as set forth in the affidavits without sympathy for his gallant and successful efforts. Unfortunately he has never been able to earn any substantial surplus over the limit allowed by the order of discharge.

We think that it is not to the interest of the State that the burden of this order should weigh upon the appellant longer than is essential for justice. There is no reason why a penal order should continue against the bankrupt; but the court must consider the interest of creditors, and has no right to act against their interest and take away their dividends. We do not, however, think in this case that if we were to continue this order against the bankrupt the money the creditors would receive would be anything substantial in proportion to the amount of their debts; and for that reason we do not think that the pecuniary interest of the creditors in this case ought to prevent our making an order in the interest of the State and the public, such as the debtor has fairly earned by his own conduct.

We therefore grant him his discharge free from any conditions whatever; but he must pay the £17 within three months. The costs of this application must come out of the £20 deposited in court. The official receiver may take his costs in full out of that sum, and the creditor who has appeared may have what is left.

KENNEDY, J., concurred.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitors, Lewis & Lewis; Easton & Cargill; The Solicitor to the Board of Trade.

Court of Appeal.

From Chan. Div. (Lindley, A. L. Smith, and Rigby, L.JJ.) — Dec. 18.

EYRE v. WYNN-MACKENZIE. (a.)

Practice—Appeal—Leave to appeal after time expired—Alteration of law since judgment—Solicitor-mortgagee—Mortgagees' Legal Costs Act, 1895 (58 & 59 Vict. c. 25), s. 3.

A solicitor-mortgagee who, before the passing of the Mortgagees' Legal Costs Act, 1895, was held not entitled to charge profit costs against his mortgagor cannot get an extension of time for appealing from such order on the ground that such Act is retrospective, for the Act was not intended to affect orders which were made before the passing of the Act.

Motion by the plaintiff, a solicitor, for leave to appeal from an order of Kekewich, J., notwithstanding that the time limited for appealing by the Rules of the Supreme Court had expired.

Kekewich, J., had held (42 W. R. 220, [1894] 1 Ch. 218) that a covenant in a mortgage of a life estate to the solicitor of the mortgagor for payment not only of the specific sum advanced, with interest, but also of "every other sum of money which may hereafter be advanced or paid by the mortgagee to, or on account of, or become owing to, the mortgagee by the mortgagor," did not include profit costs, and charges of the mortgagee, either as solicitor to the mortgagor or his agent for receiving and distributing the income; such a covenant being, as regarded profit costs, and charges, void as clogging the equity of redemption.

Judgment in the action was delivered on the 28th of November, 1893, and the order was passed and entered in April, 1894, though it had never been acted upon by any of the parties.

The plaintiff did not appeal from such order within the time limited by the Rules of the Supreme Court.

On the 6th of July, 1895, the Mortgagees' Legal Costs Act, 1895, was passed.

Section 3 of that Act provides as follows:—

"(1) Any solicitor to or in whom, either alone or jointly with any other person, any mortgage is made, or is vested by transfer or transmission, or the firm of which such solicitor is a member, shall be entitled to receive and recover from the person on whose behalf the same is done, or to charge against the security, for all business transacted and acts done by such solicitor or firm subsequent and in relation to such mortgage, or to the security thereby created or the property therein comprised, all such usual professional charges and remuneration as he or they would have been entitled to receive if such mortgage had been made to and had remained vested in a person not a solicitor, and such person had retained and employed such solicitor or firm to transact such business and do such acts, and accordingly no such mortgage shall be redeemed, except upon payment of such charges and remuneration.

(a.) Reported by W. SHALLCROSS GODDARD, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

"(2) This section applies to mortgages made, and business transacted, and acts done, either before or after the commencement of this Act."

De Castro, for the plaintiff.—The new Act is retrospective; and, as no proceedings have been taken under the order as drawn up, it is only fair, and no hardship on the defendants, that the plaintiff should have the benefit of the altered state of the law.

C. Gurdon, for the defendants, was not called upon.

LINDLEY, L.J.—It is obvious that this Act was not intended to interfere with judgments which had already been given by the court. If we gave leave to appeal in this case, we should be reopening all judgments of a similar kind which had been given prior to the passing of the Act. We cannot do that.

A. L. SMITH and RIGBY, L.JJ., concurred.

Application refused.

Solicitors for the plaintiff, G. L. P. Eyre & Co.

Solicitor for the defendants, A. H. Burns.

From Chan. Div. (Lord Herschell; and A. L. Smith and Rigby, L.JJ.) Nov. 18, 19.

HARPER & Co. (LIMITED) v. WRIGHT AND BUTLER LAMP MANUFACTURING Co. (LIMITED). (a.)

Patent—Design—Infringement—Similarity in essential features—Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 57), ss. 51, 52, 58, 60—Designs Rules, 1890, r. 9.

The plaintiffs were the registered proprietors of two designs for upright hexagonal oil-stoves. The first design consisted of a church window, with tracery above and below it. The second design was a modification of the first, and showed an extended base. The defendants sold upright hexagonal oil-stoves similar to those of the plaintiffs, though the church window was of a different style of architecture and the tracery above and below was different.

Held, that, though there were differences in detail, the plaintiffs' and defendants' stoves were alike in their essential features, and that the defendants' stove was an "obvious imitation" of the plaintiffs' within the meaning of section 58 of the Patents, &c., Act, 1883.

The insertion in an application for registration of the words "pattern, shape, configuration, and ornamentation" does not prevent the registration from being a registration of the design as a whole.

There is nothing in the Act which deprives a person who has registered a design, of his right to protection if he mistakenly puts on articles that he sells registered numbers which ought not to be there.

(a.) Reported by ARNOLD GLOVER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Appeal from Kekewich, J.

This was an action for the infringement of two designs of which the plaintiffs were the registered proprietors.

The first design was for upright hexagonal stoves, and consisted of a church window with tracery above and below it; the second design being a modification of the first, and shewing an extended base.

The defendants sold hexagonal oil-stoves, to which they applied a design similar to that of the plaintiffs, though the church window was of a different style of architecture, and the tracery above and below it was different.

The defendants, by their defence, alleged that the plaintiffs not only sold stove frames made according to the drawing deposited on the registration of the first design and marked with the registered number; but also sold stove frames differing in some particulars from the said drawing and marked, on such parts of the same stove frames as agreed with the said drawing, with the number aforesaid, and on other parts thereof with certain other numbers, which were numbers of alleged designs registered in the names of the plaintiffs.

They alleged that such marking was calculated to mislead the public, and was not in accordance with the provisions of the Patents, &c., Act, 1883.

Kekewich, J., before whom the action came on for trial on the 2nd of July, 1895, held that only the actual design was protected by the registration, and that, as the defendants' design was essentially different from those of the plaintiffs', the action failed.

The plaintiffs appealed.

Bousfield, Q.C., Warrington, Q.C., J. H. Fisher, and E. T. Slater, for the appellants.—The defendants' design is an "obvious imitation" of the plaintiffs' within the meaning of section 58 of the Patents, &c., Act, 1883: Hecla Foundry Co. v. Walker, Hunter, & Co., 14 App. Cas. 550, 38 W. R. Dig. 65. It is also a fraudulent imitation, for it is shown that the defendants' designer had the plaintiffs' design before him.

They also referred to Grafton v. Watson, 50 L. T. N. S. 420, Ibid. 141, 32 W. R. Dig. 65.

Marten, Q.C., Moulton, Q.C., and W. N. Lawson, for the respondents.—The differences between the plaintiffs' and defendants' designs are very conspicuous, and there has been no infringement. The plaintiffs by their application have claimed "shape" and "configuration" independently of "pattern," and the registration is therefore invalid: Patents, &c., Act, 1883, s. 60; Designs Rules, 1890, r. 9. The marking of their stoves by the plaintiffs is contrary to sections 51 and 52 of the Patents, &c., Act, 1883, and leads the public to suppose that that is registered which is not registered. As to the second registration, the design is so like the first that the registration must be invalid except in respect of details, and those details the defendants have not infringed.

They referred to Clark v. Adie, 2 App. Cas. 315, 25 W. R. Dig. 174.

Bousfield, Q.C., replied upon the last point.

Lord HERSCHELL.—In this case the plaintiffs bring an action against the defendants alleging that they have infringed two designs which they, the plaintiffs, registered. I will deal with the two designs separately. The first design was registered in April, 1891. The registration was accompanied by a photograph showing a stove such as the plaintiffs have since sold, and which they allege the defendants have copied. I leave till a later stage the questions raised with regard to the form of the registration, beyond saying this, that whatever else is covered by that registration it appears to me that the design is covered, that is to say, the design as a whole as shown by that photograph.

The defendants, in the season subsequent to the plaintiffs bringing this stove before the public, brought out a stove of which the plaintiffs complain as an infringement of that first registered design. At the trial the learned judge, at the close of the plaintiffs' case, came to the conclusion that there was no infringement, and gave judgment for the defendants. The defendants' case, therefore, was not gone into. But, inasmuch as it seemed to the interest of all parties expedient, if we thought that there was an infringement shown by the plaintiffs' case, that the whole case should be disposed of here, we permitted the defendants' counsel to state all the facts which they could have proved if the defendants' case had been heard by the learned judge in the court below. And those facts being admitted by the counsel for the plaintiffs, we have now the whole case before us, and therefore we are able to deal with it without sending it down for a new trial. The learned judge thought that the plaintiffs had not proved an infringement by the defendants of their design. Now, how is a question of that sort to be tested? That point was dealt with in the House of Lords in the case of The Hecla Foundry Co. v. Walker Hunter & Co. I will read a passage from the opinion which I expressed to the House of Lords in that case. "It seems to me, therefore, that the eye must be the judge in such a case as this, and that the question must be determined by placing the designs side by side, and asking whether they are the same or whether the one is an obvious imitation of the other. I ought, perhaps, to qualify this by saying that, as the design to be registered must by section 47 be a 'new or original design, not previously published in the United Kingdom,' one may be entitled to take into account the state of knowledge at the time of registration and in what respects the design was new or original, when considering whether any variations from the registered design which appear in the alleged infringement are substantial, or immaterial." Now, here the two designs have been placed side by side. The eye has been left to judge. The impression produced upon all the members of the court has been this, that the one design is an "obvious imitation" of the other, that in all their essential features they are alike, and that in those essential features they both of them differ from anything that had been previously known. No better proof than that that the one design is an obvious imitation of the other, it seems to me, it would be possible to give.

On what ground do the defendants say that the one is not an obvious imitation of the other? They point to the different details, the different parts of the design, and they show in each part of the design differences of detail. They undoubtedly show that; but to my mind that has no bearing upon the question whether the one is or is not an obvious imitation of the other. You may produce precisely the same design in all its essential features, though you make differences in all, or almost all, its details. Now, what are the essential features of the design? It is always difficult to give reasons in a case of this sort, beyond saying, "I look at the two, and the one seems to me an obvious imitation of the other." But I will endeavour, so far as I can, to do so. The general features of the plaintiffs' design are these. Supported upon feet, above which is a base sloping upwards, there is a stove, hexagonal in form, with open iron tracery to a height of about a fourth, or something less than a fourth, of the total height of the stove. Above that there is a Gothic window, and above that again tracery corresponding to that which is below the window. Then there is a projecting cornice, with the six sides of the cover sloping upwards to an apex surmounted by a knob, with a brass ball at the top. That would, perhaps, be a tolerably adequate description, I should say, of the design of the plaintiffs' stove. Now, the whole description that I have given would be equally applicable to the defendants' stove, and it would be inapplicable to any form of stove previously known. That seems to me to go a long way to show that the one is an obvious imitation of the other. If anyone, having seen the plaintiffs' stove, had described its general features to a tradesman, and had asked to be supplied with such a stove, the tradesman, if in possession of one of the defendants' stoves, would have supplied that stove, and it would have been recognized as answering the description of the stove ordered. Yet when you come to look at the kind of ornamentation, and even to a certain extent in some respects to the form also, you can point to notable differences when the two are placed side by side. The cover of the plaintiffs' stove is concave; there is a convexity about the cover of the defendants. But all these differences in detail do not prevent the two designs from being essentially the same.

That is the conclusion at which I should arrive, seeing the two designs side by side and knowing nothing of the history of the case. But what is the evidence? It appears that the defendants employed a designer, and, after putting him in possession of the plaintiffs' stove, instructed him to make an original design for a similar article. Now, what was the meaning of that? In what respect was it to be a similar article? It was to be a stove. That could not be the meaning of it; there were many stoves. It could not merely mean that it was to be a hexagonal stove, because the defendants could have told their designer to make a hexagonal stove of a certain height without ever showing him or calling his attention to the plaintiffs'. It could not be merely that it was to have some open iron tracery about it, because instructions for a hexagonal stove with iron tracery and of a certain height would have been enough. What was the meaning of giving him the plaintiffs' stove, and telling him to make a similar article? Why, that the stove was to be similar in its essential features, and in that which made it attractive to the public, and in that which made it a good article of commerce. But it was to be original in design—that is to say, the defendants, although manufacturing an article which would appear to the public to be like the plaintiffs' stove, were to be able to point to originality in all its details. A clearer direction to a designer to make an obvious imitation, it seems to me, it would be difficult to find. That is what I understand the instructions to have been, and that is what the designer understood the instructions to be. It seems to me he followed out his instructions extremely well. Therefore we are not here left to the mere judgment of the eye. The history of the case shows that what was intended is what has been produced.

I can entertain no doubt, therefore, that in this case one of these is an obvious imitation of the other. I think that the learned judge in the court below erred in considering too much the details as essentials of the design. The designs may be the same, although the details largely differ. He pointed out that although in each case there was a cathedral window, it was a cathedral window of a different order of architecture in the two. No doubt, if the whole point of the design had consisted merely in a cathedral window of a particular style of architecture it would have been an answer to say, "I have made a cathedral window of a different kind; therefore my design is not the same as yours." But the design consists of the whole thing, in the proportion of the parts, the relation in height of the lower tracery to the window, and of the upper tracery to the window, and in the form of the lid. All these matters together make the design, and being able to point to a particular part or parts and show that the differences are manifest does not answer the allegation that the one design is the same as the other. The learned judge in the court below said that there was originality in the plaintiffs' idea of putting in a cathedral window. He added, however, that "the plaintiffs unfortunately have lost the benefit of their original idea, but they have lost it through another design, which is original except in so far as the idea was borrowed from their design." But, if that which was certainly a part at least of the originality of their idea was copied from them, then it is difficult to see how the second can be an original design. The truth is that the defendants took all the essential elements of the plaintiffs' design.

The learned counsel for the defendants have contended that even if the conclusion be arrived at that the defendants design as a whole was an infringement of the plaintiffs', yet the plaintiffs cannot succeed on several grounds. First, it is said that when the plaintiffs registered their design they registered it with a statement of the nature of the design as applicable for the pattern and for the shape and configuration; and that therefore they claimed it for each of those apart from the other. The defendants contend that if you take the shape there is not sufficient originality about the shape to make it a good design for a new design for the shape alone, and that therefore the registration is bad, and the plaintiffs have no rights.

The rules of 1890 relating to the registration of designs contain a rule (rule 9) which prescribes that there shall be a statement of the nature of the design accompanying the application for the registration of the design, whether it is applicable for pattern, shape, or configuration. That rule makes it essential for the person claiming the design to distinguish between those several things named in the rule, and to show for which of them he makes his claim. Well, the rule is not a very intelligible one. The thing to be registered is the design, which, of course, is speaking of the design as a totality. Then the applicant is to state the nature of the design, whether applicable for shape, pattern, or configuration. That is not very intelligible. It would be intelligible if the rule said that the applicant shall state whether what he claims as novel is shape, pattern, or configuration. But the language used—whether the design is applicable for either one or other of those things—according to its literal interpretation, is certainly not very intelligible. But I do not, in the present case, intend to decide whether this amounts to a separate claim by the plaintiffs for the pattern, and for the shape, and for the configuration. It is unnecessary to decide it. It might have been necessary if the infringement had been something different from what it is. Whether the plaintiffs claim these several parts or not, they claim the whole—they claim the design. Whether the insertion of those words which the rule requires to be inserted has the effect contended for I do not know, and I do not propose to say. It is unnecessary to say so here. But whatever they mean they do not, to my mind, prevent the registration from being a registration of the design as a whole. What is registered is the design; and there is no difficulty here, to my mind, in determining what the design registered was. That design, I think, has been obviously imitated by the defendants. Therefore I do not say more upon that point.

Then it is said that the plaintiffs are disentitled to relief because they have misled the public. It is said that they have obtained registration for their handles to the stove and for a cover to the stove—a particular pattern of ornamentation of the cover—and that they have first of all on stoves which they have sold put the registered number of the original design and also put the registered number of the designs which they registered subsequently as applicable to particular parts of the stove. It is said that that was misleading, and that the public would not know to what those numbers referred; and if the lid was a new registered lid, then they ought not to have put on the number of the original design, because that was a different design.

Now, there is nothing in the Act of Parliament which deprives a person who has registered a design of his right to protection and to prevent infringement of it if he puts on articles that he sells registered numbers which ought not to be there. If he sells without putting the registered number on a design which is within his registration, then no doubt he loses his protection; and it may sometimes be a difficult question to know exactly what numbers he ought to put on, and on what parts of the articles sold. It is only natural that a person who has registered designs should err on the side of caution, because if he does not put the number there, he certainly loses his rights. But there is no clause in the Act of Parliament which deprives him of his rights if he mistakenly puts numbers on the articles which he sells which have no business there. Now, what might be the case if a person were fraudulently to put numbers on with a view to misleading the public it is unnecessary to say. But it appears to me to be a most hopeless contention to suggest that a person owning registered designs, who in the course of his business may sell some articles bearing registered numbers which should not be there, thereby, without any such provision in the Act of Parliament, loses his rights as a registered proprietor. If the courts were so to hold, they would be making the law; they would not be interpreting it. There is no authority for making it the law, and it seems to me that it would be a very bad and very senseless law, and one tolerably certain in some cases to work great injustice. Therefore, I have no disposition to make any such law, even if I felt myself entitled so to do. The whole of these matters were quite unconnected with the defendants or their infringement, and are as straws seized by a drowning man to save himself if he can, and have about the same value as straws have for that purpose.

I think that that disposes of the whole of the arguments addressed to us upon the first claim in respect of the first infringement. Then what happened was this. The plaintiffs made what they considered an improved design. It had many of the essential features of their first design, but they considered it an improvement. In it the stove had an extended base, and was considered by the plaintiffs to be in that respect advantageous. The year after the plaintiffs had brought out their new design, and had placed their new stove made according to that design upon the market, the defendants brought out a cathedral stove with all the upper part of it and with all the substantial features which existed in the plaintiffs' original stove and with the extended base. Now, the argument is that although the defendants' stove may be an infringement of the plaintiffs' first registered design because it contains its essential features, yet it is not an infringement of the plaintiffs' second registered design. It is said that the second registered design, having regard to the existence of the first, can only be maintained in respect of the details of the modification, and that the details of the modification are not the same in the defendants' as they are in the plaintiffs'. If that could be made out, it might well be a good defence. First of all, was there anything to prevent the plaintiffs from obtaining protection for their second as a new and original design? I cannot see that there was. It is a new design. It is not a design identical with the design already registered. No doubt it is largely founded upon it. That is admitted. It professes to be largely founded upon it. But you may have a new design, though the design is founded upon one which you have previously registered. Nothing has been produced which to my mind shows that there was such a common knowledge before the date of the second registration as to prevent that design then registered from being a new and original design.

Then, has the defendant infringed? Now, I quite agree that on this part of the case the matter is not so clear as, to my mind, it is on the question of what I will call the first infringement. There is more to be said; but still, applying the test which has been applied in previous cases as the proper test, I own it appears to me that the design complained of, the defendants' design, is an obvious imitation of the plaintiffs.' Now, the defendant might have enlarged the base of a stove without infringing the plaintiffs' design. There is a multitude of ways in which it might be done. But whether they would be appropriate, whether they would be good designs, whether they would make a design which as a whole was effective, would depend upon the way in which this was done. Now, the scheme or idea of the plaintiffs' modification, which they registered, was to provide this enlarged base by a sloping projection immediately under the windows which formed the feature of the stove—making, as Mr. Bousfield has said, something that may be called a window-sill—and then from that point having the sides of the stove again perpendicular, and bringing the line and making the continuity between the line at each corner of the hexagonal and a line as found again below this window-sill. It is difficult to describe the thing, but that one may call the general feature of the design.

Now, the same features are found in the defendants' design. There might be hundreds of ways in which you might make an enlarged base without infringing that, and very possibly no other way would have produced the same general and pleasing effect. If I look at these two side by side, it seems to me that the same essence of the design is to be found in each of the two. Therefore I come to the conclusion that a case of infringement is made out as regards the second infringement claimed, as well as the first. Mr. Moulton suggested it would be very hard on the public that a person who had registered a design could, by insignificant variations, registered from time to time, extend the term for which he obtained protection. What seems to me to be the complete fallacy in the argument is that it does not extend the term, but as soon as the original registration expires everybody can exactly copy what was originally registered. If those variations are immaterial, and not improvements, and not advantageous, and do not make a wholly new and desirable design, anybody desiring to manufacture the article represented has only to avoid those variations. He is at full liberty to make use of the original design as he pleases. Therefore I cannot see that the public is in the slightest degree affected if those alterations and modifications are immaterial, slight, and unimportant, and do not make the thing as a whole a desirable thing, which the public will seek to become the owners of. If they do, what better proof can you have that it was a new and original design, which the person designing ought to be entitled to have the benefit of? In the present case there has been nothing to show that enlarged bases for stoves, anything like either those of the plaintiffs or the defendants, had been before the public previously. The plaintiffs follow the introduction to public notice of their first design by a second. The following year the defendants introduce their second design, the first being copied from the plaintiffs, and bearing a strong resemblance to it. Now, that seems to me certainly to assist the conclusion, which I should arrive at independently, that there was a novelty in the plaintiffs' second design—in that modification something which made the thing as a whole a desirable design—and that the defendants, seeing that, sought to put before the public something which they might sell which contained the essential features of the plaintiffs' second design. For these reasons I think that the case is made out as regards the second design, as well as the first. I think, therefore, that the judgment of the learned judge in the court below must be reversed, and that judgment must be entered for the plaintiffs in the action, with an injunction in the usual terms, and the usual inquiry as to damages. There will also be an order for delivery up or destruction, as is usual in these cases. The defendants must, of course, pay the costs of the action and the costs of this appeal.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—The plaintiffs in this action are a limited company, and the proprietors of two registered designs, one registered in April, 1891, and the other in June, 1892.

They bring this action against the defendants for having infringed those registered designs. The case came on for trial before Kekewich, J., when, having heard the plaintiffs' case, he arrived at the conclusion that they had made out no infringement. Being of that opinion, all other matters became immaterial, and accordingly the learned judge gave judgment for the defendants. The plaintiffs appeal to this court, and other matters have been argued before this court, we being of opinion that if we came to the conclusion that there had been an infringement we could settle those other matters which would, I understand, have come before Kekewich, J., if he had not stopped the case in the manner in which he did.

Now, the points seem to me to arise in this order: First, the plaintiffs must show as regards both their registered designs that they had a new and original design which had not previously been registered; and they must show some substantial novelty in the design, having regard to the nature of the article itself. Many printed documents were put in in this court for the purpose of showing that the design which was registered in April, 1891, was not a new and original design, because of matters which were well known to the trade and to the public prior to that date.

Now, in my opinion, they wholly failed in this. Nothing prior to April, 1891, was shown to lead the court to the conclusion that any stove similar in design to that which the plaintiffs had registered in April, 1891, had been in vogue, or known at all; and therefore that part of the case fails for the defendants.

The next point which arises is this: The defendants say that the plaintiffs' claim is bad, because what they claimed in their application for registration was in respect of pattern, ornament, shape, and configuration. They claimed in respect of each of those separately; they did not claim for those collectively. And defendants went on to say that as regards shape that would be a bad claim; because, as they alleged, a similar shape for a hexagonal stove standing upright was known before. But, in my opinion, whatever this claim may embrace, it does embrace these matters collectively. The plaintiffs' claim is in respect of the design, and they claim as part and parcel of that design the pattern, ornament, shape, and configuration. The word "totally" has been used more than once during this case. I adopt that word. The plaintiffs claim the design—the pattern, ornament, shape, and configuration—that is to say, the totality of the design. When that was put to Mr. Moulton, because he took the point that the claim was for separate and distinct matters and not for a totality, he said: "If that is the view of the construction which is to be put upon this registration, then I have nothing to say as regards the infringement of the registration No. 1." I think Mr. Moulton was wise as regards that. Speaking for myself, I never saw a more palpable infringement. Speaking for myself, I say this—I said it in the course of the argument—that if I went into a shop and saw the plaintiffs' cathedral stove, and ordered it, and the shopkeeper sent me home the defendants', I should not have the slightest idea that I had not got what I had ordered. At a distance they are entirely similar. One is an obvious imitation of the other. But I agree that if they are brought into close proximity, and the tracing and so on pointed out, of course one can see a dissimilarity between the one stove and the other. But it is such a dissimilarity that in my judgment, if they were not together, no one could carry those dissimilarities in his mind. Therefore to say that one is not an infringement of the other is to say what, in my judgment, in the face of the facts of this case, is not the truth.

I desire to add a few words also upon a matter which has been touched upon by Lord Herschell. It is the manner in which the defendants set about making their stove which we have held to be an infringement. Mr. Priest, who was a witness, and who, my brother Kekewich remarked, gave his evidence very fairly, said this: "The defendants brought me the plaintiffs' stove." What did they do that for? They brought or sent to him the plaintiffs' stove. The witness proceeded: "They gave me instructions to make an original design for a similar article, and to make it of similar size to the plaintiffs'. And, as I understood, it was to have the same number of sides." Put that together, and ask what is the meaning of that. You make an original design. You make a design which will stand attack, but make it as near to the plaintiffs' "as ever you can." That is the meaning of that order, and the result of Mr. Priest's work is that we have these two stoves, which are as similar as possible to each other, except in some parts of the tracery. That the one is a mere colourable imitation of the other I have not the slightest doubt. Therefore it seems to me that as regards this first registration of April, 1891, the plaintiffs have made out their case.

There was a point taken about the plaintiffs having placed some numbers upon some other stoves which they subsequently made, and after the infringement had taken place complained of in this action. It is said that that was not right. Lord Herschell has dealt with that point. He himself has said that it is catching at a straw. I quite agree with him in that. I am not quite clear that I ever grasped the point, because I do not think any point in substance existed in it as regards the defence to this action.

